them, tyed him to his Chariot, and dragged him thamefully about the field, felling the dead bodie to his father Priamus for a very great ransome. But his crueltic and controusnesses were not long vnreuenged; for he was shortly after slaine with an arrow by Paris, as Homer fayes in the Seaan gate, or as others in the Temple of Apollo, whither he came to have married Polyxena the daughter of Priamus, with whom he was too farre in loue, hauing flaine so many of her brethren, and his body was ranfomed (as Lycophron faith) at the felfe famerate that Hectors was by him fold for.

Not long after this, Penthefilea Queene of the Amazons arrived at Troy; who after fome proofe given of her valour, was flaine by Pyrrhus the fonne of Achilles.

Of the taking of Troy, the wooden Horse, the Booke of DARES and DYCT is, the Colonies of the reliques

Inally after the death of many worthy persons, on each side, the Cistic was taken by night, as all writers agree: but whether by the treassion of Eneau and Antieney; or by a woodden Horse, as the Poets, and common same (which followed the Poets) shaued editured, it is vocertaine. Some write that woon one of the gates of Trey called Seau, was the image of a horse, and that the Greekes entring by that gate, gaue occasion to the report, that the Citie was taken by an artificiall horfe. It may well bee that with some wodden engine, which they called an Horse, they either did batter the wals, as the Romans in after-times yied to doe with the Ramme: or scaled the wals vpon the fudden, and so tooke the Citie. As for the hiding of men in the hollow bodie of a wodden horfe, it had beene a desperate aduenture, and serving to no purpose. For either the Troians might have perceived the deceit, and flaine all those Princes of Greece, that were inclosed in it (which also by such as maintaine this re-20 port they are faid to have thought ypon) or they might have left it a fewe dayes without the Citie ( for it was vnlikely, that they should the very first day both conclude vpon the bringing it into the towne, and breake downe their walles vpon the suddaine to doe it ) by which meanes they who were shut into it, must have perifhed for hunger, if they had not by iffuing forth valeafonably discoursed the inuention. Whereas further it is faid, that this horse was built to high and great that it could not bee brought into the towne through any of the gates, and that thereforethe Troians were faine to pull downe a part of their wall, to make way for it. through which breach the Greekes did afterwards enter; it is hereby manifest that the inclosing of so many principall men was altogether needleffe, considering that 20 without their helpe there was way fufficient for the armie, so that the surpriling of any gate by them was now to no purpole.

John Baptista Gramay in his Historic of Asia, discoursing of this war, faith that the Greekes did both batter the wall with a wodden engine, and were also let into the Citic by Antenor, at the Scaan gate: the townsmen sleeping and drinking without feare or care, because the fleete of the Gracians had hoisted faile, and was gone the day before to the Ile of Tenedos, thereby to bring the Troians into fecuritie. That the Citie was betrayed the bookes of Dares and Dietys must proue, which whether we now have the same that were by them written, it may be suspected; for surely they who have made mention of these writers in auncient times, would not as they 40 did, have followed the reports of Homer and others quite contradictorie in most points to these two authors, without once taking notice of the opposition, which they having ferued in that warre made against the Common report had it not been that either those bookes were even in those times thought frivolous; or else contained no fuch repugnancie to the other authours as now is found in them.

Alfo concerning the number of men flaine in this warre which Dares and Dyctis fay to have been about 600000. on the Troian lide, and more than 800000. of the Greekes, it is a report meerely fabulous; for a funch as the whole fleete of the Greeks was reckoned by Homer, who extolled their armie and deedes as much as hee could, to bee formewhat leffe than 1200. faile, and the armye therein transpor-50 ted ouer the Greeke leas, not much about 100000 men according to the rate formerly mentioned. But it is the common falhion of men to extol the deeds of their Aunclents: for which cause both Homer magnified the Captains of the Greekes, that ferued in the war; and Virgil with others were as diligent in commending & extolling the Troians and their Citie, from which the Romanes descended. Yeathe Athenians long after in the warre which Nerwes the Perfun King made against all Greece, did not for beare to vaunt of the great cunning which Mnejteus the Jonne of Peters had thewed in marshalling the Grecian army before Troy: whereupon, as if it had beene a matter of much consequence, they were so proud, that they refused to yeeld vnto Gelon King of almost all Sicily, the Admiraltie of their Seas, not with standing that hee promifed to bring 200. good fighting thips, and 30000 men for their defence.

The like vanitie possessed many other Cities of Greece, and many Nations in these parts of the world, which have striven to bring their descent from some of the Princes, that warred at Troy: all difficulties or vnlikelihoods in fuch their Pedigree notwithstanding. But those Nations which indeed, or in most probabilitie came of 10 the Troians, were the Albanes in Italy; and from them the Romanes, brought into that Countrey by Aneas : the Venetians first feated in Padua, and the Countrie adjoyning by Antenor: the Chaonians planted in Epirus by Helenus, the sonne of King Priamus. To which Hellanicus addeth that the posteritie of Hector did resemble fuch of the Troians as were left, and raigned ouer them about Troy.

ð. V I.

Of the distresses and dispersions of the Greekes returning from Troy.

Oncerning the Greekes, they taked as much milerie as they had brought upon the Treians. or Thueidides notes that by reason of their long abode at the fiege, they found many alterations when they returned: fothat many were driven by their borderers from their auncient feats: many were expelled their Countries by faction: fome were flaine anone after their arrivall; others were debarred from the Soueraigntic among their people, by fuch as had flayed at home. The cause of all which may feeme to have beene the differsion of the armie, which weakened much by the calamities of that long warre, was of little force to repell injuries, being divided into 30 formany peeces under feuerall Commaunders, not very well agreeing. For (Lefides other quarrels arising vpon the division of the bootie, and the like occasions ) at the time when they should have set faile, Agamemnon and his brother fell cut, the one being desirous to depart immediatly, the other to stay and performe some sacrifices to Minerus. Hereupon they fell to hot wordes, halfe the fleet remaining with Agamemnen, the rest of them sailing to the Ile of Tenedos; where when they arrived, they could not agree among themselves, but some returned back to Agamemnon, others were dispersed, each holding his owne course. But the whole Fleet was fore vexed with tempelts : for Palliss ( as Homer faith ) would not bee perswaded in

They who returned fafe were Neflor, and Pyrrhus, whom Orefles afterward flew: also Idomeneus, and Philottetes, who neverthelesse, as Virgilitels, were driven soone after to feeke new feats : Idomeneus among the Salentines, and Philochetes at Petilia in Italie. Agamemnon likewise returned home, but was forthwith slaine by his wife and by the adulterer Agyilhus, who for a while after vsurped his Kingdome. Menelius wandring long vpon the Seas, came into £gypt, either with Helen, or (as may rather sceme) to fetch her. Viffes, after ten yeeres, having lost all his company, got home in poore estate, with much adoe recourring the mastershippe of his owne house. All the rest either perished by the way, or were driven into exile, and faine to feeke out new habitations.

Aiax the fonne of Oileus was drowned; Tencer fled into Cyprus; Diomedes to King Daunus, who was Lord of the Japyges in Apulia; some of the Locrians were driven into Affricke, others into Italie, all the East part whereof was called Magna Gracia, by reason of so many townes which the Greekes were driven to erect to creek upon that coast. Finally it appeares in Homer that the Greeian Ladies, whose husbands had been at the warre of Troy, were wont to call it; The place where the Greekes fuffered miserie, and the valuckie Citie not to be mentioned. And thus much for Troy and those that warred there: the ouerthrow of which Citie, as hath beene faid, happened in the time of Habdon Judge of Ifrael, whom Samfon after a variance or Interregnum for certaine yeeres succeeded.

CHAP. XV. Of SAMSON, ELI, and SAMVEL.

HE birth and actes of Samfon are written at large in 2070. the 13.14.15. and 16. of Indres; and therefore I shall not need to make a repetition therof. But thefe things I gather out of that Storie. First that the Angell of God forbad the wife of Manoah the mother of Samfon, to drinke wine or ftrong drinke, or to cate any vnclean meate, after the was conceived with childe, because those strong liquors hinder the strength, and as it were wither and shrinke the child in the mothers wombe. Though this were cuen the counsell of God himselfe, and delinered by his Angell, yet it feemeth that many women of this age have not read, or at least will not believe this precept; the most part for bearing nor drincks. nor meats, how ftrong or vncleane focuer, filling themselues with all forts of wines. and with artificiall drincks farre more forcible; by reason whereof, so many wretched feeble bodies are borne into the world, and the races of the able and strong men

Secondly it is to be noted, that the Angell of God refused the facrifice which Mamoah would have offered him, commaunding him to prefent it vnto the Lord; and therefore those that professed distinction by the helpe of Angels, to whom also they facrifice, may affuredly know that they are Deuils who accept therof and not good Angels, who receive no worthip that is proper to God.

Thirdly, this Samfon was twice betrayed by his wines, to wit, by their importunitie and deceitful teares : by the first he lost but a part of his goods : by the second his life. Quemnullavis superare potuit, voluptas euertit: Whom no force could onermaster, Voluptuousnesse ouerturned.

Fourthly we may note, that he did not in all deliner Ifrael from the oppreffion of the Philiftims; though in some fort he reuenged, and defended them : for notwithstanding that he had slaine 30. of them in his first attempt, burnt their Corne in haruest time, and given them a great overthrow instantly you it : yet so much did Ifrael feare the Philistims, as they affembled 2 000, men out of Inda, to befree Samfon in the rocke or mountaine of Etam, vling these wordes. Knowest not thou that the Philistims are Rulers over vs? &c. After which they bound him, and delive-50 red him vnto the Philiftims, for feare of their reuenge; though he was no fooner loofened, but he gaue them another overthrow and flew 1000, with the jawbone of

Lastly, being made blinde, and a prisoner by the treason of his wife, hee was content to end his owne life, to be auenged of his enemies, when he pulled downe the pillars of the house at the feast wherto they sent for Samfon to deride him till which time he bare his affliction with patience : but it was truely faid of Seneca; Patientia Sapelasa vertitur in furorem, Patience often wounded is converted into furie : neither is it at any time so much wounded by paine and losse, as by derision and contumelie.

He Storie of Elithe Priest, who succeeded Samson, is written in the beginning of Samuel; who forctold him of the destruction of his house, for the wickednesse of his sonnes, which he suppressed his house, for the wickednesse of his sonnes, which he suppressed not, neither did he punish them according to their deserts; whose sinnes were horrible, both in abusing the Sacrifice, and pro-phaning and polluting the holy places: though Leui Ben Gersen to extenuate this filthie offence of forcing the women by the sonnes of Eli, hath a contrarie opinion. In this time therefore it pleased God to cast the Israelites under the swords of the Philiftims; of whom there perilhed in the first incounter 4000, and in the fecond battell 30000. footmen; among whom the fonnes of Eli being flaine, their 20 father (hearing the lamentable fuccesse) by falling from his chaire, brake his necke. Hee was the first that obtained the High-Priesthood of the stocke of Ithamar the sonne of Auron, before whose time it continued successively in the race of Eleazar the eldest brother of Ithamar: for Aaron was the first, Eleazar the second, Phinees the fonne of Eleazar the third, Abifue the fonne of Phinees the fourth, his fonne Bocci the fift, Ozethe sonne of Bocci the fixt, and then Eli, as Tolephus and Lyranus out of divers 1. Chron. 6. ed after Eli to the time of Salomon who cast out Abiathar, and established Sadock and Achimaas and their fucceffors. The Arke of God which Ifrael brought into the field, was in this battell taken by the Philistims. For as Danid witnesseth, God 20 greatly abhorred Ifrael, fo that he for looke the habitation of Shilo: even the Tahernacle where he dwelt among men, and delinered his power into captinitie &c.

Now as it pleased Godat this time, that the Arke whereby himselfe was reprefented, should fall into the hands of the Heathen, for the offences of the Priests and people fo did he permitthe Chaldrans to destroy the Temple built by Salomon; the Romanes to ouerthrow the second Temple; and the Turkes to ouerthrow the Christian Churches in Asia and Europe. And had not the Israelites put more confidence in the facrament, or representation which was the Arke, then in God himselfe, they would have observed his Lawes, and served him onely : which when socuer they did, they were then victorious. For after the captivitie they had no Arke 40 at all, nor in the times of the Macchabees: and yet for their pietic it pleased God to make that familie as victorious, as any that garded themselues by the signe in stead of the substance. And that the Arke was not made to the end to be carried into the field as an enfigne; David witneffed when he fled from Absalon. For when the Priests would have carried the Arke with him; he forbad it, and caused it to be returned into the Citic, vling these words. If I shall finde favour in the eyes of the Lord, hee will bring mee againe: if not, let him doe to me as feemeth good in his eyes.

The Troians beleeved that while their Palladium or the image of Minerua was kept in Troy, the Citic should neuer bee ouerturned: so did the Christians in the last fatall battell against Saladine carrie into the field, as they were made beleeue, 50 the very Croffe whereon Christ died, and yet they lost the battell, their bodies and the wood. But Chrisostome vpon Saint Matthew ( if that bee his worke) giueth a good judgement, speaking of those that ware a part of Saint Johns Gospell about their neckes, for an amulet or preservative. Si tibi ea non prosunt in auribus quomodò proderunt in Collo? If those words doe not profit men in their earcs ( to wit, the hearing of the Gospell preached ) how should it profit them by hanging it about their neckes? For it was neither the wood of the Arke, nor the wood of the Croffe, but the reuerence of the Father that gaue the one for a memoric of his Couenant : and the Faith in his Sonne, which shed his blood on the other for redemptition that could or can profit them and vs. either in this life or after it.

CHAP-15. S.2. of the Historie of the World.

The Philistims returning with the greatest victorie and glorie which ever they obtained, carried the Arkeof God with them to Azotus, and fet it vp in the house of Dagon their Idoll: but that night the Idoll fell out of his place, from about to the ground, and lay under the Arke. The morning following they tooke it vp, and fet it vp, and fet it againe in his place. And it fell the fecond time, and the head brake front the bodie, and the hands from the armes, shewing that it had nor power, nor vnderstanding in the presence of God; for the head fell off, which is the seat of reason, and knowledge, and the hands (by which wee execute strength) were fundred from the armes. For God and the Deuillinhabit not in one house, nor in one heart. And if this Idoll could not indure the representation of the true God, it is not to be maruailed, that at fuch time as it pleased him to couer his onely begotten with flesh, and fent him into the world, that all the Oracles wherein the Diuell derided and betrayed mortall men lost power, speech, and operation at the instant. For when that true light which had neuer beginning of brightnesse, brake through the clouds of a virgins bodie, shining vpon the earth which had beene long obscured by Idolatrie, all those fouleand flinking vapours vanished. Plutarch rehearseth a memorable accident in that age concerning the death of the great God Pan, as hee stileth him : where (as ignorant of the true cause) he searcheth his braines for many reasons of so great an alteration : yet finds he none out but friuolous. For not onely this olde Deuill did then die as he supposed, but all the rest, as Apollo, Jupiter, Diana, and the whole rable became speachlesse. Now while the Philistims triumphed after this victorie, God strook them with the gricuous disease of the Hamorrhoides of which they perished in great numbers. For 30 it is written that the Lord destroyed them. It was therefore by generall consent ordered that the Arke should be removed from Azotus to Gath or Gethanother of the five great Cities of the Philistims; to proue, as it seemeth whether this disease were fallen on them by accident, or by the hand of God immediatly : but when it was brought to Gath and received by them, the plague was yet more grieuous and mortall. For the hand of the Lord was against this Citie with a very great destruction, and hee (mote the men of the Citie both (mall and great, &c. And being not yet fatisfied, they of Gath lent the Arke to Ekron or Accaron, a third Citic of the Philiftims : but they also felt the same smart, and cryed out that themselves and their people should be slaine thereby; For there was a destruction and death throughout all the Citie. In the end, by 45 the adule of their Prices, the Prince of the Philistims did not onely resolut to return the Arke, but to offer gifts vnto the God of Ifrael, remembring the plagues which had fallen on the Lyptians, when their hearts were hardened to hold the people of God from their inheritance, and from his feruice by strong hand. Wherefore confelling the power of the God of Ifrael to bee almightie, and that their owne Idels were fubicet thereunto, they agreed to offer a finne offering, vling these words: 50 yee shall give glorie to the God of I fract that hee may take his hand from you, and from your C.6.0 9. Godsand from your land. And what can be a more excellent witnessing, than where an enemie doth approue our cause? according to Aristotle; Pulchrum est testimonium, quo nostra probantur ab hostibus. So did Pharao confesse the living God, when he was 50 plagued in Egypt: and Nabuchodonofor, and Darius, when they had feene his mira-

This counsell therefore of the Priests being imbraced, and the golden Hamorhoides, and the golden Mice prepared, they caused two milch kine to bee chosen, fuch as had not beene yoked, and a new Cart or carriage to bee framed; but they durft not drine or direct it to any place certaine, thereby to make triall whether it were indeed the hand of God that had ftrucken them. For if the Arke of God were carried towards Bethfhemesh and into the territoric of Israel: then they should re-Solue that from God onely came their late destruction. For the Philistims knewe that the milch kine which drew the Arke, could not be forced from their calues, but that they would have followed them wherefocuer; much leffe when they were left to themfelues would they trauell a contrary way. For in the darkest night in the world if calues be removed from their dammes, the kine will follow them through woods, and defartes by the foote, till they finde them. But the kine trauailed directly towards Bethfhemelh: and when they came into the fields thereof, to wit, 10 of one Jolua of the same Citie, they stood still there; which when the Princes of the Philistimes perceived, they returned to Ekron: After which, God spared not his owne people the Bethshemites, in that they presumed to looke into the Arke. And because they knew God and his commanndements and had beene taught accordingly: he strooke them more gricuously than he did the Heathen, for there perished of them fiftie thousand and seventie. From hence the Arke was carried to Kirriath-iearing and placed in the house of Abinadab; where it is written that it remained twentie veere in the charge of Eleazar his fonne, vntill Dauid brought it to Hierusalem.

Now whereas it is faid, that in the meane while the Arke was in Nob. Milbah and Galesta, it was the Tabernacle, which was at this time severed from the Arke: 20 or at least, it was for the a present occasion brought to these places, and anone returned to Kiriath-jearim.

Of SAMVEL and of his Government.

Hefe Tragedies ouerpast and ended, Samuel, to whom God appeared while hee was yet a childe, became now Iudge and Gouernour of Ifrahad three sounes Gerson, Cheath, and Marani: Cheath had Amram, and Izaar: of Amram came Moses and Aaron; of Izaar, Chore: and of the familie of Chore, Samuel. His father Eleana a Leute, was called an Ephratean, not cyvhich regi. that the Leuites had any proper inheritance, but because he was of c Mount Ephraim, like as Iesse, Danids father was called an Ephratean, because borne at Ephrata, or Ephrata, as ep. Bethelem. Hannah his mother being long fruitlesse, obtained him of God by prayers s, whence for and teares: it being an exceeding shame to the Iewish women, to be called barren diffinction we in respect of the bleffing of God both to Abraham that his seed should multiply, as reade Ruib, 1.2. the Starres of Heauen, and the fands of the Sea, as in the beginning to Adam, In-Bothleshemo to crease and multiply, &c. and in Deuteronomie the seauenth; There shall bee neither male AD bude, the towne nor female barren among you.

Samuel was no fooner borne, but that his mother according to her former vowe dedicated him to God, and his feruice, to which the delinered him euen from the dugge. For as the first borne of all that were called Nazarites, might be redeemed till they were fine yeeres old for fine sheekles, and betweene fine yeeres and twentie is in Mount E- for twentic sheekles: so was it not required by the Law that any of the race of the Leuites should be called to serue about the Tabernacle, till they were fine and twen-Edwards is put tie veeres old.

for he that is now called a Prophet, was in old time called a Seer. And although it pleased God to appeare by his Angels to Moses, as before to Abraham, Isac, and Jacob: yet in the time of Eli, there was no manifest vision; not that Cod had altogether with-drawne his grace from Ifrael: but as the Chaldaan Paraphraft hath it, those sam.12. reuelations before Samuels time, were more clouded and obscure. The places wherin Samuel judged were Maspha or Mitspa, seated on a hill in Beniamin neare Inda: also booke, 6.12.5.1 Gilgal, and Bethel, of which we have spoken elsewhere.

The Philistims taking knowledge of the affembly and preparation for Warre at Mispain the beginning of Samuels government, gathered their Armie and marched 10 towards the Citie: at whose approch the Israelites strucken with scare, and with the memorie of their former flaughters and seruitude, befought Samuel to pray to God for them: who was *then performing his facrifice when the Philiftms were in view. * Philiphere-But God being moued with Samuels prairies (as he was by those of Moses, when Is-parison Same rael fought against the Amalekites at their first entrance into Arabia ) It pleased him the secol Kang with thunder and temposit to dissers and hours desirable Amin of Reme, that with thunder and tempest to disperse and beate downe the Armic of the Philistims, when as hee according to the prophecie of Hanna, Samuels Mother. And the better to attend their purposes, and to withstand any of their attempts: the Israelites made peace with the Amorites, or Canaanites, which lay on their backs, and to the North of them, that they might not be affaulted from diuers parts at once; having the Philistims towards the West and Sea-coast, the Canaanite toward the North and East, and the Idumite on the South. The estate being thus settled, Samuel for the 30 case of the people gaue audience and judgment in divers places by turnes, as hath beene elfewhere faid.

CHAP. XVI. Of SAVL.

Of the deliberation to change the government into a Kingdome.

V τ when age now beganne to ouer-take Samuel, and that hee was not able to vider-goe the burthen of fo carefull a gouernment, he put off from himfelfe the waight of the affaires on his Sonnes, loel and Abijah, who judged the people at Beersbeba, a Citic, the very vtmost towards the South of Iudea. And as the place was inconvenient and farre away, so were themselves no lesse removed from the justice and vertue of their Father. For the thirst of couetousnesse the more it (walloweth, the more it drieth, and defireth, finding taft in nothing but gaine; to recouer which they did set the Law at a price, and sold Justice and judgment to the best Chapmen. Which when the Elders of Ifrael observed, and faw that Sannel as a naturall man (though a Prophet) could not fo well discerne the errours of his owne, they praied him to consent to their change of gouernment, and to make them a King, by whom they might be indeed as other Nations were; who might allo leade them to the Warre and defend them against their enemies. For after the ill and lamentable fucefife which followed the rule of Eli his sonnes, when those of Sannel by their first bloffomes promised to yeeld fruit no leffe bitter, they saw no way to put the gouernment from out his race, whom they so much reuerenced, but by the choise of a

In a cause of so great consequence and alteration, Samuel sought counsaile from 10 God: which furely he did not for the establishing of his owne Sonnes; who being as they were, God would not have approued his election. Now as it appeares by the Text, this speech or motion displeasing him, hee vsed his best arguments to dehort them : which when he perceited to bee ouer-feeble, hee delitered unto them from Gods reuelation, the inconveniences and miferies which should befall them. And yet, all which he fore-shewed was not intollerable, but such as hath beene borne, and is so still by free consent of the Subjects towards their Princes. For first he makes them know that the King will vse their sonnes in his owne scruice to make them his Horse-men, Chariotters, and Foot-men; which is not only not grieuous, but by the vaffalls of all Kings according to their birth and condition defired: it be- 20 ing very agreeable to Subjects of the best qualitie to command for the King in his Warres; and to till the ground no leffe proper and appertaining to those that are thereto bred and brought vp: so are likewise the offices of women-servants to dresse meate, to bake bread, and the like. But whereas immediately it is threatned: He will take up your Fields, and your Vineyards, and your best Olive trees, and give them to his seruants; with other oppressions; this hath given, and gives daily occasion to such as would be ruled by their owne discretion, to affirme that Samuel describeth here vnto them the power of a King, gouerned by his owne affections, and not a King that feareth God. But others vpon further examination construe this Textfarre otherwife, as teaching vs what Subjects ought with patience to beare at their Sourraignes 30 hand. The former opinion is grounded first upon that place of Deuteronomic, where God fore-sheweth this change of gouernment from Judges to Kings, and after he had forbidden many thinges vnto the Kings, as many wines, conetoufneffe, and the like; he commandeth that the Kings which were to raigne ouer Ifrael, should write the Law of Deuteronomie, or cause it to be written and to shew how greatly the King should honour the Law, he addeth, It shall be with him, and he shall reade therein all daies of his life: that he may learne to feare the Lord his God, and to keepe all the wordes of this Law, and thefe ordinances for to doe them : that he may prolong his daies in his Kingdome, he and his Sonnes. But to take away any other mans field, fay they, is contrarieto the lawes of God: in the same booke written. For it is said, That which 40 is just and right shalt thou follow, that thou masest line. Now if it bee not permitted to carrie away grapes more than thou canst cate out of an other mans vineyard, but forbidden by God : it is much leffe lawfull to take the vineyard it selfe from the ow-Dest. 33. v.34. ner, and give it to an other. Neither are the wordes of the Text (fay they) fuch as doe warrant the Kings of Ifrael, or make it proper vnto them, to take at will any thing from their vaffalls. For it is not faid that it shall be lawfull for the King, or the King may doe this or that: but it is written, that the King will take your Sonnes: and againe, this shall be the manner of the King that shall raigne ouer you. God thereby fore-shewing what power seucred from pietic, (because it is accountable to God only) will doe in the future. And hereof we finde the first example in Achab, 50 who tooke from Naboth both his Vineyard and his life, contrarie to the trust which God had put in him, of gouerning well his people. For God commanded, That his people should be judged with righteous judgement. Wherefore though the King had

money which he refused: yet because he was fallly accused and vniustly condemned (though by colour of law) how grieuosly Aebab was punished by God, the Scriptures rell vs. Neither was it a pleastificing for Aebab against the all-sightcous God, to say that it was done without his consent, and by the Elders of Israel. For God had not then left his people to the Elders, but to the King, who is called a luing Law, even as Dand tellificht of himselfte. Possifi me neaput gentium: For this of S. Augustine is very true. Simulata impocentia, non est innacentia: Simulata aquitas non est aquitas the consent of parties of Aebabplature precatum in que est insquitas & frimalatio; Faincal imacentee, and fained equitie are neither the one nor the other. but the fault or offence is three doubled.

10 in which there is both iniquitie and diffirmulation. Such in effect is their disputation who thinke this place to containe the description of a Tyrant. But the arguments on the contrarie side, as they are many and forcible, so are they well knownerousl; being excellently handled in that Princely discourse of the true law of free Monaches, which Treatise may not presume to abridge, much less here to insert. Only thus much I will say, that it practise doe show whe greatness of authoritie, cuen the best Kings of Inda and Israel were not so tied by any lawes, but that they did whatsoener they pleased in the greatest thinges; and commanded some of their owne Princes, and of their owne bretheren to be saine without any trial of law, being sometime by Prophets reprehended, sometime not. For though Daniel consolidation of So sense for the death of Prind, yee Salamon killing his elder brother and others, the same was not imputed with him as any offence.

That the flate of Issued in Outcome this change of gouernment, it was not only fore-told by Mossian Deuteronomic, but prophecial of by Issue in this Scripture. The Goals, Septer shall not alepart from Inda, 67c. It was also promised by God to Abrabam for a Goals, blessing. For it was not only assured that his issues should in number equal the Goals, Starres in heauen, but that Kings should proceede of him. Which state seeing it is framed from the Patterne of his fole rule, who is Lord of the Vniuerfall: and the excellencie thereof in respect to all other gouernments, hath beene by many indicious men handled and proued, I shall not neede to ouer-paint that which is gar-

30 nilhed with better colours already, than I can lay on.

In the time of the Indges enery man hath observed what civill Warre I freel hat; what outragious flaughters they committed upon each other; in what miscrable ferviewde they lined for many yeares; and when it fared best with them, they did but defend their owne. Territories, or recover fome parts thereof formerly lost. The Cansanites dwelt in the best values of the Countrie. The Ammonitarie held much of cilead outer Industrie the Philisms the Sca-coasts; and the Lebusties Hierafalem it selfe, till Danids time: all which that King did nor only conquer and stabilish, but hee mastered and subsected all the Neighbour Nations, and Kings, and made them his tributaries and wastalls. But whether it were for that the Israelite were moued by 40 those reasons, which allure the most of all Nations to liue under a Colonard, or whether by this meanes they fought to be cleared from the sonnes of Samuel, they be-ther by this meanes they fought to be cleared from the fonnes of Samuel, they became deafe to all the perfeadions and threats which Samuel vfed, infifting you this point that they would have a King, both to indge them and defend them: where when Samuel had warrant from God to confent, hee fent every man to his owne Citic and abiding.

 Of the election of Save.

Fter that Sanuel had difmiffed the affembly at Mizpah, he forbare the election of a King,till fuch time as he was therein directed by God.who fore-told him the day before, that he would prefent vnto him a man of the Land of Beniamin, whom hee commanded Sanuel to annoint. So

Samuel went vnto Ramath Sophim, to make a feast for the entertainement of Saul (whom yet he knew not, but knew the truth of Gods promiles) and saul also hauing wandred divers daies to seeke his Fathers Asses, at length by the aduise of his fernant transiled towards Ramath, to finde out a Seer or Prophet, hoping from him to be told what way to take, to finde his bealts. In which journey it pleafed God (who doth many times order the greatest thinges by the simplest passages and perfons) to elect Saulswho fought an Affe, and not a Kingdome : like as formerly it had pleased him to call Moses, while he fed the sheepe of Jethro; and after to make choise of David the yongest of eight sonnes, and by the Scriptures called a little one, who was then keeping of beatts, and changed his sheep-hooke into a Scepter, making 10 him of all other the most victorious King of Inda and Ifrael. So Iohn and Iacob were taken from casting their nets, to become Fishers of men, and honoured with the titles of Apofiles, a dignitic that died not in the grave, as all worldly Honours doe: but permanent and cuerlafting in Gods endleffe Kingdome.

When Samuel was entred into Ramath, he prepared a banquet for the King, whom he expected and staid his arrivall at the gate. Not long after came Saul, whom God thewed to Samuel, and made him know that it was the fame whom he had foretold him of that he should rule the people of God. Saul finding Samuel in the gate, but knowing him not, though a Prophet and Judge of Ifrael, much leffe knowing the Flonour which attended him : asked Samuel in what part of the Citie the Seer dwelt, 29 Samuel answered that himselfe was the man be sought, and praied Saul to go before him to the high place, where Samuel fetting him according to his degree, aboue all that were inuited, conferred with him afterwards of the affaires of the Kingdome. and of Gods graces to be bestowed on him, and the morning following annointed

After this he told him all that should happen him in the way homeward; that two men should incounter him by Rabels Sepulcher, who should tell him that his Asses were found; and that his Fathers cares were changed from the feare of looling his beafts, to doubt the loffe of his sonne: that he should then meete three other men in the plaine of Tabor; then a companie of Prophets : and that he should be partaker 30 of God: spirit and prophecie with them : and that thereby his condition and dispofition thould be changed from the vulgar into that which became a King elected and fauoured by God.

But the Prophets here spoken of, men indued with spirituall gifts, were not of the first and most reperenced number, who by dinine repelation fore-told things to come, reprehended without feare the errours of their Kings, and wrought mira-Chritin Wal 41, cles; of which number were Mofes, Iofua, Samuel, and after them Gad, Nathan, Alias, The Prim Elias, Elifeus, Ifay, Ieremie, and the rest; for these Prophets faith S. It is thinkes by the answere of *Vrim and Thumim: that is, by the answere of the Priest, plan that they wearing that mysterie vpon his brest when he asked counsaile of the Lord. But the pretious flones casting of lots was not only much vsed among the Ienes, but by many others, if not 50 nor any thing by all Nations. The Land of promife was divided by lot: God commanded lots to made by the Artificers. See be cast on the two Goates, which should be sacrificed, and which turned off: a si-Exed c.38. gure of Christs suffering, and our deliuerance, for whose garments the Iewes also cast lots. Cicero, Plantus, Pansanias, and others have remembred divers forts of lots, vied by the Romanes, Gracians, and other Nations: as in the division of grounds of honours; and in thinges to be vinder-taken; the two first kindes were called diviforie; the third diuinatorie; and into one of these three all may be reduced: all which kindes howfoeuer they may feeme chancefull; are yet ordered and directed by God : as in the Prouerbs. The lot is east into the lap, but the whole disposition is of the Lord. And in like fort fell the Kingdome of Ifrael on Saul, not by chance, but by Gods ordinance, who gaue Samuel former knowledge of his election : from which election Saul with-drew himselfe in modestie, as both Iosephus constersit, and as it may be gathered by his former answeres to Samuel, when he acknowledged himselfe 10 the least of the least Tribe. But Samuel inlightened by God, found where Saul was hidden, and brought him among the people, and he was taller than all the refl by the shoulders. And Samuel made them know that he was the chosen King of Ilrael, whereupon all the multitude fabited him King, and praied for him; yet some there were that enuied his glorie (as in all effates there are fuch) who did not acknowledge him by offering him prefents as the manner was : of whom Saul, to avoide fedition, 1. tooke no notice.

O fooner was Saul placed in the Kingdome; but that hee received knowledge that Nahas King of the Ammonites prepared to beliege labes Gilead : which Nation lince the great ouer-throw given them by tephia, neuer durst attempt any thing voon the ifriesites, till the beginning of Saul his rule. And although the Ammonites did illwaies attend vpon the aduantage of time, to recouer those Territories which first the morite, and then Ifraet disposses them of which they made the ground of their innation in tephta's time; yet they never perswaded themselves of more advantage 30 than at this present. For first they knew that there were many of the Israelites that did not willingly submit themselves to this new King: secondly they were remembred that the Philistims had not long before slaine 34000. of their men of Warre: and besides had vsed great care and pollicie that they should have no Smithes to make them fwords or speares : neither was it long before that of the Bethshemesites and places adioyning, there perithed by the hand of God more then 50000 and therefore in these respects, euen occasion it selfe inuited them to inlarge their Dominions vpon their borderers : Jabes Gilead being one of the nearest. Belides it may further be conjectured that the Ammonites were imboldened against labes Gilead, in respect of their weakenesse, since the Israelites destroied a great part of them, for not Indiati 40 ioyning with them against the Beniamites : at which time they did not only slaughter the men and male-children, but tooke from them their yong women, and gaue them to the Benjamites and therefore they were not likely to have beene increased to any great numbers : And if they had recourred themselves of this great calamitie, yet the Ammonite might flatter himselse with the opinion, that Israel having for long time been difarmed by the Philistims, was not apt to succour those whom they had so deeply wounded and destroied. But contrariewise when the tidings came to Saul of their danger, and that the Ammonites would give them no other condition to ransome themselves, but by pulling out their right eies, by which they should be vtterly disabled for the Warre, as elsewhere hath beene spoken: Saul, both to valew 50 himselfe in his first yeares raigne, and because perchance he was descended of one of those 400. Maides taken from the Gileadites, and given to the Beniamites, gave order to affemble the forces of Ifrael hewing a yoke of Oxen into peeces, and fending them by messengers ouer all the coasts, protesting thus. That who soener came not forth after SAVL and after SAMVEL, fo should his Oxen be served: threatning the people by their goodes, and not by their lines at the first. Seuen daies had Saul to affemblean Armie, by reason that the Gileadises had obtained the respite of these seuen daies to give Nahas the Ammonite an answere : who, could they have obtained any realonable condition, were contented to have feuered themselves from Israeli and to become Vassalls and Tributaries to the Heathen. In the meane while Saul affembled the forces, which repaired vnto him at Bezee, neare Iordan, that he might readily paffethe River; which done he might in one day with a speedy march ar-rine at labes, under the Hills of Gilead.

The Armie by Saul led confifting of three hundreth and thirtic thousand; he returned an answere to those of tabes, that they should assure themselues of succour 10 by the next day at noone. For as it feemeth Saul marched away in the latter part of the day, and went on all night; for in the morning watch hee surprized the Armie of Nahas the Ammonite. And to the end that he might fet on them on all fides, he divided his force in three parts, putting them to the fword, vntill the heate of the day, and the wearineffe of Sauls troupes, inforst them to give over the pursuit. Now the Ammonites were become the more carelesse and secure, in that those of Jabes promifed the next morning to render themselues and their Citie to their mercie. After this happy fuccesse the people were so farre in lone with their new King, that they would have flaine all those Ifractites that murmured against his election, had not himselfe forbidden and resisted their resolutions. Such is the condition of worldly 29 men, as they are violent louers of the profeerous, and base vasfalls of the time that flourisheth: and as despightfull and cruell without cause against those, whom any misaduenture, or other worldly accident hath throwne downe.

Sam.II.

After the Armieremoued, Samuel summoned the people to meet at Gilgal, where Saul was now a third time acknowledged, and as some Commenters affirme, anointed King; and here Samuel vsed an exhortation to all the affembly, containing precepts, and a rehearfall of his owne Justice, during the beginning of his government to that day. After Saul had now raigned one yeare before hee was established in Gilgal or Galgala, he strengthened himselfe with a good guard of 2000. chosen men, of which he affigned 1000, to attend on Ionathan his sonne at Gibeah, the Citie of his 30 natinitie: the rest hee kept about his owne person in Micmas; and in the Hill of

Of SAVLS disobedience in his proceedings in the Warres with the Philisims and Amalekites, which caused his for nall rejection.

TO NATHAN with his finall Armic or Regiment, that attended him, 40 taking a time of aduantage, furprized a Garrison of Philistims: the fame, as some thinke, which Saul past by, when he came from Rama where he was first annointed by Samuel, which they thinke to haue beene Cariath-iearim: because a place where the Philistims had a Garrison 1. Sam. 10. is called the Hill of God, which they understand of Cariath-icarim:

but Iunius vnderstands this Garrison to have beene at Gebab in Benismin neare Gibha where Ionathan abode with his thousand followers. How socuer by this it appeareth that the Philistims held some strong places, both in the times of Samuel, and of Saul, within the Territorie of Ifrael: and now being greatly inraged by this surprize they affembled 30000 armed Chariots, and 6000. Horfe, where-with they inuaded In- 50 des, and incampedat Machmas or Michmas, a Citie of Beniamin, in the direct way from Samaria to Hierusalem, and in the midst of the Land betweene the Sea and Iordan. With this fuddaine invalion the Ifraelites were strucken in fo great a feare, as fome of them hid themselues in the caues of the mountaines, other fled ouer Iordan into Gad and Gilead : Saul himfelfe with fome 2000, men of ordinarie, and many other people, staid at Galgala in Beniamin, not farre from the passage of 10/11a when hee led Ifrael ouer Iordan. Here Saul by Samuels appointment was to attend the comming of Samuel seauen daies; but when the last day was in part spent, and that Saul perceived his forces to diminish greatly, he prefumed (as some expound the place 1.Sam. 13.9.) to exercise the office which appertained not vnto him, and to offer a burnt offering and a peace offering vnto God, contrarie to the Ecclesiastical lawes of the Hebrewes, and Gods Commaundements : others expound the word obtalit, in this place, by obtulit per Sacer dotem, and so make the sinne of Saul not to have been any intrulion into the Priests office, but first a disobedience to Gods Commaundement. in not flaying according to the appointment 1. Sam. 10. 8. fecondly a diffidence or mistrust in Gods helpe, and too great relying vppon the strength of the people, whose departing from him he could not beare patiently; and lastly a Contempt of the holy Prophet Samuel, and of the helpe which the prayers of so godly a man might procure him. But whatfocuer was his finne, notwithstanding his excuses he 155am.c 13was by Samuel reprehended most sharply, in termes vnsitting his estate, had not extraordinarie warrant beene giuen to Samuel so to doe, from God himselfe, at which time also Samuel feared not to let him know, that the Kingdome should be conferred to another (a man after Gods owne heart) both from Saul and his posteritie. Persist.

After this Samuel and Saul returned to Gibeah, where Saul when he had taken view of his armie found it to confift of 600, men : for the most were fled from him and scattered, yea and among those that staid, there was not any that had either sword or speare, but Saul and his sonne Ionathan only. For the Philistims had not left them anv Smyth in all Ifrael, that made weapons; belides they that came to Saul came haftily, and left fuch weapons & armour as they had, behind them in the garrifons: for if they had had none at all, it might be much doubted how Saul should bee able the yeere before, or in some part of this very yeere, to succour labes Gilead with 300. and thirtie thousand men, if there had not now beene any yron weapon to defend themselves withall, saue onely in the hand of Saul and Jonathan his sonne. But howfocuer, all the rest of the people were formerly disarmed by the Philistims, and all those craftesmen carried out of the land that made weapons : there being left vnto

the Ifraelites onely files to sharpen and amend such stuffe as serued for the plough. and for nought elfe yet that they had some kinde of armes it is manifest, or els they durst not have attempted upon the Philistims as they did. And it is not faid in the Text that there was not any fword in all Ifrael, but onely that there was not any found amongst those 600. Souldiers which stayed with Saul after Samuels departure: 1. Sam. 13.12. and it feemeth that when Samuel had publiquely reprehended Saul, that his owne guards for fooke him, having but 600. remaining of his 3000. ordinarie fouldiers. and of all the rest that repaired vnto him, of which many were fled from him before

With this small troupe he held himselfe, to his owne Citie of Gibeah, as a place of more strength and better affured vnto him, then Gilgal was. Neither is it obscure how it should come to passe that the Philistimes should thus disarme the most part of the Ifraelites, how soener in the time of Samuel much had bin done against them. For the victories of Samuel were not got by fword or speare, but by thunder from heaven and when these craftsmen were once rooted out of the Cities of Israel, no meruaile if they could not in a short peace vnder Samuel bee replanted againg. For this tiranny of the Philistims is to be understood, rather of the precedent times, than vnder Samuel: and yet vnder him it is to bee thought that by their craftes they To proceeded in the pollicie, not fuffering their artificers to teach the Ifraelites, and fo even to the times of Saul kept them from having any store of armour. The same policie did Wahuchodonosor vse after his Conquest in Iudea : Dyonisius in Sicilie; and many other Princes elsewheere in all ages. But these lost weapons in part the Israelites might repaire in Gilead, for ouer Iordan the Philileft hand with flones: & with a fling it was that David himfelfe flew the gyant Goliah.

While the State of Ifrael flood in these hard termes, the Philislims having parted their armic into three troupes, that they might spoile and destroy many parts at once; Jonathan strengthened by God, and followed with his Esquire onely, scaled a 10 mountaine, whereon a companie of Philistims were lodged: the rest of their armie (as may bee gathered by the fuccesse) beeing incamped in the plaine adioyning. And though hee were discouered before he came to the hill toppe, and in a kinde of derifion called vp by his enemies : yet hee so behaued himselfe, as with the affiftance of God hee flewe twentie of the first Phinflims that hee incountred. Whereupon the next companies taking the alarme, and being ignorant of the cause, fled away amazed altogether. In which confusion, feare, and lealousie, they slaughtered one another in itead of enemies: wherupon those Hebrewes which became of their partie, because they seared to be spoiled by them, tooke the aduantage of their dethruction, and flew of them in great numbers. And laftly Saul himselfe taking know- 20 ledge of the rout and diforder, together with those Israelites that shrouded themfeliues in mount Ephraim, fet vpon them and obtained (contrary to all hope and expectation) a most happie and glorious victoric ouer them. Heere was that prophecie in Deuter onomie fulfilled by Ionathan, That one of those which feared God, should kill a thouland and two of them ten thouland.

This done, the small armie of Israel made retrait from the pursuit. And though Saul had bound the people by an oath not to take foode till the cuening, vet his for Ionathan being infeebled with extreme labour and emptineffe, tafted a droppe of hony in his pailage: for which Saul his father would have put him to death, had not the people delinered him from his crueltic.

The late miraculous victorie of Saul and Ionathan, seemes to have reduced vnto the Philiflims remembrance their former ouerthrowe likewife miraculous in the daies of Samuel; fo that for some space of time they held themselues quiet. In the meane while Saul being now greatly encouraged, undertooke by turnes all his bordering enemics; namely the Mosbits, Ammonits, Edomits, and the Arabians of Zobah, against all which he prevailed. Hee then assembled all the forces hee could make, to wit, 210000, men, and receiving the commaundement of God by Samuel, hee inuaded Amales, wasting and destroying all that part of Arabia Petrea, and the defart, belonging to the Amalekits, from Hautlah towards Tigris vnto Shur, which bordereth Agypt in which warre he tooke Agag their King prisoner. But whereas he 40 was instructed by Samuel to follow this Nation without compassion, because they first of all other attempted I/rael, when they left Agypt in Moles time : he not withflanding did not only spare the life of Agag, but referred the best of the beastes and fpoile of the Countrie, with pretence to offer them in facrifice to the liuin, God. Therfore did Samuel now a fecond time make him know, that God would cast him from his roiall eftate to which he was raifed, when he was of base condition, and as the Text both it, ittle in his owne eyes. And though the offence was great in Saul for not obeying the voice of God by Samuel, had there bin no former precept to that effeet; yet feeing Saul could not be ignorant how feuerely it pleafed. God to injoyne the Mraeites to reuenge themselves vpon that Nation, he was in all vnexcusable. For God had commanded that the Ifraelites (hould put out the remembrance of AMALEC from under heaven. For the crueltie which the predeceffors of this Agag vsed against the Ifraelites, especially on those which were ouerwearied, faint, sicke, and aged people, was now to be reuenged on him, & his Nation about 400. yeres afterward;

Of the occurrents betweene the relection of SAVL and his death.

Ow while Samuel mourned for Saul, God commanded him to choose a King for Ifrael, among the fonnes of Isbai: which Samuel (doubting the violent hand of Saul) feared in a fort to performe, till it pleafed God to direct him, how he might avoide both the suspicion, and the danger. And if Samuel knew that it was no way derogating from the providence of God, that by his cautious care and wifedome he fought to avoide the inconvenience or dangers of this life, then doe those men militake the nature of his diuine ordinance, who neglecting the reason that God hath given them, doe no o-20 ther wife avoide the perills and dangers thereof, than as men flupified in the opinion of fate, or deltinie, neglecting either to begge counfaile at Gods hand, by praicr, or to exercise that wisedome or fore-fight, where-with God hath inriched the mind of man, for his preferuation. Neither did the all-powerfull God (who made and could destroy the world in an instant) disdaine here to instruct Samuel, to avoide the furie of Saul, by the accustomed cautious waies of the world.

Of the fonnes of Islai, Samuel by God directed, made choife of Danid, the vongests having refused Eliab, the first borne; who though he were a man of a comly person and great firength; yet vnto fuch outward appearance the Lord had no respect. For as it is written, God feeth not as aman feeth, &c. but the Lord beholdeth the heart. Hee

30 alfo refuling the other fixe brethren, made choise of one whom his Father had 1.5amate altogether neglected, and left in the field to attend his flock, for of him the Lord faid to SASIVE L. arife and anoint him, for this is he: which done, Samuel departed and went to Ramath. Neither was it long after this that Saul began to feeke the life of David in which bloudy mind he continued till he died, ouercome in battaile by the Philistims.

The Philifims having well confidered (as it feemes) the increase of Saul his power through many victories by him obtained, whileft they had fitten ftill and forborne to give impediment vnto his prosperous courses, thought it good to make new triall of their fortune, as justly fearing that the wrongs which they had done to Ifrael might be repaied with aduantage, if ever opportunitie should serve their often iniu-40 red neighbours against them, as lately it had done against Moab, Ammon, and the rest of their ancient enemies. Now for the qualitie of their Souldiers, and all Warlike prouisions, the Philistims had reason to thinke themselves equall, if not superiours to Ifrael. The fuccesse of their former wars had for the most part been agreable to their owne willies; as for late difasters, they might, according to humane wisedome, impute them to second causes, as to a tempest happening by chance, and to a mistaken alarme, whereby their Armie possessed with a needlesse feare had fallen to rout. Hauing therefore mustered their forces and taken the field, encamping so neare to the Armie which King Saul drew forth against them, that they could not easily depart without the triall of a battaile, each part kept their ground of advantage for a while. 50 not joyning in groffe, but maintaining fome skirmilhes, as refuling both of them to paffe the valley that lay between their Camps. Just causes of seare they had on both. fides; especially the Philistims, whose late attempts had beene confounded by the angrie hand of God. Vpon this occasion perhaps it was that they fought to decide the matter by fingle combat, as willing to try in one mans person, whether any ftroake from heauen were to be feared. Goliah of Gath a ftrong giant; fearing neither

God nor man, vndertooke to defie the whole hofte of Ifrael, prouoking them with despightfull words, to appoint a Champion that might fight with him hand to hand, offering condition, that the partie vanquilhed in Champion, should hold it felfe as ouercome in groffe, and become vaffall to the other. This gave occasion to young David, whom Samuel by Gods appointment had annointed, to make a famous entrance into publicke notice of the people. For no man durft expose himselfe to encounter the great strength of Goliab, until David (fent by histather of an crrand to the campe) accepted the combat, and obtained the victorie, without haughtic gyant, and after with his owne fword ftrooke off his head. Hereupon and were purfued and flaughtered euen to their owne gates. By this victorie the Philistims were not so broken, that either any of their townes were lost, or their people discouraged from infetting the Territories of Ifrael. But David, by whom

God had wrought this victoric, fell into the gricuous indignation of his mafter

Saul, through the honour purchased by his well deserving. For after such time as the spirit of God departed from Saul and came you David, he then became

Of such as lived with SAMVEL and SAVL; of HELLEN and HERCVLES, and of their issues : upon occasion of the Dores, with the HERA. CLIDAE, entring PELOPONESUS about

N the second yeare of Samuel according to Eusebius, was Dauid bornes after Codoman later, and in the ninth yeare : after Bunting in the tenth For David, faith he, was thirtie yeares old when he beganne to raigne: whence it followeth, that he was born in the tenth of the fortie years. which are given to Samuel and Saul. About the eleventh of Samuel.

Aneas Silvius the fonne of Polthumus beganne his raigne over the Latines in Alba. who governed that State 3 1. yeares. There are who place before him Latinus Silnius, as brother to Polibumus, calling him the fifth from Aneas, and fourth King of Alba, wherof I will not stand to dispute. In the eleventh of Samuel, Dercilus sate in the Throne of Aliria, being the one and thirtieth King; hee ruled that Empire 40. yeares. In this age of Samuel the Dores obtained Peloponnesus, and at once with the Heraclida, who then led and commanded the Nation, possest a great part thereof 228, yeares before the first Olympiad, according to Diedorus and Eratosthenes. For all Greece was anciently pofferfied by three Tribes or Kindreds, viz. the Ionians, Doorians, and Lolians: at length it was called Helles, and the people Hellens, of Hellen. the fonne of Deucalion, Lord of the Countrie of Pthiotis in Theffali. But before the time of this Hellen, yea and long after, Greece had no name common to all the inhabitants, neither were the people called Hellenes, till fuch time as partly by trading in all parts of the Land, partly by the plantation of many Colonies, and fundriegreat victories obtained, the iffues of Hellen had reduced much of the Countrie under their obedience, calling themselves generally by one name, and yet every severall Nation after some one of the posteritie of Hellen, who had raigned ouer it. And because this is the furthest antiquitie of Greece, it will not bee amisse to recount the Pedigree of Japetus (as the Poets fable) was the sonne of Heaven and Earth, so accounted, either because the names of his Parents, had in the Greeke tongue such signification : or perhaps for his knowledge in Astronomie and Philosophie.

Japetus begat Prometheus, and Epimetheus : of whom all men haueread that haue read Poets. Prometheus begat Deucalion : and Epimetheus, Pyrrha. Deucalion and his wife Pyrrharaigned in The falle, which then was called Pyrrha (as Cretenfis Rhianus affirmeth) of Pyrrhathe Queene. In Deucalions time was that great floud of which we have fooken elfewhere. Deucalion begat Hellen : whose sonnes were Xuthus, Dorus and Folus: of Dorus and Folus, the Dores and Folians had name. The Foles inhabited Baotia. The Dores having first inhabited fundrie parts of Thessale, did afterward feate themselves about Parnassus: and finally became Lords of the Countries about Lacedamon: Xuthus the eldest some of Hellen, being banished by his bretheren, for having diverted from them to his owne vse some part of their Fathers goods, came to Athens: where marrying the Daughter of King Erietheus, hee begat on her two fonnes, Achaus and Ion. Of these two Achaus, for a slaughter by him committed, fled into Peloponne fus: and feating him felfein Laconia, gaue name to that region: from whence (as some write) he afterwards departed; and leaving an Armie recoursed the Kingdome of his grand-father in Thesfalie.

Jon being Generall for the Athenians, when Eumolpus the Thracian invaded Attied, did obtaine a great victorie, and thereby fuch loue and honour of the people, that 50 they committed the ordering of their State into his handes. He divided the Citizens into Tribes, appointing every one to some occupation, or good course of life. When the people multiplied he planted Colonies in Sycionia, then called Ægialos, or Ægialia: In which Countrie Solinas then raigning, thought it fafer to give his daughter Helice in marriage to Ion, and make him his Heire, than to contend with him. So hunger made him forget his fathers vireasonable commination. The companions of crueltic are breach of faith towards men, and impietic towards God. The former he shewed in denying David his daughter, whom he had promised him: and againe in taking her away from him, to whom he had given her; also in that when as Daniel had twice spared his life in the Territory of Ziph, and Saultwice sworne to do him no hurt, and confessed his errours, yet he sought still to destroy him, by all the meanes he could. His impictic towards God he shewed, in that he sought counsell of the witch of Endor, which was the last preparative for his destruction. For wheras when he fought counsel from God he had been alwaies victorious : from the Oracle of the Deuill this successe followed, that both himselfe, and his three sons, with 40 his neerest and faithfullest servants, were all slaughtered by the Philistims: his bodie with the bodies of his sonnes (as a spectacle of shame and dishonour) were hung ouer the wals of Bethfan: and there had remained till they had found buriall in the bowels of rauenous birds, had not the gratefull Gileadites of Tabes ftolne their carcafes thence and interred them. This was the end of Saul, after he had governed Ifrael, togither with Samuel 40. yeres, and by himselfe after Samuel 20. yeeres, according to Cedrenus, Theophilus, & Iofephus. But yet it seemeth to me that after the death of Samuel, Saul did not rule very long. For in the beginning of the 25, chapter, it is written that Samuel died: and in the rest of the same chapter the passages are written of Dauid, Nabal, and Abigail, after which the death of Saul quickly enfued. An exceeding valiant man he was, and gaue a faire entrance to all those victories which David afterward obtained, for he had beaten the Ammonites with their neighbouring Nations; crusht the Syrians, and their adhærents; broken the strength of the Amalekites; and greatly wasted the power and pride of the Philiftims.

Jon married Helice, and built a Towne called by his wives name in Ægialia, where he and his policritic raigned long, and (though not obliterating the old name) gaue to that Land the denomination. But in after-times the Dores affifting the Nephewes of tiereales, inuaded Pelapannefus, and ouer-comming the Achaens poffeffed Laconia. and all those parts which the dehai had formerly occupied. Hereupon the Achai driven to feeke a new feate, came vnto the lones, defiring to inhabite Agialia with them, and alleadging in vaine, that Ion and Acheus had beene brethren. When this request could not bee obtained, they sought by force to expell the Ionians, which they performed; but they loft their King Tifamenes, the fonne of Orefles, in that

Thus were the Iones driven out of Peloponnefus, and compelled to remove into Atties, from whence after a while they failed into Alia, and peopled the Wellerne coast thereof, on which they built twelve Cities, inhabited by them, even to this day, at the least without any universall or memorable transmigration. This expedition of the lones into Alia hath beene mentioned of all which have written of that Age, and is commonly placed 140 yeares after the warre of Troy, and 60, yeares after the descent of the Heracide into Pelepannesia. These Heracide were they of whom the Kings of Sparts issued; which race held that Kingdome about 700. yeares. Of their Father Hercules many strange thinges are delinered vnto vsi'y the Poets, of which fome are like to have beene true, others perhaps must be allegaritally 20 vnderstood. But the most approued Writers this ke that there were many called Hercules, all whose exploits were by the Greekes ascribed to the sonne of Alemena, who is faid to have performed these twelve great labours.

First, he slew the Nemaan Lyon: secondly, he slew the Serpent Hydra, which had nine heads, whereof one being cut off, two grew in the place: The third was the o-uer-taking a very swift Hart: The fourth was the taking of a wild Bore aline, which hanted mount Erymanthus in Arcadie : The fift was the cleaning of Augus his Oxe-fiall in one day, which hee performed by turning the River Alpheus into it: The fixt was the chafing away of the Birds from the Lake Stymphalis: The feuenth was the fetching a Bullirom Crete: The eighth was the taking of the Mares which 30 Diomedes King of Thrace fed with humane flesh: The ninth was to fetch a Girdle of the Queene of the Amazons: The three last were, to fetch Gerions Beenes from Gades; the golden Apples of the Hefferides; and Cerberus from hell. The Mythologicall interpretation of these I purposely omit as both over-long to be here set downs, and no leffe perplexed then the labours themselues. For some by Herenles understand Fortitude, Prudence, and Confiancie, interpreting the Moniters, Vices, Others make Hereules the Sunne, and his travailes to be the twelve fignes of the Zodiac. There are others who apply his workes historically to their owne conceits; as well affured, that the expolition cannot have more valikelihood, than the fables: That hee tooke Elis, Pylus, O Echalia, and other Townes, being affifted by fach as either admi- 40 ted his vertues, or were beholding vnto him. Also that he slew many Theenes, and Tyrants, I take to be truly written, without addition of Poeticall vanitie. His trauailes through most parts of the world are, or may seeme, borrowed from Hercules Libyeus. But fure it is that many Cities in Greece were greatly bound to him : for that lie (bending all his indeuours to the common good) deliuered the Land from much oppression. But after his death no Citie of Greece (Athens excepted) requited the vertue and deferts of Hercules, with constant protection of his children, perfequuted by the King Eurystheus. This Eurystheus was sonne of Sthenelus, and grandchild of Perfess; he raigned in Mycene, the mightiest Citie then in Greece. He it was that imposed those hard taskes vpon Hercules, who was bound to obay him (as Poets report) for expiation of that Murther, which in his madneffe hee had committed vpon his owne Children; but as others fay, because hee was his Subject and Seruant : wherefore there are who commend Eury#heus for imploying the strength of Hercules to so good a purpose. But it is generally agreed by the best writers, that Hercules was also of the stocke of Perfeus, and holden in great iealousie by Eury/theus because of his vertue, which appeared more and more in the dangerous feruices, wherein hee was imployed, fo that hee grew great in reputation and power through all Greece; and had by many wives and Concubines aboue threefcore children. These children Eurysibeus would faine haue got into his power, when Hercules was dead : but they fled vnto Cerx King of Trachinia, and from him (for he durft not withftand Eury libeus) to Athens. The Athenians not onely gauethem entertainment, but lent them ayde, wherewith they encountred Eryftheus. Iolaus the brothers sonne of Hercules, who had affisted him 16 in many of his trauels, was captaine of the Heraclide. It is faid of him, that being dead, be obtained leaue of Pluto to line againe till hee might reuenge the injuries done by Eary fibe as whom when he had flaine in battell, he died againe. It feemes to merginat whereas he had led Colonies into Sicilie, and aboad there a long time forgotten thee came againe into Greece to affift his colins, and afterwardes returned backe. When the Peloponnesians understood that Eurystheus was slaine, they tooke Arress the some of Pelaps to their King : for hee was rich, mightie, and favoured of the people. Against him the Heraclida marched under Hyllus the sonne of Hercules Burto avoid offusion of bloud, it was agreed, that Hyllus should fight with Echense Kang of the Tegesta a people of Areadis, who affifted Atress, with condition that if Hyllus were victor, hee should peaceably enjoy what hee challenged as his right: otherwise the Heraclida should not enter Peloponnessis in 100 yeeres. In that combat Hyllus was flaine, and the Heraclida compelled to forbeare their Country, till the third generation: at which time they returned under Arillodomus (as the best authoritie shewes, though some haue faid, that they came under the conduct of his children) and brought with them the Dores, whom they planted in that country, as is before thewed, having expelled the Achai, ouer whom the iffue of Pelops had reigned after the death of Eury/theus fouregenerations.

Bout this time that excellent learned Poet Homer lined as many of the best Chronologers affirme. Whence, perhaps, sprang the diversitie thers, first at of opinions, both of the time and of the natiue Citie of Homer. According to this with Fryar An-Archiloctus, Functius findes Homer about the time of Minasse King of Inda, and Nu- nins his Comma of Rome. Hee was called Melefigenes from the place of his birth, and at length ment at dat-weep is invited. In his Euangelicall preparation where out of Tatianus Affyrius he citeth fundry opinions touching the time when Homer lived, hee reckoneth many other Greeke writers more auncient than Homer; 20 as Linus, Philammon, Epimenides, Phemius, Ariftaus, Orpheus, Mufaus, Thamyras, Amphion, and others.

NoFt. Attic.l.3;

Now whether Homer or Hesiodus were the elder, it is also much disputed. Aulus Gellius reports that Philochorus and Xenophanes affirme, that Homer preceded Hefiod: and on the contrarie, that Luc. Accius the Poet, and Ephorus the Historian make Hesiod of an elder time than Homer. Varro leanes it vncertaine which of these learned Varro de imag. fablers was first borne : but he findes that they lived together some certaine yeeres, wherein he confirmes himselfe by an Epigram, written vpon a Treuit, and left by Cornelius Nepos reports that they both lived 260. yeeres before Rome built: while 30 call cannal the Silui reigned in Alba, about a 140. yeeres after the fall of Troy. b Euthimenes, a This number findes them both 200. yeeres after Troy taken, in the time of Acastus the sonne of rects, & reads Pelias, King of The Jaly. For the curiofitie of this mans age is no lesse ridiculous, than the inquisition why he began his Iliades with the word Menin; as perhaps containing some great mysterie. In derision whereof Lucian faining himselfe to have beene in hell, and to have spoken with Homer, there asked him the cause why he beganne his booke with that word : who answered, That he began in that fort, 40 because it came in his head so to doe.

It seemeth that Senyes, or after Macrobius Senemires, ruled Egypt at this time: for Tanepher fabris was his successour who preceded Vaphres, father in law to Salomon.

of DAVIDS effate in the time of SAVL.

HE hazards which David ranne into while he was yet onely defigned King, and living as a private man, expected the Empire, were very many. The first personal act of fame, was his killing of Golish in the viewe of both armies, whereby hee became knowne to Saul and so highly affected of Ionathan the sonne of Saul. that hee loued him as his owne foule : In fo much as when Saul fought to perswade his sonne, that David would affuredly be the ruine of his house, and estate, and offered him violence when he pleaded his cause.

30 Ionathan could neuer be perfuaded, neuer forst, nor euer wearied from the care of Davids life, and well doing. It was not long after this figual act of Davids, but that Saul became exceeding jealous of him, though hee were become as his houshold feruant, and his Efquire, or armour-bearer. Saul being vexed with an euill spirit. was aduifed to procure fome cunning Mulitian to play before him you the harpe; whereby it was thought that he might finde case, which came to passe accordingly. He entertained David for this purpole, and began to favour him, giving him a place of Commaund among the men of warre. But the lealous tyrant foone waxed wearie of his good affections, and fought to kill David, being thereunto moved onely through enuic of his vertue. This passion first brake forth in the middest of his ra-40 uing fit, at which time hee threw a speare at David that was then playing on his harpe to dochim eafe. Censorinus remembreth one Aselepius a Physitian, who practifed the curing of conferred to the Frenzie, by the like Musick; and tempered thereby those diseases which grew from paffion. That Pythagor as did alfo, the like by fuch a Kinde of harmonie, Seneea in his third booke of anger witnesseth. But the madnesse of Saul came from the cause of causes, and was thereby incurable, how socuer it sometimes left him, and yeelded vnto that musicke, which God had ordained to be a meane of more good to the Mulitian than to the King.

Saul having failed in fuch open attempts, gave vnto David the Commaundement 50 of 1000, foldiours, to confront the Philistims withall. For hee durft not trust him as before about his person fearing his reuenge. Now the better to couer his batred towards him, hee promifed him his daughter Merab to wife : but having married her to Adriel, hee gaue to David his younger daughter Michel, but with a condition, to prefent him with an hundred foreskinnes of the Philistims: hoping rather (in refpect of the valour of that Nation, that the Philiftims would take Danids head, than he their foreskinnes. This hope failing, when as now Davids victories begat new feares and icalousies in Saul, hee practifed with Ionathan, and afterwards with his owne hands attempted his life, but his purpofes were ftill frustrated. After all this bee fought to murther him in his owne house, but Michel his wife deliucred him. So Danid fought Samuel at Ramah, and being purfued by Saul, fled thence vnto Nob in Reniamin to Abimilech, then to Achis the Philiftim, Prince of Geth : where to obforce himselfe, he was forc't to counterfeit both simplicitie and distraction. But being ill affured among the Philiflims he couered himselfe in the Caue of Adullam: and after conveying fuch of his kinsfolkes as were not fit to follow him into Moab, 10 he hid him felfe in the defarts of Ziph, Maon, and the hilles of Engaddi, where hee cut off the lap of Sauls garments, and spared his life; as he did a second time in the defart of Ziph, after his passage with Nabal and Abigail. After which he repaired to Achis of Geth the second time, and was kindly entertained in regard of the hatred with which his mafter Saul was knowne to profecute him. I mièn in pf.d.

Of Achis Dauid obtained * Siklag in Simeon pretending to inuade Iudaa : but hee bent his forces another way and strooke the Amalekites, with other enemies of Ilrael, letting none line to complaine vpon him. Achis supposing that Danid had ned signature that this time, for it drawne bloud of his owne Nation, thought himfelfe affured of him: and therefore preparing to inuade Ifrael, fummoneth Dauid to affift him, who diffembling his 20 1 of Same 27. intent, femeth very willing thereto. But the rest of the Philishim Princes knowing his valour, and doubting his disposition, liked not his company, and therefore hee Siglag pertaiwithdrew him selfe to Siklag. At his returne he found the towne burnt, his two norb your the wines with the wines and children of his people taken by the Amalekites : Hereuupon his fellowes mutined, but God gaue him comfort, and affurance to recouer all againe: which he did.

This armie of the Philistims commaunded by Athis, encountred Saul at Gilbon, if which hee and his three fonnes were flaine. The newes with Sauls Crowne and bracelets were brought to Dauid at Siklag, in his returns from being victorious over Amalech, by a man of the fame Nation, who answed (though fally) that himfelfe 25 at Sauls request had flaine him. David, because hee had accused himselfe, made no foruple to cause him to be flaine at the instant; and the sooner, because the probabilities gaue strong cuidence withall. Otherwise it followeth not that enery man ought to bee beleeved of himselfe to his owne prejudice. For it is heldin the lawe; INF degrafil. Confessio reorum non habenda est pro explorato crimine, nisi approbatio alia instruit religionem cognoscentis. The prisoners confession must not be taken for an enidence of the crime, waleffe some other proofe informe the conscience of the Indge. For a man may confesse those things of himselfe, that the Judge by examination may know to bee impossible. But because it is otherwise determined in the title de custodiarcorum l. siconfessio, etineap, de panis l. qui sententiam, therefore doth the Glosse reconcile these two pla- 40 ces in this fort. Si quis iniudicio sponte de seipso consiteatur, & postcà mancat in confessione, id off latis. If any man in indepement doe confesse of himselfe, of his owne accord, and after doth perseure in his confession, it is enough. That David greatly bewailed Saul it is not improbable, for death cutteth afunder all competition and the lamentable end that befell him, being a King, with whom in effect the strength of Israel also fell, could not but stirre up forrow and moue compassion in the heart of Danid.

The victorie which the Philistims had gotten was so great, that some townes of the Ifraclites, even beyond the river of Iordan, were abandoned by the inhabitants, and left vnto the enemie, who tooke possession of them without any resistance made. Wherefore it may feeme strange, that a Nation so warlike and ambitious 50 as were the Philiflims, did not follow their fortune with all diligence, and feeke to make the Conquest entire. Most like it seemes, that the Ciuill warre immediatly breaking out betweene Danid and the house of Sanl, wherein Inda was divided from the rest of Israel, gaue them hope of an easie victorie ouer both; and thereby caufed them to attempt nothing at the present, least by so doing they should inforce their disagreeing enemies to a necessarie reconciliation; but rather to permit that the one part should confume the other, by which means, both the victors, and the vanquished would become a prey to the violence of such as had beaten them, when their forces were united.

CHAP.17. S.2. of the Historie of the World.

Of the beginning of DAVIDS reigne, and the warre made by ABNER for ISBOSETH.

Fter the death of Saul, Abner, who commaunded for Saul in the war, fought to advance Isbofeth (or Ieboftus according to Iofephus) though hee had no right to the Kingdome of Ilrael; for Mephiboleth the first fonc of Jonathan lived. Against this Joner, and Ishofeth, David made a defensive warre, till Abner past Jordan, and entred the border of Juda; at which time hee fent loab with fuch forces as hee had, to relift Abner: Isbojeth remaining in Gilead, and David in Hebron. The armies encountred each other neere Gibeon, where it seemeth, that Abner made the offer to trie the quarrel by the hands 20 of a few; like to that Combat betweene the Lacedemonians, and the Argues, remembred by Herodotus, 300. being chosen of each Nation, of which number three persons were onely left vnslaine. I he like triall by a farre leffe number was performed by the Horatif and Curiatif for the Romanes and Latines. The fame challenge Goliab the Philistim made, whom David flew: a custome very auncient. Edward the third offered the like triall in his owne person to the French King, and Francis the French King to Charles the Emperour. There were twelve chosen of each part, in this warre of David with the house of Saul, to wit, so many of Beniamin, and as many of Inda: whose force and valour was so equall, as there survived not any one to challenge the victoric. But the quarrell staid not here: for the armie of Juda prest Abner 30 in groffe, and brake him. Three hundrethand fixtie men of Abners companions were flaine, and but twentie of Iuda; whereof Alabel the brother of Ioab was one: who when hee would needes purfue Abner, and by Abners perswasions could not a Sama. be moved to quit him, he was forced to turne vpon him, wounding him to death, with the stroake of his speare. For though Ashel were an excellent footman, and as it is written in the Text, as light as a wild Roe, and as tolephus reporteth, contended not onely with men, but with horses; and hoped to have gotten great fame, if he could have maistered Abner (who as Afahel perswaded himselfe, had by being o- Ecolo. perthrowne and flying away lost his courage) yet here it fell out true; That the race is not to the fwift.

That this civill warre lasted two yeeres, wee finde it written in the second of Samuel the (econd Chapter; though in the beginning of the third it is againe made Version probable, that this contention dured longer; and therefore the matter reflech fill in dispute, and some of the Rabbines conceive that Isboseth had then reigned two yeeres, when this was written, the warre as yet continuing a longer time. For Abner held for the partie of Isbofeth after this, and till such time as there grew icaloufie betweene him and Ishofeth for Sauls concubine: neither did the death of Ishofeth instantly follow; but how long after the murther of Abner it happened, the same doth not certainly appeare.

Q. 11 I.

by RECHAB and BNANAH.

1.5.00.3.27.

Bner, reconciled to Danid, was anone by Ioab murdered; for Ioab could not endure a companion in Davids favour, and in the commanlement of his forces, by which hee was growne so powerfull, as Daaid forbare to cal him to account; for thus much he confesseth of himfelfe. Iam this day weake, and thefementhe fonnes of ZERVIAH bee too hard for mee. In this fort David complained after Abners death; and to make it cleare 10 that hee hated this fact of 10ab, hee followed him with this publicke imprecation; Let the blood fall on the head of IOAB, and on all his fathers house: and let them be subicit to vicers, to the leprofie, to lameneffe, to the fword, and to ponertie, &c. For could any thing have withflood the ordinance of God, this murther committed by Ioab might greatly have indangered Davids effate, Abner being the mouth and trust of all the rest of the Tribes, not yet reconciled. This mischaunce therefore David openly bewailed, so that all I/rael perceined him to bee innocent of that fact. The place which Abner held, being Generall of the men of warre, was of fuch importance, that the Kings themselines were faine to give them great respect, as bath bene alreadie showed more at large. This office Josh held in the armie of Juda, & thought 26 himselfe worthy to hold the place entire, if once his Lord might obtaine the whole Kingdome. For he was neere to Danid in kinred, and had beene partaker of all his aduerfitie; wherefore hee did not thinke it meete, that an old enemie should in reward of new benefits, be made his partner. Indeed he was by nature fo icalous of his dignitie and place, that hee afterward flew Amaja his owne kinfman, and the Kings, vpon the same quarrell, taking it in high disdaine to see him joyned with himselse ascaptaine of the hoste of Inda; much lesse could hee brooke a superiour, and fuch a one as had flaine his brother, and beene beaten himfelfe in battell. But howfocuer loab did hate or despise Abner, David esteemed highly of him as ofa Prince, and agreat man in Ifrael, excusing the ouerlight by which hee might seeme to have perished, by affirming that hee'died not like a foole, nor a man vanquished. But as a man falleth be fore wicked men, fo (faid hee) diddeft thou fall. And certainly it is no errour of wit, nor vant of valour and vertue in him whom a stronger hand de ftroyeth vnawares, or whom subtiltie in free trust bringeth to consusion. For all vnder the Sume are subject to worldly miseries and misadventures. Howsocuer 1/2 boseth meant to have dealt with Abner, yet when he heard of his death, hee despatred greatly of his chate, and with him all I/rael were posses with great feare: insomuch as two of Isbofeihs owne Captaines, Rechab and Baanah, murthered Isbofeth, and presenting his head to Danid, received the same reward that the Amalekite lately did, for pretending to have flaine Saul. Isbofeth being dead, all the Elders of Ifrael 40 repaired to Danid at Hebron, where he was the third and last time annointed by ge-

There are who expound this place otherwise. Except thou take away the blinde and the lame, thou shalt not come in hither. For some thinke that it was meant by the Idols of the Iebusites: others, that it had reference to the Couenant made long before with If are and Isrcob: the one blinde by nature and age, the other made lame by wreftling with the Angell, and that therefore till those (that is till that Couenant) be broken David ought not to moleft them. But for my felfe I take it with tolephus, that they to armed their wals with certaine impotent people at first, in fcorne of Danids at-

When he had now posses himselfe of the very heart and Center of the Kingdom, and received congratulatoric Embassadours & presents from Hiram King of Tyre: he entertained divers other concubines & maried moe wives, by whom he had ten fons in Ierufalem, and by his former wives he had fix in Hebron where he reigned 7, yeres.

Then David affembled 30000 choice Ifraelites to conduct the Arke of God from the house of Abinadab in Gibea, to the Citie of Dauid, which businesse was interrupted by the death of Fzzah the sonne of Aminadab, whom the Lord slewe for prefuming to touch the Arke, though it were with intent to flay it from taking harme, when it was shaken. But after three yeeres it was with great solemnitie brought into the Citie with factifices, musicke, dances, and all signes of joyfulnesses, in which David himselfe gladly bare a part. Hereupon Michol derided him for dancing before the Arke, and afterward told him in scorne. That hee was unconcred as a le in the eyes of the maidens his feruants; namely that hee forgat his regall dignitie in apparrell and behauiour; and mixed himselfe among the base multitude, ng as fooles doe in the wayes and streetes : not that she diffiked Daniels beha-(as I take it ) though the made it the colour of her derifion. But rather the aant griefe, which this spectacle stirred vp, beholding the glorie of her hufto whom thee was delinered laftly by force, and remembring the miferable fher father and brethren, out of whose ruines she conceived that the sonne of had built this his greatnesse, together with the many new wives and concuines imbraced fince his possession of Ierusalens, made her breake out in those despitfull tearmes, for which she remained barren to her death.

This done, Dauid confulted with the Prophet Nathan for the building of the Temple or house of God: but was forbidden it, because he was a man of warre, and had fied bloud. So greatly doth the Lord and King of all detest, homicide; having threatned, not in vaine, that hee would require the bloud of man, at the hand of man and beaft. The warres which David had made were just, and the bloud therein shed was of the enemies of God, and his Church : yet for this cause it was not permitted that his hands should lay the foundation of that holy Temple. Hereby it appeares how greatly those Princes deceive themselves, who thinke by bloudfled and terrour of their warres, to make themselues in greatnes like to the Amigh. tie, which is a damnable pride; not caring to imitate his mercie and goodnesse, or 30 feeke the bleffednesse promised by our Saniour vnto the peacemakers.

Now although it was not pleasing to the Lord to accept a Temple of Daniels founding, yet was his religious intent fo well accepted, that hereupon hee received both a confirmation of the Kingdom to him and his heirs, and that happie promife of the euerlasting throne; that should be established in his seede.

Ooneafter this David overthrew the Philiflims, which made them al-Together powerleffe, and vnable to make any inuation upon I/rael in Malte. For it is written, accepit franum Amgaris emanu Philishhaorum; which place our English Geneua converts in these words. And DAVID Stooke the bridle of bendage out of the hand of the Philislims. The latine of Junius giteth another and a better fense; for by that bridle of Amgar was meant the firong Citie of Gath, or Geth, and so the Geneua hath it in the marginal note. This 10 Citic of Gath was the same which was afterward Dio-Casaria, set on the frontier of Palessima at the entrance into Judea and Ephraim. From thence they made their incursions, and thereinto their retrait in all their invasions, which being taken by Dasid and demolished, there was left no such frontier towns of equall strength to the Philistims on that part. There was no nation bordering the Jenes that fo greatly afflicted them as the Philistims did, who before the time of Saul, (to the end they might not sharpen any wea- 20 pon against them) did not leaue one Smith in all their Cities & villages of that kind, but inforst them to come downe into their territorie, for all iron worke what soeuer they needed; fo as the Ifraelites till this time of Danid were feldome free from paying tribute to the Philiflims.

After this he gaue them foure other ouerthrowes: but the war of the Meabites and Arabians came between. In the first of which he was indangered by Ilbbi-benob, the head of whose speare weighed 200. shickles of brasse, which make nine pound three quarters of our poizes: at which time Abifini fuccoured Danid and flew the Philiftim, 255 Mil 1, 11.7. whereupon the Councellors and Captaines of Danid (least the light of Ifrael might by his loffe be quenched) vowed that he should not thence foorth hazard himself in 20 any battaile. The second and third incounter and operthrow of the Philissims was at Gob a place neere Gefar, and the last at Gath or Geth. And being now better assured of the Philistims by the taking of Geth, hee intuaded Month, from whom not withflanding in his aduerlitiche fought fuccour and leit his parents with him in truft. But whether it were the same King or no it is not kowne.

The Rabines faine that Moab flew those kinsfolkes of David, which lived under his protection in Sauls time, but question lesse Daniel welknew how that Nation had bin alwaies enemies to Ifrael, and tooke all the occasions to vexe them that were offered. And he also remembred that in the 23. of Deuter. God commaunded Ifrael not to feeke the peace or prosperitie of the Monbits, which Danis well observed, for he de-40 stroyed two parts of all the people, leaving a third to till the ground. This victory obtained, he led his armie by the border of Ammon towards Syria Zobah, the region of Adadezer the sonne of Rehob King therof. The place is set downe in the description of the holy land to which I referre the Reader.

The warrewhich DAVID made upon the Syrians.

T is written in the Text: DAVID smote also HADADEZER &c. as hee 50 went to recover his border at the river Euphrates. Now whether the words (as he wen to to recouer his border )be referred to David or Hadadezerit is not agreed upon. Innius thinkes that the article (he) hath relation to Dauid, who finding Tohu opprest by Hadadezer, ouerCHAP.17. S.4. of the Historie of the World.

threw the one and succoured the other. But the ancient and most received opinion. that this recourse hath reference to the Syrian, is more probable. For if David had intended any such enterprize towards Euphrates he was in farre better case to have proceeded after his victorie than before : feeing that (Adadezer being taken) he had now left no enemie on his back, either to pursue him, to take victuals and supplies from him, or to stop the passages of the mountaines upon him at his returne.

Againe, sceing David was either to passe through a part of Arabia the defart, or by the plains of Palmyrena, his army confifting of footmen, for the most, if not all : Hee had now both horse and chariots good store to cary his prouisions through those to vicultived places, by which he was to have marched before he could have reached Euphrates or any part therof. But we find that Danid returned to Hierusalem, after hee had twice ouerthrowne the Syrian armie, not bending his course towards the riuer Euphrates, but feeking to establish his purchases alreadie made. Wherby it may appeare, that it was the Syrian, and not King Dauid, that was going to inlarge his border as afore is faid.

The king of Syria Damascena, and of Damascens, wherof that region is so called, hearing that Adadezer was ouerthrowne by the Ifraelits, fearing his owne estate, & the loffe of his owne Contry which adjoyned to Syria Zobah of Hadadezer, fent for an army of Aramites or Syrians to his fuccour: but these, as it apeareth, came too late for 20 Adadezer, and too fonne for themselves : for there perished of those supplies 22000. This king of Damafeus, Tofephus (out of Nicholaus an ancient Historian) calleth Adad; who was also of the same name & family as all those other Adads were: which now began to grow up in greatnesse, and so continued for ten descents, till they were extinguilhed by the Affyrians, as is shewed heretofore. David having now reduced Damaleus under his obedience, left a garrifon therin, as he did in Edom: haning alfo fackt the adiovning cities of Betah, and Beratt, belonging to Adadezer, of which Cities Ptolomy calleth Betah, Tauba: & Berathi he nameth Barathena. Tohu or Thoi whose contro of Hamath joined to Adadezer (as in the description of the Holy land the reader may perceiue) fent his fon Ioram to congratulate this successe of David: partly because he 20 had war with Adadezer, and partly because he feared David now victorious. He also presented Danid with vessels of gold, filuer, and brasse, all which together with the golden sheilds of the Aramites, and the hest of all the spoiles of other Nations Danid dedicated vnto God at his returne. Iunius translated the words (clypeos aureos) by vmbones, as if all the parts of the targets were not of gold but the boffes only. The septuagint call them bracelets: Aquila, golden chains. But because Roboam made shields of brasse in place of these of Adadezer, at such time as Shicab the Agyptian fackt the Temple of Hierusalem, it may be gathered thereby, that those of Adadezer were

But this Ammonite being ill aduised, and ouer-icalous of his estate, vsed Dauids messengers so barbaroully, and contemptuoully (by curtailing their beardes, and their garments ) as hee thereby drewe a warre vppon himfelfe, which neither his owne firength, nor all the aydes purchased could put off, or sustaine. Hadadezer hearing that Ioab had difmiffed his armie, affembled his forces againe, and fent for all the companies that he could leuie out of Melopotamia, who vnder the command of Shabach paffed Euphrates, and incamped at Helam, on the South fide Hidam or the thereof. Danid hearing of this new preparation, affembled all the ableft men of Ifrael Heliam or the-liam which Pin- and marched towardes the Syrian armie in Palmyrena, not yet entred into Arabia; tony calleth de to wit, at Helam, a place no leffe diftant from Damafens, towards the Northeast, than Hieru(alem was towards the Southwest. Now Danid (speaking humanely) might with the more confidence go on towards Euphrales (which was the farthelt-off journey that ever he made because he was now Lord of Damaseus, which lay in the midway, He also possess himselfe of * Thadmor or Palmyrena, which Salomon afterward 10 strongly fortified, and this Citie was but one daies journey from Helam, and the riuer Euphrates. So had he two fafe retraites the one to Thadmor, and the next from thence to Damafeus. In this incounter between Dauid & the Syrians, they loft 40000 horsemen, and 700.chariots, together with Shobach Generall of their armic. The Chronicles call these 40000, souldiers footmen, and so summers it, and so is it very probable. For the armie of I/rael confifting of footmen, could hardly have flang htered 40000, horsemen, except they quitted their horse and fought on foote. So are the chariots taken in this battel, numbred at 7000. in the first of Chron. the 9. in which number, as I conceine, all the fouldiers that ferued in them with the conductors are included : so as there died of the Syrians in this warre against David, be- 20 fore he forc't them to tribute; 1 00000 footmen, besides all their horsemen and waggoners, and befides all those that loab flew, when they fled at the first encounter, together with the Ammonites before Rabba. Notwithstanding all which, the Adads in following ages gathered strength againe, and afflicted the Kings of Inda often; but the kings of Israel they impourished, even to the last end of that State.

Dayid having now beaten the Arabians and Mesopotamians from the partie and confederacie of Ammon: He fent out Ivab the Licutemant of his armies to forradge and destroy their territoric, and to beliege Rabbah, afterward Philadelphia, which after a while the Ifraelites mastered and possest. The Kings crowne which weighed a talent of gold, garnished with pretious stones, David set on his owne head, and carri- 30 ed away with him the rest of the riches and spoile of the Citie. And though David stayed at Hierufalem, following the warre of Vriah-his wife, till such time as the Citie was brought to extremitie and readie to be entred : yet Ioab in honour of David forbare the last affault, and entrance thereof, till his masters arrivall. To the people he vsed extreeme rigor (if we may so call it being exercised against heathen Idolaters) for some of them he tare with harrowes some he sawed asunder, others he cast into burning kils, in which he baked tile and bricke.

of DAVID stroubles in his reigne, and of his forces.

Vr as victorie begetteth fecuritie, and our present worldly selicitie a forgetfulneffe of our former miseries, and many times of God himself the giver of all goodnesse: so did these changes, in the fortune and state of this good King , change also the zealous care which formerly hee had to please God in the precise observation of his Lawes and Commaundements. For having now no dangerous apparant enemie (against whom hee was wont to aske counsaile from the Lord ) liee beganne to be adulfed by his owne humaine affections and vaine defires. For hee was not only fatisfied to take Prials wife from him, and to vie her by flealth: but hee imbrodered his adultery with Prials flaughter, giving order to his truftic feruant

Toab to marshall him in the front or point of those Israelites, which gave an assault 2.5400,11.15. vpon the suburbes of Rabba, when there was not as yet any possibilitie of pregalling. And that which could no leffe displease God than the rest, hee was content that manv others of his best servants and souldiers should perish together with Vriah, hoping thereby to couer his particular ill intent against him. After which he began by degrees to fall from the highest of happinesse; and his dayes then to come were filled with ioyes and woes interchangeable, his troden-downe forrowes began againe to spring; and those perils which he had pulled vp by the rootes (as he hoped) gaue him an after-haruest of many cares and discontentments. to to take the witnesse of Danids owne mouth against him, as Danid himselfe did against the Amalekite, which pretended to haue flaine Saul, he had then appeared as worthy of reprehension as the other was of the death he suffered. For when Nathan the Prophet propounded vnto him his owne errour, in the person of another, to wit of him that tooke the poore mans sheepe that had none else, the bereauer being Lord of many: He then vowed it to the liuing Lord, that fuch a one shold die the death. And hereof, although it pleased God to pardon Danid, for his life, which remission the Prophet Nathan pronounced: yet he deliuered him Gods inflice together with his mercic in the tenour following; Now therefore the fivord first neuer depart from thy very grante, house, &c. Two yeeres after which foule and incestuous act, Absalom caused him to be murthered, at the feast of his sheep-shearing; not perchance in reuenge of Thamars rauishment alone: but having it in his heart to vsurpe the Kingdome; in which, because he could not in any fort be affured of Ammon, he thought his affaire greatly advanced by his destruction. He began instantly to practise against David his father, seeking by the pretence of common inflice, and by lowly and familiar manner to all men, and by detracting from his fathers equitie, to win vnto himselfe a popular reputation. Here began the great affliction, threatned by the Lord as a punishment

40 The company which Absalom gathered at the first were but 200. men: which 2.Sam.150 he carried with him from Hierusalem to Hebron; pretending, though impiously, the performance of a vow to God. There when Achitophel repaired vnto him, and many troopes of people from all places, he proclaimed himfelfe King, and was by the people(whose hearts God had turned from their lawfull Prince) accepted so readily, that David doubting to be fet upon on the fuddain, durst not trust himselfe in his owne Citie of Hierusalem, nor in any other walled towne for feare of surprise: but incamped in the fields, & defarts with some 600.0f his gards, and few elfe. of whose hatred Danids prosperitie had sinothered, but his adversitie illightened) holding himselfe vpon the advantage of a mountaine side, cast stones at Dauid, and most despightfully cursed him to his face : but Dauid attending no priuate reuenges, forbadde Abilbai to pursue him for the present, yet lest him among 3.Sam.16. others in the rolle of his reuenge, to his sonne Salomon. Absalom being now possest of Hierufalem, was aduited by Achitophel to vie his fathers concubines in some such publique place, as all Ifrael might affure themselues, that hee was irreconciliable to his father : whereof being perfivaded they would then refoluedly adhere to Ablalom and his cause, without seare of being given vp vpon a reconciliation betweene them. This faluage and impious (though craftic counfaile) Achitophel indeed vr- 10 1,Sam.17. ged for his ownerespect, as fearing that this rebellion might take end to his destruction; who most of all other inflamed Ab/alom against his father. And now was it fulfilled that Nathan had directly forctold Danid: I will raife up enill against thee out of thine owne house, and will take thy wines before thine eyes, and give them unto thy neighbour, and hee shalls envish thy vines in the selfs of the Sunne: for thou diddest it secretly, but I will doe this thing before all speak, and before the Sunne. Hee also gaue adults to Absidons, that himself with an armie of 12000, men might be imployed at the inflam for the surprising of Danid, which had willingly beene imbraced by Absidons, had not Isushi Danids kitchfull serunnt given counter-adults, and swayed it persuanding Absidons, that it was fitter and more safe for him with all the strength of 1814, 20 to pursue his father: then by such a troope, which Danids valour, and those of his attendants, might either indaunger or resist. This delay in Absidons, and advantage of time gained by Datid, was indeed, after God, the loffe of the one and delinerie of the other. Whereupon Achitophel rightly fearing (by the occasion fore shewed) the fixees fixed five the other within followed, disposed of his owneels and then for soke both the partie and the care of Ablahom, and of his owne life.

Dauid being advertised of this enterprize against him marched away al night, and past Iordan, possessing himselte of Alabanaian in the tribe of Gad: the same wherein Islosfath himselse in the warre against Dauid after Sauls death scated himselse. To which place there repayred vnto him Shobi, the sonne of Nabash the Ammonite, 30 whom Dauid loued, the same which Inspect callect Shiphar. And though it bee greatly disputed, what this Shobi was, yet the most general and probable opinion makes him a second brother to Hamm, whom Dauid for his stathers sake established in the Kingdome, after Hammon our throw. In the meane time both the King and Abhiatom prepared to fight, Abhiatom made Amafa Commanuder of the armie of histoly the faine place which Toub below with Dautal 3 an office next the King him felts, like vnto that of the Manors of the Palace aunutal 3 an office next the King him felts, like vnto that of the Manors of the Palace aunciently in France. disposed the forces he had to Toub, Abhinain, and Histo, giuing them charge in the hearing of all that is flied out of the port of Mahnaim, that they should spare the life of Abhaim. But Toub, besides that hee was very crued by nature, remembred that Abhiatom had lately disposed of his Gouernment to Amasa, and therefore the victoric being obtained, and newes brought him that Abhiatom hung by the haire of his

Hereof, together with newes of the victorie, when knowledge was brought to Daussid, he mourned and forrowed, not onely as a man that had lost a sone, but as one that had outlined all his worldly ioyes, and seen every delight of life interred. For hee so hid himselfe from his people, as those which hoped for honour and re-

Whereupon 10th presenting himselise before Dausis, persenvaded him to dissemble his forrow for the present, and to shew himsels to the armie. For first he told him that he had dissountenanced his faithfull serunas, who had that day preserved his life; inferring that nothing could be more daungerous to a king, than not onely to not acknowledge fo great a lowe and constancies his people, who being but sew in number, did yet resolvedly expose themselves to great perils for his sake-buton the contrarie grieue and lament at their good success. For, no doubt, they might all 1 have bought their peace of Assistance an acaie rate. Secondly, hee viged that it was generally beleened, that he loued his enemies and bated his friends, and that he witnesselves have been successed by this his mourning, that he had not any respect of his Princes, and others his faithfull scruants, but would more have over distributions and approved value of the success o

Latily hee vsed this prevalent argument, that if the King came not out and shewed himselfe publikly to his men of warre, that they would all that very night abandon him, and returner concluding with this fearefull threatning. And that will bee *Samis, worse vono three than all the entitled the souther from thy youth bitherto. By these ourhoold and arrogant speeches (though perchance vitered with a good intent) Itals raise seed Danus, from his bed of sorrow, and brought him to the gates of the Ciric among the people, whom hee assured of his loue and affection of percally Amasa who communed the armie of Assistant, to whom hee promised the office of Lieutenanthippe; the same which Assistant had given him, and which Inst now enjoyed. For Danid doubted that if Amasa were not satisfied, hee might draw from him a great part of the strength of Israel, now vnder his commandement.

This done, the King marched towards Ior Lan homeward, where in his paffage hee pardoned Shimel, who had lately reuiled him to his face; but this remiffion was 2. Sam, 2.5. but externall, as appeared afterward. He also accepted of Mephiboffeeth his excuse, 20, whom Zit; shad formerly fally accused and betrayed.

He all 6 intreated B w zillai the Gleadite, his late liberall hofte, to follow him to Ierafalon, that he might reward his fertice done him, who exculing himfelfe by his 2.5am.1538, age, apopinted his fonne Chambam to attend the Kine.

At Gilgal on this tide tordan, all the tribes affembled, and after some contention which of them ought to have most interest in Danid, the armie brake and Danid returned to Jerusalem. But Sheba, the sonne of Bichri a Beniamite of the faction of the house of Saul, finding some discontentment among the Ifraelites, withdrewe them from David, as from a stranger in whom they had no interest; and it seemeth that many of the people of the out-tribes, and in effect of all but Inda, bare still a good af-40 fection to the iffues of their first King. David imployed his reconciled Captaine Ama/a, to giue him contentment, and to witnesse his trust, as also because hee conceiued that Amafa had interest in those revolts of Ifrael more than Ioab had. He receiued commaundement from Dauid to affemble the armie within three dayes, which hee foreflowed : but being onward on his way, Abifhai Ioabs brother was fent after him, with Davids guard and best fouldiers, whom also Ioab accompanied and overtaking Amasa neere Gibeon, pretending to imbrace him, gaue him a wound, wherof hee fell dead, being no leffe icalous of Amasa than hee was of Abner, whom hee murdered in the same manner, and out of the same impatient ambition. This done he purfued Sheba, and finding him inclosed in Abel, affaulted the Citie with that fu-To rie, that the Citizens by the perswasions of a wife woman there inhabiting, cut off

The next act of Dauids, was the deliucrie of Sauls formes or kinsmen to the Gibeomites, whom those Citizens hung up in reuenge of their fathers crueltie. Dauid had knowledge

Junius cals this Michal the lifter of her that was Dauids wife, thee whom Saul maried to Phaltiel; but Michel here named had Aariel to her husband: the same which is named Merab in the first of Samuel the eighteenth, who was first promised to Dautd, when he flew Goliab in the valley of Raphaim: and because it is written that Mishelloued Daniel, which perchance Merab did not, whether Daniel had any humane respect in the deliucrie of her children, it is onely knowne to God.

Now whereas the General nameth Michol for Merab, the wife of Adriel: the better translation were out of the Hebrew word here yed, having an eclipsis or defect, 20 and fignifieth, as I am informed, one of the same kinned, as in the 19. verse of the fame 21. Chapter it is faid of Golial, whose speare was weightic as a weaters beame, when as by the same Eclipsisit must be understood by the brother of Goliah: Goliah himselfe being formerly slaine.

As by the death of Sauls children God secured the house of David, leaving no head vnto rebellion; so did hee strengthen both the King and Nation against forraine enemies, by the valour of many braue Commaunders, the like of whom, for number and qualitie, that people of Ifraccis not knowne to have had at any time before or after. Thirtie Captaines of thoulands there were, all men of marke, and great reputation in warre. Ouer these were live Coronels, whose valour was so ex- 20 traordinarie, that it might well be held as miraculous. These Coronels had some difference of place and honour, which feemeth to have beene given vpon meere consideration of their vertue. For Ab Shat the brother of Isab, who in the warre against the Ammonites and Aramites was Lieutenant and commaunded halfe the armie, could not attaine to the honour of the first ranke, but was faine to rest contented with being principall of the three Coronels of the fecond order, notwithstanding his necreneffe in blood vnto the King, the flourishing chate of his owne house, and his well approued feruices. All these Coroneis and Captaines, with the Companies belonging to them, may feeme to have beene such as were continually retained, or at the least kept in readineffe for any occasion, considering that the numbers 40 which were mustered and drawne out, if need required into the field, very farre exceeded thirtie thousand, yea or thirtie times as many. They were most of them such as had followed the King in Sauletime, & bin hardened with his aduerfities. Others there were very many, and principal men in their fenerall Tribes, that repaired vnto him after the death of S. ml; but these Captaines and Coronels, (who with 10ab that was Generall of all the Kings forces, make up the number of 37.) were the 2. cfpeciall men of warre, and reckoned as Danie's worthies. The long reigne of Danie, as it is knowne to have confumed many of these excellent men of warre, so may it probably be geffed to haue wasted the most of those whose deaths wee finde nowhere mentioned. For the fonnes of Zernia, who had beene too hard for Danid, were worne away, and onely loab left in the beginning of Salomon, who wanted his brother Abilbu to stand by his side in his last extremitie.

By the actions forepassed in the time of Danie, it is gathered that he had reigned now 33. yeeres, or thereabout, when the posteritie of Saul was rooted out, so that hee enioyed about feauen yeeres of entire quiet and fecuritie, wherein it pleafed God to remoue all impediments that might haue troubled the fucceffion of Salomon in his fathers throne. In this time also David having established all things in Juda and Israel, and the borders thereof, hee againe displeased God by numbring the people, as in oftentation of his power; in which hee imployed loab with other Captaines of his armie, who after nine moneths and twentie daies trauell, returned with the account and register of all the people, able and fit to beare armes, and they amounted to the number of thirteene hundred thousand, besides Leui and Beniamin; whereof in Iuda and the Cities thereof fine hundred thousand, and in Israel 1.chros.c.21.

to eight hundred thou fand. For this, when by the Prophet Gad he was offered from God the choice of three punishments, whereof he might submit himselfeto which he pleased; to wit, seauen yeeres famine; three moneths warre, wherein hee should be vnprosperous in all attempts, and be chased by his enemies; or a generall pestilence to last three dayes: David made choyce to bowe himselfe under the hand of God onely, and left himfelfe subject to that cruell disease, which hath no compassion or respect of persons, of which there perished seauentie thousand. And hereby he hath taught al that line that it is better to fall into the hands of God than of men; whereof he giveth vs this diuine reason. For his mercies are great.

2. Sam. 14:

of the last acts of David: Adonians faction: thereuenge upon Ioab and Shimei.

Aftly, when hee grew weake and feeble, and patt the acts and know-be ledge of women, hee was yet aduited to lie in the armes of a yong and well complexioned maiden, to keepe him warme. In this his weake was clatter of bodie, when he was in a manner bedrid, \(\triangle \triangle \trian partiethat inuincible, renowned and feared Ioab, with Abiathar the Priest, beganne manifestly to prepare for his establishment in the Kingdome after his father. For being the eldest now living of Davids sonnes, and a man of a goodly personage, Salomon yet young, and borne of a mother formerly attainted with adulteric, for which her name was omitted by S. Matthew (as Beds, Hugo, Thomas, and others suppose)he presumed to carrie the matter without resistance. Hereof when David had knowledge by Berfabe the mother of Salomon, who did put him in minde of his faithfull promife, that Salomon her fonne should reigne after him ( Nathan the Prophet affirming the same thing vnto the King, & seconding her report of Adoniah his pre-40 fumption) the King calling vnto him Zadoe the Priest, Nathan the Prophet, and Bemaiah the Captaine of his guard, gaue charge and commission to annoint Salomon, and to fet him on the mule whereon himselfe vsed to ride in his greatest state; which done, Salomon attended and strongly guarded by the ordinarie and choyce men of warre, the Cherethites and Pelethites, shewed himselfe to the people. Those tydings being reported to Adonijah, he presently abandoned his affistants, and for the safetic of his life he held by the hornes of the Altar, whom for the present Salomon pardoned. After this, Danid had remaining two especiall cares, whereof hee was 1. King to desirous to discharge his thoughts; the one concerning the peace of the land, which might be disturbed by some rebellion against Salomon; the other concerning the 30 building of the Temple, which he fought by all meanes to aduaunce, and make the businesse publique. To bring these intentions to good effect hee summoned a Par-Jiament, confifting of all the Princes of Ifrael, the Princes of the seuerall Tribes, all the Captaines and Officers, with all the mightie, and men of power; who repaired vnto Ierufalem.

In this assembly the King stood vp, and signified his purpose of building the Temple, shewing how the Lord had approved the motion. Herein he tooke occasson to lay open his owne title to the Crowne, shewing that the Kingdome was by Gods ordinance due to the Tribe of Iuda (as Iaacob in his bleffing prophetically bequeathed it) and that God himselfe was pleased to make choice of him amone all his fathers fonnes. In like manner he faid that God himfelfe had appointed Salomon by name to be his successor: whereupon he earnestly charged both the people and his fonne, to conforme themselues viito all that God had commaunded, and particularly to goe forward in this worke of the Lords house which Salomon was chosen to build. Then produced hee the paterne of the worke according to the forme 10 which God himfelfe had appointed; and so laying open his owne preparations, he exhorted all others to a voluntary contribution.

The Kings propolition was so well approued by the Princes and people, that whereas he himselfe had given three thousand talents of golde, and seaven thoufand of filuer, they added vnto it seauen thousand of gold, and ten thousand of filuer, besides brasse, iron and iewels, heartily reioyeing in the advancement of so religious a worke. This businesse being well dispatched, a solemne feast with great facrifice was made, at which time Salomon was againe annointed King, and received fealtie of all the Princes and people of the land, and of all the Princes his brethren the formes of King David. Salomon being thus established King, his father David 20 finding himfelfe even in the hands of death, first exhorted his sonne to exercise the fame courage and ftrength of minde, which himfelfe had done in all his attempts, and to the end that a happie end might follow the beginning of all his enterprizes, he vttered these mightie words; Take heede to the charge of the Lordthy God, to walke in his waies, and keepe his statutes and his commaundements, and his judgements, and his testimonies, as it is written in the Law of Moses or. to the performance of which God fastened the succession, and prosperitie of his issues. For this done (faith God himselfe) Thou shalt not want one of thy posteritie to sit upon the throne of

Secondly, hee aduised him concerning Ioab, who out of doubt had served David 20 from the first assault of Jerusalem to the last of his warres, with incomparable valour and fidelitie, fauing that hee fastened himselfe to Adonijah ( his maister yet lining) and thereby yexed him in his feeble age. But as God hath neuer left crueltie vnreuenged, fo was it his will that Ioab should drinke of the same cuppe, whereof he had enforced other men to tafte, and fuffer the same violence which himselfe had vniuftly stroken others with all, qui gladio percutit, gladio peribit : for he had bereaued Abner and Amafa of their lives, having against the one the pretence onely of his brothers flaughter, whom Abner had flaine in the time of warre, and could not auoid him : against the other but a meere icalousie of his growing great in the fauour of David. And though Josh affured himselfe that Abner and Amasa being dead, 40 there was none left either to equall him or supplant him, yet God (deriding the pollicies of wicked men) raifed vp Benhaiah the Jonne of Jehoiadah, to pull him from the Sanctuarie, and to cut him in pieces. For David giveth this cause to Salomon against Ioab, that he flew the Captaines of the hofte of Ifrael, and shed bloud of battell in peace; and to this apparant and just cause, it is not improbable but that David remembred the ill affection of Joab towards Salomon, which Joab made manifest by the votimely fetting vp of Adoniah, David yet living. Some other offence Ioab had committed against Dauid of which in these words he put his son Salomon in minde; Thou knowest also what I O AB the sonne of SERVIAH did to mee, &c. Now whether this were ment by the killing of Absalom, contrary to the Kings desire, or by the proud words vsed to him when hee mourned in Mahanaim for Absalom; or whether it were the publishing of Danids letter vnto him for the killing of Vriah: thereby to differee Salomon as descended of such a mother, the Scriptures are silent. True it is that those great men of warre doe oftentimes behaue themselues exceeding in folently towards their Princes, both in respect of their service done as also because they flatter themselves with an opinion, that either their masters cannot mille them, or that they dare not offend them. But this kinde of pride hath ouerthrowne many a worthie man otherwise deseruing great honour and respect.

Hee also gaue order to Salomon, to ridde himselfe of Shimei, who not long before had cast stones at David and cursed him to his face. And albeit by reason of his oath and promife David spared Shimei all the time himselfe lived, yet being dust and in the graue he flew him, by the hand of Salo men his sonne. Hence it seemeth that King Henry the seaucnth of England had his patterne, when hee gaue order to He n-

to rie the eight to execute Pool as soone as himselfe was buried, having made promise to the King of Spaine when hee delinered Pool vnto him, that while hee lined hee would never put him to death, nor fuffer violent hands to be elaid vpon him.

And yet did not the execution of loab yeeld vnto Salomon any fuch great profite or assurance as he hoped for. For he found a young Adad of Idumaa, and Rezin of Damafeus to vexe him : who, as the Scriptures witnesse, were emboldened to creer- 1.King. 11. prize vpon Salomon, hearing that David flept with his fathers, and that loab the Captaine of the holt was dead. Now when David had reigned in all fortic veeres. to wit, in Hebron feauen yeeres, and in Ieru/alom three and thirtie, he died.

For his person, he was of smal stature, but exceeding strong. For his internal gifts and graces he fo farre exceeded all other men, as putting his humane frailtie apart. he was faid by God himfelfe to be a man according to his owneheart. of Chronicles, that he left Salomon for the building of the Temple a hun. dred thousand talents of gold, & athousand thousand talents of silver, and of braffe and yron patting all weight, which is more than any King of the world poffett belies himfelfe, and his fon to whom he left it. For it amounted to three thousand three hundred thirtie and three cartload & a third of a cartload of filuer, allowing two thousand weight of filuer or fix thousand pound fterling to enery cartload, belides three fcore and feauenteene millions of 20 French Crownes, or of our money twentie three millions and a thousand pound; a matter but for the testimonie of the Scriptures exceeding all beliefe. For that any riches were left him it doth not appeare, feeing that the Judges had not any treafure, nor any fourraigne power to make legies; but when they went to the warres. they were followed by fuch voluntaries as the feuerall tribes by turnes gaue them: feeing also that Saul who was of a meane parentage, and perpetually vexed and inmaded by the Philiflims, could not in all likelihood gather great riches (if any at all) his territories being exceeding narrow, and thereof the better part poffert by his enemies.

Therefore it were not amiffe to confider how David within the space of not very 20 tnany yeeres, might amaffe up fuch mightie treafures. For though parlimonic be it felfea great reuenue, yet needes there must have beene other great meanes. It feemes that hee made the vitermost profit of all that hee had, that was profitable. Eusebius in his ninth booke and last Chapter de proparatione Euangelica, citeth the words of Eupolemus, who reporteth that David among other preparations for the Temple, built a Nauie in Atelanis (or as Villalpandus corrects it Achanis) a Citic of Arabia, and from thence fent men to digge for gold in the Island Prphe, which Orteliss thinkes, was Ophir, though Eupoiemus in his place of Eulebiss (erring perhaps in this circumstance) faith that this Island is in the red sea; from whence faith this Eupolemus they brought golde into sury. Pineda lib. 4. develus Salomonis c. 1. thinks that 40 Daniel did this way also enrich himselse, and citeth this testimonic of Eupolemus : and yet certainely David had many other waies to gather great riches. Much land doubtlesse he gained by conquest, from the Conacites and Philislims, besides those fruitfull vallies neere Jordan in Trachonitis and Bafan, and the best of Syria, and other countries bordering the Ifraelites. These demaines belike he kept in his owne hands. and with his infinite number of captines, which hee tooke in his warres, which were notable to redeeme themselves, husbanded those grounds for his greatest advantage. For it is written 1. Chron. 17. that Ichonathan was ouer his treasures in the field. in the villages, in the Cities, in the townes; that Ezri was over the labourers, that tilled his ground; Simei over the vineyards; and Sabdi over the flore of the wine; Baal 50 Hanan over the olive trees, and Toalh over the store of the oyle, also that hee had heardmen that had charge ouer his cattell, both in the high lands, and in the plaines, ouer his theepe; camels, and affes. And this cuftome of enriching themfelues by husbandry and Cattell the auncient Kings every where held, both before and after Dauids time. For wee reade of Pharas that hee spake to Isfeph to appoint fome of his brethren or of their feruants, to be Rulers ouer his cattell. We reade of Vzzia, that he loued husbandrie, had much cattell, and plough-men, and dreffers of a.cheg. 26. Vines : likewise we reade it in all Greeke Poets, that the wealth of the ancient Kings did especially consist in their Heards and flocks, whereof it were needlesse to cite Augens and Admetus or any other for examples, the rule holding true in all. Now concerning Danid it is not vnlikely, but that those captines which were not imploied in hulbandrie, were many of them vied by him in all forts of gainefull professions.

as the ancient Romans in like manner yfed their flaues:

To these profits (besides the tributes and impositions which doubtlesse were great, and besides the innumerable presents which yearly were brought him, or extraordinarily fent him, by Tehu and others) wee may adde the great spoiles which hee found in the Cities and Countries which he conquered : also the head money which was gathered per legem capitationis; By the law of capitation or head money, energy man rich or poore paying halfe a ficle of the Sanctuarie, which is about as much as fourteene pence, and so in all it amounted to a wondrous summe in that Kingdome: wherein one thousand thousand fine hundred and seventie thousand sighting men 1.Chron.atwere numbred by 10ab. Now although this Law of capitation be thought by some very learned not to haue beene perpetuall ( which opinion of theirs neuertheleffe

20 they confesse is against the Hebrew expositions) yet David vpon this occasion is not unlikely to have put it in practize. And by these meanes might he be able to leave those huge treasures to Salomon. Yet it may seeme that of this great masse of gold and filter left by David, the least part was his owne in private, and so will it appeare the lesse wonderfull that he left so much. Of his owne liberalitie we finde, that he gaue to the building of the Temple three thousand talents of gold, and seuen thoufand talents of filuer; a great fumme : but ho'ding a very small proportion to the other. Wherefore we are to confider, that the treasures of the Sanctuarie it selfe were exceeding great, as needes they must have been, having received continual encrease. without any losse or diminution ever fince the time of Moses and Iosush. The re-

20 uennues of the Sanctuarie (besides all manner of tithes and oblations, which defraied the daily expences, and maintayned the Priest and Leuites) were partly raised out of the head money before mentioned; partly out of the spoiles gotten in warre. For all the bootie was divided into two parts, whereof the Souldiers had one, and Number 1,27 the People which remayned at home, had the other halfe; whereby all the Countrie received benefit of the victorie, yet fo, that the Souldiers had a farre greater proportion than the rest, as being fewer, and therefore receiuing more for every single

Out of this purchase was deducted the Lords tribute, which was one in fiftie, of that which the people received, and one in five hundred, of that which was given 40 to the Souldiers; namely one hundred and one thousand part of the whole bootic. So in the spoile of Midian, thirtie two thousand women being taken, the armie had fixteen thousand of them for flaues, and the Congregation had other fixteene thoufand; but out of the fixteene thousand given to the Armie, were exempted two and thirtie for the Lordstribute. Out of the peoples number were taken three hundred and twentie. By this meanes, the leffer that the Armie was which had exposed it felfe to danger, the greater profit had every Souldier; but when it confifted of many hands, they who remayning at home were faine to vndergoe more than ordinarie trauaile in domesticall affaires, did receiue by so much the greater portion. But the Lordstribute was alwaies certaine, yea many times it was increased, either by 50 fome especiall commandement, as when all the gold, and filter, and other mettalls found in Iericho, were consecrated vnto God; or by thankfulnesse of the Rulers and 10,6,19. People, as when after the victorie obtayned against the Midianites without the losse of one man, all Iewells, Bracelets, Eare-rings, and the like, were offered vp, as volun- Numb. 21.50. tarie prefents.

Now how focuer the Ifraelites were many times oppressed, and troden downe by other Nations, yet were not these treasures robbed or spoiled; for the enemies neuergat possession of the Tabernacle that was in Shile. Wherefore it cannot otherwife be, than that the wealth of the Sanctuarie must have beene exceeding great : as contayning aboue one hundreth part of all the money and other goods found by the Ifraelites in the whole Land of Canaan; and of all that was purchased by so many victories, as they obtayned against the bordering Nations. For that this treasurie was not defrauded of the due portion, it is cuident; feeing that before the time of Dauid and his Lieutenant loab, it is recorded that Saul and Abner, and before them Samuel, had vied to dedicate of the spoiles obtayned in warre, to maintayne the 10 house of the Lord : the like wherof may be well presumed of the former Iudges and Captaines in other Ages. Certaine it is, that the Conquest of David brought into the Land farre greater abundance of riches, than any former victories had purchafed, those of Iofua perhaps excepted : but these vast summes of an hundred thousand Talents of filuer, may feeme rather to have beene made vp, by the addition of his winnings and liberalitie, to the treasures laid vp in many former Ages, than to have beene the meere fruits of his owne industrie.

gold is 770. frêch crownes. 1. King. 10.14.

Now concerning the riches of Salomon, it is more manifest how he gathered them: for he received of yearely revenues with his tributes fixe hundred fixtie fixe Talents of gold, besides the Customes of Spices. He had also fixe rich Returnes from 20 the East India, which greatly increased his store. For his ships performed that voiage cuery three yeares, and he beganne that trade in the two and twentieth yeare of his raigne, and ruled fortie yeares. Besides this, all Indea and Ifrael were now mastered to his hands; all the Arabians his borderers, the Syrians of Zobah, of Damascena. of 1. King. e. g.v. 20 Palmyra, of Iturea; all of Idemea, Moab, and Ammon, paid him tribute; as likewise did the Hittites, who with the Perizzites, Heuites, Iebusites, and other races of the Canamites, were not as yet extinguished, though subjected.

ter fortie yeares raigne, and seuentie yeares of life, dyed in a good age, full of dayes, riches, and honour, and was buried in the Citie of Danid. It is written by Iolephus 20 that there was hid in Dauids Tombea meruailous quantitie of treasures, in so much as Hyrcanus ( who first of the Chasmanai , or race of the Maccabees, called himselfe King ) one thousand and three hundred yeares after, drew thence three thousand Talents, to rid himselfe of Antiochus then belieging Jerusalem, and afterward Herod opening an other Cell, had also an exceeding masse of gold and silver therein. And it was an ancient custome to burie treasure with the dead. So the Peruvians and other Americans did the like, which being discouered by the Spaniards, they inriched themsclues by nothing so much in their first Conquest. That Salomon did burie so much treasure in his fathers grave, it would hardly be beleeved, in regard of the great exactions with which he was faine to burthen the people, not with standing altheriches 40 which he got otherwise, or which were left vnto him : were it not with all confidered that his want of monie grew from such magnificent imploiments. Particularly of the Sepulcher of Danid the Scriptures have no mention, but only the Sepulchers of the Kings of Iuda, as of an honourable place of buriall. Yet the Monuments of those Kings, as (by Relation of the Duke of Plika) they remayned within these Peregranat, His-1961, D. N. CHAP.17. S.10.

F the Philistims, whose pride David was the first that absolutely mastered, in this conclusion of Dauids time somewhat here may bee

They descended of Cassoim, who, according to Isydor and Infephus, 1std.19.19. was one of the fonnes of Milraim, and was furnamed Philiftim, as Efau 10 (d. 1. am. 17) was furnamed Edom, and Iacob Ifrael. There were of them fine Cities of pettic principalities; namely, Azotus or Afdod, Gaza or Aczaph, Afcalon, Geth or Gath, and Acca- 1. Sam. 6. ron. It feemeth that Calloim was the first founder of this nation, because of his kindred on either hand, the Canaanites and the Egyptians. The first King of these Philistims, which the Scriptures have named, was that A- Genzo. bimelech which loued Sara, Abrahams wife.

The second Abimelech lived at once with Isaac, to whom Isaac repaired in the time of famine, Abimelech then residing at Gerar in the border of Idames, which Abimelech fancied Isaac his wife: as his father had done Sara.

After Abimelech the second, the Philistims Kings are not remembred in the Scriptures, till Davids time: perhaps the government was turned into Ariflocraticall. For they are afterwards named Princes of the Philiftims, how focuer Achis be named king Jud 16.1. Sam. of Gath, the fame to whom David fled, and who againe gaue him Siklag to inhabit in 18.19.

After him wee read of another Achis who liucd with Salomon, to whom Semes trangiled to fetch backe his fugitive fervant, what time the feeking of his fervant was the loffe of his life. Jeremie the Prophet speaketh of the Kings of Palessin or Philistim. Amos nameth the King of Ascalon: Zacharias, a King of Gaza. The rest of the warres of the Philistims are remembred in the Catalogue of the Indges, of Saul and David, and therefore I shall not neede to collect the particulars in this

There lived at once with Danid, the third of the Silviy King of Alba called Latinus Siluius, who is faid to have ruled that part of Italy fiftie yeeres. And about his fourteenth yeere Codrus the last King of the Athenians died, to whom succeded the first Prince of those, who being called after Medon, Medontide, without regall name gouerned Athens during their life.

The reasons which moued the Athenians to change their government, was not drawne from any inconvenience found in the rule of Soueraigntie, but in honour of Codrus onely. For when the Gracians of Doris, a region betweene Phocis and the mountaine Oeta, fought counfaile from the Oracle, for their fuccesse in the warres against the Athenians, it was answered that then vidoubtedly they should preuaile and become Lords of that State, when they could obtain any victorie against the Nation, and yet preserve the Athenian King living. Codrus by some intelligence being informed of this answere, withdrewe himselfe from his owne forces, and putting on the habit of a common fouldier, entred the Campe of the Dorians, and killing the first hee encountred, was himselfe forthwith cut in Eupales the 21. King of Affyria, which others account but the 30. began to rule 50 that Empire, about the 12. yeere of David, and held it 38. yeeres.

Neere the same time began Ixion the second King of the Heraelsde, the sonne of Eurysthenes in Corinth; and Agis the second of the Heraelida in Lacedamon: in honour of which Agu, his fuccessours were called Agida, for many yeeres after. He restored the Laconians to their former libertie: hee ouercame the Citizens of Helosin Laconia, who had refused to pay him tribute: hee condemned them and theirs to perpetual flauerie; wherof it came, that all the Mellenians, whom at length they brought into the like bondage, were after called Helotes,

In like fort from the Selani came the word Slane. For when that Nation iffuing out of Sarmatia, now called Rullia, had feifed your the countrie of Illyria and made in their owne by Conquest, their victorie pleased them so highly, that therupon they called themselves by a new name, Slauos, which is in their language glorious. But in after-times (that warmer Climate having thawed their northerne hardines, and not ripened their wits) when they were troden down, and made feruants to their neighbours; the Italians which kept many of them in bondage began to cal all their bond- 10 men Slaues, vling the word as a name of reproche: in which fense it is now current through many countries.

Other Chronologers make this Agis, the third King of Sparta, and somewhat later, about the 23. yeere of Danid, and fair that Scheffratus was the fourth King of Euleb, in Chron, this race, the fame whome Eulebius cals Labotes, and fets him in the thirteenth yeere

In the teach veere of Achestratus, Androdus the third fonce of codrus affifted by the Iones, built Ephelias in Caria, who after the adjoyning of the Ile of Sames to his territorie was flame by the Carians whose countrie he ysurped. He was buried (faith The Haft gate Paulanius) in one of the gates of Ephelius called Magnetes, his armed Statua being let 20 ward Macroclas Ouer him. Strabe reports that after Androclas had Subdued the Jonians (the next vpon the river province to Ephelus on the fea coast of Asia the lesse) he inlarged his Dominions vppon the Aoles, which joyneth to Jonia: and that his posteritie gouerned the Cities

The other Citie poffet by Androclus in Folis was also vinuerfully spoken of by reason of Sibylla, surnamed Erythraa: who lived feuen hundred and fourtie yeeres before Christ borne. Saint Augustine auoweth that a Romane Proconful shewed him in an auncient Greeke coppie certaine verses of this Propheteffe: which began (as Saint Augustine changed them into Latine) in these wordes. In this time also Acastus lived, the second of the Athenian Princes after Codrus, Enthis. chan. of which there were thirteene in descent before the State changed into a Magisfraie Hearding vit. of tenne yeeres. Some writers make it probable that the Aolians ledde by Graus, Honder Strab.

But it is a familiar errour in to fephus, to mifreckon times, which in this point hee doth fo ftrangely, as if hee knew not how at all to cast any accompt. For that it was the fame Hirans 20 which lived both with David and with Salomon, the Scriptures make it plainely

> CHAP. XVIII. Of SALOMON.

Of the establishing of SALOMON: of birthright, and of the cause of ADONIAHS death, and of SALOMONS wildome.

ALO MON, who was brought up under the Prophet Nathan, beganne to reigne ouer Juda and Ifrael, in the yeere of the world 2001. He was called Salomon by the appointment of God: hee was also called Iediddia, or Theophilus, by Nathan because the Lord loued him.

Hiram King of Tyre, after Salomons annouting, difpatched Embassadours toward him, congratulating his establishment : a custome betweene Princes very auncient. Whence we read that David did in like fort falute Hanum King of the Ammonites, after his ob- 2. Sam. 10.

taining the Kingdome.

The beginning of Salomon was in bloud, though his reigne were peaceable. For foone after Dauids death, hee caused his brother Adonijah to bee flaine by Benaiah 50 the fonne of Jehoiada, taking occasion from Adonijah his defiring by Bersheba, that the young maid Abilhag, which lay in Davids bosome in his latter daies, to keepe him warme, might be given him. What focuer hee pretended it was enough that Adomijab was his elder brother, and fought the kingdome contrary to the will of Dauid, whom God inclined towardes Salomon. And yet it is saide that a word is enough to the wife, and he that fees but the claw, may know whether it bee alvon or no: fo it may feeme that to the quick-fighted wildome of Salomon, this motion of Alonijahs, was a demonstration of a new treason. For they which had beene concubines to a King, might not after bee touched but by a King: whence Achitothe withed Abfalon to take his fathers concubines as a part of the royaltie. And David after that wrong, determining to touch them no more, did not give them to any other, but them vp, and they remained widowed vntil their death. And this it feems was the depth of Isbofbeths quarrel against Abner, for having his fathers concubine. And some lignification of this custome may seeme too in the words of God by Nathanto Danid; I have given thee thy masters house, and thy masters wives. And in the 10 1.5.111.29.30. words of Saul, upbraiding Jonathan that hee had chosen David to the shame of the nakednesse of his mother. Hercunto perhaps was some reference in this purpose of Adonial, to marrie with her that was alwaies prefent with David in his latter daies, and who belike knew all that was past, for the conveying of the Kingdome to Saloman. There might be divers farther occasions, as either that hee would learne fuch things by her as might be for the advantage of his ambition, or that he would perswade her to forge some strange tale about Danids last Testament, or any thing else that might prejudice the title of Salomon.

As for the right of an elder brother which Adonijah pretended, though generally it agreed both with the law of Nations, and with the cuitomes of the lenes : yet the 20 1. King. 2.15. Kings of the Jewes were fo absolute, as they did therein, and in all elfe what they pleased. Some examples also they had (though not of kings) which taught them to ye this paternall authoritic in transferring the birthright to a younger sonne: namely of lacobs difficriting Reuben, and gining the birthright (which was twice as much as any portion of the other brethren) to loseph: of whom hee made two tribes. And Descrits.

Filtern exode ag- that it was generally acknowledged that this power was in Daniel, it appeares by nofeto, diedo et the words of Berfabe and Nathan to David, and of Ionathan to Adonijah. For as for popular election, that it was necessarie to confirme, or that the refusal of the people had authoritie to frustrate the elder brothers right to the Kingdome, it nowhere ellius primogeappeares in the stories of the lewes. It is said indeed that the people made Saul King 20 niterum.1.Tire. at Gigal: that is, they acknowledged and established him. For that hee was King T.Kingara 1000 long before no man can doubt. In like manner elswhere the phrase of chusing or making their King, is to bee expounded: as wherein the prohibition, that they 1.Sam 11.14. should not make themselues a King, it is said. Thou shalt make him King whom the

But to proceed with the acts of Salomon: at the fame time that he put Adonijah to death, he ridde himselfe also of Joab, and three yeeres after of Shimei, as Dautd had aduised him: he displaced also the Priest Abiathar, who tooke part with Alonijah against him: but in respect of his office, and that he followed Danid in all his afflictions, and because hee had borne the Arke of God before his father, he spared his life. 40 And thus being established in his Kingdome, hee tooke the daughter of Vaphres King of Egypt to wife : for so Eusebius out of Eupolemus cals him. Hee offered a thousand sacrifices at Gibeon, where God appearing vnto him in a dreame, bad him aske what he would at his hands; SALOMON choofeth wildome, which pleafed God. And God faid unto him, Because thou hast asked this thing, and hast not asked for thy selfe long life, neither half thou asked riches for thy felfe, nor half asked the life of thine enemies, behold I have done according to thy words: by which wee may informe our felues what delires are most pleasing to God, and what not. For the coucting after long life, in respect of our selues, cannot but proceede of selse-loue, which is the roote of all impietie: the defire of private riches is an affection of couctoufnesse which God ab- 50 horreth; to affect reuenge, is as much as to take the fword out of Gods hand and to distrust his Instice. And in that it pleased God to make Salomon know that it liked him, that he had not asked the life of his enemies, it could not but put him in mind of his brothers flaughter, for which he had not any warrant either from Danid, or from the Law of God. But because Salomon desired wildome onely, which taught him both to obey God, and to rule men, it pleafed God to give him withail that which he defired not. And I have also given thee (faith God) that which thou half not asked, both riches and honour. This gift of wisdome our Commentators stretch to almost all kindes of learning: but that it comprehended the knowledge of the nature of plantes and living creatures the Scripture tellifieth, though no doubt the chiefe excellencie of Salomons wildome, was in the knowledge of gouerning his kingdome: whence, as it were for an example of his wildome, the Scripture telleth how foone he judged the controuerfie betweene the two harlors.

II.

Of SALOMONS buildings and glorie.

E then entred into league with Hiram King of Tyre, from whom hee had much of his materials, for the Kings palace and the Temple of God: for the building whereof he had received a double charge, one from his father Dania, and another from God. For like as it is written of Dania' that Hecalled S A L O M O N his fonne, and charged him to build a Hee beganne the worke of the Temple, in the beginning of the 4 yeers of his L.Kin. L.G.V. reigne, at which time also hee prepared his fleete at Estongaber to trade for gold in the East Indies, that nothing might be wanting to supplie the charge of so great a worke. For that the Temple was in building, while his fleetes were paffing to and froit is manifest. For the pillars of the Temple were made of the Aimagam trees brought from ophir. Of this most glorious building, of all the particulars (whereof 1. Chron. 28.20 the forme and example was given by God himfelfe) many learned men have writ-20 ten, as Salmeron, Montanus, Ribera, Burralus, Azorius, Villalpandus, Pineda, and others. to whom I referre the reader.

For the cutting and squaring of the Cedars which served that building, Salomon employed thirtie thouland Carpenters, tenne thouland every moneth by course: he also vsed eightie thousand Masons in the mountaine, and seauentie thousand labourers that bare burdens, which it is conceived, he selected out of the Profesites, befides three thousand three hundred maisters of his worke, so as he paid and imployed in all one hundred eightie three thousand and three hundred men, in which number the Zidonians which were more skilful in hewing timber than the Ifraelites, may(as I think') be included. For Hiram caused his servants to bring downe the Ce-40 dars and Firres from Libanon to the fea, and thence fent them in raffes to Joppe or the 1.Kin.5.v.o. next port to Hierusalem. For in the second of Chronicles the second Chapter, it is plaine that all but the thirtie thousand Carpenters, and the overseers, were strangers, and as it feemeth the vastals of Hiram, and of Vaphres King of Agypt. In re-1. Kin. 5.12. compence of all this timber and stone, Salomon gaue Hiram twentie thousand meafures of wheate, and twentic measures of pure oyle yeerely. I Ing SALOMON to King SVKON, of Tyre, Sydon, and Phanicia King, and myje-thrys friend, fendeth greeting, You may underfland that I have received of the great God of my lather DAVID, the Kingdome : and when my father commaunded mee to build a Temple to God which crested beanen and earth, bee commaunded also that Isbould write to you. Invite therefore to you, and befeech you, that you would bee pleased to fend mee artiscers and Carpenters to build the Temple of God,

To which the King Suron made this answere.

C VRON, Tyri, Sydenis, & Phaniciares, SALOMONI regisalitem. Lettis literis gra- 10 Dias eet Deo, qui tibi regnum patris tradidit: & quoniam scribis fabros ministros q, ad convlendum Templum esse tibi mittendos, misi ad te millia kominum octoginta, & Architectum Tyrium hominem ex matre Iudea, virum in rebus architectur e mirabilem. Curabis igitur vi necessarijs non egeant, & Templo Dei condito ad nos redeant.

SVRON of Tyre Siden and Phanicia King, to King SALONON greeting: when I Secad your letters, I gaue God thankes, who hath infladed you in your fathers Kingdome. And because you write, that corpenters and workensen may be sent to build Gods Temple, I have fent onto you four cleare thou fand men, and a Maifter builder a Tyrian, borne of a lewith woman, a man a mirable in building. You will be carefull that all necessaries be provided 20 10f. Ant. 1.8. e. z. for them, and when the Temple of God is built that they come home to vs.

The Copies of these letters were extant in Insephastime as himselfe affirmeth, and to be feene, faith he, Tom in notices quam in Tyriorum annalibus, as well in our owne asin the Train annals. But he delivereth them somewhat in different tearmes, as the reader may finde in his antiquities. But were this intercourse betweene Salomort and thram either by melfage or by writing, it is fomewhat otherwise deliuered in the Scriptures, than either Enpoleones or Tofepha fet it downe, but, so that in subthe 1.v.to the 9. france there is little difference between the one and the other.

The like letter in effect Salomon is faid to have written to Vaphres King of Egypts 20 and was answered as from Haram.

But whereas some Commenters upon Salomen finde that Hiram King of Tyre, and Vaphres King of Egypt, gaue Salomon the title of Rex magnus, and cite Eupolemon in Eufebius, I doe not finde any fuch addition of magnus in Eufebius in the last chapter of that ninth booke; neither is it in Jefethus in the eight booke and fecond chapter of the lewes antiquities : it being a vaine title vied by some of the Affrica and Perflan Kings and yield likewife by the Parthians, and many other after them, infomuch as in latter times it grew common, and was vsurped by meane persons in respect of the great Hermes the first which was honoured by that name for his noble qualities as much or more than for his mightineffe.

After the finithing and dedication of the Temple and house of the Lord, Salomon fortified Ierufilem with a troble wal, & repaired Hazar which had benethe auncient Metropolis of the Canaanites, before Iofualistime: fo did he Gaza of the Philiftims: he built Bethoron, Gerar and the Millo or munition of Hierusalem. For Pharaoh ( as it feemeth in fauour of Salomon) came vp into the edge of Ephraim, and tooke Gerar which the Canaanites yet held & put them to the fword and burnt their Citie. The place and territorie he gaue Salomons wife for a dowrie. And it is probable that because Salaman was then busied in his magnificent buildings, and could not attend the warre, that he entreated his father in lawe to rid him of those neighbours, which Pheraph performed. But he thereby taught the Agyptians to visite those partes a-gaine before they were sent for, and in his sonne Rehaboams time Sheshack this mans fucceffor did facke teru(alem it felfe.

Salamon at to built Aregiddo in Manasse, on this side Iordan; and Balah in Dan : also Thadmor, which may be either Ptolomics Thamoron in the defart of Inda ( or as InfeCHAP. 18. S.z. of the Historie of the World.

phus thinkes Palmyra in the defart of Syria, which Palmyra because it stood on the vtmost border of Salomons dominion to the northeast of Libanus, and was of Dauids conquest when hee wanne Damaseus; it may seeme that Salomon therefore bestowed thereon the most cost, and fortified it with the best arte, that that age had. Infe- lofely 1.8. mm. phus cals this place Thadamora, by which name (faith hee) given by Salomon, the Syrians as vet call it. Hierom in his booke of Hebrew places cals it Thermeth. In aftertimes, when it was rebuilt by Adrian the Emperor it was honoured with his name, and called Adrianopolis. In respect of this great charge of building Salomen raised tribute through all his Dominions, besides an hundred and twentie talents of gold 10 received from Hiram feruants, Salomon offered Hiram twentie townes in or neere the vpper Galilee, but because they stood in an unfruitfull and marish ground Hiram refuled them, and thereof was the territorie called Chabull. These townes, as it is supposed, lay in Galilee of the Gentiles, Non quadgentes ibi habit.went : fed quia fub ditione regis gentilis erat, Not that it was possess by Gentiles (faith Nauclerus) but because it was under the rule of a King that was a Gentile. Howsocuerit were, it is true that Salomon in his 21. yeere fortified those places, which Hiram refuled. Further, he made a journey into Syria Zobah and established histributes; the first and last warre (if in that expedition hee were driven to fight) that hee made in person in all his life. Hethen visited the border of all his Dominions passing from 20 Thismen to the North of Palmyrena, and so to the Deserts of Idumea, from whence hee vilited Eziongsher and Eloth, the vttermost place of the South of all his territories, bordering to the red sea: which Cities I have described in the Storie of

Of SALOMON'S fending to Ophir, and of some seeming contradictions about SALOMONS riches, and of PINEDAES conceipt of two strange passages about

Ere Salomon prepared his fleete of shippes for India with whom Hiram ioyned in that voyage, and furnished him with Marriners and Pilots, the Tyrians being of all other the most expert sea-men. From this part of Arabia, which at this time belonged to Edom and was conquered by Danie, did the Fleete passe on to the East India, which was not farre off, namely to Ophir, one of the Islands of the Moluccus, aplace exceeding rich in gold: witneffethe Spaniards, who notwithstanding all the aboundance which they gather in Peru, doe yet plant in those Islands of the East at Manilia, and reco-40 uer agreat quantitie from thence, and with leffe labour than they doe in any one part of Peru, or new Spaine.

The returne which was made by thesesshippes amounted to source hundred and twentie talents, but in the second of Chronicles the eight, it is written source hundred and fiftie talents: wherof thirtie talents went in expence for the charge of the fleet, and wages of men, and foure hundred and twentie talents, which makes fine and twentic hundred and twentie thousand Crownes came cleere. And thus must those two places be reconciled. As for the place 1. Reg. 10. 14. which speaketh of fixe hundred fixtie and fix talents of gold, that fumme, as I take it, is of other receipts of salemons which were yearely, and which came to him belides these profits from Ophir.

My opinion of the land of Ophir, that it is not Peru in America (as divers have thought) but a countrey in the East Indies; with some reason why at those times they could not make more speedie returne to Ierusalem from the East Indies then in 3. c & $ 9.10 * 1. yeeres; and that Thar is in Scripture is diverstimes taken for the Ocean; hath beene Lib.4.4 evens Salemana. 6.

Onely it remaineth that I should speake somewhat of Pineda his strange conceits, who being a Spaniard of Batica would faine have Gades or Calis-malis, in old times called Tarteffie, which is the Southwest corner of that Prouince, to be the 1 harfis from whence Salomon fetcht his gold; for no other reason, as it seemes, but for love of his owne countrie, and because of some affinitie of sound between Tharsis and Tartessus. For whereas it may feeme strange that it should be three yeere ere they, that tooke shippe in the red sea, should returne from the East Indies to Ierusalem, this hath bene in part answered alreadie. And further the intelligent may conceiue of fundry lets, in the digging and refining of the mettall, and in their other trafficke, and in their land-carriages betweene lerufalem and the red fea, and perhaps also elswhere: so that 10 wee have no neede to make Salomons men to goe many thousand miles out of their way to Gales, round about all Affrick, that so they might bee long a comming

For the direct way to Gades (which if Salomon and the Ifraelites knew not, the Tyrisms which went with them, could not have been ignorant of) was along the Mediterransea, and so ( besides many wonderfull inconveniences and terrible nauigation in rounding Africa) they should have escaped the troublesome land-carriage betweene Ierufalem and the red fea through drie, defart, and theeuish Countries: and within 30. mile of terufalem at toppe, or some other hauen in Salomons owne Coun-trie haug laden and valaden their thips.

But this direct course they could not hold (faith Pineda) because the huge Island of Atlantis in largneffe greater than all Africk and Afra being swallowed up in the Atlantic Ocean hindered Silomons thips from passing through the straits of Gibraltar: for this hee alleadgeth Plate in Timee. But that this calamitie happened about Salemonstime, or that thereby the Straights of Gades were filled with mudde and made vnpassable, that there could bee no comming to Gades by the Mediterran (ea: or that this indraught where the sea runneth most violently, and most easily scourcth his channell, should be filled with mud, and not also the great Ocean in like manner. where this huge Island is supposed to have stoode : or that Salomons ships being in the red sca, should neglect the golden mines of the East Indies (which were infinitly 20 better and neerer to the red fea, than any in Spain) to feeke gold at Cady = by the way of compaling Affrica, it is most ridiculous to imagine. For the Spaniard himselfe that hath also the rich Peruin the West, fortifieth in the East Indies and inhabites fome part thereof, as in Manilia, finding in those parts no lesse quantitie of gold (the fmall territorie which he there possessite considered) than in Peru.

Devebus Sald.

The same Pineda hath another strange passage round about all Africa, which elfwhere he dreames of : Supposing whereas Ionas failing to Tharsis the Citic of Cilicia As it appeares was cast out in the Mediterran fea, and taken up there by a Whale, that this whale in three dayes swimming about twelve thousand English miles, along the Mediterran feas, and fo through the fireights of Gades, and along all the buge seas round about 40 Africa, caft vp len, s vpon the shore of the red lea, that so hee might have perhaps fome fixe miles the thorter (though much the worse) way to Aimine. This conceipt hee grounds onely vpon the ambiguitie of the word Suph, which oftentimes is an Epitheton of the red fea (as if wee thould call it mare algolum, the fea full of weeds) for the red sea. But in Ionas 2. 5. it is generally taken in the proper fignification for weeds, and not as Pineda would have it, who in this place against his owne rule (which elfewhere he giueth vs) supposeth strange miracles without any neede. For this long voyage of the whale finished in three daies, is a greater miracle, than the very preferuation of Ionas in the bellie of the whale and therefore seing there is no necessitie of this miracle, we send it backe vnto him, keeping his ownerule which in 50 this place he forgets; Miracula non funt multiplicanda. And againe, Non funt miracula gratis danda, ncc pro arbitrio noua fingenda, Miracles are not to be multiplied without neceffire, nor delinered without cause, nor fained at pleasure. Therefore to Icaue this man in his dreames, which (were hee not otherwise very learned and iudicious) might bee thought vnworthic the mentioning. But to proceede with our Storie of

The Queene of Sabaes comming from farre to Salamon, (as it seemes from Arabia falix, & not as fome think from Athiopia) and her rich presents, and Salomons reciprocal magnificence, and his refoluing of her difficult questions, those are set downe at large in the text. But herein Tolephus is greatly mistaken, who cals this Queene of Saba Nigaules, the fucceffour (faith hee out of Herodotus) of those thirtie and eight . Egyptian Kings which succeded Mineus the founder of Memphis; adding that after this Agyptian, and the father in Law of Salomon, the name of Pharach was left Mante 1.2

10 off in Agypt. For as it is elfwhere proued that the Queene was of Arabia, not of Egypt and Ætbiopia; fo were there other Pharaohs after the father in Law of Salomon. Yea, aboue three hundred yeeres after Salomon, Pharao Zyecho flew 10/has King of 2.Kin.c.2.6

It is also written of Salomon that hee kept in garrisons fourteene thousand chariots and twelue thousand horsemen, that he spent in Court every day thirtie measures of fine flower, threescore measures of wheat, one hundred sheepe, befides flags and fallow deare, bugels and foule; foure thousand stals of horses he had for his chariots and other ves, and for the twelve thouland holemen of his guard. For , the ten thouland stals in the first of Kings the fourth, are to be taken but for so 20 many horses, whence in the second of Chronicles the ninth, it is written but source thousand stals or teemes, and in every teeme ten horses, as Innius and the Genera vn- 1.King.4-31 derstand it. He was faid to be wifer than any man, yea than were Ethan the Exeahite, than Heman, Chalcal, or than Darda, to which Junius addeth a fife to wit, Eze ak. For the Genera maketh Ethan an Expanite by Nation. Infephus writes them Athan. Æman, Chalceus and Donan the fonnes of Hemon. Hee spake three thousand Prouerbes, and his fonges were one thousand and fine, whereof either the most part perished in the Captiuitie of Babylon, or else because many actes of Salomons were written and kept among the publique Records of Civill causes and not Ecclesiafticall, therefore they were not thought necessarie to bee inserted into Gods

Owas hee had plentie of all other things, so had he no scarcitie of women, For belides his feauen hundred wines hee kept three hundred Concubines, and (forgetting that God had commaunded that none of his people should accompanie the daughters of Idolators) hee tooke wives out of Egypt, idom, Moab, Ammon, Zidon and Heth: and when hee fell a doting, his wines turned his heart after other Gods, as Afteroth of the Zidonians, Mileom or Molech of the Ammonites, and Chemolh of Moab.

These things God punished by Adad of Idumes, Rezin of Damaseus, and by Ierobeam his owne feruant, and one of the mafters of his workes, who by the ordinance of God tare from his fonne Roboam, ten of the twelve parts of all the territorie hee had. 50 In the reigne of Salomon (as in tymes of long peace) were few memorable actions by him performed, excepting his buildings with other workes of magnificence and that great Indian voyage alreadic mentioned. Fourtie yeeres hee reigned: how many he lived, it is not written, and must therefore bee found onely by conjecture The most likelie way to guesse at the truth in this case, is by considering the action, of the yeares which they confumed, and confequently learne the true, or most likely yeare of his nativitie. Seauen yeeres David reigned in Hebron : in his eight yeere hee tooke Jerufalem, and warred with the Philistims, who also troubled him the yere following. The bringing home of the Arke seemes to have been in the tenth yere of David, and his intention to build the Temple in the veere enfuing, at which time he had fufficient levfure, liuing in reft. After this he had warres with the Philistims, Moabites, Aramites and Edomites, which must needes have held him five vecres, considered that the Aramites of Damasco raised warre against him, after such time as he had beaten Hadadezer; and that in every of these warres, he had the entire victorie. Neither is it likely that these seruices occupied any longer time, because 2.5am.c.11.v.1 in those daies and places there were no wintering campes in vse, but at conucnient feafons of the vecre, Kings went forth to warre, dispatching all with violence, rather than with temporizing; as maintaining their armies, partly uppon the footle of the enemies countrie, partly upon the private provision which every fouldier made for himselfe. The 17. yeere of David in which hee tooke Mephiboleth the son of Ionathan into his Court, appeareth to have passed away in quiet; and the vecre following to have begunne the warre with Ammon; but fomewhat late in the end of fummer perhaps, it came to triall of a battaile (for loab after the victorie, returned immediatly to leru[alem] the causes and preparations for that war having taken 20 vp all the fummer. Davids perfonall expedition against the Aramites wherein hee brought all the tributaries of Hadadezer under his owne allegiance, appeares manifeltly to have beene the next veeres worke, wherein he did cut off all meanes of fuccour from the Ammonites; all Syria, Monb and Iduman being now at his owne deuotion. By this reckoning it must have beene the 20, yeare of Davids reigne, and about the aftieth of his life, in which he fent forth loab to beliege Rabba, and finished the warre of Ammon: wherein also fell out the matter of Frishs wife. So one halfe of Dauids reigne was very prosperous: in the other halfe he felt great forrow by the expectation, execution, and fad remembrace of that heavie judgement laid your him by God, for his foule and bloudie offence,

Now very manifest it is that in the veere after the death of that childe, which was begotten in adulterie, Salomon was borne, who must needes therefore haue beene nineteene veres old or thereabout, when he beganne to reigne at the deceafe of his father, as being begotten in the 21, yeare of his fathers reigne, who reigned in all fortie.

This account hath also good coherence with the following times of Dauid, as may be collected out of enfuing actions: for two yeeres passed ere Absalom slewe his brother Ammon; three yeeres ere his father pardoned him; and two yeres more ere he came into the Kings presence. After this he prepared horses and men, and laid the foundation of his rebellion, which feemes to have beene one yeres worke. 40 So the rebellion it felfe with all that happenned thereupon, as the Commotion made by Sheba, the death of Amasand the rest, may well seeme to have beene in the 20. yeare of Danids reigne.

Whether the three yeres of famine should be reckoned apart from the last yeres of warre with the Philistims or confounded with them, it were more hard than needfull to coniecture. Plaine enough it is, that in the tenne remaining yeeres of David there was time sufficient, and to spare, both for three yeeres of famine, for foure yeares of warre, and for numbring the people, with the peftilence enfuing; as also for his owne last infirmitie, and disposing of the Kingdom. Yet indeed it seemes that the warre with the Philistims, was but one yeeres worke, and ended in three or foure fights, of which the two or three former were at Gob or Wob neere vnto Gezer and the last at Gath. This warre the Philistims undertooke, as it seemeth, upon confidence gathered out of the tumults in Ifrael, and perhaps emboldened by Davids old age, for hee fainted now in the battaile, and was afterwardes hindered by his men from expoling himfelfe vnto danger any more. So David had fixe or fenen yeares of rest, in which time it is likely, that many of his great men of Warre died (being of his owne age) whereby the ftirring spirit of Adonial found little fuctour in the broken partie of loab the fonne of Zernia.

of the Historie of the World.

At this time it might both truly be faid by Danid to Salomon. Thou art a wife man, 1. King. 62.79. and by Salomon to God, I am but a yong child; for nineteene yeares of age might $63.27. well agree with either of these two speeches.

Neuertheleffe there are some that gather out of Salomons professing himselfe a child, that he was but eleuen yeares old when he beganne to raigne. Of these Rabbi so Salomon feemes the first Authour, whom other of great learning and judgement haue herein followed: grounding themselues perhaps vponthat which is said of Absolous rebellion, that it was after fortic yeares, which they understand as yeares 2. Sam. 15.7. of Dauids raigne. But whereas Reliaboam the sonne of Salomon was 41. yeares old when hee beganne to raigne, it would follow bereby that his Father had begotten him, being himselfe but a child of nine or ten yeares old; the difference betweene their ages being no greater, if Salomon (who raigned fortic yeares) were but cleuen yeares old when his raigne began. To avoid this inconvenience, lofephus allowes 80. yeares of raigne to Salomon; areport to difagreeing with the Scriptures, that it needes no confutation. Some indeede haue in fauour of this opinion construed the 20 wordes of Tofephus, as if they included all the yeares of Salomons life. But by fuch reckoning hee should have beene 40. yeares old at his Fathers death; and confequently should have beene borne long before his Father had wome terusalem : which is a manifest vntruth. Wherefore the 40. yeares remembred in Abfalons rebellion, may either feeme to have reference to the space betweene Davids first annointment, and the trouble which God brought vpon him for his wickednesse, or perhaps be read (according to lofephus, Theodoret, and the Latine translation) foure yeares; which passed betweene the returne of Absolon to Jerusalem, and his brea-

Here remaine of Salomons workes, the Proverbs, the Preacher, and the Song of Salomon. In the first he teacheth good life and correcteth manners, in the fecond the vanitie of humane nature, in the third he fingeth as it were the Epithalamion of Christ and his Church. For the Booke intituled the wisedome of Salomon, (which some give vnto Sa-

He also speaketh of one Eliazarus, who by the roote in Salomons ring disposses divers persons of euill spirits in the presence of Velpalian, and many others, which I will not fland to examine.

Certainly fo strange an example of humane frailty hath neuer been read of as this King: who having received wildome from God him felfe, in honour of whom, and for his only fernice, he built the first and most glorious Temple of the world: hee that was made King of I/rael and Indan, not by the law of Nature, but by the loue 10 of God, and became the wifest, richest, and happiest of all Kings, did in the end, by the perswasion of a few weake and wretched Idolatrous Women, forget and forfake the Lord of all the world, and the giver of all goodnesse, of which he was more liberall to this King, than to any that ever the world had. Of whom Siracides writeth in this manner. SALOMON raigned in a peaceable time and was glorious, for God made all quiet round about, that he might build a house in his name, and prepare the San-Etuarie for ever; How wife wast thou in thy youth, and wast filled with understanding, as with a floud! Such Eutropius, at such time as Sesos was carried out to take the aire, cast his head continually backe vpon the two fore-most wheeles next him; which Sefostris perceiving, asked him what hee found worthy the admiration in that motion ? to whom the captiue King answered, that in those he beheld the instabilitie of all worldly thinges; for that both the

EHOBOAM the Son of Salomon by Nahamaan Ammonitelle, now fortie yeares olde, fucceeded his Father Salomon, and was annointed at Sichem, where the ten Tribes of Ifrael were affembled: who attended a while the returne of Ieroboam as yet in Egypt, fince he fled thither fearing Salomon. whereof he tooke three daies to deliberate before his answere, of whom therefore it could not be faid as of David, that he was wifer than all his Teachers. For as of himselfe hee knew not how to resolve, so had hee not the judgement to discerne of counfells, which is the very test of wisedome in Princes, and in all men else. But notwithstanding that he had consulted with those grave and aduised men, that serued his Father, who perswaded him by all meanes to satisfie the multitude: he was transported by his familiars and fauourites, not only to continue on the backs of his 40 Subjects those burdens which greatly crusht them ; but (vaunting fally of greatneffe exceeding his Fathers) he threatned in sharpe, or rather in terrible termes, to lay yet heauier, and more vnfupportable loades on them. But as it appeared by the fucceffe, those yonger aduifors greatly mistooke the nature of seueritie, which without the temper of elemencie is no other than crueltic it felfe: they also were ignorant that it ought to be yied for the helpe, and not for the harme of fubicets. For what is the strength of a King left by his people ? and what cordes or fetters haue euer lasted long, but those which haue beene twisted and forged by loue only? His witleffe paralites could well judge of the Kinges disposition : and being well learned therein, though ignorant in all thinges elfe, it fufficed and inabled them fufto ficiently for the places they held. But this answere of Rehoboam did not a little adnance Terobosms delignes. For being fore-told by the Prophet Achish of his future aduancement, these the Kings threats (changing the peoples loue into furie) confirmed and gaue courage to his hopes. For he was no fooner arrived, than elected King of Ifrael: the people crying out what portion have wee in Dauid? wee have no

Now though themselues, even all the Tribes of If red, had conferred to Dauids annointing at Hebron the second time, acknowledging that they were his bones and his flein; yet now after the manner of rebells. they forgat both the bonds of nature, and their dutie to God, and, as all alienated refolued hearts doe, they ferued themselves for the present with impudent excuses. Siehem with all speede, and recovered leval dem, where preparing to invade Israel. with an hundred and foure-fcore thousand chosen men, Shemai in the person of to God commanding to the contrarie, all was flaied for the prefent. In the meane time leroboam the new King fortified Sechem on this fide, and Penuel on the other fide of Jordan; and fearing that the Vnion and exercise of one Religion would also iowne the peoples heart, against to the House of David; and having in all likelyhood allo promifed the Agyptians to follow their Idolatrie; he fet up two Calues of gold for the Children of Ifrael to worthip, impioufly persuading them that those were the Gods, or at least by these hee represented those Gods, which delinered them out of Agypt and refuling the feruice of the Leuites, hee made Priefts fit for fuch Gods. It must needes be that by banishing the Leuites which served David and Salamon through all I/rael, Ieroba.m greatly inriched himselfe: as taking into his hands 20 all those Cities which were given them by Moses and Iolua, for as it is written. The Leuites lest their suburbs, and their possession, and came to Iuda, &c. This irreligious pollicie of Ierobasm (which was the foundation of an Idolatrie that never could be rooted out, vntill Ifrael for it was rooted out of the Land) was by prophecie and miracles impugned fufficiently when it first beganne; but the affections maintaining it, were fo ftrong, that neither Prophecie nor Miracle could make them yeeld. Ierobaam could not bee moved now by the authoritic of Ahia, who from the Lord had first promised vnto him the Kingdome; nor by the withering of his owne hand as hee stretched it ouer the Altar, which also claus a funder, according to the figne, which the man of God had given by the commandement of 30 God, who againe recourred and cured him of that defect; yet he continued as obftinate an Idolater as before, for he held it the fafest course in pollicie to proceede as he had begunne. This impious invention of Ierobosm, who forfooke God, and the Religion of his forefathers, by God and his Ministers taught them, was by a moderne Historian compared with the pollicies of late Ages, obseruing well the practife of his Nation, being an Italian borne. Sie qui hodie (faith he) politici vocantur, & propria commoda, prasentes finitates sibi tanquam vitimum finem conflituunt, caufam quam vocant status in capite omnium ponunt : pro ipfa tuenda, promonenda, conseruanda, amplianda nihil non facien lum putant. Of REHOBOAM his impictie; for which he was punished by SESAC: of his end and Contemporaries.

Hile Ieroboam was occupied in fetting up his new Religion, Rehoboams on the other fide having now little hope to recouer the Provinces loft, ftrengthened the principall places remaining with all endeuour: for he fortified and victualled fifteene Cities of Indah and Beniamin : 2, chron, +15 not that he feared Ierobeam alone, but the Agyptians, to whom Ieroboam had not only fastned himselfe, but withall inuited them to inuade Indaa: laying perchance before them the incountable riches of Dauid and Salomon, which might now eafily bee had, feeing ten of the twelve Tribes were revolted, and become enemies to the Indaans. So as by those two waies (of late yeares often troden) to wit, change of Religion, and inuitation of forraine force, Ieroboam hoped to fettle himselfe in the seate of Ifrael, whom yet the powerfull God for his Idolatrie in a few yeares after rooted out with all his. Rehoboam also having, as he thought, by fortifying divers places affured his efface, for looke the Law of the living God, i. And therefore in the fifth years of his raigne, Sefas or Shifbas before spoken of, being now King of Egypt, and with whom as well Adad of Idumaa, as Ieroboam, were familiar and his infiruments, entred Indea with twelve thousand Chariots, and a chron. 12.30 three score thousand Horse, besides foote-men, which Josephus numbers at foure 10f. data. 8.c.4. hundred thousand. This Armie was compounded of foure Nations, Agyptians, Lubeans, Succeans, and Culites. The Lubeans were Lybeans, the next bordering Region to Agypt, on the West side. The Cusites were of Petraa, and of the Desart Arabia, which afterward followed Zerahagainst Asa King of Inda. With this great and powerfull Armie, Selac invaded Indea, and (belides many other strong Cities) wanne terusalem it selfe, of which, and of the Temple, and 30 Kings house, he tooke the spoile, carrying away (besides other treasures) the golden shields which Salomon had made, in imitation of those which David recoursed from Adadezer, in the Syrian warre: these Rehoboam Supplied with Targets of braffe, which were fit enough to guard a King of his qualitie : whom Siracides calleth The foolishnesse of the people.

From this time forward the Kings of Agypt claimed the four raigntie of Indea, and held the lenes as their Tributaries : Sefae, as it feemes, rendring vp to Rehoboans. his places on that condition. So much may be gathered out of the wordes of God, where promiting the delinerance of Inda after their humiliation, he doth not with-Randing leave them under the yoke of Agypt, in these wordes. Neverthelesse they (to wit, the Judicans) Shall be his feruants, that is, the feruants of SESAC.

After this ouerthrow and dishonour Rehobour raigned twelve yeares, and his loffes received by Sefac notwithstanding, hee continued the warre against Veryboam all his life time. After his death Ieroboam gouerned Ifrael foure yeares.

Rehoboam lived $ 8, yeares, and raigned 17, his florie was written at large by She- 10 meish and Hidden the Prophets, but the same perished with that of Nathan & the rest. About the 12.0f Rehoboam Abdallrartus King of Tyre was murthered by his Nurfes fons, or foster brethren, the elder of which vsurped the Kingdom twelve yeares. Towards his latter times Periciades, or Pyrithiades, beganne to gouerne Affyria, the 24. BIJAH the Sonne of Rehoboam, inherited his Fathers Kingdome, and his vices. He raifed an Armie of foure hundred thouland with which he invaded Jeroboam, who encountred him with a double number of 22 eight hundred thouland; both Armies joyned neare to the Mount of Ifrael broken; for there fell of that fide fine hundred thousand, the greatest ouerthrow that euer was given or received of those Nations. Abijah being now mafter of the field, recourred Bethel, Jefhanah, and Ephron, foone after which difcomfiture, ler oboam died: who raigned in all 22, yeares. Abijah, the better to ftrengthen himfelfe, entred into league with Hefion, the third of the Adads of Syria; as may be 2. Chron. 16. 23, gathered out of the 2. of Chron. he raigned but three yeares and then died: the particulars of his acts were written by Iddo the Prophet; as some part of his Fathers were.

Here wee see how it pleased God to punish the sinnes of Salaman in his Sonne 40 Rehoboam: first, by an Idolator and a Traitor; and then by the successor of that Agyptian, whose daughter Salomon had maried, thereby the better to assure his estate, which while he ferued God, was by God affured against all and the greatest neighbouring Kings, and when hee for looke him, it was torne a-funder by his meanest Vaffalls; Not that the Father wanted strength to defend him from the Egyptian Sefac. For the fonne Abijah was able to leuie foure hundred thousand men, and with the same number he ouerthrew eight hundred thousand Ifraelites, and slew of them five hundred thousand, God giving spirit, courage, and invention, when and where it pleafeth him. And as in those times the causes were exprest, why it pleafed God to punish both Kings and their People : the fame being both before, 50 and at the inflant delivered by Prophets; fo the same just God who liveth and gouerneth all thinges for euer, doeth in these our times give victorie, courage, and discourage, raise, and throw downe Kinges, Estates, Cities, and Nations, for the same offences which were committed of old, and are committed in the present: for which reason in these and other the afflictions of Israel, alwaies 2.Sam.27.1, the causes are set downe, that they might bee as precedents to succeeding ages. They were punished with famine in Daulds time for three yeeres, For Saul and his bloudie house, &c. And David towards his latter end suffred all forts of affictions. and forrowes in effect, for Vriab. Silomon had tenne tribes of twelve torne from his fonne for his idolatric. Rehoboam was spoiled of his riches and honour by Sefac of Ægypt, because the people of Iuda made images, high places, and groues &c. And because they suffered sadomites in the land. Ieroboam was punished in himselfe & his posteritie for the golden Calues that he crected. Joram had all his sonnes slaine by the 10 Philistims, and his very bowels torne out of his bodie by an excertating flix, for murthering his brethren. Abab and lex abel were flaine; the bloud of the one; the bodie of the other caten with dogs : for the falle accusing and killing of Naboth. So also hath God punished the same and the like sinnes in all after times, and in these our daies by the fame famine, plagues, warre, loffe, vexation, death, figkneffe, and cala-

For notlong after hee was inuaded by Zerah, who then commaunded all the Arabians bordering Iudea, and with such a multitude entred the territorie of Asa, as (for any thing that I have read ) were never assembled of that Nation either before or fince. For it is written, that there came against the Indeans Zerah of Æthiopia with an host of tenne hundred thousand, and three hun- 2.Chron.149. dred Chariots, which Afa encountred with an armie of fine hundred and fource fcore thousand, leuied out of those two tribes of Iuda and Beiamin which obeyed him, and with which he ouerthrew this fearefull multitude, and had the spoile both

That this Zerah was not an Athiopian I haue*proved alreadic, and were it but the In the for-40 length betweene Athiopia and Index, and the strong florishing, regions of Egypt in mer booke c.d. teriacent (who would not fuffer a million of strangers to passe through them) it $14,1000 c.8. were fufficient to make it appear how foolish the opinion is that these inuaders were Æthiopians. But in that the scriptures acknowledge that Gerar was belonging to Zerah, and the Cities thereabouts were spoyled by the Iudeans in following their vi-Storie, as places belonging to Zerah, and that all men know that Gerar standeth viton the torrent of Befor, which David past over when he furprized the Amalekites or Arabians, this prooueth sufficiently that Zerab was leader of the Arabian, and that Gerar was a frontier towne standing on the vttermost South-border of all Iudaa, from all parts of Athiopia fix hundred miles. Also the spoiles which Asa tooke, as the

50 cattell, Camels, and sheepe, whereof he sacrificed fine thousand, shew them to bee Arabians adioyning, and not far off, and not vnknowne Athiopians. And if it be obiected that these desart countries can hardly yeeld a million of men fit for the wars, I answere, that it is as like that Arabia Petraa, and the Desart which compasse two parts of the holy land, should yeeld ten hundred thousand, as that two tribes of the twelve, should arme five hundred and foure score thousand. Besides it answereth to the promise of God to Abraham, that these nations should exceed in number; for God foake it of Ilmael, that he would make him fruitfull, and multiply him exceedingly, that he should beget twelue Princes,&c.

Baafha a king of Ifrael began to reigne in the third of Afa, and fearing the greatnesse of Maafter his great victorie, entertained Benhadad King of Syria, of the race of Adadezer, to joyne with him against A/a; and to the end to block him vp, hee fortified Rama which lieth in the way from Ierusalem towardes Sa-

This warre began according to the letter of the Scriptures in the 36. yeere of A- 10 1. Grow. 16. v. 1. Ja his reigne: but because in the first of Kings the 16. it is said that Baasha died in the 26. yeare of Asa, therefore could not Baasha begin this warre in the 25. of Asa his reigne, but in the 35, yeare of the divilion of Inda and Israels; for so many veeres it was from the first of Rehobeam, who reigned 17. yeeres, to the 16. of Asa. It may feeme strange that Asa being able to bring into the field an armie of fine hundred and fourescore thousand good souldiers, did not easily drine away Bansha, and defeat him of his purposes, the victories of Abia against Ieroboam, and of Asa himselfe against Zerah being yet fresh in minde, which might well have emboldened the men of Inda and afmuch disheartened the enemies. Questionlesse there were some important Circumstances, omitted in the text, which caused Afa to fight at this 20 time with mony. It may be that the employment of fo many hundred thousands of hands in the late service against Zerab, had caused many mens private businesses to lie vndifpatched, whereby the people being now intentine to the culture of their lands and other trades, might be ynwilling to ftirre against the Ifraelites, choosing rather to winke at apparant inconvenience, which the building of Roma would bring vpon them in after-times. Such backwardnesse of the people might have deterred A/a from adventuring himfelfe with the least part of his forces, and committing the fuccesse into the hands of God. Howsoeuer it were, he tooke the treasures remaining in the Temple, with which he waged Benhadad the Syrian again Baasha, whose imployments Benhadad readily accepted, and brake of confederacie with Baalha. For 20 the Ilraelites were his borderers and next neighbours, whom neither himselfe (after his inualion) nor his fucceffors after him euer gaue ouer, till they had made themfelues masters of that Kingdome. So Benhadad being now entred into Nephthalim without relistance, he spoiled divers principall cities thereof, and inforced Baasha to quit Rama, and to leave the fame to Afa with all the materials which he had brought thither, to fortifie the fame : which done, Benhadad who loued neither partie, being loden with the spoiles of Ifrael, and the treasures of Inda, returned to Damaseus. After this, when Hanani the Prophet reprehended Afain that he now relyed on the strength of Syria, and did not rest himselfe on the fauour and affistance of God, he not onely caused Hanani to bee imprisoned, but hee began to burden and oppresse 40 his people, and was therefore strooken with the grieuous paines of the gout in his feete, wherewith after he had beene two yeeres continually tormented, he gaue vp the ghost when he had reigned 41. yeeres.

GHAP. 19. S.5. of the Historie of the World.

Of the great alteration falling out in the Ten Tribes during the raigne of As A.

N the raigne of Aa, the Kingdome of Ifrael felt great and violent commotions, which might have reduced the ten Tribes unto their former alleageance to the house of David, if the wisdome of God had not otherwise determined. The wickednesses of troobsom had, in his latter dayes, the sentence of heavie vengeance laied upon it, by the mouth of Ahia, the same Prophet which had foretold the division of Ifrael, for the finne of Salomon, and his raigne ouer the ten Tribes. One fonne leroboam had among others, in whom only God found fo much pietie, as (though it sufficed not to with-hold his wrath from that Familie) it procured vnto him a peaceable end; an honourable testimonic of the peoples loue, by their generall mourning and lamentation at his death; and (wherein hee was most happie) the fauourable approbation of God himfelfe.

After the losse of this good sonne, the vngodly father was soone taken away: a miscrable creature, so conscious of his vile unthankefulnesseto God, that he durst not fuffer his owne name to be vsed in consulting with an holy Prophet, affured of the ruine hanging ouer him and his, yea of Gods extreme hatred; yet for bearing to destroy those accursed Idolls that wrought his confusion. So loath hee was to forfake his worldly wisedome, when the world was readie to for sake him, and all belonging to him, his hatefull memorie excepted.

Nadab the sonne of Ieroboam, raigned in the second and third yeares of Asa, which are reckoned as two yeares, though indeede his fathers last yeare of two and twentie didrunne along (how farre is vncertaine) with the second of Asa, whose third yeare was the first of Baasha; so that perhaps this Nadab injoyed not his Kingdome one whole yeare. He did not alter his fathers courses, neither did God alter his sen-

20 tence. It feemes that he little feared the judgements denounced against his fathers house: for as a Prince that was secure of his owne estate, hee armed all Israel against the Philifims, and besieged one of their Townes. There (whether it were so, that the people were offended with his ill successe, and recalled to minde their grieuous loffe of fine hundred thousand vnder Ieroboam, counting it an vnluckie familie to the Nation; or whether by some particular indiscretion, hec exasperated them) flaine he was by Baafha, whom the Armie did willingly accept for King in his stead. Baasha was no sooner proclaimed King, than hee began to take order with the house of Ieroboam, that none of them might molest him, putting all of them, without mercie, to the sword. That he did this for private respects, and not in regard of Gods 40 will to haue it so, it is cuident, by his continuing in the same forme of Idolatrie which Ieroboam had begunne. Wherefore hee received the same sentence from God that had beene laid vpon Ieroboam; which was executed vpon him also in the same fort. Hee beganne to infest Asa, by fortifying Ramah; but was discreted from thence by the Syrian Benhadad, who did waste his Countrie, destroying all the Land of Neph-

current, perhaps not one compleat. Ela was as much an Idolater as his father: and withall a riotous person. He sent an Armie against Gibbethon, the same Towne of the Philistims, before which Nadab the sonne of Ieroboam perished; but he sate at home the whilst, seasting and drinking with his Minions, whereby hee gaue such advantage against himselfe, as was not neglected. Zimri, an ambitious man, remayning with the King at Tirza, finding his Master so dissolute, and his behauiour so contemptible, conceiued hope of the like fortune as Baasha had found, by doing as Baasha had done. Wherefore he did set vp-thalim. Foure and twentie yeares heer aigned: and then dying, left the Crowne to

Ela his sonne; who enjoyed it, as Nadab the sonne of Ierobeam had done, two yeares

on Elain his drunkennesse, and slue him. Presently vpon which fact, he stiled himon Liam instrumenteners, and the limit Fretenery viole which race, he three infinitely felleking of Ifrael: and began his raigne with maffacring all the house of Baa/bay extending his crueltienot only to his children, and kinsfolke, but vinto all his friends in Tirza. These newes were quickly blowne to the Campe at Gibbethon, where they were not welcomed according to Zimri his expectation. For the Souldiers in steade of proclaiming him King, proclaimed him Traitor: and being led by Omri, whom they faluted King, they (quitting the fiege of Gibbethon) prefented themselves before Tirze; which in short space they may seeme to have forced. Zimri wanting ftrength to defend the Citie, not courage to keepe himselfe from falling aliue into his enemies hands, did fet fire on the Palace: confuming it and himselfe together to 10 ashes. Seuen dayes he is said to have raigned : accounting (as is most likely) to the time that Omri was proclaimed in the Campe. For Zimri was also an Idolater, Walking in the way of IEROBOAM; and therefore is likely to have had more time wherin to declare himselfe, than the raigne of seven dayes, and those consumed partly in murthering the friends of Baasha, partly in seeking to have defended his owne life. After the death of Ela, there arose another King to oppose the faction of Omri; wherby it may seeme, that Zimri had made his partie strong, as being able to set vp a new head, who doubtlesse would never have appeared, if there had not beene readie to his hand, some strength, not valikely to refist and vanquish the Armie which maintayned Omri. How long this Tibni, the new Competitor of Omri, held out; I doe 20 not finde; only it appeares that his fide was decated, and fohe died, leauing no other Successor than his concurrent.

A coniecture of the causes hindring the revnion of Israel with Inda, which might have beene effected by these troubles.

Ny man that shall consider the state of Israel, in those times, may justly wonder how it came to passe, that either the whole Nation, wea- 30 ried with the calamities alreadie suffered under these unfortunate Princes, and with the present civil warres, did not returne to their ancient Kings, and revnite themselues with the mightie Tribes of Inda and Beniamin; or that Zimri and Tibni, with their oppressed factions, did not call in Ala, but rather chose, the one to endure a desperate necessitie of yeelding, or burning himselfe, the other to languish away, a man for saken: than to have recourse vnto a remedie, so sure, so readie, and so honourable. To say that God was pleased to haue it so, were a true, but an idle answere (for his secret will is the cause of all things) vnleffe it could be proued, that he had forbidden Asto deale in that businesse, as he forbad Rehaboam to force the rebellious people to obedience. That the 40 restraint laid by God vpon Rehobosm, did only binde his hands from attempting the suppression of that present insurrection, it appeares by the Warre continued betweene Ifrael and Inda, so many yeares following: wherein Abia so farre prevailed, that he wanne a great battaile, and recoursed some Townes belonging to the other Tribes, which he annexed to his owne Dominion. Wherefore we may boldly looke into the second causes, mouing the People and Leaders of the ten Tribes, to suffer any thing under new upstarts, rather than to cash their eyes upon that Royall house of Danid, from which the succession of sine Kings in lineall descent, had taken away all imputation, that might formerly haue beene laid vpon the meane beginnings thereof: To thinke that Omri had preuented his Competitors, in making peace 50 with Asa, were a conjecture more bold than probable. For Omri was not only an Idolater, but did worse than all that were before him, which asit might serve alone to proue, that Afa, being a godly King, would not adhere to him, so the course which hee professed to take at the very first, of reuenging the massacre committed vpon the familie and friends of Baasha, (As his mortall enemie) gives manifest reason. why Zimi, who had wrought that great execution, should more justly than he have expected the friendship of Inda in that quarrell. Wherefore, in searching out the reason of this backwardnesse in the ten tribes (which was such that they may seeme to have never thought vpon the matter) to fubmit themselves to their true Princes; it were not amisseto examine the causes, mouing the people to reuenge the death of Ela; an idle drunkard; rather than of Nadab the fonne of Teroboam, who followed the warres in person; as a man of spirit and courage. Surely it is apparant, that the very first defection of the ten Tribes, was (if wee looke vpon humaine reason) occa-

to fioned by defire of breaking that heavie yoake of bondage wherewith Salomon had galled their neckes. Their defire was to have a King that should not oppresse them: not to haue no King at all. And therefore when the arrogant folly of Religious had caused them to renounce him, they did immediatly choose teroboam in his stead, as a man likely to affoord that libertie vnto them, for which hee had contended in their behalfe. Neither were they (as it seemes) herein altogether deceined. For his affectation of popularitie appeares in his building of decayed townes, and in the infitution of his new denifed idolatry; where he tolde the people, that it was too much for them, to trauaile so farre as to Ierusalem. But whether it were so, that his moderation, being voluntarie, began to teafe, towards the latter end of his reigne,

20 and in the reigne of his fonne, when long time of pofferfion had confirmed his title. which at the first was onely good by courtescoff the people : or whether the people (as often happens in such cases) were more offended by some prerogatives of a King that he still retained in his owne hands, than pleased with his remission of other burdens: it is clearly apparent, that the whole armic of all Ifrael joyned with Baafha, taking in good part the death of Nadab, and eradication of Ieroboams

Now the reigne of Baasha himselfe, was (for ought that remaineth in writing of it) every way unfortunate; his labour and coft at Rama was cast away; the other fide of his Kingdome harried by the Syrians ; neither did he winne that one towne

30 of Gibbethen from the Philistims, but left that businesse to his some, who likewise appeares an unprofitable fluggard. Wherefore it must needes be, that the fauour of the people toward the house of Bsashs grew from his good forme of Civill goternment, which happily he reduced to a more temperate method than Ieroboams buer meant to doe. And furely he that shall take paires to looke into those examples, which are extant of the different courses, held by the Kings of Ifrael and Inda, in administration of instice, will finde it most probable, that upon this ground it was that the ten Tribes continued so auetse from the line of David; as to thinke all aduerlitie more tolerable, than the weightie Scepter of that house. For the death of Ioab and Shimei was indeed by them deserved; yet in that they suffered it without

40 forme of judgement, they fuffered like vnto men innocent. The death of Adonijah was both without judgement, and without any crime objected, other than the Kings iealousie: out of which by the same rule of arbitrarie instice (vnder which it may be supposed that many were cast away) he would have slaine Ieroboam (if hee could have caught him) before he had yet committed any offence; as appeares by his confident returne out of Agypt, like one that was knowne to have endured wrong having not offered any.

The like and much more barbarous execution, to wit, without law, Icharam did vpon his brethren, and vpon fundry of his greatest men; as also loash did so put to death Zacharish, the sonne of Iehoiada, who had made him King, even in the court of a chrosaint. so the house of the Lord: and MANASES did shed innocent bloud exceeding much, till he replenished Ierusalem from corner to corner : and this was imputed to him as another falt; besides his sinne, wherewith hee made suda to sinne. Contrariwise, among the kings of 2.King. 21.16. Ifrael we finde no monument of frich arbitrarie proceeding, vinleffe perhaps the words of Ichoram the sonne of Ahab (which were but words) may be taken for an inflance, when he faid, God doe fo to mee, and more alfo, if the head of ELLSHA the fonne of SHAPHAT fall stand on him this day : whereby it is not plaine whether hee meant to kill him without more adoe, or to have him condemned as a falle prophet, that had made them hold out against the Aramites, till they were faine to eate their owne children, which he thought a fufficient argument to proue, that it was not Gods purpole to deliuer them. The death of Naboth sheweth rather the libertie which the Ifraelites enjoyed, than any peremptorie execution of the Kings will. For Naboil did not feare to fland upon his owneright, though Abab were even ficke for anger, neither was hee for that cause put to death, as vpon commaundement, but made away by conspiracie, the matter being handled after a judiciall forme, to which might give fatisfaction to the people, ignorant of the devile, though to God

2.King.10.4.

The murther of the Prophets is continually ascribed to Iezabel, an impotent woman, and not vnto the King her husband. Neither is it certaine, that there was no Law made, whereby their lives were taken from them; but certaine it is that the people, being idolaters, were both pleased with their death, and laboured in the execution. So that the doings of the kings of Inda (fuch as are registred) prooue them to have yied a more absolute manner of commaund, than the Kings of the tenne Tribes. Neither doe their fufferings witnesse the contrarie. For of those which reigned ouer Iuda, from the division of the kingdom, to the captivitie of the ten tribes, 20 three were flaine by the people, and two were denied a place of buriall amongst their auncestors. Yea, the death of Abazia and his brethren, slaine by Ichu, with the destruction of all the royall feed by Athalia, did not (for ought that wee can reade) ftirre vp in the people any fuch thirst of reuenge, as might by the sodainnesse and vniformicie testificthe affection to be general, and proceeding from a louing remembrance of their Princes; vnleffe we should thinke that the death of Athalia, after feauen veeres reigne, were occasioned rather by the memorie of her ill purchasing, than by the present sence of her tyrannicall abusing the gouernment, whereon she had feifed. On the other fide, fuch of the kings of Ifrael as perished by treafon (which were featien of the twentie) were all flaine by conspiracie of the great men, who as- 30 pired by treason to the Crowne: the people being so farre from embruing their hands in the bloud of their Souereignes that (after Nadab) they did neuer forbeare to renenge the death of their Kings, when it lay in their power; nor approue the good fuccesse of treason, vnlesse feare compelled them. So that the death of two Kings, being throughly reuenged vpon other two, namely the death of Ela and Zacharte, vpon Zimri and Shallum, who traiteroully got and vsurped, for a little while, their places; onely three of the feauen remaine, whose ends how the people tooke. it may be doubtfull. Though indeed it is precifely faid of the flaughter, committed on Shabs children by Jehu, that the people durft not fight with him that did it, because they were exceedingly afraid: and the same seare might be in them at the death 40 of Peka, whose historie (as others of that time) is cursorily passed ouer. The like may be pronounced, and more abfolutly, of the Kings of England, that neuer any of them perished by furie of the people, but by treason of such as did succeed them. neither was there any motine viging fo forcibly the death of King Edward and king Richard when they were in prison, as feare least the people should stirre in their quarell. And certainely (how focuer all that the law cals treason, be interpreted, as tending finally to the Kings destruction) in those treasonable insurrections of the vulgar, which have here most prevailed, the furic of the multitude hath quenched it felfe, with the bloud of some great Officers; no such rebellions, how soener wicked and barbarous otherwise, thirsting after the ruine of their naturall Soucraine, but 50 rather for bearing the aduantages gotten uppon his royall person; which if any man impute vnto groffe ignorance, another may more charitably, and I thinke, more truely, ascribe to a reuerent affection. Wherefore that fable of Briareus, who, being loofened by Pallas, did with his hundred hands give affiftance to Jupiter, when all the rest of the Gods conspired against him; is very firly expounded by Sir Francis Bacon, as fignifying, that Monarches need not to feare any courbing of their absolutneffe by mightie subjectes, as long as by wisdome they keepe the hearts of the people, who will bee fure to come in on their fide. Though indeed the Storie might very well haue borne the fame interpretation, as it is rehearfed by Homer, who tels vs that Pallas was one of the conspiracie, and that Thetis alone did marreall their practife, by loofening Briarens, For a good forme of government sufficeth by it selfe to retaine the people, not onely without affiftance of a laborious Wit, but euen against all deuises of the greatest and shrewdest polititians; e-10 uery Sherife and Constable, being sooner able to arme the multitude, in the

Kings behalfe, than any ouer-weening rebell how mightie focuer, can againft

This declaration of the peoples loue, being seldome found in Iuda, makes it very likely, that the rule it felfe of gouernment there was fuch, as neither gaue occasion of contentment vnto the fubiects, nor of confidence in their good affection, to the Kings. Vpon which reasons it may seeme that the multitude was kept vsually disarmed. For otherwise it would have been almost impossible, that Athalia the si-Rer of Ahab, a stranger to the royall bloud of Inds, should by the onely authoritie of a Queene mother haue destroicd all the seede of Danid, and vsurped the King-

20 dom very neere seuen yeres without finding anie resistance. Yeawhen Iehoista the high Priest had agreed with the Captains & principal men of the land to set up Isash their lawful King, whereunto the whole nation were generally well affected; he was faine to giue to these Captaines and their men, the speares and the shields that were King DAVIDS, and werein the house of the Lord. But wee neede not enter into such particulars. Questionlesse, the Tribes which thought obedience to their Princes to be a part of their dutie toward God, would endure much more with patience, than they which had Kings of their owne choice or admission, holding the Crowne by a more vncertaine tenure.

And this, in my opinion, was the reason, why the tenne cribes did neuer seeke to 20 returne to their auncient Lords: but after the destruction of their fixe first Kings. which died in the reigne of Ma, admitted a seauenth of a new family, rather than they would consubject themselves, with those of Inda and Beniamin, under a more honourable, but more heavie yoake.

So, Ma having seene the death of seauen kings of Ifriel, died himselfe after one and fourtie yeeres reigne, leaving Iehosophat his sonne to deale with Ahab the son of omri, who was the eight king ouer the tenne tribes.

Of IEHOSAPHAT and his contemporaries.

Ено s а р н а т, who fucceeded A/a, was a Prince religious and happie; hee deftroyed all the groues, altars, and high places dedicated to idolatrie, and fent fearchers to all places and people wanting instruction; hee recoucred the Tribute due vnto him by the Arabians and Philistims : from the one hee had filuer, from the other sheepe and goates to the number of fifteene thousand to and foure hundred. The numbers of his men of warre were more than admirable: for it is written that Adnah had the command of three hun-2.chron.12. dred thousand, Ielohansm of two hundred and fourescore thousand, and Amasia of two hundred thousand; also that hee had, besides these, in Beniamin of those that bare shields, which wee call Targetiers, and of Archers under Elisada two hundred thousand, and under the commaundement of Jehozabad a hundred and fourescore thousand: which numbred together, make cleuen hundred and fixtic thousand, all which are said to haue waited vpon the King, besides his garrifons.

That Inda and Beniamin, a territorie not much exceeding the Countie of Kent, should muster eleuen hundred and fixtic thousand fighting men, it is very strange, and the number farre greater than it was found vpon any other view. Ioab in Dawids time found fine hundred thousand : Rehoboam found but an hundred and foure score thousand: Abia foure hundred and eight thousand: As five hundred and foure-score thousand: Amaziah inrolled all that could beare armes, and they a- 10 mounted to three hundred thousand: Vzziah three hundred and seuen thousand and five hundred. Surely, whereas it is written that when newes was brought to Icho saphat that Moab and Ammon were entred his territorie to the west of Iordan, and that there numbers were manie, hee feared (to wit) the multitude, it is not likely that hee would have feared even the armie of Xerxes, if hee could have brought into the field cleuen hundred and three-fcore thousand fighting men, leauing all his strong Cities manned. I am therefore of opinion (referring my selfe to better judgement) that these numbers specified in the second of Chronicles the scauentcenth, distributed to scuerall leaders, were not all at one time, but that the three hundred thousand under Adnah, & the two hundred and sourscore thousand 20 under Iehohanam, were afterward commaunded and mustred by Amasiah, Eliada, and Icholabad: for the groffe and totall is not in that place let downe, as it was under the other Kings formerly named. Againe as the aydes which Iehofaphat brought to Ahab did not flew that he was a Prince of extraordinarie power, fo the Moabites and Ammonites which hee feared could neuer make the one halfe of those numbers, which hee that commaunded least among Iehoshaphats leaders had under

This mightie Prince notwithstanding his greatnes, yet he loyned in friendship with Abab King of Ifrael, who had married that wicked woman Iezabel. Him Iofaphat vilited at Samaria, and caused his sonne Ioram to marrie Athalia, this Achabs 20

Ahab perswaded Iosaphat to affist him in the warre against the Syrians, who held the Citie of Ramoth Gilead from him, and called together foure hundred of his Prophets, or Baalites to foretell the successe: who promised him victorie. But Icho(aphat beleeued nothing at all in those diviners, but resolved first of all to conferre with some one Prophet of the Lord God of Ifrael. Hereupon Achab made answere that hee had one called Michaiah, but hee hated that Prophet, because hee alwaies foretolde of euill, and neuer of any good towardes him. Yet fent for Michaiah was to the King, but by the way the messenger praied him to consent with the rest of the Prophets: and to promise victorie vnto them as they did. But 49 Michaiah spake the truth, and repeated his vision to both Kings, which was that God asked who (ball perswade A H A B, that hee may goe up and fall at Ramoth Gilead? to whom a spirit that stood before the Lord answered, that hee would enter into his prophets, and bee in them a false spirit to delude. For as it is said by Christ: Non enim vos estis qui loquimini , sed spiritus patris vestri loquitur in vobis. It is not you that speake, but the spirit of your father speakes in you; so in a contraric kinde did the deuillin the prophets of Baal, or Satan, incourage Achab to his destruction. And as P. Martir vpon this place well observeth, these cuill spirits are the ministers of Gods vengeance, and are vsed as the hangmen and tormentors, which Princes sometime imploy. For as it pleaseth God by his good Angels, to saue and 50 deliuer from destruction of which the Scriptures have many examples: so on the contrarie, it is by the cuill that he punisheth and destroyeth, both which are said to performe the wil of their Creator licet non codem animo. Ecclesiasticus remembreth a fecond fort of malignant natures, but they are enery-where visible. There are spirits, faith hee, created for vengeance, which in their rigour lay on fure strokes. In the time of destruction they show foorth their power, and accomplish the wrath of him that made them.

Now Michains having by this his reuclation greatly displeased the King, and the Prophets whose spirit hee discouered, was strooken by Ziakiah one of Baals prophets, and by Achab himfelfe committed to prison: where he appointed him to be referred and fed with bread of affliction till he returned in peace. But Mieliajaly, not fearing to reply, answered, If thou returne in peace the Lord bath no shoken lin me. Neuertheleffe Achab went onin that warre, and was wounded to death.

40 Iehosaphat returned to Ierusalem, where hee was reprehended by Iehn the Prophet for alifting an idolatrous Prince, and one that hated God.

After this the Aramites or Damafaens, joyned with the Mashites, Ammonites and Idameans to inuade Indea: who passe Iordan, and encampe at Engaddi, and when lehosaphat gathered his armie, the Prophet Iahaziel toretolde him of the victoric, which should bee obtained without any bloud-shed of his part; and so when leholaphat approached, this affembly of nations, the Ammonites and Mosbites, differen ing with the Idam eans, and quarrelling for some causes among themselves: those of Ammon and Moab fet vpon the Idam.e.ms, and brake them vtterly, which done they alfo inuaded each other; in which broile Iehofaphat arriving tooke the spoile of 2. chron. 10.

20 them all without any losse of his part, as it was foretold and promised by God. Notwithstanding this victoric, Jehosaphat forgetting that hee was formerly reprehended for affifting an Idolatrous King, did not with standing iowne with ochagas, the sonne of Achab, in preparing a Fleet to fend to Ophir, hoping of the like returne which Salomon had : but as Eliezor the Prophet foretold him, his shippes perished and were broken in the port of Ezion Gaber, and so that enterprize was ouer-

Yet he taketh part with Iehoram the brother of Ochazias, against the Albabites. with which Kings of Juda and Ifrael the Edomites ionne their forces, not forgetting. it seemes, that the Moabites; affisted by the Anmonites, had not long before destroi-

The Moabites, subjects to David and Salomon, forfaking the Kings of Juda, gave themselues for vassals to Ierohaam, and so they continued to his successors till the death of Achab: but 10/aphat; notwithstanding the Idolatrie of his Colleague, yet as it feemeth, he was drawne into this warre both to bee auenged of the Capabites for their defection from Iuda to Ifrael, as also because they had lately joyned themfelues with the Syrians against Iofathat, and thirdly to punish their double rebellion who first forsooke Inda and now Ifrael.

Both Kingsresolued to passe by the way of Idumen, thereby the better to assure that nation, for wee finde that both Moub, Ammon and Edom were all in the field 40 together at Engaddi against Icholaphat: But whether they had then declared themfelues against Ichofaphat, it is not certaine, for in the 2. of Chroniel. 11, verf. 8, je is written that in the time of Ichoram, the fonne of Iofaphat, Edom rebelled, and therefore it feemeth to mee that the Edomites, when they were flaine by Moab and Ammon, not finding themselves satisfied in such conditions as they required, offered to turne from them, and to joyne themselves with the armie of Inda. For that they were numbred among the enemies of Iolaphat it is plaine in the 2. of Chren. the 20. and as plaine 6. 2. v. 8. that they were not declared, nor had made them a King till Icholaphats death. Now in the passage of these Kings towards Moab, where ther it were by the extraordinarie heat of the yeere, or whether the Idumeans ha-50 uing a purpole to rebell missed the armie of Inda and Israel with intent to infeeble them for want of water, true it is, that they fuffered the fame, if not a greater thirst than the armies of Crasus and M. Antonius did in their Parthian expeditions; and had, in all likelihood, veterly perished had not Elisha taught them to cut trenches whereinto the water sprang, by which not onely Iehosaphat and his armie, but

Jehoram King of Israel an Idolator was relieved: the great mercie and goodnesse of God, having ever beene prone to faue the cuill for the good, whereas hee never destroyed the good for the cuill.

The miserable issue of this warre, and how Moab burnt his sonne, or the sonne of the King of Edom, for facrifice on the rampire of his owne Citie, I have alreadie written in the life of Jehoram among the Kings of Ifrael. Jehofaphat reigned twentie five yeeres and died, he was buried in the valley of Ieho (aphat, and a part of the Pyramis fet ouer his graue is yet to be feene, faith Brochard. In Iehofaphats time also ruled Mecades or Mezades in Athens: Agelas or Agefilaus in Corinib; and Archilaus of the same race, of the Heraelida the seauenth in Lacedamon. Badeforus ruled the Tyrians; Achab, Ochazias and Ichoram the Ifraclites.

Of IEHORAM the Conne of IEHOSAPHAT, and AHAZIA.

ò. I.

That IEHORAM was made King fundry times.

EHORAM the fonne of Jehofaphat King of Juda began to reigne at thirtie two yeeres of age, and liued untill hee was fourtie yeeres olde, being eight yeeres a King: but of these eight yeeres, which tehoram is said to have reigned, soure are to be reckoned in the life of his father, who going to the Syrian warre with Ahab. left this Iehoram King in his stead, as Ahab did his sonne Ahazia. This appeares by the scuerall beginnings, which are given in Scripture to the two Iehorams kings 40 of Ifrael and Iuda, and to Ahazia the eldest sonne of Ahab. For Ahazia is faid to have begunne his reigne, in the scauenteenth vere of Ichosaphat, Ichoram the brother of Ahazia succeeded him in the second yeare of IEHORAMthe some of IEHOSAPHAT King of Iuda, that is in the next yeere after that Iehoram of Iuda was deligned king by his father; it being (as wee finde elfwhere ) the eighteenth yeere of IEHOSAPHAT himfelfe, who went with the Israelite against Moab. Hereby it appeares that the full power and execution of the royall office was retained still by Ieho faphat, who gouerned absolutely by himselfe, not communicating the rule with his sonne. But in the fift yeere of I E-HORAM King of Ifrael, which was the two and twentieth of Iehofaphat, the olde 50 king tooke vnto him, as partner in the Gouernment, this his eldeft foune, who was at that time thirtie two yeeres olde, his father being fiftie seauen. Now forasmuch as I E H O S A P H A T reigned twentie fine yeares, it is evident that his sonne did not reigne alone till the eighth of Joram King of Ifrael. The like regard is to bee had in accounting the times of other Kings of Inda and Ifrael, who did not alwaies reigne precifely fo long as the bare letter of the text may feeme at first to a firme : but their yeeres were fometimes compleat, fometimes onely current, sometimes confounded with the yeeres of their successors or foregoers, and must therefore be found by comparing their times with the yeeres of those others. with whom they did begin and end.

It were perhaps a thing leffe needfull than curious, to enquire into the reasons mooning tehosaphat either to assume vato him his sonne as partner in the Kingdome, whileft hee was able himfelfe to commaund both in peace to and in warre, the like having neuer beene done by any of his progenitors, or hauing once (in the feauenteenth of his reigne) vouchfated vnto him that honour, to refume it vnto himfelfe; or at least-wife to deferre the confirmation of it, vntill fower or fine yeeres were passed. Yet forasmuch as to enter into the examination of these passages, may bee a meane to finde some light, whereby wee may more clearely discouer the causes of much extraordinarie businesse ensuing, I hold it not amisse to make such coniecture, as the circumstances of the Storie briefly handled in the Scriptures may seeme to ap-

Wee are therefore to confider, that this King Tehofaphat was the first of Re-20 hoboams iffue that euer entred into any freight league with the Kings of the tenne Tribes. All that reigned in Inda before him, had with much labour and long warre, tired themselues in vaine, making small profite of the greatest aduantages that could be wished. Wherefore Jehosaphat thought it the wisest way, to make a league offensive and defensive betweene Ifrael and Inda, whereby each might enjoy their owne in quiet.

This confederacie made by a religious King, with one that did hate the Lord,

Change of the confederacie made by a religious King, with one that did hate the Lord, could not long profeer, as not iffuing from the true roote and fountaine of all wifdom: across yet as a peece of found pollicie, doubtelesse it wanted not faire pretences of much common good thereby likely to arife, with mutuall fortification of both those 30 kingdomes against the vacircumcifed nations their auncient enemics. This apparant benefit, being so inestimable a iewell that it might not easily bee lost, but continue as hereditaric from father to fonne, it was thought a very good course to haue it confirmed by some sure bond of affinitie, and thereupon was Athalia the daughter of Omriand fifter of Ahab King of Ifrael, ginen in marriage to Iehoram, who was some and heire apparant to the King of Inda. This Ladie was of a masculine spirit, and had learned so much of Queene Jezabel her brothers wife, that thee durft vindertake, and could throughly performe a great deale more in Ierusalem, than the other knew how to compasse in Samaria. Shee was indeede a fire-brand, ordained by God to confume a great part of the noblest houses in Iuda, ,40 and perhaps of those men or their children, whose worldly wisdome, regardlesse of Gods pleafure, had brought berin.

The first fruits of this great league, was the Syrian warre at Ramoth Gilead, wherin Iuda and Ifrael did adventure equally, but the profit of the victoric should have redounded wholly to Ahab: as godly Princes verie seldome thrine by matching with Idolators, but rather ferue the turnes of those false friends, who being ill affected to God himfelfe, cannot be well affected to his feruants. Before their fetting foorth Ahab deligned, as King, his sonne Ahazia; not so much perhaps in regard of the vicertaine events of warre(for none of his predeceffors had ever done the like vpon the like occasions) nor as fearing the threatnings of the Prophet Michaid 30 (for he despised them) as inviting Iehosaphat by his owne example; to take the same courfe wherein he prenailed.

Probable coniectures of the motiues inducing the old King I e II o-S A P II AT to change his purpose often in making his Conne I E H OR AM King.

Anie arguments doe verie strongly proue Iehoram to haue beene wholy ouer-ruled by his wife; especially for his for saking the religion of his godly aunceftors, and following the abhominable superstitions of the house of Ashab.

That the was a woman of intolerable pride, and abborring to liue a private life, the whole course of her actions witnesseth at large. Much vaine matter shee was able to produce, whereby to make her husband thinke that his brethren and kindred were but meane and voworthy persons in comparison of him, and of his children, which were begotten upon the daughter and lifter of two great Kings, not vpon base women and meere subjects. The Court of Ahab, and his famous victories obtained against the Syrian Benhadad, were matter sufficient to make an infolent man thinke highly of himfelfe, as being allied to honorably; who could otherwise haue found in his heart well enough, to despise all his brethren, as being the eldest, and heire apparent to the Crowne, whereof alreadie hee had, in a 20 manner, the possession.

How foone his vices brake out, or how long hee diffembled them and his idolatrous religion, it cannot certainly be knowne. Like enough it is, that some smoke, out of the hidden fire, did very soone make his fathers eyes to water; who thereuppon caused the young man to know himselfe better, by making him fall backe into ranke among his younger brethren. And furely the doings of Jehosaphat about the same time, argue no small distemper of the whole country, through the missouernment of his vingodly fonne. For the good old King was faine to make his progreffe round about the land, reclaiming the people vnto the seruice of God, and ap-2. Coron, 19.04. pointing Judges throughout all the strong Citties of Juda Citie by Citie. This had bin 30 a needleffe labour, if the religion taught and strongly maintained by A/a, and by himselfe, had not suffered alteration, and the course of Instice beene peruerted, by the power of such as had borne authoritie. But the necessitie that then was of reformation, appeares by the charge which the King did giue to the Iudges; and by his commission given to one of the priestes in spiritual causes, and to the steward of his house in temporal matters, to be general ouerseers.

This was not till after the death of Abazia the fonne of Abab; but how long after it is vncertaine. For Ichoram the brother of Ahazia beganne his reigne (as hath beene alreadie noted) in the eighteenth of Icho aphat, which was then accounted the second of Iehoram, Icholaphats sonne, though afterward this Iehoram 40 of Inda had another first and second yeere, even in his fathers time, before hee reigned alone, as the best Chronologers and expositors of the holy text agree. So beecontinued in prinate estate, vntil the two and twentieth of his fathers reigne, at which time, though the occasions inducing his restitution to former dignitie are not fet downe, yet wee may not thinke, that motiues thereto, appearing fubftantiall, were wanting. Ichoram of I/rael held the fame correspondencie with Iehofaphat that his father had done; and made vse of it. Hee drewe the Indean into the warre of Moab, at which time it might well bee, that the young Prince of Inda was againe ordained King by his father, as in the Syrian expedition hee had beene. Or if wee ought rather to thinke, that the preparations for the enter- 50 prize against Meab did not occupie so much time, as from the eightenth of Iehosaphat, in which yeere that nation rebelled against Ifrael, vnto his two and twentieth; yet the dailie negotiations betweene the two Kings of Inda and Ifrael, and the affinitie betweene them contracted in the person of Iehoram, might offer fome good occasions thereunto. Neither is it certaine how the behaujour of the yonger fonnes, in their elder brothers differace, might cause their Father to put him in possession, for feare of tumult after his death; or the deepe diffimulation, of Jehoram himselfe, might winne the good opinion both of his Father and Brethren; it being a thing vivall in mischienous fell natures, to be as abiect and seruile in time of aduersitie, as insolent and bloudy upon aduantage. This is manifest, that being repossessed of his former estate, he demeaned himselfe in such wife towards his brethren as caused their father to enable them not only with store of filter, and of gold, and of pretious thinges, (which kinde of liberalitie other Kings 2. Chromatic. to doubtleffe had vsed vnto their yonger sonnes) but with the custodie of strong Cities in Inda, to affure them, if it might have beene, by vinwonted meanes; against vinwonted perills.

The doings of IEHORAM when he raigned alone; and the rebellion of Edom and Labra.

Vt all this providence availed nothing; for an higher providence had otherwise determined of the sequele. When once the good old man, their Father, was dead, the yonger fonnes of Ieho(aphat found firong Cities, a weake defence, against the power of him to whom the Citizens were obedient. If they came in vpon the fummons of the King their brother, then had he them without more adoe; if they flood upon their guard, then were they Traitors, and so vnable to hold out against him, who besides his owne power, was able to bring the forces of the Ifraelitifb Kingdome against them, so that the apparent likelyhood of their finall ouerthrow, sufficed to make all forfake them in the very beginning. Howfocuer it was, they were all taken and flaine, and with them for companie many great men of the Land; fuch belike, as 20 either had taken their part, when the T yrant fought their liues, or had beene appointed Rulers of the Countrie, when Iehoram was deposed from his Gouernment; in which Office they, without for bearing to doe inflice, could hardly avoide the doing of many thinges, derogatorie to their yong Master, which if he would now call treason, saying that he was then King, who durst say the contrarie?

After this, Jehoram tooke vpon him, as being now Lord alone, to make innouations in religion: wherein he was not contented as other Idolatrous Princes, to giue way and safe conduct vnto superstition and idolatrie, nor to proucke and encourage the people to that finne, whereto it is wonderfull that they were so much addicted, having fuch knowledge of God, and of his detelling that about all other 40 finnes; but he vsed compulsion, and was (if not the very first) the first that is regi-ftred, to have fet vp irreligion by force.

Whilest hee was thus busied at home, in doing what hee listed, the Edomites his Tributaries rebelled against him abroad; and having hitherto, fince Davids time, beene gouerned by a Viceroy, did now make vnto themselves a King. Against these Iehoram in person made an expedition, taking along with him his Princes, and all his Chariots, with which hee obtained victorie in the field, compelling the rebells to flie into their places of aduantage, whereof hee forced no one, but went away contented with the honour that hee had gotten in beating and killing fome of those, whom he should have subdued, and kept his servants. Now beganne the prophecie 50 of Isaac to take effect, wherein he fore-told, that Esau in processe of time should breake the yoke of Incob. For after this the Edomites could never be reclaimed by any of the Kings of Iuda, but held their owne fo well, that when, after many civill and forraine warres, the Iewes by fundric Nations had beene brought low; Artipater the Edomite, with Herod his Sonne, and others of that race following them, became Lords of the Jewes, in the decrepitage of Ifrael, and raigned as Kings, even in Ierulalem it felfe.

The freedome of the Edomites, though purchased somewhat dearly, encouraged Libra, a great Citic within Inda, which in the time of Iolia had a peculiar King, to rebell against Jehoram, and set it selfe at libertie. Libra flood in the confines of Beniamin and of Dan, farre from the affiftance of any bordering enemies to Iuda, and therefore fo valikely it was to have maintained it felfe in libertie, that it may feeme strange how it could escape from vtter destruction, or at the least from some terrible vengeance, most likely to have beene taken, by their powerfull cruell, and throughly incenfed Lord. The Ifraelite held fuch good intelligence at that time with Inda, 10 that he would not have accepted the Towne, had it offered it felfe vnto him : neither doe we reade that it fought how to cast it selfe into a new subjection, but cona. chion, 21.104 tinued a free effate. The rebellion of it against Jehoram, was, Because he had for laken the Lord God of his Fathers; which I take to have not only beene the first and remote cause, but even the next and immediate reason, moving the inhabitants to doe as they did : For it was a Towne of the Leuites : who must needes be driven into great extremities, when a religion contrarie to Gods law, had not only fome allowance to countenance it by the King, but compulfine authoritie to force vnto it all that were vnwilling. As for the vie of the Temple at Ierufalem (which being deuout men they might feareto loofe by this rebellion) it was never denied to those of the ten revol- 20 ted Tribes by any of the religious Kings, who rather inuited the Ifraelites thither, and gaue them kinde entertainment : vnder Idolaters they must have beene without it whether they lived free or in subjection. Yet it seemes that private reasons were not wanting, which might moue them rather to doe than to fuffer that which was vnwarrantable. For in the generall vilitation before remembred, wherein Iehosaphat reformed his Kingdome, the good old King appointing new Gouernours, and giving them especiall charge to doe instice without respect of persons, vsed these wordes: The Leuites shall be Officers before you: Be of good courage and doe it, and the Lord shall be with the good. By these phrases, it seemes, that he encouraged them against the more powerfull, than inst proceedings of his sonne; whom if the Leuites 30 did (according to the trust reposed in them) neglect, in discharging their duties, likely it is that he meant to be even with them, and make them now to feele, as many Princes of the Land had done, his heavie indignation. How it happened that Libra was not hereupon destroied, year that it was not (for ought that wee can reade) fo much as belieged or molefted, may justly seeme very strange. And the more strange it is in regard of the mightic Armies which Ieho faphat was able to raife, being fufficient to haue ouer-whelmed any one Towne, and buried it vnder the earth, which they might in one moneth have cast into it with shouells, by ordinarie approches. But it seemes that of these great numbers which his father could have levied, 40 there were not many whom Iehoram could well trust; and therefore perhaps hee thought it an easier losse, to let one Towne goe, than to put weapons into their handes, who were more likely to follow the example of Libra, than to punish it. So desperate is the condition of T yrants, who thinking it a greater happinesse be feared than to be loued; are faine themselues to stand in seare of those, by whom they might have beene dreadfull vnto others.

§. IIII. 50

ð. I I I I.

Of the miseries falling upon IEHORAM, and of his death.

Hefe afflictions not fufficing to make any impression of Gods displeafure in the minde of the wicked Prince; a prophecie in writing was delinered vnto him, which threatned both his people, his children. his wives, and his owne body. Hereby likewife it appeares that hee was a cruell Perfecutor of Gods feruants; in as much as the Prophets durst not reproue him to his face, as they had done many of his Predecessors, both good and cuill Kings, but were faine to denounce Gods judgements against him by letters, keeping themselves close and farre from him. This Epistle is said to have 2.cbrox.21. 18, beene fent vnto him from Elias the Prophet. But Elias was translated, and Elizeus prophecied in his flead before this time, even in the daies of Iehofaphat. Wherefore 2.Kings c. 2. & it may be that Elias left this prophecie in writing behinde him, or that (as some coniecture) the errour of one letter in writing, was the occasion that wee reade Elias for Elizeus. Indeede any thing may rather bee beleeued than the Tradition held by some of the Jewish Rabbins, that Elias from heaven did send this Epistle, a tale somewhat like to the fable of our Ladies letters, deuiled by Eralmus, or of the Verle that was fent from heaven to St. Giles.

But who foeuer was the Author of this threatning Epiftle, the accomplishment of the prophecie was as terrible, as the fentence. For the Philistims and Arabians brake into Indea, and tooke the Kings house, wherein they found all, or many of his children, and wives, all which they flew, or carried away, with great part of his goods. These Philistims had not prefumed since the time of David, to make any offenfine warre till now ; for they were by him almost consumed, and had lost the best of their Townes, maintaining themselves in the rest of their small Territorie, by defensive armes, to which they were constrained at Gibbethon by the Israelites. The Arabians were likely to have beene then as they are now, a naked people, all horsemen, and ill appointed; their Countrie affording no other furniture, than fuch as might make them fitter to robbe and spoile in the open fields, than to offend strong Cities fuch as were thick fet in Iuda. True it is that in ages long after following, they conquered all the South parts of the world then knowne, in a very flort space of time, destroying some, and building other some very stately Cities. But it must be confidered; that this was when they had learned of the Romanes the art of Warre; and that the propisions which they found, together with the arts which they learned, in one subdued Prouince, did make them able and skillfull in pursuing their conquest, and going onward in to Regions farre removed from them. At this day having lost in effect all that they had gotten, such of them as live in Arabia it selfe 40 are good horsemen, but ill appointed, very dangerous to passengers, but vnable to deale with good Souldiers, as riding starke naked, and rather trusting in the swiftnes of their horses, than in any other meanes of relistance, where they are well opposed. And fuch, or little better, may they feeme to have beene, that spoiled Indea in the time of Iehoram. For their Countrie was alwaies barraine and defert, wanting manuall arts whereby to supply the naturalls with furniture: neither are these bands named as chiefe in that action, but rather adherents of the Philistims. Out of this we may inferre that one halfe, yea or one quarter of the numbers found in the least muster of Juda and Benjamin under Jeholaphat (wherein were involled three hundred and eightie thousand fighting men ) had beene enough to have driven away farre To greater forces than these enemies are likely to have brought into the field, had not the people beene vnable to deale with them, for lacke of weapons, which were now kept from them by their Princes icloufie, as in Sauls time by the pollicie of the

It may feeme that the house of the King which these inuaders tooke, was not his Palace in Jerufalem, but rather some other house of his abroad in the Countrie. where his wines and children at that time lay for their recreation; became we reade not that they did facke the Citie, or spoile the Temple, which would have invited them as a more commodious bootic, had they got polleffion thereof. Yet perhaps they tooke Ierufalem it felfe by furprife, the people being difarmed, and the Kings guardes too weake to keepe them out; yet had not the courage to hold it, because it was fo large and populous; and therefore having done what fooile they could. with-drew themselves with such purchase as they were able safely to conveigh

The flaughter committed by Iehn upon the two and fortie brethren of Ahazia, 10 or (as they are called elfewhere) fo many of his brothers Sonnes, and the cruell maffacre wherein all the Royall feede perifhed (only Ioas excepted) under the tyrannie of Athalia, following within two yeares after this invalion of the Philiffings, and Arabians, make it feeme probable, that the fonnes of Jeharam were not all flaine at once, but that rather the first murther beganne in his owne time, and was seconded by many other heavie blowes, wherewith his house was incessantly stricken, vntill it was in a manner quite hewed downe.

After these calamities, the hand of God was extended against the body of this wicked King, fmiting him with a grieuous difeafe in his bowells, which left him nor untill his guts fell out, and his wretched foule departed from his miferable carcaffe. 20 The people of the Land, as they had fmall cause of comfort in his life, so had they not the good manners to pretend forrow for his death; wherefore he was denied a place of buriall among his Ancestors the Kings of Inda, though his owne some succeeded him in the Kingdome, who was guided by the same spirits that had beene his Fathers cuill Angells. Athalia had other matters to trouble her head, than the pompous enterring of a dead husband. Shee was thinking how to provide for the future, to maintaine her owne greatnesse, to retaine her fauourites in their authoritie, and to place about her Some fuch Counsellors, of the house of A H A B, as were fittest for her turne. Wherefore shee thought it viscasonable to make much a-doe about a thing of nothing, and offend the peoples eies, with a stately funerall of a 20 man by them detefted : but rather chose to let the blame of thinges passed bee laid vpon the dead, than to procure an ill opinion of her felfe, and hers, which it now did concerne her to avoid. Such is the qualitie of wicked inftigators, having made greedie vie of bad imploiments, to charge, not only with his owne vices, but with their faults also, the man whose cuill inclinations their finister counsailes have made worfe, when once he is gone and can profit them no longer. The death of Jehoram fellout indeede in a butie time; when his friend and colin the Ifraelite, who had the fame name, was entangled in a difficult warre against the Aramite; and therefore could have had no better leifure to helpe Athalia in fetting of thinges according to her owne minde, than he had (perhaps through the fame hindrance) to helpe her 40 husband, when he was diffressed by the Philistims. Yearather he needed and craued the affiftance of the men of Inda, for the taking in of Ramoth Gilead, where they had not fped fo well the last time, that they should willingly runne thither againe, vnleffe they were very fairely intreated.

The acts of this wicked man I have thought good to handle the more particularly (purfuing the examination of all occurrences, as farre as the circumflances remembred in holy Scripture, would guide me by their directions) to the end that it might more plainly appeare, how the corrupted affections of men, impugning the reucaled will of God, accomplish neuerthelesse his hidden purpose; and without miraculous meanes, confound themselues in the seeming-wise deuises of their owne folly: as likewife to the end that all men might learne, to fubmit their judgements to the ordinance of God, rather than to thinke, that they may fafely diffeenfe with his commandements, and follow the prudent conceipts which worldly wifedome dictateth vnto them: for in fuch kinde of vnhappie fubtilities, it is manifest that

Athalia was able to furnish both her Husband and her Sonne, but the iffue of them partly hath appeared alreadie, and partly will appeare, in that which immediately ### à. V.

Of the raigne of AHAZIA, and his businesse with the King of Israel.

CHAZIAS, or Ahazia, the fonne of Iehoram and Athalia, beganne his raigne ouer Inda in the twelfth yeare of Ichoram, the sonne of Ahab King of Ifrael, and raigned but that one yeare. Touching his age, it is a point of more difficultie than importance to know it; yet hath it bred much disputation, whereof I see no more probable conclu-fion, than that of Torniellus, alleaging the Edition of the Septuagint at Rome. Anno Domini 1788, which faith that he was twentie yeares old in the beginning of his Kingdome, and the Annotations thereupon, which cite other Copies, that give him two yeares more. Like enough he is to have beene yong: for hee was governed by his Mother, and her-Ministers, who gaue him counsaile by which hee perished. In matter of Religion he altered none of his Fathers courses. In matter of State, he likewise up held the league made with the house of Ahab. Hee was much bufied in doing little, and that with ill successe. He accompanied his Cosen the Israelite against Ramoth Gilead, which they wanne, but not without blowes: for the Aramites fought so well, that the King of Israel was faine to aduenture his owne perfon, which scaped not vinwounded. The Towne being wonne was manned strongly, in expectation of some attempt likely to bee made by Hazael King of Aram: which done, Jehoram King of Ifrael with-drew himselfe to the Citie of Izreel, where with more quiet he might attend the curing of his woundes; and Ahazia returned to Ierusalem. It seemes that hee was but newly come home (for hee raigned in all feantly one yeare, whereof the former expedition, with the preparations for it, had taken vp a great part) when he made a new journey, as it were for good manners fake, to vilit the King of Ifrael, who lay fore of his woundes. Belike Athalia was brewing some new plots, which his presence would have hindred, and therefore fought every occasion to thrust him abrode; for otherwise it was but a vaine peece of worke to to leaue his Kingdome, having no other businesse than by way of complement to goe fee one whom he had feene yesterday. Certaine it is that the Lord had resolved at this time to put in execution that heavie judgement, which hee had laid by the mouth of Elias the Prophet, vpon the house of Ahab. And hereunto at this time had hee disposed not only the concurrence of all other thinges, which in mans eies might seeme to haue beene accidentall; but the very thoughts and affe-40 Ctions of fuch persons, as intended nothing lesse than the fulfilling of his high pleasure. Of these Athalia doubtlesse was one; whose mischieuous purposes it will shortly be needfull for explanation of some difficulties arising, that wee diligently consider and examine.

How AHAZIA perished with the house of AHAB; and how that Familie was destroied by I E H v.

He whole Armie of Ifrael, with all the principall Captaines lying in Ramoth Gilead, a Disciple of Elizaus the Prophet came in among the Captaines that were fitting together, who calling out from among them Jehu, a principall man, tooke him apart, and annointed him King ouer Ifrael, rehearling vnto him the prophecie of Elias against the house of Ithis who had vpon the finddainethis great honour throwne vpon him, was not flow to put himfelfe in polififion of it, but vfed the first heate of their affections to who ioyned with him, in setting on store the businesse which nearely concerned him, and was not to be fore-slowed, being no more his owner han Gods.

The first care taken was that no newes of the resolt might be carried to Izerel, whereby the King might hase had warning either to fight or site: this being forecase her marched fwirtly away, to take the Court while it was yet secure. King irbitram was now so well recouvered of his wounds, that hee could endure to rideableoad, for which cause it seems that there was much feasing, and toy made, especially by Queene Izezabes, who keep her state so well, that the brether of Abazia comming thather at this time, did make it as well their errand to salute the Queene, as to visit the King.

Certaineit is, that fineethe rebellion of Moule against Israel, the house of Abab according to the Moule of Israel and the Moule of Abab according to the Moule of Mo

In the midft of this securitie, whilest these great Estates were (perhaps) either confulting about profequution of their intents, first against the Aramites, and then against Moib, Edom, and other rebells and enemics; or else were triumphing in joy of that which was already well atchieued, and the Queene Mother drefling her felfe in the brauest manner to come downe amongst them; tidings were brought in, that the watchman had from a Tower discourred a companie comming. These newes were not very troublesome : for the Armie that lay in Ramoth Gilead, to bee readie against all attempts of the Aramites, was likely enough to be discharged vpon fome notice taken that the enemie would not, or could not firre. Only the King 40 fent out an Horse-man to know what the matter was, and to bring him word. The meffenger comming to Iehn, and asking whether all were well, was retained by him, who intended to give the King as little warning as might bee. The feeming negligence of this fellow in not returning with an answere, might argue the matter to be of small importance: yet the King to bee satisfied, sent out an other, that should bring him word how all went; and he was likewise detained by Iehn. These dumbe showes bred some suspition in Iehoram, whome the watchmen certified of all that happened. And now the companie drew fo neare that they might, though not perfectly, be differened, and notice taken of Iehu himselfe by the furious manner of his marching. Wherefore the King that was loath to discouer any weakenesse, caused his Chariot to bee made readie, and issued forth with Abazia King of Iuda in his companie, whose presence added majestie to his traine, when strength to resist, or expedition to slee had been e more needfull. This could not be done so hastily, but that Ichu was come euen to the Townes end, and there they met each other in the field of Naboth. Ichoram beganne to falute Ichu with termes of peace, but receiuing a bitter anfiwere, his heart failed him; fo that crying our upon the treafon to his fellow King, he turned away to haue fled. But Ichu foone ouer-tookehim with an arow, where with he strookehim dead, and threw his carcaffe into that field, which, purchafed with the bloud of the rightfull owner, was to be watered with bloud of the vninft possession. We will be the was arreited by a wound, which held him till death did fire yoon him.

The Kings Palace was joyning to the wall, by the gate of the Citie, where least bed might foone bee adnertifed of this calamitie, if thee did not with her owne cies behold it. Now it was high time for her to call to God for merice, whose indgement, pronounced against her long before, had ouer-taken her, when shee least expected it. But shee, full of indignation, and proud thoughts, made her feller readie in all hast, and painted her face, hoping with her stately and imperious lookes to daunt the Traitour, or at the least to veter some Appelvitegme, that should expecsed her braue spirit, and brand him with such a reproach as might make him odious for euer. Little did shee thinke upon the hungrie dogs, that were ordained to deuout her, whose paunches the stitum, with which shee besineared her cies, would more offend, than the foolding language where with shee armed her trongue, could trouble the caresof him that had her in his power. As selved we neares shee opened her 20 window, and looking out upon him, beganne to put him in minde of Zomri, that had not long invoyed the fruits of his treation, and murther of the King his Master.

This was in meere humane valuation floutly spoken, but was indeede a part of miferable folly, as are all thinges, how sow sever laudable, if they haue an ill relation to 63d he Lord of all. Her owne Emmches that shood by and heard her, were not affested so much as with any compassion of her fortune; much less was her ortemic daunted with her proud spirit. When Jehn say that sheed did wit the little remainder of her life in seeking to week him; her made her presently to vinderstand her owne estate, by deedes and not by wordes. He only called to her serunats to know which of them would be of his side, and soone found them readie to offer their service, before the very face of their proud Ladie. Hereupon he commanded them to cast ther owne head-long: which immediately they performed without all regard of her towne acad-long; which immediately they performed without all regard of ther greatness and clates, wherein shee had a sie who more shefore shined for gloriosistly in the cies of men; of men that considered not the judgements of God that had been denounced against her.

So persisted this accursed woman by the rude handes of her owne fermants, at the commandement of her greated enemie, that was yellerday her fishied, but now her Lord: and thee perifihed miferably flrugling in vaine with backgroomes, who contumelioudly did hale and thrult her, while the rin infulting enemic fate on horfe-back, adding indignitie to her griefe by feornefully beholding the (hamefull manner of a) her fall, and trampling her bodie vnder foote. Her dead carcaffe that was left without the walls was demoured by dogges, and her very memorie was odious. Thus the vengeance of God rewarded her Idolatrie, murther, and oppreffion, with flow, but fure painment, and full intereft.

Abszis King of Inds flecing a-pace from Iehn, was ouer-taken by the way where he liked; and receiving his deadly wound in the Kingdome of Samaria, was fuffered to get him gone (which he did in all hath) and feek his burial in his owncking dome; and this fauour hee obtained for his grand-fathers fake, not for his fathers, nor his owne. He died at Agiddo, and was thence carried to Ierufalem, where he was enterred with his Ancestors, having raigned about one yeare.

CHAP. XXI.

Of ATHALIA, and whose Sonne he was that succeeded onto her.

of ATHALIA her vsurping the Kingdome, and what pretences free might forge.

3.Chroit.11.9.

TER the death of Ahazia, it is faid that his house was not able to retaine the Kingdome : which note, and the proceedings of Athalia vpon the death of her Sonne, haue giuen occasion to diuers opinions concerning the Pedigree of Ions, who raigned shortly after. For Athalia being thus dispoiled of her Sonne, 20 vnder whose name shee had ruled at her pleasure, did forth-with lay hold vpon all the Princes of the bloud, and flew them, that so shee might occupie the Roiall Throne her felfe, and raigne as Queene, rather than liue a Subicet. Shee had before hand put into great place, and made Counfailours vnto her fonne, such as were fittest for her purpose, and readie at all times to execute her will: that shee kept a strong guard about her it is very likely; and as likely it is that the great execution done by Iehoram, vpon the Princes, and many of the Nobilitie, had made the people tame, and fearefull to ftirre, whatfoeuer they faw or heard.

Yet ambition, how violent socier it be, is seldome or neuer so shamelesse as to refuse the commeditie of goodly pretenses offering themselues; but rather scrapes together all that will any way ferue to colour her proceedings. Wherefore it were not abfurd for vs to thinke, that Athalia when shee saw the Princes of the Royall bloud, all of them in a manner, flaine by her husband, and afterwards his owne children destroied by the Philistims, beganne euen then to play her owne game, reducing by artificiall practife, into faire likelyhoods, those possibilities where with her hulbands bad fortune had presented her. Not without great show of reason, either by her owne mouth, or by some trustie creature of hers, might shee give him to vnderstand, how needfull it were to take the best order whilest as yet hee might, 40 for feare of the worst that might happen. If the issue of David, which now remained only in his Familie, should by any accident faile (as wofull experience had alreadie shewed what might after come to passe) the people of Iuda were not vnlikely to choose a King of some new stock, a popular seditious man peraduenture, one that to countenance his owne vnworthinesse, would not care what aspersions hee laied vpon that Royall house, which was fallen downe. And who could affure him, that some ambitious spirit, fore-seeing what might be gotten thereby, did not alreadie contriue the destruction of him, and all his seede? Wherefore it were the wisest way to designe by his authoritie, not only his Successiour, but also the reucrfioner, and so to provide, that the Crowne might never bee subject to any rifeling, 73 but remaine in the disposition of them that loued him best, if the worst that might be feared comming to paffe, his owne posteritie could not retaine it.

Such persivations being viged, and earnestly followed, by the importunate solicitation of her that gouerned his affections, were able to make the icalous Tyrant thinke that the only way to frustrate all deuises of such as gaped after a change, was to make her Heire to the last and yongest of his house, whom it most concerned, as being the Queene-Mother, to vp-hold the first and eldest.

If Athalia tooke no fuch course as this in her husbands times, yet might shee doe it in her Sonnes. For Abazia (besides that he was wholly ruled by his Mother) was not likely to take much care for the fecuritie of his halte-brethren or their children; as accounting his Fathers other wines, in respect of his owne high borne-Mother, little better than Concubines, and their children basely begotten. But if this mischieuous woman forgate her selfe so farre in her wicked pollicie, that shee 10 loft all opportunitie which the weakeneffe of her hufband and fonne did afford, of procuring to her selfe some seeming Title; yet could shee afterwards faine some fuch matter, as boldly flee might: being fure that none would aske to fee her euidence, for feare of being fent to learne the certaintie of her fonne or hufband in another world. But I rather thinke that shee tooke order for her affaires before hand. For though shee had no reason to suspect or feare the suddaine death of her sonne. yet it was the wifest way to prouide betimes against all that might happen, whilest her hufbands iffue by other women was yong and vnable to relift. We plainly find that the Bretheren or Nephewes of Abazia, to the number of two and fortie, were fent to the Court of Ifrael, only to falute the children of the King, and the children 20 of the Queene. The flender occasion of which long journey, considered together with the qualitie of these persons (being in effect all the stocke of tehoram that could be growne to any firength) makes it very fulpitious that their entertainement in /ezabets house would only have been more formall, but little differing in substance, from that which they found at the hand of Jehn. Hee that lookes into the courses held both before and after by these two Queenes, will finde cause enough to thinke

Ages, afford plentifull examples: and the rule of Salomon is true: Is there any thing Ecological 30 whereof one may fay, behold this is new? it hath been ealreadie in the old time that was before vs. That a King might fled his brothers bloud, was proudd by Salomon vpon Adonia: that he might aliene the Crowne from his naturall Heires, David had given proofe: but these had good ground of their doings. They which follow examples that please them, will neglect the reasons of those examples, if they please them not, and rest contented with the practise, as more willingly shewing what they may doe, than acknowledging why. Salomon flew his brother that had begunne one rebellion. and wasentring into an other. IE HORAM flew all his brethren, which were better than 2.Chro. 33, 10, 252 he: DAVID purchased the Kingdome, and might the more freely dispose of it, yet he disposed of it as the Lord appointed; if Ieheram, who had lost much and got-40 ten nothing, thought that he might aliene the remainder at his pleasure; or if Ahazia fought to cut off the fuccession of his brethren, or of their issue: either of these was to be answered with the wordes which Iehoiada the Pricst vsed afterwards, in de-no leffe. Of fuch as have afpired vnto Lordships not belonging to them, and thrust out the right Heires by pretence of Teftaments, that had no other validitie than the fword of fuch as claimed by them could give, Historics of late, yea of many claring the title of I O A S H. Behold the Kings some must raigne; as the Lord hath Said of the somes of DAVID. Wherefore though I hold it very probable, that Athalia did pretend some title, what socuer it might bee, to the Crowne of Juda; vet is it most certaine that shee had thereunto no right at all; but only got it by treacherie. murder, and open violence; and so shee held it fixe whole yeares; and a part of the feuenth, in good feeming-fecuritie.

ATHALIA.

N all this time lehu did neuer goe about to diffurbe her; which in realon hee was likelie to defire, being an enemic to her whole House.

But he was occupied at the first in establishing himselfe, rooting out the posteritie of whub, and reforming somewhat in Religion : afterwards in warres against the Aramite, wherein he was so farre ouercharged, that hardly hee could retaine his owne, much leffe attempt vpon others. 10 Of the line of Ahab there were seuentie liuing in Samaria, out of which number Jehn by letter aduised the Citizens to set up some one as King, and to prepare themfelues to fight in his defence. Hereby might they gather how confident hee was, which they well viderstood to proceede from greater power about him, than they could gather to relift him. Wherefore they tooke example by the two Kings whom he had flaine, and being exceedingly afraide of him, they offered him their fernice, wherein they for eadily shewed themselues obedient, that in lesse than one daies warning, they fent him the heads of all those Princes, as they were injoyeed by a fewanning as you him. After this be furprized all the Pricits of Real by a fubrilite, fairing a great facrifice to their God, by which meanes be drew them altogether in-20 to one Temple, where he flew them; and in the same zeale to God vtterly demolished all the monuments of that impictic.

Concerning the Idolatric denised by Icroboam, no King of Israel had over greater reason than lehn to destroy it. For he needed not to frare least the people should be allured vnto the house of David; it was (in appearance) quite rooted vp, and the Crowne of Juda in the possession of a cruell Tyrannesse: he had received his kingdome by the vnexpected grace of God; and further, in regard of his zeale expressed in destroying Baal out of Ifrael, he was promised, notwithstanding his following the finne of Ieroboam, that the Kingdome should remaine in his familie, to the fourth generation. But all this would not ferue; hee would needes helpe to peece 30 out Gods providence with his owne circumspection; doing therein like a foolish greediegamester, who by stealing a needlesse Carde to assure himselse of winning a Rake, forfeits his whole reft. He had questionlesse displeased many, by that which he did against Baal; and many more hee should offend by taking from them the yse of a superstition, so long practized as was that Idolatric of Ieroboam. Yet all these, how many socuer they were, had never once thought vpon making him King, if God, whom, to retaine them, hee now for fooke, had not given him the Crowne, when more difficulties appeared in the way of getting it, than could at any time after be found in the meanes of holding it.

This ingratitude of Icha drew terrible vengeance of God vpon Ifrael, whereof 40 Bazael King of Damaseus was the Executioner. The crueltie of this barbarous 2. Roggs 8. 2.12. Prince we may finde in the prophecie of Elizaus, who fore-toldit, faying : Their livong Cities falt thou fet on fire, and their rong men falt thou flay with the fword, and So did not only the wickednesse of Ahab cause the ruine of his whole house, but the obstinate Idolatrie of the people bring a lamentable miserie vpon all the Land. For the furic of Hazaels victorie was not quenched with the destruction of a few Townes, *. Ning. 10.0.32 nor wearied with one invalion; but he smote them in all the coasts of Israel, and wasted all the Countrie beyond the River of Iordan. Notwithstanding all these calamities it seemes that the people repented not of their Idolatrie; (For in these daies the Lord to begsame to losth (frael,) but rather it is likely, that they bemoaned the noble House of Asab, under which they had beaten those enemies to whom they were now a prey, and had brauely fought for the conquest of Syria, where they had enlarged their border, by winning Ramoth Gilead, and compelled Benhadad to restore the Cities which his Father had wonne: whereas now they were faine to make wofull thifts, liuing vnder a Lord that had better fortune and courage in murdering his Master that had put him in trust, than in defending his people from their cruell enemies. Thus it commonly falls out, that they who can finde all manner of difficulties in feruing him, to whom nothing is difficult, are in flead of the cafe and pleas fure to themselues propounded by contrarie courses, ouer-whelmed with the troubles which they fought to avoide, and therein by God whom they first for fooke, for faken, and left vnto the wretched labours of their owne blinde wildome, wherein they had reposed all their confidence.

Of ATHALIAHS Government.

Hefe calamities falling vpon Ifrael, kept Athalia fafe on that fide, giving her leifure to looke to thinges at home; as hauing little to dea broad, validie it were so that she held some correspondencie with states who had done the like. And some probabilitie that shee did so may who had done the like. And some probabilitie that shee did so may be gathered out of that which is recorded of her doings. For wee finde that this wicked ATHALIA and her children brake up the house of God, and all thinges that were 2, Class, 24.27. dedicate for the house of the Lord did they bestow upon BAALIM. Such a facriledge, though it proceeded from a defire to fet out her owne Idolatrie, with fuch pompe as might make it the more glorious in the peoples eies, was not likely to want fome faire pretext of necessitie of the State so requiring; in which case others before her had made bold with that holy place, and her next successour was faine to doe the like, being thereunto forced by Hazael, who perhaps was delighted with the tast of that which was formerly thence extracted for his fake.

Vnder this impious government of Athalia, the denotion of the Priests and Leuites was very notable, and ferued (no doubt) very much to retain the people in the religion taught by God himfelfe, how focuer the Queenes proceedings advanced the contrarie. For the pouertie of that facred Tribe of Leui, must needes have been exceeding great at this time; all their lands and possessions in the ten Tribes being vtterly loft, the oblations and other perquifites, by which they flued, being now very few, and small; and the store laid up in better times under godly Kings, being all taken away by shamefull robberie. Yet they up-held in all this miserie the seruice of God, and the daily facrifice, keeping duly their courses, and performing obedience to the high Priest, no lesse than in those daies wherein their entertainement was farre better.

50 it feeme that Athalia was not her Mother, though her accesse to the Court argue the contrarie: but her discreet carriage might more casily procure her welcome to her owne Fathers house, than the education under such a Mother could have permitted her to be fuch as flee was. By her care toals the yong Prince that raigned foone after, was conneighed out of the nourferie, when Athalia destroied all the Kings children, and was carried fecretly into the Temple, where as fecretly hee was brought vp. How it came to palle that this yong child was not hunted out, when his bodie was milling, nor any great reckoning (for ought that we finde) made of his eCape, I will not fland to examine: for it was not good in polltice, that the people should heate say, that one of the children had auoided that cruell blow; it might haue made them heartken after innovations, and so be the left conformable to the present gone no man could tell whither, and might be thought peraduenture to bee call away, as hauing no other guard than a poore woman that gaue him suck, who foolifsly doubting that shee her selfe should have been slaine, was sled away with 10 him into some debolate places, where it was like enough that shee and he should perish. In such cases flatterers, or men desirous of reward, castily coine such tales, and rather sweare them to bee true in their owne knowledge, than they will loofe the thankes due to their original tidings.

Some doe inferre that this holf was not properly called his Sonne, but was the next of his kindred, and therefore faceceded him, as a forme in the inheritance of his Father. And hereunto the murder committed by Athalia, doth cry well agree. For thee perceiving that the Kingelown was to fall into their handes, in whom thee had no intereft, might eafily finde cause to feare, that the tyramic excreted by her husband, at her infligation you for many noble Houses, would now bee reunged you her felfe. The ruine of her Idolatrous religion might in this case terrifie both her and her Minions; the sentence of the Law rewarding that offence with death; and the Tragedie of 40 12-26 teaching her what might happen to an other Queene. All this had little concerned her, if her owne grand-child had beene heire to the Crowne; for sheethat had power enough to make her selfe Queene, could with more case, and lesse much hau to won her the office of a Protector, by which authoritie sheemight haue

Concerning this Nathan the son of Danid there are that would have him to bee Xi-than the Prophet, who as they thinks, was by Danidadopted. And of this opinion was Origen, as also S. Gregorie Nazianzen (as I linde him tiet by Peter Marty) and after him, Erafinus, and Feber Straphelis, In theil kiewife held the fame of Inafh, deriving him from Nathan. But Nathan, and those other brethren of Salomon by the fame mother, are thought, you goog od likelihoods, to have beene the children of Yria the Hittite: and so are they accounted by fundrie 20 of the fathers, and by Lyra, and Andrens, who follow the Hebrew expositors of that place in the first of Champiels. The words of Salomo calling himselfer the only begotten of his mother, doe approoue this exposition: for wee read of no more than two fons which Bathlians or Bathlibead ald beare vito Daniel, where of the one, begotten in adulteric, died an infant, and Salomon only of her children by the king did line. So that the rest must needs haue bin the children of Priz, and are thought to haue beene Daniels onely by adoption. Wherefore, if Toza had not beene the sonne of Abazia, then must that pedegree haue beene false, wherein S. by the Genealogie of our Lord; as it is recounted by S. Luke, but the preferuation of the house of Duaid, mentioned in the bookes of Kings and Chronicles, was performed in the person of schools as in whom the rotall braunch of Salomon, the naturall, and not onely legall iffue remaining of David, was kept alive. Wherefore it may bee thought that this 10sfb, who followed Athalia in the Kingdome, was the yongest fonne of tehoram, whose life Athalia, as a stepdame, was not vnlikely to pursue. For

Voonwhatreafons ATHALIAmight feeke to destroy IOAS, if be were her owne grandchilde

TF therefore we shall follow that which is commonly received, and interpret the text according to the letter, it may be faid that Athalia was not onely blinded by the passions of ambition and zeale to her idolatrous worshippe of Badim, but purfued the accomplishment of some naturall desires, in seeking the destruction of her grand-childe, and the rest of the bloud royall. For whether it were so that A bails 10 (as proud and cruell women are not alwaies chaft) had imitated the libertic of Iczabether lifter in law, whose whoredomes were vpbraided by Jehu to her some or whether the had children by fome former husband, before thee was married vnto Iehoram (which is not vnlikely in regard of her age, who was daughter of Omri, and fifter to Abab) certaine it is that thee had formes of her owne, and those old enough to be imployed, as they were, in robbing of the Temple. So it is not greatly to be wondred at, that to lettle the Crowne vpon her owne children, the did feeke to cut off, by wicked pollicic, all other claimes. As for Ions, if the were his grandmother; yet the might mistrust the interest which his mother would have in him, least when he came to yeeres, it might withdraw him from her denotion. And hereof (be-20 fides that women doe commonly betterslove their daughters husbands, than their fonnes wives) there is some appearance in the reigne of her sonne; for the made him fpend all his time in idle journeies, to no other apparant end, than that the might rule at home; and he liuing abroad, be oftranged from his wife, and entertaine fome new fancies, wherein Iezabel had cunning enough to be his tutoresse. But when the fword of Jehn had rudely cut in funder all these fine denises, then was Athalia faine to goe roundly to worke, and doe as she did, whereby she thought to make all fure. Otherwife, if (as I could rather thinke) she were onely stepdame to toas, wee neede

Adagression, wherein is maintained the libertie of wsing con. secture in Hiltories.

H v s much concerning the person of Jeas, from whom as from a new roote, the tree of Danid was propagated into many branches. In roote, the tree of Dand was propagated into many branches. In handling of which matter, the more I confider the nature of this Hiftoric, and the diucrlitic beweene it and others, the leffe, me thinkes,
I neede to suspect mine owne presumption, as descruing blame, for curiolitie in matter of doubt, or boldnesse in libertie of conjecture. For all Histories doe giue vs information of humaine counfailes and euents, as farre forth as the knowledge and faith of the writers can affoord; but of Gods will, by which all things are ordered, they speake onely at randome, and many times failily. This we often finde in prophane writers, who afcribe the ill fuccoffe of great vindertakings to the neglect of some impious rites, whereof indeed God abhorred the perfermance as vehemetly, as they thought him to be highly offended with the omiffion. Hereat we may the leffe wonder, if we confider the answere made by the jewes in Agypt vnto Ieremic the Prophet reprehending their idolatrie. For, how focuer the 10 written Law of God was knowne vnto the people, and his punishmens laid vpon them for contempt thereof were very terrible, and even then but newly executed: yet were they so obstinatly bent vnto their owne wils, that they would not by any meanes be drawne to acknowledge the true cause of their affliction. But they rold the Prophet roundly, that they would worthin the Oncene of incarien; as they and

Certainely that inhumane murther which leliorans committed vpon his brethren, if it were (as appeareth in the Historie) reuenged voon his owne children; then was not this vengeance of God accomplished by the Philiftims and Arabians, but being only begun by them, was afterwardes profecuted by tehn, and finally tooke effect by the hands of that same wicked woman, at whose instigation hee had committed such barbarous outrage. And from this execution of Gods heavie indgement laid vpon Jehorani

3.c/wwn.21.14. and all his children, only jehoahas his youngest fonne was exempted; whom there- 20 fore if I should affirme to be the same with Joan, which is called the some of Ahazia, I should not want good probabilitie. Some further appearance of necessitie there is, which doth argue that it could no otherwise have beene. For it was the youngest some of Ichoram in whom the race was preserved; which could not in any likelihood be Ahazia, feeing that hee was twentic yeeres old at the least ( as is alreadic noted) when he began to reigne, and consequently, was borne in the eightenth or twentieth yeere of his fathers age. Now, I know not whether of the two is more valikely, either that Iehoram should have begotten many children before he was eighteene yeeres old, or that hauing (as hee had) many wives and children, he should voon the suddaine, at his eighteenth yeere, become vnfruitfull, and beget 30 no more in twentie yeeres following : each of which must have beene true, if this were true that Ahaziawas the fame leboahas, which was his youngest sonne. But this inconvenience is taken away, and those other doubts ariling from the causeleffe crueltie of Athalia, in feeking the life of Io.is, are eafily cleared, if Io.is and Iehoahas were one. Neither doth his age withstand this opinion. For he was senen yeeres old when he began to reigne; which if wee understand of yeeres compleat, hee might haue beene a yeere old at the death of Iehoram, being begotten somewhat after the beginning of his ficknesse. Neither is it more absurde to fay that hee was the naturall sonne of tehoram, though called the sonne of Ahazia, than it were to say, as great authors have done, this difficultie not with flanding, that hee was of the posteritie 40 of Nathan. One thing indeed I know not how to answere; which, had it concurred with the rest, might have served as the very foundation of this opinion. The name of Jehoshas, that foundeth much more neere to Jous, than to Ahazia, in an English care, doth in the tiebrew (as I am informed by fome, skilful in that language) through the diverlitie of certaine letters, differ much from that which it most resembleth in our westerne manner of writing, and little from the other. Now, although it be so that Abazia himselse be also called Azaria, and must have had three names, if hee were the same with Ieloahas; in which manner Ions might also have had severall names; yet because I finde no other warrant hereof than a bare possibilitie, I will not prefume to build an opinion vpon the weake foundation of mine owne coniec- 50 ture, but leave all to the confideration of fuch as have more abilitie to judge, and lei-

So blinde is the wildome of man, in looking into the counfaile of God, which to finde our there is no better nor other guide than his owne written wil not peruerted by vaine

But this Historic of the Kings of Ifrael and Juda hath herein a fingular prerogatine about all that have beene written by the most sufficient of meerly humane authours; it fetteth downe expressly the true, and first causes of all that happened; not imputing the death of Abab to his ouer-forwardnesse in battaile; the ruine of his so his familie, to the fecuritie of Ieroboam in Izreel; nor the victories of Hazael, to the great commotions raifed in Ifrael, by the comming in of Iehu; but referring all vnto the will of God. I meane, to his reuealed will; from which that his hidden purposes doe not varie, this storie, by many great examples, gives most notable proofe. True it is that the concurrence of second causes with their effects, is in these bookes nothing largely described; nor perhaps exactly in any of those Histos. Phil. Sid. in bis ries that are in these points most copious. For it was well noted by that worthin Apullar lee-Gentleman Sir Philip Sidnie, that Hillorians doe borrow of Poets, not onely much of their ornament, but somewhat of their substance. Informations are often false, records not alwaies true, and notorious actions commonly infufficient to difcouer the 20 passions, which did set them first on foote. Wherefore they are faine (I speake of the best, and in that which is allowed : for to take out of Linie euery one circumstance of Claudius his journey against Afdrubal in Italie, fitting all to another businesse, or any practise of that kinde, is neither Historicall nor Poeticall) to search into the particular humours of Princes, and of those which have governed their affections, or the inftruments by which they wrought, from whence they doe collect the most likely motives, or impediments of every businesse; and so figuring as necre to the life as they can imagine, the matter in hand, they indiciously consider the defects in counfaile, or obliquitie in proceeding.

Yet all this, for the most part, is not enough to give affurance, howfocuer it may 300. giue fatiffaction. For the heart of man is vnfearchable; and Princes, howfoeuer their intents be feldome hidden from some of those many eyes which price both into them, and into such as line about them; yet sometimes either by their owne close temper, or by some subtill miste, they conceale the trueth from all reports. Yea, many times the affections themselves lie dead, and buried in oblinion, when the preparations which they begate, are conuerted to another vse. The industrie of an Hiltorian, having fo many things to wearie it, may well be excused, when finding apparent cause enough of things done, it for beareth to make further search; though it often fall out, where fundry occasions worke to the same end, that one small matter in a weake minde is more effectuall, than many that sceme farre greater. So 40 comes it many times to passe, that great fires, which consume whole houses or Townes, begin with a few strawes, that are wasted or not seene; when the flame is discouered, having fastned vpon some wood-pile, that catcheth all about it. Questionlesse it is that the warre commenced by Darius, and pursued by Xerxes against the Greekes, proceeded from defire of the Persians to enlarge their Empire: howfoeuer the enterpize of the Athenians upon Sardes, was noised abroad as the ground of that quarrell : yet Herodotus telleth vs, that the wanton defire of Oucene Atolla, to haue the Grecian dames her bondwomen, did first moue Darius to prepare for this warre, before he had received any injurie; and when he did not yet fo much defire to get more as to enjoy what was alreadie gotten.

I will not here stand to argue whether Herodotus be more justly reprehended by fome, or defended by others, for alleadging the vaine appetite, and fecret speech of the Queene in bed with her husband, as the cause of those great euils following: this I may boldlie affirme, (hauing I think, in enery effate fome sufficient witneffes) that matter of much confequence, founded in all feeming upon fubfiantiall reasons, have iffued indeed from fuch pettie trifles, as no Historian would either thinke vpon, or could well fearch out.

Therefore it was a good answere that Sixtus Quintus the Pope made to a certaine Frier, comming to vilite him in his Popedome, as having long before in his meaner citate, beene his familiar friend. This poore Frier, being emboldened by the Pope to vie his old libertie of speech, aduentured to tell him, that he verie much wondred how it was possible for his holinesse, whom he rather tooke for a direct honest man, than any cunning polititian, to attaine vnto the Papacie; in compaffing of which,

10 all the fubtiltie (faid he) of the most craftic braines, finde worke enough; and therfore the more I thinke you the arte of the conclaus, and your vnaptneffe thereto. the more I needs must wonder. Pope Sixtus to satisfic the plaine dealing Friar, dealt with him againe as plainly, saying, Hadst thou lived abroad as I have done, and feene by what folly this world is gouerned, thou wouldest wonder at nothing.

Surely, if this be referred vnto those exorbitant engines, by which the course of affaires is mooued; the Pope faid true. For the wifeft of men are not without their vanities, which requiring and finding mutuall toleration; worke more closely, and earneftly, than right reason either needes or can. But if we lift up our thoughts to that fupreame governour, of whose Empire all that is true, which by the Poet was 20 faid of Inpiter.

> Quiterram incrtem, qui mare temperat Ventolum, er vrbes, regnagae triflia Dinolane, mortalefane turmas. Imperio regit vnus equo.

Who rules the duller earth, the wind-fwolne streames. The civill Cities, and th'infernall realmes, Who th' hoft of heaven and the mortall band, Alone doth gouerne by his iust commmaund.

Then shall we finde the quite contrarie. In him there is no vncertaintie nor change; he forefeeth all things, and all things disposeth to his owne honour; Hee neither deceineth nor can be deceined, but continuing one and the fame for ever, doth constantly gouerne all creatures by that law, which hee hath prescribed and will neuer alter. The vanities of men beguile their vaine contriners, and the profperitie of the wicked, is the way leading to their destruction : yea, this broad and headlong paffage to hell, is not fo delightfull as it feemeth at the first entrance, but hath growing in it, belides the poilons which infect the foule, many cruell thornes 40 deepely wounding the bodic, all which, if any few escape, they have onely this mi-

53 Wherfore it being the end and scope of al Historie, to teach by example of times past, such wisdome as may guide our delires and actions, wee should not meruaile though the Chronicles of the Kings of Inda and Ifrael, being written by men inspired with the spirit of God, instruct vs cheifly, in that which is most requisite for vs to know, as the meanes to attaine vnto true relicitie, both here, and hereafter, propounding pounding examples which illustrate this infallible rule, The feare of the Lord is the beginning of Wildome. Had the expedition of Xerxes ( as it was foretold by Daniel) beene written by some Prophet after the captinitie : wee may well beleene that the counfaile of God therein, and the execution of his righteous will, should have occupied either the whole, or the principall roome in that narration. Yet had not the purpose of Darius, the desire of his wife, and the businesse at Sardes, with other occurrents, beene the leffe true, though they might have beene omitted, as the leffe materiall : but these things it had beene lawfull for any man to gather out of prophane Histories, or out of circumstances otherwise appearing, wherein he should not have done injurie to the facred writings, as long as hee had forborne to derogate 10 from the first causes, by ascribing to the second more than was due.

Such, or litle different, is the bufineffe that I have now in hand; wherin I cannot be-Iccue that any man of judgement will taxe mee as either fabulous or prefumptuous. For he doth not faine, that rehearfeth probabilities as bare coniectures; neither doth he deprace the text, that feeketh to illustrate and make good in humane reafon those things, which authoritie alone, without further circumstance, ought to haue confirmed in every mans beliefe. And this may suffice in defence of the libertie, which I have yield in conjectures, and may hereafter yie when occasion shall require, as neither vnlawfull, nor misbefeeming an Historian.

The conspiracie against ATHALIA.

HEN Athalia had now fixe yeeres and longer worne the Crowne of Inda, and had found neither any forraine enemic, nor domesticall aduerfarie to disturbe her possession, suddainly the period of her glorie, and reward of her wickednesse meeting togither, tooke her away without any warning, by a violent and shamefull death. For the growth of 20

the young Prince began to be such, as permitted him no longer to bee concealed, and it had beene very vnfitting that his education should bee simple, to make him seeme the childe of some poore man (as for his safetie it was requisite, ) when his capacitie required to have beene indued with the stomach and qualities meete for a King. All this Iehoiada the Priest considered, and with all the great increase of impietie, which taking deepe roote in the Court, was likely to spreade it selfe ouer all the Countrie, if care were not vsed to weede it vp very speedily. Wherefore hee affociated vnto himselfe fine of the Captaines, in whose fidelitie he had best affurance, and having taken an oath of them, and shewed them the Kings sonne, hee made a Couchant with them, to advance him to the Kingdome. These drew in others of 40 the principall men, to countenance the action, procuring at the first onely, that they should repaire to Ierusalem, where they were further acquainted with the whole matter. There needed not many perswasions to win them to the businesse: the pro mise of the Lord vnto the house of David was enough to assure them, that the action was both lawful and likelie to fucceed as they defired.

But in compassing their intent some difficulties appeared. For it was not to bee hoped, that with open force they should bring their purpose to good iffue; neither were the Captaines, and other affociates of Jehoiada able by close working, to draw together fo many trustic and serviceable hands as would suffice to manage the businesse. To helpe in this case, the Priest gaue order to such of the Leuites, as had fini- 50 fled their courses in waiting on the Dittine service at the Temple, and were now relieued by others that succeeded in their turnes, that they should not depart vntill they knew his further pleafure. So by admitting the new commers, and not difcharging the old, he had, without any noise, made up such a number, as would bee able to deale with the Queenes ordinarie Guard, and that was enough, for if the tyrannesse did not preuaile against them at the first brunt, the fauour of the People was like to shew it selfe on their side, who made head against her. These Leutes were placed in the inner Court of the Temple, about the person of the King, who as yet was kept close; the followers of the Captaines, and other adherents were beflowed in the vtter Courts: As for weapons, the Temple it selfe had store enough; King Dauid had left an Armorie to the place, which was now emploied in defence of his iffue.

All things being in a readinesse, and the day come wherein this high designe was to to be put in execution; Iehoiada deliuered vnto the Captaines, Armour for them and their adherents; appointed a guard vnto the Kings person; produced him openly, and gaue vnto him the Crowne; vfing all ceremonies accustomed in fuch folemnities, with great applause of the people. Of these doings the Queene was the last that heard any word; which is not so strange as it may seeme; for insolent natures, by dealing outragiously with such as bring them ill tidings, doe commonly loose the benefit of hearing what is to bee feared, whilest yet it may bee preuented, and haue no information of danger, till their owne eyes, amazed with the suddennesse, behold it in the shape of incuitable mischiefe.

All Ierusalem was full of the rumour, and entertained it with very good liking. 20 Some carried home the newes, others ranne forth to fee, and the common joy was fo great, that without apprehension of perill, vnder the windowes of the Court; were the people running and praifing the King. Athalia hearing and beholding the a.chron. 23, 126 extraordinarie concourse, and noise, of folkes in the streets, making towards the Temple, with much vnvfuall paffion in their lookes, did prefently conceine, that somewhat worthie of her care was happened; though what it might bee shee did not apprehend. How soeuer it were, shee meant to vie her owne wisedome in looking into the matter, and ordering all as the occasion might happen to require. It may bee, that shee thought it some especials solemnitie vsed in the Divine service, which caused this much adoe; and hereof the vnaccustomed number of Leuites, and 20 of other denout men, about the towne, might give some presumption.

Many things argue that thee little thought vpon her owne Tragedie; although Infephus would make it feeme otherwise. For we finde in the Text, 3 her came to the 1. Chronos; 12. people into the house of the Lord (which was neare to her Palace) and that when shee & 13. & 1. looked and faw the King stand by his pillar, as the manner was, with the Princes, or Regentions great men of the Land by him, and the Trumpetters proclaiming him, sheerent her clothes, and cried Treason, Treason. Hereby it appeares that shee was quietly going, without any miltrust or feare, to take her place, which when shee found occupied by another, then shee begun to afflict her selfe, as one cast away, and cried out in vaine vpon the Treason, whereby shee saw that shee must perish. But that shee 40 came with a guard of armed men to the Temple, (as Iosephus reporteth) and that her companie being beaten back, shee entred alone, and commanded the people to kill the yong Tyrant, I finde no where in Scripture, neither doe I hold it credible. For had shee truely knowne how things went, shee would surely have gathered her friends about her, and vsed those forces in defence of her Crowne, by which shee gatit, and hitherto had held it. Certainely if it were granted, that shee, like a new Semiramis, did march in the head of her troupe, yet it had beene meere madneffe in her, to enter the place alone, when her affiftants were kept out; but if shee perceiuing that neither her authoritie, nor their owne weapons, could preuaile to let in her guard, would neuertheleffe take vpon her to command the death of the new 50 King, calling a child of feuen yeares old a Conspirator, and bidding them to kill him, whom shee saw to be armed in his defence, may wee not thinke that shee was mad in the most extreme degree? Certaine it is that the counsaile of God would haue taken effect, in her destruction, had sheevsed the most likely meanes to disappoint it: yet wee neede not so cut her throate with any morall impossibilities. It is enough to fay, that the godly zeale of Ieloiada found more casie successe, through her indiferction, than otherwise could have beene expected; so that at his appointment flee was without more adoe carried out of the Temple and flaine, yea fo, that no bloud faue her owne was shed in that quarrell; her small traine, that she brought along with her, not daring to fland in her defence.

). VIII.

The death of ATHALIA, with a comparison of her and IEZABEL.

Oft like it is, that Abalia had many times, with great indignation, bewailed the rafhnesse of her Nephew Jehoram the Ifraelite, who did foolishly cast himselfe into the very throat of danger, gaping vpon him, only through his eager defire of quickly knowing what the matter meant; yet fice her felfe, by the like bait, was taken in the like trap, and having lived fuch a life as lezabel had done, was rewarded with a futable death. These two Queenes were in many points much alike, each of them was Daughter, Wife, and Mother to a King; each of them ruled her husband; was an Idolatresse, and a Murdreffe. The only difference appearing in their conditions, is, that lexabel is more noted as incontinent of body, Athalia as ambitious: So that each of them 20 furviuing her husband about eight yeares, did spend the time in satisfying her owne affections; the one vling tyrannie, as the exercise of her haughtie minde; the other painting her face, for the ornament of her vnchafte body. In the manner of their death little difference there was, or in those things which may seeme in this world to pertaine vnto the dead when they are gone. Each of them was taken on the suddaine by Conspirators, and each of them exclaiming vpon the Treason, received fentence from the mouth of one that had lived vnder her subjection; in execution whereof, lexabel was trampled under the feet of her enemies horses; Athalia flaine at her owne horse-gate; the death of Athalia having (though not much) the more leifure to vexe her proud heart; that of Iexabel, the more indignitie, and shame of 20 body. Touching their buriall, Iezabel was denoured by Dogges, as the Lord had threatned by the Prophet Elias; what became of Athalia wee doe not finde. Like enough it is, that shee was buried, as hausing not perfecuted and slaine the Lords Prophets, but suffered the Priests to exercise their function; yet of her buriall there is no monument; for shee was a Church-robber. The service of Baal creeked by these two Queenes, was destroied as soone as they were gone, and their Ghaplaines, the Priests of that Religion, slaine. Herein also it came to passe, alike, as touching them both when they were dead; the Kings who flue them, were afterwards afflicted, both of them by the same hand of Hazael the Syrian; in which point Athalia had the greater honour, if the Syrian ( who feemes to have been eher good friend ) pre- 40 tended her reuenge, as any part of his quarrell to Iuda. Concerning children, all belonging to Iezabel perished in few daies after her: whether Athalia left any behinde her, it is vncertaine; shee had sonnes lining after shee was Queene, of whom, or of any other, that they were flaine with her, we doe not finde.

This is a matter not vnworthie of consideration, in regard of much that may depend upon it. For if the children of Athalia had beene in Ierusalem when their Mother fell, their death would surely have followed hers as nearely, and beene regifired, as well as the death of Mattan the Pricft of Baal, That Law by which God forbad that the children should die for the fathers, could not have faved these vngracious Impes, whom the clause following would have cut off, which commands, that 50 enery man shall die for his owne sinne. Seeing therefore that they had beene professors & advancers of that vile and Idolatrous worship of Baal, yea had robbed the Temple of the Lord, and enriched the house of Bad with the spoile of it; likely it is that they should not have escaped with life, if Ieboiada the Priest could have gotCHAP.22. ten them into his hands. As there was lawfull cause enough requiring their death, fo the securitie of the King and his friends, that is, of all the Land, craued as much, and that very carneltly. For these had beene esteemed as heires of their mothers Crowne, and being reckoned as her affiftants in that particular bufineffe of robbing the Temple, may be thought to have carried a great sway in other matters, as Princes and fellowes with their Mother in the Kingdome. Therefore it is evident, that either they were now dead, or (perhaps following Hazael in his warres against Jelm) absent from Ierusalem; whereby Ielioiada might with the more confidence, aduenture to take Armes against their Mother, that was desolate.

Y the death of Ashalia, the whole Countrie of Iuda was filled with great joy and quietneffe, wherein 10as a child of feuen yeares old or there-about, began his Raigne, which continued almost fortie yeares. During his minoritie, Lee lined under the protection of that Hono rable man leholada the Priest, who did as faithfully gourne the Kingdome, as hee had before carefully preserved the Kings life, and restored him vnto the Throne of his auncestors. When hee came to mans estate, he tooke by appointment of te-holada two wines, and begat fonnes and daughters, repairing the family of David which was almost worncout. The first Act that hee tooke in hand, when he began to rule without a Protector, was the reparation of 40 the Temple. It was a needfull pecce of worke, in regard of the decay wherein that Holy place was fallen, through the wickednesse of vigodly Tyrants; and requisite it was that he should vphold the Femple, whome the Temple had vpheld. This businesse he followed with so carnest a zeale, that not onely the Leuites were more flacke then he, but even Iehoiada was faine to be quickned by his admonition. Money was gathered for the charges of the worke, partly out of the taxe imposed by Moles, partly out of the liberalitie of the people: who gaue fo freely, that the Tem-2, Chim, 24, 114. ple, befides all reparations, was enriched with veffels of Gold and Siluer, and with all other Vtenfiles. The facrifices likewife were offered, as vnder godly Kingsthey had beene, and the seruice of God was magnificently celebrated.

The death of IEHOIADA, and Apollasie of IOAs.

33 Vt this endured no longer than the life of iehoiada the Priest: who hauing lived an hundred and thirtie yeares, died before his Countrie could have spared him. He was buried among the Kings of Juda, as he well deserved, having preserved the race of them, and restored the true Religion, which the late Princes of that house, by attempting to eradicate, failed but a little, of rooting vp themselues, and all their iffue. Yet his honourable Funerall feemes to have been given to him, at the motion of the people; it being faid, They buried him in the Citie of DAVID. As for the King himfelfe, who did owe to him no leffe than his Crowne and life, he is not likely to have been Author of it, seeing that he was as easily comforted after his death, as if hee had thereby beene discharged of some heavie debt.

For after the death of Iehoiada, when the Princes of Inda beganne to flatter their King, he soone forgate, not onely the benefites, received by this worthic man his old Councellour, but also the good precepts which he had received from him, yea and God himselfe, the author of all goodnesse. These Princes drew him to the worship of Idols, wherewith Jehoram and Athalia had so infected the Countrie, in 20 fifteene or sixteene yeares; that thirtie yeares, or there-about, of the Raigne of Ieas, wherein the true Religion was exercised, were not able to cleare it from that mischiefe. The King himfelfe, when once hee was entred into these courses, ranne on head-long, as one that thought it a token of his libertie, to despise the service of God: and a manifest proofe of his being now King indeede, that hee regarded no longer the fowre admonitions of deuout Priefts. Hereby it appeares, that his former zeale was onely counterfaited, wherein like an after vpon the ftage, he had ftriuento expresse much more liuely affection, than they could shew, that were indeed

Yt God, from whome he was broken loofe, gaue him ouer into the hands of men, that would not callly be shaken off. Hazael King of Aram, having taken Gath, a Towne of the Philiftims, addressed himselfe towards Jerusalem, whither the little distance of way, and great hope of a rich bootie, did inuite him. He had an Armie heartned by many victories, to hope for more, and for ground of the warre (if his ambition cared for 40 pretences) it was enough, that the Kings of Inda had affifted the Ifraelites, in their enterprifes vpon Aram, at Ramoth Gilead . Yet I thinke he did not want some further infligation. For if the Kingdome of Juda had molefled the Aramites, in the time of his predeceffour, this was throughly recompensed, by forbearing to succour Ifrael, and leaving the ten Tribes in their extreame miserie, to the furie of Hazael himselfe. Neither is it likely, that Hazael should have gone about to awake a sleeping Dogge, and flirre vp against himselfe a powerfull enemie, before hee had affured the conquest of Ifrael, that lay betweene Ierufalem and his owne Kingdome, if some opportunitie had not promifed fuch easie and good fuccesse, as might rather advance, than any way diffurbe, his future proceedings against the ten Tribes. Wherefore I 50 hold it probable, that the fonnes of Atbalia, mentioned before, were with him in this action, promiting (as men expelled their Countries viually doe) to draw many partakers of their owne to his fide; and not to remaine, as loas did, a neutrall in the warre betweene him and Ifrael, but to joyne all their forces with his, as they had cause, for the rooting out of Ieiu his posteritie, who, like a bloudie Traitor, had veterly destroyed all the kindred of the Queenes, their mother, even the whole house of Ahab, to which he was a subject. If this were so, Hazzarl had the more apparant reason to inuade the Kingdome of Inda. Howsoeuer it were, we find it plainely, that low was afraid of him, and therefore tooke all the hallowed things, and all the Golde . Elegions. that was found in the treasures of the house of the Lord, or in his owne house, with which present hee redeemed his peace: the Syrian (questionlesse) thinking it a better bargaine, to get so much readily paide into his hand for nothing, than to hazard the affurance of this, for the pollibilitie of not much more. So Hazael departed with a to rich bootie of vnhappie treasure, which, belonging to the lining God, remained a small while in the possession of this mightie, yet corruptible man, but font him quickly to the grave. For in the thirtie leventh of Io.s., which was the lifteenth of Ichoahaz he made this purchase; but in the same or the very next yeare he died, leauing all that he had vnto his Sonne Benhadad, with whom these treasures prospered none otherwise, than ill-gotten goods are wont.

This enterprise of Hazaelis, by some, consounded with that warre of the Aramites upon Inda, mentioned in the fecond Booke of Chrondes. But the reasons alleaged by them that hold the contrarie opinion, doe forcibly proone, that it was not all one warre. For the former was compounded without bloudfred or fight; 20 in the later, to as tried the fortune of a battaile, wherein being put to the worst, hee loft all his Princes, and hardly escaped with life: In the one, Hazael himselfe was prefent; in the other, he was not named: but contrariwife, the King of Aran then reigning (who may feeme to have then beene the Sonne of Hazael) is faid to have beene at Damafeus. The first Armie came to conquer, and was so great that it terrified the King of Inda; The second was a fmall companie of men, which did animate 1011 (in 2.611011, 24,25) vaine, for God was against him) to deale with them, as having a very great Armie.

Now concerning the time of this former inuation, I cannot perceine that God forfooke him, till be had first forfaken God. There are indeede fome, very learned, who thinke that this expedition of Hazael was in the time of Ielioiada the Prieft, be-30 cause that storie is joyned vnto the resauration of the Temple. This had beene probable, if the death of Icholada had beene afterwards mentioned in that place of the fecond Booke of Kags, or if the Apoltalie of Ions, or any other matter implying fo much, had followed in the relation. For it is not indeed to be doubted, that the Lord of all may dispose of all things, according to his owne will and pleasure, neither was he more valuation the affluctions of Isb that righteous man, or the death of Influs that godly King, than in the plagues which he laid vpon Pharaoh, or his judg-19/10 that gody temg, four in the pagues which he had open romann, or instrug-ments upon the houle of Mob. But it appears plainely, that the rich furniture of the Temple, and the magnificent fertice of God therewithall, which are joyned together, were vied in the house of the Lord continually, all the dayes of TEH O I AD A, Coone 2. Chrom. 1416. 40 after whose death, if not immediatly vpon it, that is (as some very learnedly colless) in the fix, or thirtie f. nenth yeare of this Io.w his Raigne, the King failing away from the God of his Father, became a foule Idolater.

And indeede we commonly observe, that the crosses which it hath pleased God fometimes to lay upon his feruants, without any cause notorious in the eyes of non-terminated by your market many waters and the many case many the men, have always tended onto the bettering of their good. In which respect, even the sufferings of the blessed Martyrs (the death of his Samts being precious in the light of PfA.1545, the Lord) are to their great aduantage. But with cuill and rebellious men, God keepeth a more euen, and more ftrict account; permitting vfually their faultes to get the flart of their punishment, and either delaying his vengeance (as with the Ama-50 rites) till their wickednesse be full; or not working their amendment by his correction, but suffering them to runne on in their wicked courses, to their greater miserie, So hath he dealt with many; and fo it appeares that he dealt with Loas. For this vuhappie man did not onely continue an obstinate Idolater, but grew so forgetfull of God and all goodnesse, as if he had strough to exceede the wickednesse of all that went before him, and to leave fuch a vilainous patterne vnto others, as few or none of the most barbarous Tyrants should indure to imitate.

up at length by the Spirit of God to admonish them of their wicked- 10 neffe, and make them understand the punishment due unto it, wherof they flood in danger. This Zacharia was a man so honourable, and sonne to a man so exceeding beloued in his life time, and reverenced, that if 10,15 had reputed him (as Ahab did Elias) his open enemie, yet ought he in common honeftie, to have cloaked his ill affection, and have vied at least some part of the refpect that was due to fuch a person : On the other side, the singular affection which he and his father had borne vnto the King, and the vnrecounteable benefits, which they had done vnto him, from his first infancie, were such, as should have placed Zacharia in the most heartic and affured love of Iow, yea though he had beene otherwife a man of very fmall marke, and not very good condition. The truth is, that 20 the message of a Prophet sent from God, should bee heard with reuerence, how fimple focuer he appeares that brings it. But this king low, having alreadie fcorned the admonitions and protestations of such Prophets as first were sent, did now deale with Zacharia, like as the wicked hufbandman in that parable of our Sauiour dealt with the heire of the Vineyard; who faid, this is the heire, come let vs kill him, that the Inheritance may be ours. By killing Zacharia he thought to become an absolute Commaunder, supposing belike that he was no free Prince, as long as any one durst tell him the plaine truth, how great focuer that mans deferuing were, that did fo, yea though Gods commaundement required it. So they conspired against this Holy Prophet, and floned him to death at the Kings appointment; but whether by any 30 forme of open law, as was practifed upon Naboth; or whether furprifing him by aany close treacherie, I doe neither reade nor can conjecture. The dignitie of his person, considered together with their treacherous conspiracie, makes it probable, that they durst not call him into publique judgement; though the manner of his death, being fuch as was commonly, by order of Law, inflicted vpon malefactours, may argue the contrarie. Most likely it is, that the Kings commaundement, by which he fuffered, tooke place in flead of Law; which exercise of meere power (as hath beene alreadie noted) was nothing strange among the Kings of Juda.

How I o a s was flamefully beaten by the Aramites, and of his death.

His odious murder, committed by an vnthankfull fnake vpon the man in whose bosome he had beene fostered, as of it selfe alone it sufficed to make the wretched Tyrant hatefull to men of his owne time, and his memorie detefted in all ages; fo had it the well-deferred curfe of the bleffed Martyr, to accompanie it vato the throne of God, and to call for vengeance from thence, which fell downe fwiftly, and heavily vpon the head of that vngratefull monfter. It was the last yeare of his raigne; the end of his time comming then upon him, when he thought himselfe beginning to liue how he lifted, without controulement. When that yeare was expired, the Aramites came into the Countrie, rather as may feeme to get pillage, than to performe any great a-

Etion; for they came with a small companie of men: but God had intended to doe more 2, chron. 24. 26 by them, than they themselves did hope for.

That Ioss naturally was a coward, his bloudie malice against his best friend, is, in my judgement proofe fufficient: though otherwise his base composition with Hazael, when hee might haue leauied (as his sonne after him did muster) three hundered thousand chosen men for the warre, doth well enough shew his temper. Yet now he would needes be valiant and make his people know, how from of disposition their King was, when he might have his owne will. But his timorous heart was not well cloaked. For to encounter with a few bands of ropers, he tooke a verie

10 great Armie; fo that wife-men might well perceive, that he knew what he did, making thew as if he would fight for his Countrie, and expose his person to danger of warre, when as indeed all was meere oftentation, and no perill to be feared; he going forth fo strongly appointed, against fo weake enemies. Thus might wife men thinke, and laugh at him in fecret; confidering what adoe he made about that, which in all apparent reason was (as they say) a thing of nothing. But God, before whom the wisedome of this world is foolishnesse, did laugh, not onely at this vaince lorious King, but at them that thought their King secure, by reason of the multitude that he drew along with him.

When the Aramites and King Io.15 met, whether it were by some folly of the 20 leaders, or by fome amazement happening among the Souldiers, or by whatfoeuer meanes it pleased God to worke, so it was, that that great Armie of Inda received a notable ouer-throw, and all the Princes were destroyed; the Princes of Juda, at whose perswasion the King had become a rebell to the King of Kings. As for Ions himselfe (as Abulensis and others expound the Storie) hee was forely beaten and hurt by them, being, (as they thinke) taken and shamefully tormented to wrine our of him an excessive ransome.

And furely all circumstances doe geatly strengthen this conjecture. For the text (in the old translation) faith, they exercised upon Ious ignominious judgments; and that departing from him, they dismissed him in great languor. All which are us. 30 that they had him in their handes, and handledhim ilfauouredly Now at that time. Jours the Son of Jehoahas raigned ouer Ifrael, and Benhadad the Son of Hazael oner the Syrians in Danafeus; the one a valiant vndertaking Prince, raifed up by God to restore the State of his miserable Countries the other inferior enery way to his father. of whose purchases he lost a great part, for want of skill to keepe it. The difference in condition found betweene these two Princes, promising no other event than fuch asafter followed, might have given to the King of Inda good cause to bee bold, and plucke up his spirits, which Hazael had beaten downe, if God had not beene against him. But his fearefull heart being likely to quake vpon any apprehenfion of danger, was able to put the Syrian King in hope, that by terrifying him with 40 fome show of warre at his doores, it were calle to make him craue any tolerable conditions of peace. The vnexpected good fucceffe hereof, alreadie related, and the (perhaps as inexpected) ill successe, which the Aramites found in their following warres against the King of Israel, sheweth plainely the weaknesse of all earthly might, relifting the power of the Almightie. For by his ordinance, both the kingdome of Inda, after more than fortie yeares time of gathering firength, was vnable to driue out a small companie of enemies; and the Kingdome of Ifrael, hauing so beene troden downe by Hazael, that onely fiftie horsemen, tenne Charriots, and tenne thousand footmen were left, preuailed against his Sonne, and recouered all from the victorious Acamites. But examples hereof are eneric where 50 found, and therefore I will not inlift upon this; though indeed we should not, if we be Godschildren, thinke it more tedious to heare long and frequent reports of our Heauenly fathers honour, than of the noble acts performed by our fore fathers

When the Aramites had what they lifted, and faw that they were not able, being to few, to take any poffession of the Countrie, they departed out of Indaloaden with spoyle, which they sent to Pamafous, themselves belike falling vpon theten Tribes, where it is to bee thought that they fped not halfe fo wel. The King of Inda being in ill cafe, was killed on his bed when he came home, by the fonnes of an Ammoniteffe, and of a Stoabiseffe, whom fome (because onely their Mothers names being ftrangers, are expressed) thanke to have beene bondmen. Whether it were contempt of his fortune, or feare, east (as T yrants vse) hee should revenge his difafler your them, imputing it to their fault, or what focuer elfe it were that animated 2, floren, 24 25, them to murder their King; the Scripture tells vs plainly, that, for the blond of the children of LEIT O I AD A, this befell him. And the fame appeares to have beene 10 yfed as the pretence of their confpiracie, in excuse of the fact when it was done. For Amazia, the fonne and fucceffor of Day, durft not punish them, till his Kingdome was established; but contrariwise, his bodie was judged unworthic of buriallin the Sepulchers of the Kings: whereby it appeares, that the death of Zecharia cauled the treason, wrought against the King, to find more approbation, than was requisite, among the people, though afterwardes it was recompenfed by his Sonne, vpon the Traytours, with wel-deferred death.

In this time of Io.s, was likewife the Raigne of Pigmalion in Tyre, and the foundation of Carthage by Dides the building of which Citie is, by divers Authors, placed in divers ages, fome reporting it to be feventic yeares yonger than Rome, others about four chundred yeares elder, few or none of them giving any reason of their affertions, but leaving vs vncertaine whom to follow: Injephus, who had read the Annales of Tyre, counting one hundred fortie and three yeares and eight Moneths from the building of Salomons Temple, in the twelfth yeare of Hyram King of Tyre, to the founding of Carthige by Dielo, in the feuenth of Pigmalion. This hundred fortic and foure yeares current, after the building of Silomons Temple, being the elementh years of Joss, was a hundred fortis and three years before the birth of 50 Rome and after the destruction of Troy, two hundred eightie and nine: a time so long after the death of Anens, that we might truely conclude all to bee fabulous which rigil hath written of Dido, as Aufonius noteth, who doth honour her Statua with this Epigramme.

From the time of Dido vnto the first Punicke warre, that Carthage grew and flourished in wealth and conquest, we find in many histories; but in particular wee find little of the Carthaginian affaires before that warre, excepting those few things that are recorded of their attempts upon the sile of Stale. Friep Coat. App. Eb.s.

The beginning of AMAZIA his reigne. Of IOAS King of Ifrael, and ELISIIA the Prophet.

MAZIAS, the fonne of loafb, being twentie five yeares old when his father died, tooke possession of the Kingdome or Inda, wherein he laboured fo to demeane himfelfe, as his new beginning raisne might be least offentiue. The Law of Moles he professed to obserue; which howfocuer it had been fecretly despited fine the time of Ichgram by 10

many great persons of the Land, yet had it by prouision of good Princes, yea and of bad ones (in their best times) imitating the good, but especially by the care of holy Prieftes, taken fuch deepe roote in the peoples hearts, that no King might hope to be very plaufible, who did not conforme himfelfe vnto it. And at that prefent time, the flaughter, which the Aramites had made of all the Princes, who had withdrawne the late King from the service of God, being seconded by the death of the King himselfe, cuen whilest that execrable murther, committed by the King vpon Zecharia, was yet fresh in memorie, did serue as a notable example of Gods in tice against idolatours, both to animate the better fort of the people in holding the Religion of their fathers, and to discourage Amazia from following the way, which led 20 to fuch an cuill end. He therefore, having learned of his father the art of diffirmulation, did not only forbeare to punish the Traytours that had flaine King to,ts, but gaue way to the time, and fuffered the dead bodie to be interred, as that of lehoram formerly had beene, in the Citie of Danid, yet not among the Sepulchers of the Kings of Iuda. Neuertheleffe after this, when (belike) the novfe of the people hauing wearied it selfe into silence, it was found that the Conspiratours (howsoeuer their deed done was applauded as the handie worke of GOD) had neither any mightic partakers in their fact, nor firong maintainers of their persons, but rested fecure, as having done well, feing it was not ill taken; the King, who perceived his gouernment well established, called them into question, at such a time, as the 30 heate of mens affections, being not well allaied, it was easie to diffinguish betweene their treasons and Gods judgment, which, by their treasons, had taken plausible effect, So they were put to death without any tumult, and their children (as the Law didrequire) were suffered to line; which could not but give contentment to the people, seeing that their King did the office of a just Prince, rather than of a reuenging sonne. This being done, and his owne life the better secured, by such exemplarie justice, against the like attempts; Amazia carried himselfe outwardly as a Prince well affected to Religon, and so continued in rest, about twelve or thirteene

As Amszia gathered strength in Inda by the commoditie of a long peace, so Ioas 40 the Israelite grew as fast in power, by following the warre hotly against the dramites. He was a valiant and fortunate Prince, yet an Idolater, as his predeceffours had beene, worshipping the Calues of Ieroboans. For this sinne had God so plagued the house of Icha, that the tenne Tribes wanted little of being vttterly consumed. by Hazael and Benhadad, in the time of Iehu and his fone Iehoahaz. But as Gods benefits to Iehu fufficed not to withdraw him from this politique idolatric; so were the miseries, rewarding that impietie, vnable to reclaime Iehoahaz from the same impiouscourfe: yet the mercie of God beholding the trouble of Ifrael, condescended vnto the prayers of this vngodly Prince, euen then when hee and his miferable subjects, were obstinate in following their owne abhominable waies. Therefore in temporall matters, the ten tribes recourred apace, but the fauour of God, which had been infinitely more worth, I do not find, nor beleeue, that they fought; that they had it not, I finde in the wordes of the Prophet, faying plainly to Amazia, the Lord a.chron.25.7. is not with Ifrael neither with all the house of EPHRAIM.

Whether it were fo, that the great Prophet Elisha, who lived in those times, did foretell the prosperitie of the I/raclites under the Raigne of Ioas; or whether ichoshaz wearied and broken with long aductifitie, thought it the wiseft way, to difcharge himselfe in part of the heatie cares attending those vnhappie Syrian warres, by laying the burthen vpon his hopeful fonne; we find that in the thirtie feuenth yeare 1. King 13, 10, of IUAS, King of Inda, IOAS the sonne of IEHOAHAZ began to raigne over Israel in Samaria, which was in the fifteenth of his fathers raigne, and some two or three veares before his death.

It appeares that this yong Prince, even from the beginning of his Rule, did fo 10 well hulband that poore stocke which he received from his Father, of tenne Charriots, fiftie horsemen, and ten thousand foot, that he might seeme likely to proue a thriuer. Among other circumstances, the wordes which he spake to Elistathe Prophet, argue no leffe. For 10,55 visiting the Prophet, who lay sicke, spake vnto him thus, o my father, my father, the Charriot of Ifrael, and the horsemen of the same, by 1. Kings 13.1 A. which manner of speech hee did acknowledge, that the prayers of this holy man had flood his Kingdome in more fleede, than all the horses and Charriots could

This Prophet who succeeded vnto Elias, about the first yeare of Joram the sonne of Ahab King of Ifrael, died (as some haue probably collected) about the third or 20 fourth yearc of this 1000, the Nephew of Iehn. To shew how the Spirit of Elia was doubled, or did rest vpon him; it exceedeth my facultie. This is recorded of him, that he did not onely raife a dead child vnto life, as Elias had done, but when hee himselfe was dead, it pleased God that his dead bones should restore life vnto a carcasse, which touched them in the graue. In fine hee bestowed, as a legacie, three victories vpon King Ioas, who thereby did fet Ifrael in a faire way of recovering all that the Aramites had vsurped, and weakning the Kings of Damajeo in such fort, that they were neuer after terrible to Samaria.

Of AMAZIA his warreagainst Edom; His Apostasie; and overthrow by Ioas.

He happie fuccesse which Ions had found in his warre against the Aramites, was fuch as might kindle in Amazia a delire of vndertaking fome expedition, wherein himfelfe might purchase the like honour. His Kingdom could furnish three hundred thousand serviceable men His Kingdom could running three further and the for the payment of the for the wars, and his treasures were sufficient for the payment of the second sufficient for the payment of the second sufficient for the second sufficient and the hire of many more. Cause of warre he had very just against the Edomites, 40 who having rebelled in the time of his grandfather Iehoram, had about fiftie yeares beene vnreclaimed, partly by meanes of the troubles happening in India, partly through the floth and timorousnesse of his father Ioas. Yet, for asmuch as the men of Iuda had in many yeares beene without all exercise of warre (excepting that vnhappie fight wherein they were beaten by a few bands of the Aramites he held it a point of wisedome to increase his forces, with Souldiers waged out of t-(rael, whence hee hired for an hundred talents of filuer, an hundred thousand valiant 2. Ciron. 1. 5. men, as the Scripture telleth vs, though Insephus diminish the number, saying that theyerse, they were but twentie thousand.

This great Armie, which with so much cost Amazia had hired out of Israel, he 50 was faine to dismisse, before he had imployed it, being threatned by a Prophet with ill successe, if hee strengthned himselse with the helpe of those men, whom God (though in mercy he gaue them victoric against the cruell Aramites) did not loue, because they were idolatours. The Ifraelites therefore departed ingreat anger, taking in ill part this dismission, as an high disgrace; which to reuenge, they fell vpon a peece of Indain their returne, and thewed their malice in the flaughter of three thousand men; and some spoile, which they carried away. But Amazia with his owne forces, knowing that God would be alliftant to their journey, entered couragiously into the Edomites Countrie; over whome obtaining victorie, he flew tenne thousand, and tooke other tenne thousand prisoners, all which hee threw from an bigh rocke; holding them, it feemes, rather as Traytors, than as inft enemies. This victorie did not seeme to reduce Edem under the subjection of the crowne of Inda, which might be the cause of that severitie, which was vsed to the prisoners; the Edomites that had escaped, refusing to buy the lives of their friends and kinsmen at so deare a rate, as the loffe of their owne libertie. Some townes in mount Seir, Amazia 10 tooke as appeares by his carrying away the jdols thence; but it is like they were the places most indefencible, in that he left no garrisons there, whereby he might another yeare the better have purfued the conquest of the whole Countrie. Howsoener it were, he got both honor by the journie, & gaines enough, had he not loft himfelfe.

Among other spoiles of the Edomites, were carried away their Gods, which being vanquilhed and taken prisoners, did deserue well to be led in triumph. But they contrariwife, I know not by what itrange witchcraft, fo beforted this vnworthie 2, Chron. 25,14. King Amazia, that hee fet them up to bee his Gods, and worthipped them, and burned incenie vnto them.

For this when he was rebuked by a Prophet fent from God, hee gaue a churlish 20 and threatning answere; asking the Prophet, who made him a Counseller, and bidding him hold his peace for fearc of the worst. It either the costly stuffe, whereof these jdols were made, or the curious workemanship and beautie, with which they were adorned by Artificers, had rauished the Kings fancie, me thinkes, hee should haue rather turned them to matter of profit, or kept them as houshold ornaments and things of pleafure, than thereby have fuffered himfelfe to be blinded, with fuch varcasonable denotion towards them. If the superstitions account wherein the Edomites had held them, were able to worke much vpon his imagination; much more should the bad service which they had done to their old Clients, have moved him thereupon to laugh, both at the Edomites, and them. Wherefore it seemes to me, 30 that the same affections caried him from God, vnto the service of jdols, which afterwards moved him to talke so roughly to the Prophet reprehending him. Hee had aireadic obeyed the warning of God by a Prophet, and fent away fuch auxiliary forces as he had gathered out of I/rael, which done, it is faid that hee was encouraged, andled forthhis people, thinking belike, that God would now rather affift him by miracle, than let him faile of obtaining all his hearts delire. But with better reason he should have limited his defires by the will of God, whose pleasure it was, that Esau, having broken the yoke of Iacob from his necke, accordingly as Isaac had foretolde, should no more become his servant. If therefore Amazia did hope to reconquer all the Countrie of Edom, he failed of his expectation; yet fo, that he brought home 40 both profit and he nour, which might have well contented him.

But there is a foolish and a wretched pride, wher with men being transported, can ill endure to ascribe vnto God the honour of those actions, in which it hath pleased him to vse their owne industrie, courage, or forelight. Therefore it is commonly feene, that they, who entring into battaile are carefull to pray for aide from Heauen, with due acknowledgement of his power who is the giver of victorie; when the field is wonn, do vaunt of their owne exploits: one telling how he got fuch a ground of advantage; another, how he gaue checke to fuch a battallion; a third, how hee feized on the enemies Canon; energy one striuing to magnific himselse, whilest all forget God, as one that had not been epresent in the action. To ascribe to fortune the effects of another mans vertue, is, I confesse, an argument of malice. Yet this is true, that as he which findeth better successe, than he did, or in reason might expect, is deeply bound to acknowledge God the Authour of his happinesse; so hee whose meere wisedome and labour hath brought thinges to a prosperous issue, is doubly bound to show himselfe thankfull, both for the victorie, and for those vertues by which the victorie was gotten. And indeede fo farre from weakneffe is the nature of fuch thank figiuing, that it may well be called the height of magnanimities no vertue being so truly heroicall, as that by which the spirit of a man advanceth it felfe with confidence of acceptation, vnto the louc of God. In which fense it is a braue speech that Enander in Virgil, vseth to Eneas, none but a Christian being capable of the admonition.

Ande hospes contemnere opes, & te quoque dignum

With this philosophie Amazia (as appeares by his carriage) troubled not his head; he had shewed himselfe a better man of warre than any King of indistince the time of tehofaphat, and could be well contented, that his people should thinke him little inferior to David: of which honour hee faw no reason why the Prophets should rob him, who had made him loofe a hundred talents, and done him no pleafure, he having prevailed by plaine force and good conduct, without any miracle at all. That he was diftempered with fuch vaine thoughts as these (besides the witneffe of his impiette following) Infephius doth teftific; faying, That hee despifed 10f. Aut. 19.6.10

20 GoD, and that being puft vp with his good fuccesse, of which neverthelesse bee would not acknowledge God to be the Authour, hee commaunded Ious King of Ifreel to become his fubject, and to let the tenne Tribes acknowledge him their foueraigne, as they had done his Ancestors King David and King Salomon Some thinke that his quarrell to 1048 was rather grounded vpon the injurie done to him by the Ifraelites, whom he dismissed in the journie against Mount Seir. And likely it is, that the fenfe of a late wrong had more power to flirre him vp, than the remembrance of an old title, forgotten long fince, and by him felfe neglected thirteene or foureteen yeares. Neuerthelesse it might so be, that when he was thus propoked he thought it not enough to requite new wrongs, but would also call old matters into question; that so the Kings of Israel might, at the least, learne to keepe their subjects from offending Iuda, for feare of endangering their owne crownes. Had Amazia defired onely recompence for the injurie done to him, it is not improbable that hee should have had some reasonable answere from 10,15, who was not delirous to fight with him. But the answere which Io. returned, likening himselfe to a Cedar, and Amazia in respect of him to no better than athistle, showes that the challenge was made in infolent tearmes, fruft perhaps with fuch proud comparison of nobilitie, as might be made (according to that which tofephus bath written) betweene a King of Ancient race, and one of leffe nobilitie than vertue.

It is by Sophocles reported of Aux, that when, going to the warre of Troy, his fa- sophocles in Ather did bid him to be valiant, and get victoric by Gods affiftance, he made answere, ince ton. that by Gods affiftance, a coward could get victorie, but he would get it alone without fuch helpe: after which proud speech; though he did manie valiant actes hee had finall thankes, and finally killing himfelfe in a madnetie, whereinto hee fell vaon difgrace received, was hardly allowed the honour of buriall. That Amazia did vtter fuch wordes. I doe not find : but having once entertained the thoughts, which are parents of fuch wordes, he was rewarded with fuccesse according. The verie first counsaile wherein this warre was concluded, serves to proue that hee was a wife Prince indeed at Ierufalem, among his Paralites; but a foole when hee had to deale with his equals abroade. For it was not all one, to fight with the Edemics, a to weake people, trufting more in the fite of their Countrie than the valour of their Souldiers; and to encounter with Ious, who from fo poore beginnings had raifed himselfe to such strength, that he was able to lend his friend a hundred thousand men, and had all his Nation exercised, and trained vp, in a long victorious warre. But as Amazia discouered much want of judgement, in undertaking such a match; to in projecuting the bulinefic, when it was fet on foote, hee behaued himfelfe as a man of little experience, who having once onely tried his fortune, and found it to begood, thought that in warre there was nothing elfe to doe, than fend a defiance, fight, and winne. Jeas on the contrarie fide, having beene accustomed to deale with a irronger enemie than the King of Iuda, vied that celeritie, which peraduenture had often food him in good head against the Aramite. Hee did not lit waiting till the enemics brake in and waited his Countrie, but prefented himselfe with an Armic in Inda, readie to bid buttaile to Amazia, and faue him the labour of a long journic. I his could not but greatly discourage those of Inda; who (besides the feliues to get as much, and at as eafic a rate, as in the journic of Edom; were fo farre disappointed of their expectation, that well they might suspect all new assurance of good lucke, when the olde had thus beguiled them. All this notwithstanding, their King that had flomacke enough to challenge the patrimonie of Salomon, thought like another Danie, to winne it by the fword. The iffue of which foolehardineffe might cafily be forefeene in humane reason; comparing together, either the two Kings, or the qualitie of their Armies, or the first and ominous beginning of the warre. But meere humane wisedome, howsocuer it might foresee much,

Ind., that without one blowegiuen, they fled all away, leaning their King to flift for himselfe, which he did foill, that his enemie had soone caught him, and made him change his glorious humour into most abiect basenesse. That the Armie which fled, fultained any other loffe than of honour, I neither find in the Scriptures nor in

In feeblus, it being likely that the foone beginning of their flight, which made it the more shamefull, made it also the more safe. But of the mischiefe that followed this ouerthrow, it was Gods will that Amazia himfelfe should sustaine the wholedisgrace. For loas carried him directly to Ierusalem, where he bad him procure that the 20

gates might be opened, to let him in and his Armie; threatning him otherwife with present death. So much amazed was the miserable catine, with these dreadfull wordes, that he durft doe none other, than perfwade the Citizens, to yeelde themselves to the mercic of the Conqueror. The Towne, which afterwardes being in weaker flate, held out two yeares, against Nebuchadnezzar, was vtterly difmayed, when the King; that should have given his life to faucit, vsed all his force of commaund and intreatic to betray it. So the gates of Ierufalem were opened to Ioas, with which honour (greater than any King of Ifrael had euer obtained) hee could not refl contented, but, the more to despight Amazia and his people, hee caused source hundred cubites of the wall to be throwne downe, and entered the Citie in his 40

Charriot through that breach, carrying the King beforehim, as in triumph. This done, he fackt the Temple, and the Kings Pallace, and fo, taking hoftages of Amazia, he difmiffed the poore creature that was glad of his life, and returned to Samaria.

could not have prognofficated all the mifchiefe that fell upon Amazia. For as foone 20 as the two Armies came in fight, God, whose helpe this wretched man had so def-impreilion of feare which an inuation beates into people, not inured to the like) ha- 10 uing denoured, in their greedie hopes, the spoile of Ifrael, fully perswading them-

A discourse of the reasons hindering Io as from uniting Iv & a to the crowne of Ifrael, when he had wonne Jerusalem, and held AMAZIA prisoner. The end of I o A s his raigne.

Ee may justly marvaile how it came to passe, that loas, being thus in possession of lerusalem, having the King in his hands, his enemies forces broken, and his owne entire, could bee so contented to depart quietly, with a little spoile, when hee might have seized vpon the whole Kingdom. The raigne of Athalia had given him cause to hope, that the iffue of David might be dispossessed of that crowne, his owne Nobilitie, being the fonne and grand-childe of Kings, together with the famous a Resthat hee had done, were enough to make the people of Inda thinke highly of him, who might also have preferred his forme of government, before that of their owne Kings , cfpecially at fuch a time, when a long fuccession of wicked Princes had smoothered the thankes, which were due to the memorie of a few good ones. The commoditie that would have enfued, vpon the vnion of all the twelve Tribes, vnder one Prince. 20 is so apparant, that I need not to insist on it. That any message from God forbad the Ifraelites (asafterwardes in the victorie which Pekathe fonne of Romelia got voon All this makes it the more difficult to refolue the question, why a Prince so well exercised, as Io.ss had beene, in recourring his owne, and winning from his enemic, should forfake the possession of Ierusalem, and wilfully neglect the possibilities, or rather cast away the full affurance of fo faire a conquest, as the Kingdome of Inda. But concerning that point, which of all others, had beene most materiall, I meane

the delire of the vanquished people to accept the Israelite for their King, it is plainely scene, that entring ierasalem in triumphant manner, loss was vnable to concoct 30 his owne prosperitie. For the opening of the gates had been enough to have let him not only into the Citie, but into the royall throne, and the peoples hearts. whom by faire intreatic (efpecially having fure meanes of compulsion) hee might haue made his owne, when they faw themselues betrayed, and basely given away by him whose they had beene before. The faire marke with this opportunitie prefented, he did not aime at, because his ambition was otherwise and more meanely builed, in levelling at the glorie of a triumphant entrie through a breach. Yet this errour might afterwards have beene corrected well enough, if entring as an enemie, and the wing what he could doe, by spending his anger upon the walles, he had within the Citie done offices of a friend, and laboured to flew good will to the in-

49 habitants. But when his pride had done, his couctoufneffe began, and fought to please it selfe, with that which is commonly most readie to the spoiler, yet should be most forborne. The treasure wherewith Sefae, Hazael, and the Philiflims, men ignorant of the true God & his religion, had quenched their greedie thirst, ought not to haue tempted the appetite of 10.15, who though an jdolatour, yet acknowledged also and worthipped the eternall God, whose Temple was at Ierusalem. Therefore when the people faw him take his way directly to that holy place, and lay his rauenous hands upon the confecrated veffels, calling the family of obed Edom (whole chil- #.6/mm, 26.15dren had bereditarie charge of the treasurie) to a strict account, as if they had beene Officers of his owne Exchequer, they confidered him rather as an execuable Churchi-

70 robber, than as a Noble Prince, an Ifraelite and their brother, though of another Tribe. Thus following that courfe, which the most vertuous King of our age (taxing it with the same phrase) hath wifely avoided; by stealing a few apples, hee loft the inheritance of the whole Orchard. The people detested him, and after the respite of a few dayes, might by comparing themselves one to one, perceive his

Soulaiers to be no better than men of their owne mould, and inferiour in number to the inhabitants of fo great a Citie. It is not fo easie to he! Loy force a mightie Towne entered by capitulation, as to enter the gates opened by viaduifed feare. For when the Citizens, not being difarmed, recourr their spirits, and begin to understand their first errous: they will thinke you cuery advantage, of place, of provisions, of multitude, yea of women armed with tileftones, and rather chuse by desperate resolution, to correct the cuils growne out of their former cowardice, than fuffer those mischeifes to poyson the bodie, which in such halfe-conquetts, are easily tasted in the mouth. A more lively example hereof cannot be defired, than the Citie of Florence, which through the weaknesse of Férer de Medices, governing therein as a Prince, was reduced into such hard termes that it opened the gates vnto the French King Charles the eight, who not plainly professing himselfe either friend or foc to the Litate, entred the Towne, with his Armie, in triumphant manner, himfelfe and his horse armed, with his lance upon his thigh. Manie insolencies were therin commixted by the French, and much argument of quarrell ministred, betweene them and the Townes men: so farre forth that the Florentines, to preserve their libertie, were driven to prepare for fight. To conclude the matter, Charles propounds intollerable conditions, demanding bage fummes of readic monic, and the absolute Signoric of the State, as conquered by him, who entred the Citie in Armes. But Peter Catoni, a principall Citizen, catching these Articles from the Kings Secretarie, 29 and tearing them before his face, had him found his trumpets, and they would ring their bels; which peremptorie wordes made the French bethinke themselues, and come readily to this agreement, that for fortic thousand pounds, and not halfe of that monie to be paid in hand. Charles thould not one v depart in peace, but reflore what foeuer he had of their dominion, and continue their : ffured friend. So dangerous a matterdid it feeme for that braue Armie, which in few moneths after wanne the Kingdome of Naples, to fight in the streetes, against the armed multitude of that populous Citie. It is true, that Charles had other bulinesse (and to perhaps had ions, as shall anon be showed) that called him away; but it was the apprehension of imminent dans or that made him come to reason. In such cases the firing of houses, 20 vinally drawes energy Citizen to faue his owner, leaving victoric to the Souldier; yet where the people are prepared and refolued, women can quench, as faft as the enemie having other things to looke vnto, can fet on fire. And indeed that Commaunder is more given to anger than regardfull of profit, who you the vicertaine hope of destroying a Towne, for lakes the affurance of a good composition. Diuersitie of circumstance may alter the case; it is enough to say, that it might be in Ierusalem, as we know it was in Florence.

How ftroughy focuer to a might hold himfelfe within temfolem, he could not eafify depart, from thence, with his bootic fafe, if the Armic of testa, which had been more terrified than weakend in the late encounter, flould reenforce it felfe, and girchim a checke vpon the way. Wherefore it was wifely done of him, to a ke holages for his better fecuritie, his Armic being ypon returne, and better loaden than when it came for the, for which cast for it was the more mapter to fight.

Belides these impediments, within the Citie and without, seruing to coole the ambition of Inst, and keepe it downs from assigning to the Crowneos Inda, it appeares that somewhat was newly fallen out, which had restrence to the anger of Elishathe Prophet; who when this Inst had sufficiently ground with his arrowes thrice told him that he should no oftner smittethe. Frencher evideries which Israel had against __tran, are by some, and with great probabilitie, referred vinto the lists, such and seuenth years of Inst: a stirr which time, if any sofies ensuring had ble missed that we should not stirr which time, if any sofies ensuring had ble missed that we should not should not should be such as the sum one hundred thous and men, or meete him in battaile, who was able to bring into the skeld three shundred thous and of his owne. Seeing therefore it is made plaine by the wordes of Elifas, that after three victories, to as should finde some change of fortune, and suffer folles; were must needes conclude. That the Arapite prevailed upon him this yeare, it being the last officis is aligne. That this was fig, and that the Sprans, taking advantage: of Loss his absence, gave such a blow to Island, a strick lings at his recurre was not able to remedie, but rather fell himselfe-into new mistorigues; which increated the adamatite, were may evidently preceive in that which is spoken of trackersh his spoke. For it is said, That the Lord fave the exceeding distinct afficitions of island, and that having not derived to privous the award of Island from under the sistency, he preferred them by the should of liberary to My like from e I on as "I has senough to 10 prone; that the victorious raigns of loss was concluded with a fad cataltrophe; the riches of the. Temple hattning his miseriannel death, as they had done with Sofae, athalia, and Islande, and as afterwards they wrought with Antonious Craffus, and o ther facrilegious Potentates.

Thus either through indignation conceived againft him, by the people of *terufalem*, and courage which they took to fer you him within the Walls: or through preparation of the Armie that lay abroad in the Countrie, to bid him battalle in open field, and recover by a new charge the honour which was loft at the former encounter; or through the miferies daily brought typon his owne Countrie, by the Syrissin his ablence, if not by all of theft; *tost* was driven to lay afide all thought of winning the Kingdome of *tost* and taking hoftages for his quiet paffage, made all halte homewards, where hee found a fad well-come, and being vertey for fake not his wonted profperitie, for fooke all oh his life in few moneths after, leaving his Kingdome to *tostoom* the fectood, his fortunate and valiant Sonne.

The end of AMAZIA his Raigne and Life.

Ny man is able to gheffchow Lonassia looked, when the enemie had left him. Hee that had vaunted so much of his owne great proweste and skill in armes, threatning to worke wonders, and story anew the glorious Empire of Danid, was now uncased of his Lyons hide, and appeared nothing so terrible a beat as he had beene painted. Much argument of scoffing at him hee had ministred vnto such, as held him in dislike; which at this time, doubtleffe, were very many: for the thame that falls vpon an infolent man, seldome failes of meeting with aboundance of reproach. As for Amazia (besides that the multitude are alwaies prone to lay the blame vpon their Gouernours, euen of those calamities which happened by their owne default) there 40 was no child in all Ierusalem, but knew him to be the roote of all this mischiese. He had not only challenged a good man of Warre, being himfelfe a Dastard; but when hee was beaten and taken by him, had basely pleaded for the common Enemic, to haue him let into the Citie, that with his owne eyes hee might see what spoile there was, and not make a bad bargaine by heare-fay. The father of this Amazia, was a beaftly man; yet when the Aramites tooke him and tormented him, he did not offer to buy his owne life at so deare a rate, as the Citic and Temple of Ierusalem. Had he offered; should they have made his promise good? Surely the haste which they had made in condescending to this hard match, was very vnfortunate : for by kecping out the Ifraelite ( which was casie enough ) any little while, they should some to have beene rid of him, seeing that the Aramites would have made him runne home, with greater speede than he came forth. Then also, when having truffed vp his bag-

o haue beenerid of him, seeing that the Aramites would haue made him runne home, with greater speech than he came forth. Then also, when hauing trussed via his baggage, he was readieto be gone, a litle courage would haue serued to perswade him to leaue his loade behinde; had not their good King deliuered vp Hosages, to secure his returne, as loath to destaud him of the recompence due to his paines taken.

Such exprobrations could not but vexe the heart of this vnhappie King : it had beene well for him, if they had made him acknowledge his faults vnto God, that had punished him by all this dilhonor. But we finde no mention of his amendment. Rather it appeares, that hee continued an Idolator to the very laft. For it is faid of 2. Chron. 25, 27, him, that after his turfling away from the Lord, they wrought treason against him in Ierufalem; a manifest proofe that he was not reclaimed, vnto his lines end. And certainely, they which tell a man in his advertitie of his faults paffed, hall fooner bee thought to vpbraid him with his fortune, than to feeke his reformation. Wherefore it is no maruaile, that Priests and Prophets were lesse welcome to him, than ever they had beene. On the other lide, flatterers, and fuch as were desirous to put a 10 heart into him, whereof themselves might alwaies be Masters, wanted not plausible matter to reviue him. For hee was not first, nor second, of the Kings of Iuda, that had beene ouer-come in battaile. David himselfe had abandoned the Citie, leaving it, before the Enemie was in fight, vnto Absalom his rebellious sonne. Many befides him had received loffes, wherein the Temple bare a part. If Ions might fo eafily have beene kept out; why did their Ancestors let Sefac in? As was reputed a vertuous Prince, yet with his owne hands hee emptied the Temple, and was not blamed, but held excusable by necessitie of the State. Belike these traducers would commend no actions but of dead Princes: if so, hee should rather live to punish them, than die to please them. Though wherein had he given them any cause of 20 displeasure ? It was he indeede that commanded to set open the gates to loss ; but it was the people that did it. Good scruants ought not to have obeied their Masters commandements, to his disaduantage, when they saw him not Master of his owne Person. As his captiuitie did acquite him from blame, of all things that hee did or fuffered in that condition; so was that misfortune it selfe, in true estimation, as highly to his honour, as deeply to his loffe. For had hee beene as hastic to flie, as others were; hee might haue escaped, as well as others did. But seeking to teach the base Multitude courage, by his Royall example, he was shamefully betraied by those in whom hee trusted. Vnworthie creatures that could readily obey him, when speaking another mans wordes, being prisoner, he comanded them to yeeld; having ne- 20 glected his charge, when leading them in the field, he bad them fland to it, and fight like men. The best was that they must needes acknowledge his mischance, as the occasion whereby many thousand lines were faued; the Enemie having wisely preferred the furprise of a Lyon that was Captaine, before the chase and slaughter of an Armie of stags, that followed him.

These or the like wordes comforting Amazia, were able to perswade him, that it was even so indeede. And such excuses might have served well enough to please the people, if the King had first studied how to please God. But hee that was vnwilling to ascribe vnto God the good successe foretold by a Prophet; could easily finde how to impute this late disaster, vnto fortune, and the sault of others. Now 40 concerning fortune, it seemes that he meant to keepe himselfe safe from her, by sitting still; for in fifteene yeares following (so long he out-liued his honor) we finde not that he stirred. As for his subjects, though nothing henceforth be recorded of his governement, yet wee may see by his end, that the middle time was ill spentamong them, increasing their hatred, to his owne ruine. He that suspecteth his owne worth, or other mens opinions, thinking that leffe regard is had of his person, than he belecueth to be due to his place, will commonly spend all the force of his authoritie, in purchasing the name of a seuere man. For the affected sowrenesse of a vaine fellow, doth many times refemble the gravitie of one that is wife: and the feare wherein they line, which are subject vnto oppression, carries a shew of reuerence, to 50 him that does the wrong; at least it serues to dazle the cies of vnderlings, keeping them from prying into the weaknesse of such as haue jurisdiction ouer them. Thus the time, wherein, by well vling it, men might attaine to be such as they ought, they doe viually mispend, in seeking to appeare such as they are not. This is a vaine and deceiuable courfe; procuring, instead of the respect that was hoped for, more indignation than was feared. Which is a thing of dangerous confequence; especially when an visible spirit, being ouerparted with high authoritie, is too pallionate in the execution of Juch an Office, as cannot be checked but by violence. If therefore Amaza thought by extreme rigour to hold vp his reputation, what did hee elfe than thriue to make the people thinke he hated them, when of them selues they were apt chough to beleeue, that he did not loue them? The best was that he had, by reuenging his fathers death, prouided well enough for his owne fecuritie; but who should take vengeance; (or vpon whom?) of such a murther, wherein enery one had 10 a part? Surely God himfelfe, who had not given commandement or leane vnto the people, to take his office out of his hand, in shedding the bloud of his anointed. Yet as Amaza, carelesse of God, was carried headlong by his owne affections; so his subjects, following the same illexample, without requiring what belonged vnto their duties, rofe vp against him, with such headlong surie, that being vnable to defend himselfe in Ierusaiem, he was driven to for lake the Citie, and flie to Luchis, for fafegard of his life. But so extreme was the hatred conceined against him, and so generall, that neither his absence could allaie the rage of it is the Capitall Citic, nor his presence in the Countrie abroade procure friends, to defend his life. Queltionleffe, he chose the Towne of Lachis for his refuge, as a place of all other best affe-20 cted to him; yet found he there none other fauour, than that the people did not kill him with their owne hands: for when the Conspiratours (who troubled not themselves about railing an armie for the matter) sent pursuers after him, he was abandoned to death. Lachis was the vtmost Citie of his Dominion Westward, standing somewhat without the border of Inda; so that hee might haue made an easie escape (if hee durit aduenture) into the Territorie of the Philistims, or the Kingdome of Ifrael. Therefore it may feeme that he was detained there, where certaine it is that he found no kind of fauour: for had not the people of this Towne, added their owne treason to the generall insurrection; the murtherers could not at so good leifure as they did, have carried away his bodie to Ierufalem, where they gave him 30 buriall with his fathers.

VI

Of the Interregnum, or vacancie, that was in the Kingdome of I v D A, after the death of A M A Z I A.

Thath alreadic been flowed, that the raignes of the Kings of Inda and If I ad were fometimes to be measured by compleat yeares, otherwise, by yeares current: and that the time of one King is now and then confounded with the last yeares of his fathers Raigne, or the month of his Sonnes. But we are now arritude at a moere yearting.

wherein the Crowne.of Inda laie voide cleuen whole yeares: a thing not plainly fer downe in Scriptures, nor yet remembred by IoJephus, and therefore hard to bee beleeued, were it not proued by necessarie consequence.

Twice we find it written, that A M A ZI A, King of Inda, lined after the death of I O A S Action, 51.5.

King of Ifract Influence peaces, whereupon it followes, that the death of Amazia, was $\frac{3}{4}\tilde{\t

Yet fome coniectures there are made, which tend to keepe all eucn, without acknowledging any voide time. For it is thought that in the place last of all cited, by the feuen and twentith yeare of Ieroboam, we should perhaps understand the feuen and twentith yeare of his life; or elfe (because the like wordes are no where else interpreted in the like fenfe) that Azaria was cleauen yeares under age, that is fine yeares old, when his father died, and so his sixteenth yeare might concurre with the feuen and twentith of Ieroboam; or that the text it felfe may have suffered some wrong, by mifwriting twentic feuen for feuenteene yeares, and fo, by making the feuenteenth yeare of Jeroboam to be newly begun, all may be falued. These are the coniectures of that worthic man Gerard Werester: concerning the first of which it 10 may fuffice, that the author himfelfe doth easily let it passe, as improbable; the last is followed by none that I know, neither is it fit, that vpon enerie doubt, we should call the text in question, which could not be fatisfied in all coppies, if perhaps it were in one, as for the fecond, it may be held with fome qualification, that Azaria began his raigne being fine yeares old; but then must we adde those eleanen yeares which passed in his minoritie, to the two and fiftie that followed his sixteenth yeare. which is all one, in a manner, with allowing an interregnum.

But why fhould we be 0 carefull to anoide an interregium in Inda seeing that the like necessitie bath enforced all good writers, to acknowledge the like vacancy, twice happening within few years, in the Kingdome of Ifrael? The space of time be-20 tweene Iros bosum death, and the beginning of Inda Raigne, and such another gap sound betweene the death of Irola, and the beginning of Insae, have made it cally to be admitted in Samaria, which the consideration of things as they shood in Inda, when Imacia was slaine, doth make more probable to have happened there, yea although the necessitie of computation were not so apparant.

For the publike furie, having lo farre extended it felle, as wnto the deftruction of the Kings owne perfon, was not like to be appeafed without order taken for obtaining fome redreftle of tho fe matters, which had cauded it at the first breake forth into fuch extremitie. Wee need not therefore wonder how it came to palle, that they which alteradie had throwne themselues into fuch an horible treason, should 30 afterwards dare to withhold the crowne from a Prince of that age, which being incested in all ornaments of regalitie, is neuerthelesse exposed to many injuries, proceeding from headstrong and forgetfull shietes.

As for their coniceture, who make Asmis to have beene King but one and fortie yeares, after he came out of his nonage; I dare not allow it, because it agrees too harfhly with the text. The best opinion were that, which glues who terebown elrauen yeares of raigne with his stather, before hee beganne to raigne single in the fifteenth of Amassas, sid it not fivallow up almost the whole raigne of Bost, and extending the yeares of those which raigned in I find (by making such of them compleat, as were only current) and take at the shortest the Raignes of Princesru- 40 ling in other Nations. But I will not fland to dispute surther of this: enery man may follow his owne opinion, and see mine more plainly in the Chronologicall Table, drawne for these purposes.

Q. XII.
Of Princes Contemporarie with AMAZIA, and more particularly of SARDANAFALVS.

He Princes living with Amtzia, and in the cleaven yeares that followed his death, were tous and teroboam in If seel, Cophrenes and Affo. 50 cerims in Egyp; Sylvins Alledius, and Sylvins Americans in Alba, Agamemon in Corinth, Diogeneius Pheredus, and Ariphon in Athens; in Laceksmon Theletius, in whose time the Spartons wan from the Achains, Gerantha, Ambreha, and Some other towners.

Bur

But more notable than all thele, was Allyrian Sardanapalus, who in the one and twentieth years of Amazia Increeding his Father Ornzapes or Amazia faceeding his Father Ornzapes or Amazia faceeding his Father Ornzapes or Amazia faceeding his father of the cleuen void years which forewent the Raigne of Azaria. In him ended (as moft agree) theline of Zimus, which had held that Empire one thouland two hundred and fortic years. A most luxurious and effeminate Palliard hee was, palling away his time among firumpers, whom he imitated both in apparell and behaulour.

In these voluptious courses here lined anyinhappie life, knowing himselfe to bee for vilesthat he durft not let any man haue a light of him; yet scene he was at length, to and the light of him was so odious, that it procured his ruine. For Arbeet, who governed Alecha vinder him, finding meanes to behold the person of his King, was to incensed with that beatly spectacle, of a man disguised in womans active, and friumg to counterfritan harlot, that here thought it great shame to him whether command of so two this acreature. Purposing therefore to free himselse and others from so base substitution, he was much converaged by the prediction of Belgio or Belgio a Chalkam, who told him plainly, that the Kingdome of Surchapalas should fall into his hands. Arbeets well pleased with this prophecie, did promise vito Belgio himselse the gourment of Budpin; and so concluding how to to handle the busines, one of them stirred up the Medes, and alured the Profices into the quar-

20 rell, the other perfivaded the Balyinims and Anlams to venture the Parlams into the quartaneous C. These foure Nations armed fortic thousand men against Sardanapolas, who in this danger was not wanting to himselfe, but gathering such forces as hee could, out of other Nations, encountred the rebels, as one that would by deeder refute the tales that they had told of him. Neither did his carriage in the beginning of that warre, answere to the manner of his retirednesse. For in three battailes hee carried away the better, driving Arbaes and his followers into such searces that had not Belgias promised them constantly some vnexpected succours, they would forthwith haue broken up their Campe. About the same time, an Armic out of Bastria was comming to assist the King, but Arbaese encountring it you the 30 way, perfivaded fo ftrongly by promife of libertie, that those forces joyned themfelius with his. The fodaine departure of the enemic feeming to be a flight, caused Sardanepalus to feast his Armie, triumphing before victorie. But the Rebels being strengthened with this new supply, came upon him by night, and forced his Campe, which through ouer-great securitie, was upprepared for resistance.

This ouerthrow did so weaken the Kings heart, that leaving his wives brother Salmens to keepe the field, he withdrew himselfe into the Citie of Nimus; which, till new aides that he sent for should come, hee thought easily to defend; it having beene prophecied, that Nimus should never be taken, till the Riner were enemie to the towne. Of the greatness and strength of Nimuse, enough hath beene spoken in 40 our discourse of Nims. It was so well vicknalled, that Abuses (hauing in two battails ouer throwne the Kings Armie, and slaine Salamenne) was faine to lie two whole years before it, in hope to winne it by famine; whereof yet hee saw no appearance. It seems that hee wanted Engines and skill to force those walles, which were a hundred foot high, and thick enough for three Charriots in front to passe you the rampire. But that which hee could not doe in two yeares, the Riucr of Tygris did in the third: for being high swolne with raines, it not only drowned a part of the Crite through which it ranne, but threw downer twentie surlongs of the wall, and made a faire breach for Abusesto enter.

Surdangulus, either terrified with the accomplishment of the olde Oracle, or of feeing no meanes of relistance left, shutting up himselfe into his Pallace, with his wines, Eunuches and all his treasures, aid set the house on fire, wherewith hee and they were together consumed. Strabo speakes of a monument of his, that was in straboly. Anothing Citic of Cilicia, whereon was found an inferpition, shewing that he built that Citic and Tharfus upon one day: but the addition hereto, bidding men ente and drinke, and make merrie, encouraging other, with verses well knowne, to a voluptuous life, by his owne example, teltifie that his nature was more prone to fenfualitie, than to any vertue befeeming a Prince.

There are some that faintly report otherwise of his end, saying that Arbaces, when he first found him among his Concubines, was so enraged, that sodainly hee flew him with a dagger. But the more generall confent of writers agrees with this Biod.Sic.1,2.6.7. relation of Diodorus Siculus, who citeth Ctefias a Greeke writer, that lined in the Court of Persia, where the truth might best be knowne.

Concerning the Princes which raigned in Allyria, from the time of Semiramis, vnto Sardan thalus, though I beleeue that they were fometimes (yet not, as Orollus 10 hach it, inceffantly) bufied, in offenflue or elfe defenflue armes; yet for the most part Diod. . . of them I doe better trust Diodorus Siculus, who faith that their names were ouerpassed by Ctessas, because they did nothing worthic of memorie. Whatsoeuer they did; that which Theophilus Antiochenus hath faid of them is verie true; Silence and Theophilus Anoblinion bath oppressed them.

CHAP. XXIII.

Of VzziA.

The prosperitie of V ZZIA, and of I EROBOAM the second, who raigned with him in Ifrael. Of the Anarchie that was in the tenne Tribes after the desthof IEROBOAM. Of ZACHARIA, SAL-LVM, MENAHEM and PEKAHIA.

Z z 1 A, who is alfo called Azaria the fonne of Iotham. was made King of Inda, when he was fixteene yeares old, in the feuen and twentieth yeare of Ieroboam the fonne of Ions King of I/rael. Hee served the God of his father David, and had therefore good fuccesse in in all his enterprises. Hee built Eloth, a Towne that flood neareto the Red Sca, and restored it to Inda. 40 Hee ouercame the Philishims, of whose Townes hee difmantled some, and built others in fundric partes of their Territories. Also hee got the mastric ouer some partes of Arabia, and brought the Ammonites to pay him tribute. Such were the fruites of his prosperous warres, wherein (as Io-fephus rehearseth his acts) he beganne with the Philislims, and then proceeded vnto the Arabians and Ammonites. His Armic confifted of three hundred and feuen thoufand men of warre, ouer which were appointed two thousand sixe hundered Caps.chm36.14. taines. For all this multitude the King prepared finelds, and frenes, and belmets, and other Armes requifites, following therein happily a courfe quite opposite vnto that which some of his late predecessors had held, who thought it better policie to vse the service of the Nobilitie, than of the multitude; carrying forth to warre the 2 Chron.21.9. Princes and all the Charriots.

As the victories of Vazia were farre more immportant, than the atchieuements of all that had raigned in Inda fince the time of David: fo were his riches and magnificent workes, equall, if not superior to any of theirs that had been Kings between him and Salomon. For belides that great conquefts are wont to repay the charges of warre with triple interest, hee had the skill to vse, as well as the happinesse to get. Hee turned his lands to the best vse, keeping Ploughmen and Dressers of Vines, in grounds convenient to fuch hufbandrie. In other places hee had cattell feeding, whereof he might well keepe great flore, having wonne fo much from the Anamonites and Arabians, that had aboundance of waste ground serving for pasturage. For desence of his cattell and Heardsmen, hee built Towres in the wilderneffe. He also digged many cesternes or ponds. Iosephus cals them water-courses; but in fuch driegrounds, it was enough that he found water, by digging in the most likely places. If by these Towers hee so commanded the water, that none could without his confent, relecue themselves therewith; questionlesse he tooke the one-

ly course, by which hee might securely hold the Lordship over all the wildernesse; it being bardly paffable, by reason of the extreme drougth, when the few springs therein found, are left free to the vse of traugilers.

Befides all this coft, and the building both of Eloth by the Red Sea, and of fundrie T ownes among the Philiftims: hee repaired the wall of Ierufalem, which Ions had broken downe, and fortified it with Towers, whereof fome were an hundred and fiftie Cubites high.

The State of Ifrael did neuer fo flourish, as at this time, fince the division of the twelve Tribes into two Kingdomes. For as Vzzia prevailed in the South, fo (if not more) Jeroboam the fonne of Joas, King of the tenne Tribes, enlarged his border on the North; where obtaining many victories, against the Syrims, he wanne the Royall Citie of Damafew, and he wanne Hamath, with all the Countrie thereabout from the entring of Hamath, unto the Sea of the Wilderneffe, that is ( as the most 2. Reg. 14.25.29 expoundit) vnto the vast deserts of Arabia, the end whereof was vndiscouered. So the bounds of Israel in those parts, were in the time of this Ieroboam, the same (or not much narrower) which they had beene in the raigne of Danid.

But it was not for the pietie of Ieroboam, that hee thriued fo well; for hee was an Idolater: it was only the compassion which the Lord had on Ifrael, seeing the exceeding bitter affliction, whereinto the Aramites had brought his people, which caused him to alter the successe of warre, and to throw the victorious Aramites, vnder the feet of those, whom they had so cruelly oppressed. The line of Jehu, to which God had promifed the Kingdome of Ifrael unto the fourth generation, was a Reg. 10,130 now not farre from the end; and now againe it was inuited vnto repentance, by new benefits, as it had beene at the beginning. But the finne of Icroboam the fonne of Nebat, was held fo pretious, that neither the Kingdome it felfe, given to him by God, was able to draw Ichu from that politike jdolatrie; nor the miferie falling vpon 40 him and his posteritie, to bring them to a better course of Religion; nor yet, at the last, this great prosperitie, of Ieroboam the sonne of Iow, to make him render the honour that was due, to the onely giver of victorie. Wherefore the promife of God, made vnto Iehu, that his fonnes, wnto the fourth generation, should fit on the throne of Israel, was not enlarged; but, being almost expired, gaue warning of the approxching end; by an accident (fo ftrange, that wee, who find no particulars recorded.

can hardly geffe at the occasions) foregoing the last accomplishment. When Iereboam the sonne of Ioas, after a victorious raigne of one and fortie veares, had ended his life, it seemes in all reason that Zacharia his Son, should forthwith haue beene admitted, to raigne in his flead; the Nobilitie of that race haping 50 gotten fuch a luftre, by the immediate fuccession of foure Kings, that any Competitor, had the crowne paffed by election, must needes have appeared base, and the vertue of the last King, having beene so great, as might well serve to lay the foundation of a new house, much more to establish the alreadie confirmed right of a familie for ooted in possession. All this notwithstanding two or three and twentie yeares did paffe before Zacharia the Sonne of Jeroboam was , by vniforme confent, received as King. The true original causes hereof were to be found at Dan and Beilel, where the golden Calues did tland : yet second instruments of this disturbance, are likely not to have beene wanting, upon which, the wifedome of man was readie to call an eye. Probable it is that the Captaines of the Armie ( who afterwardes flew one another, fo faft, that in fourteene yeares there raigned fine Kings) did now by headstrong violence, rent the Kingdome asunder, holding each what he could, and either despiting or hating some qualities in Zacharis; vntill, after many yeares, wearied with diffention, and the principall of them perhaps, being taken out of the way by death, for want of any other eminent man, they confented to yeeld 10 all quietly to the fonne of terobosm. That this Anarchie lasted almost three and twentie yeares, we find by the difference of time, between the fifteenth yeare of Vzzia, which was the laft of Ieroboam his one and fortith (his feuen and twentith concurring with the first of Facia) and the eight and thirtith of the same Faciain the last fixe moneths whereof, Zacharia raigned in Samaria. There are some indeed that by supposing Israbann to have raigned with his father cleaven yeares, doc cut off the interregauss in Iuda (before mentioned) and by the fame reason, abbridge this Anarchie, that was before the raigne of Zacharia in Ifrael. Yet they leaue it twelne yeares long: which is time fufficient to proue that the Kingdome of the ten Tribes, was no leffediftempered, than as is alreadic noted. But I choose rather to 20 follow the more common opinion, as concurring more exactly with the times of other Princes raigning abroade in the world, than this doubtfull coniccture, that giues to Ieroboam two and fiftic yeares, by adding three quarters of his fathers raigne unto his owne, which was it felle indeed fo long, that hee may well feeme to have begun it very yong: for I doe not thinke, that God bleffed this Idolater, both with a longer raigne, and with a longer life, than he did his fernant David.

Thus much being spoken of the time, wherein the throne of Ifrael was voide, before the raigne of Zacharia; little may fuffice to be faid of his Raigne it felfe, which lafted but a little while. Sixe moneths onely was he King: in which time he declared himfelte a worshipper of the golden Calues; which was enough to instiffe the 20 judgement of God, whereby hee was flaine. He was the last of Jehu's house, being (inclusively) the first of that line; which may have beene some cause of the troubles impeaching his orderly faccoffion; the prophecie having determined that race in the fourth generation. But (belides that Gods promife was extended unto the vtinoft) there was no warrant ginen to Sallum or to any other, for the death of Zacharia, as had beene given to Ieha, for the flaughter of Jeharam, and for the eradication of Ababs house.

Zacharia baning beene fixe moneths a King, was then flaine by Sallum, who 8. Kins, 15.13, raigned after him, the flace of a moneth in Samaria. What this Sallum was, I doe not finde; faue onely that he was a Traitour, and the fonne of one Isbeft, whereby his 40 father got no honour. It feemes that hee was one of those, who in time of faction had laboured for himfelfe; and now, when all other Competitors were fitten downe, thought eafily to preuaile against that King, in whose person the race of lebu was to faile. Manifestitis, that Sallam had a strong partie: for Tiph(ah or Thap(a, and the coast thereof even from Tirzah, where Atenahem, his enemie and supplanter, then lay, refused to admit, as King in his flead, the man that murdered him. Yet at the end of one moneth, Sallium received the reward of his treason, and was slaine by Msnations who raigned in his place.

Menshem the sonne of Gadi, raigned after Sallam tenne yeares. In opposition to Salliam, his hatred was deadly, and inhumane, For he not onely destroyed Tiphfah, 50 and all that were therein, or thereabouts, but he ript up all their women with child, because they did not open their gates and let him in. Had this crueltie beene ysed in reuenge of Zacharias death, it is like that he would have beene as earnest, in procuring vnto him his fathers crowne when it was first due. But in performing that office, there was yfed fuch long deliberation, that we may plainely discouer Ambition, Disdaine, and other prinate passions, to have beene the causes of this beastly

CHAP.22. S.2. of the Historie of the World.

In the time of Menabem, and (as it feemes) in the beginning of his raigne; Pul, King of Albria, came against the Land of Israels, whom this new King appealed. with a thouland talents of filter, leavied upon all the substantial men in his Countrie. With this monie the Ifraelite purchased, not only the peace of his Kingdome. but his owne chablishment therein : some factious man (belike) having either inutted Pulthither, or (if he came vncalled) fought to vse his helpe, in deposing this ill 10 beloued King. Infephus reports of this Menahem, that his raigne was no milder televal and than his entrance. But after ten yeares, his tyrannic ended with his life; and Pekalia.

his Sonne, occupied his roome. Of this Pekalia the florie is short : for hee raigned only two yeares; at the end whereof, he was flaine by Peka, the Sonne of Kemalia, whose treason was rewarded with the crowne of Ifrael, as, in time comming, another mans treafon against himfelfe shall be. There needes no more, to be faid of Menahem, and his Sonne, faue that they were, both of them, Idolaters; and the Sonne (as wee finde in Iofephus) Iofibid. like to his Father in crueltic. Concerning Pul the Afgrian King, who first opened vito those Northerne Nations the way into Palestina; it will thortly followin or-20 der of the storie, to deliuer our opinion : whether he were that Belofin (called also Belefes, and by fome, Phul Belochus) who joyned with Arbaces the Median, against Sardanapalus, or whether he were some other man. At the present it is more fit that we relate the end of Vazia's life, who out-lived the happinesse wherein we left him.

Q. II. The end of Vzzi A his raigne and life.

S the zeale of Ichoisda, that godly Priest, was the meane, to preserve the linage of David, in the person of Ioas; so it appeares, that the care of holy men was not wanting to Vzzia, to bring him vp, and aduance him to the crowne of Inda, when the hatred borne to his Father 1-mazia, had endangered his fuccession. For it is said of Vzzia, That he fought God in the daies of ZECIIARIA (which understood the visions of God) and a Change 6.54

when as he fought the Lord, God made him profper. But, when he was strong, his heart was lifted up to his destruction : for he transgressed a- 17, 16, gainst the Lord his God : and went into the Temple of the Lord to burne incense, when the Altar of incenfo. Thus he thought to enlarge his owne authoritie, by medling in the Priests office, whose power had in energ extremitic beene so helpefull to the AO Kings of Iuda, that meere gratitude, and civill policie, should have held back Vazia from incrocking thereupon; yea, though the law of God had beene filent in this case, and not forbidden it. Howsoeuer the King forgot his dutie, the Priests remembred theirs, and God forgate not to affift them. Azaria the high Priest interrupted the Kings purpose, and gaue him to understand, how little to his honor it would prought that he tooke upon him the office of the Sonnes of Aaron. There were with Azaria fourescore other Priests, valiant men, but their valour was shewed, only in affifting the high Prieft, when (according to his dutie) hee reprehended the Kings prefumption. This was enough, the rest God himselfe performed. We finde in to Jephus, that the King had apparrailed himselfe in Priestly habit, and that hee Josanthows

50 threatned Azarias and his Companions, to punish them with death, vnlesse they would be quiet. 10sephus, indeede, enlargeth the storie, by inserting a great earthquake, which did teare downe halfe an Hill, that rowled foure furloings, till it refted against another Hill, stopping up the high waies, and spoiling the Kings Gardenin the passage. With this earth-quake, hee faith, that the roofe of the Temple did cleaue, and that a Sunne beame did light vpon the Kings face, which was prefently infected with leprofic. All this may have beene true; and fome there are who thinke that this earth-quake is the fame, which is mentioned by the Prophet Amos; wherein they doe much mille-reckon the times. For the earth-quake fooken of by Amer. was in the daies of Ieroboam King of Ifrael, who died feuen and thirtie yeares before Vazia; fo that lathem the Sonne of Vazia, which supplied his Fathers place in gopernament of the Land, should, by this accompt, have beene then vnborne : for he was but thue and twentie yeares old, when hee beganne to raigne as King. Theresolven 26.20. foregious rarre only we have affurance; that while V zzt A was wroth with the Priefls, the len alice of exprin his forehead, before the Priefts. Hereupon he was caused, in all 10 hafte, to depart the place, and to live in a house by himselfe, vntill he died the rule outer the Kings house, and oner all the Land, being committed to Iotham, his Sonne, and Successor. In him tooke not upon himselfe the stile of King, till his Father was dead; when they arried in the same field wherein his Ancestors lay interred, yet in a Monument a part from the rest, because he was a Leaper.

Of the Prophets which lived in the time of V zz 1 A; and of Princes then ruling in Agypt, and in (ome other Countries.

N the time of Vazia were the first of the lester Prophets, Hofea, Ivel, Arnes, Obadia, and Ionas. It is not indeede fet downe, when Ioel, or Obadia, did prophecie: but if the Prophets, whose times are not expressed, ought to be ranged (according to S. Meremes rule) with the next before them; then must these two bee judged contemporarie with Holes and Amos, who lived vnder King Pazis. To enquire which of these five was the most ancient, it may perhaps be thought, at least a superfluous labour; yet if the age wherein Homer lived, hash to painefully beene fought, without reprehen- 20 fion; how can be be taxed, which offers to fearch out the antiquitie of these holie Prophets? It feemes to me, that the first of these, in order of time, was the Prophet Ionas; who foretold the great victories of Ieroboam Ling of Ifrael; and therefore is like to have prophecied in the daies of Joas, whileft the affliction of Ifrael was exceeding bitter; the Text it felfe intimating no leffe : by which confequence, he was elder than the other Prophets, whose workes are now extant. But his prophecies, that concerned the Kingdome of Ifrael, are now loft. That which remaineth of him, feemes, not without reason, vnto some very jearned, to have belonged vnto the time of Sardanapalus, in whose daies Nizine was first of all destroied. This Prophetrather taught Christ by his sufferings, than by his writings now extant: in all 40 the rest are found expresse promises of the Messias.

s. Chron. c.ra.

In the raigne of Vzzialikewise it was, that Esai, the first of the fouregreat Prophets, beganne to fee his visions. This difference of greater and leffer Prophets, is dat de Ciri. Da. taken from the Volumes which they have left written (as S. Augustine gives reason of the diffinction) because the greater have written larger Bookes. The Prophet Efai was great indeede, not only in regard of his much writing; or of his Nobilitie, (for their opinion is rejected, who thinke him to have beene the sonne of Ames the Prophet) and the high account wherein he lived; but for the excellencie, both of his file, and argument, wherein he fo plainely foretelleth the Birth, Miracles, Paffion, and whole historic of our Saujour, with the calling of the Gentils, that he might 50 as well be called an Euangelift, as a Prophet; having written in fuch wife, That stier in metile (as therome faith) one would thinke he did not foretell of thinges to come, but compile an Historie of matters alreadie past.

Bocoboris was King of Ægypt, and the ninth yeare of his raigne, by our computation (whereof in due place we will give reason) was current, when Vzziatooke posselfion of the Kingdome of Inda.

After the death of Bocchoris, Alychis followed in the Kingdome of Agypt, vnto him succeeded anysis; and these two occupied that crowne like yeares. Then Sabacus, an Athiopian, became King of Agypt, and held it fiftie yeares, whereof the ten first ranne along with the last of Vzzia his raigne and life. Of these and other Leyptian Kings, more shall be spoken, when their affaires shall come to bee intermedled with the businesse of Iuda.

In Albens, the two last yeares of Ariphron his twentie, the seuen and twentieth of Thespeius, the twentieth of Agamnester, and three the first of Ashrlus his three and twentie, made even with the two and fiftie of Vzzia: as likewise did in Albathe last seven of Siluius Auentinus his seuen and thirtie, together with the three and twentie of Siluius Procas, and two and twentic the first of Syluius Amulius. In Media Arbaces beganne his new Kingdome, in the first of Vazia, wherein, after eight and twentic yeares, his Sonne Sofarmus fucceeded him, and raigned thirtie yeares. Of this Arbaces, and the division of the Affrian Empire, between him and others, when they had oppressed Sardanapalus, I hold it convenient to vse more particular discourse, that we may not wander in too great vncertainetie in the storie of the Asirrian Kings, who have alreadie found the way into Palassima, and are not likely to for-20 get it.

d. IIII.

Of the Algrian Kings, descending from PHVL: and whether PHVL and BELOSYS were one person; or heads of sundrie Families, that raigned a-part in Niniue and Babylon.

Y that which hath formerly beene shewed of Sardanapalus his death, it is apparent that the chiefe therein was Arbices the Median; to whom the reft of the Confederates did not only submit themselves in that Warre, but were contented afterwards to be judged by him, receiuing by his authoritie sentence of death, or pardon of their forfeited lines. The first example of this his power, was shewen vpon Belosus the Ban bylonian, by whose especiall adusse and helpe, Arbaces himselse was become so great. Yet was not this power of Arbaces exercised in so tyrannical manner, as might give offence in that great alteration of things, either to the Princes that had affifted him, or to the generalitie of the people. For in the condemnation of Belofus, he yied the counfaile of his other Captaines, and then pardoned him of his owne Grace; allowto ing him to hold, not only the Citic and Province of Babylon, but also those treasures. for embezeling whereof his life had beene endangered.

In like manner, he gaue rewards to the rest of his partakers, and made them Rulers of Prouinces; retaining (as it appeares) only the Soucraignetic to himselfe, which to vse immoderately he did naturally abhorre. He is faid, indeede, to have excited the Medes against Sardanapalus, by propounding vnto them hope of transferring the Empire to their Nation. And to make good this his promife, hee defiroicd the Cittie of Niniue; permitting the Citizens neuerthelesse to take and carrie away eueric one his owne goods. The other Nations that joyned with him, as the Perfians and Bactrians, he drew to his fide, by the allurement of libertie; which 50 he himselfe so greatly loued, that by flackning too much the reines of his owne Soucraignetie, he did more harme to the generall effate of Media, than the pleasure of the freedome, which it enjoyed, could recompence. For both the Territorie of that Countrie was pared narrower by Salmanasfar (or perhaps by some of his Progenitors) whom wee finde, in the Scriptures, to have held fome Townes of the Medes; and the civill administration was so disorderly, that the people themselves were glad to fee that reformation, which Deioces, the fift of Arbaces his Line, did make in that government, by reducing them into firefer termes of obedience.

How the force of the Assyrians grew to be such, as might in fourescore yeares, if not fooner, both extend it felfe vnto the conquest of Ifrael, and trare away some part of Media, it is a question hardly to bee answered; not only in regard of the detruction of Niniue, and subuction of the Affrian Kingdome, whereof the Medes, vnder Arbaces, had the honour, who may seeme at that time to have kept the Allrrims under their subjection, when the rest of the Provinces were set at libertie; but in confideration of the Kingsthemfelues, who raigning afterwards in Babylon and 10 Nining, are confounded by fome, and diftinguished by others; whereby their histo-

I will first therefore deliner the opinion generally received, and the grounds whereupon it flands: then, producing the objections made againfi it; I will compare together the di crimination of that worthie man tofeth Scaliger, with those learned that subscribe thereunto, and the judgement of others that were more ancient Writers, or haue followed the Ancients in this doubtfull case. Neither shall it be needfull to fet downe a-part the feuerall authorities and arguments of fundrie men, adding somewhat of weight or of clearnesse one to another: it will be enough to relate the whole fubstance of each discourse : which I will doe as briefly as I can, 20 and without feare to bee taxed of partialitie, as being no more addicted to the one opinion than to the other, by any fancie of mine owne, but meerely led by those reasons, which vpon examination of each part, seemed to me most forceable, though to others they may perhaps appeare weake.

That which, untill of late, hath passed as current, is this; That Belosus was the fame King who, first of the Afgrians, entred Palastina with an Armie; being called Pul, or Phul, in the Scriptures, and by Authors with fuch as follow them, Phul Belochus. Of this man it is faid, that he was a skilfull Aftrologer, fubtile, and ambitious; that hee got Babylon by composition made with Arbaces; and that not therewith content, he got into his hand part of Appria: finally, that he raigned 30 eight and fortie yeares, and then dying, left the Kingdome to Teglat phalafar his Sonne, in whose Posteritie it continued some few descents, till the house of Merodach prevailed. The truth of this, if Annius his Metalihenes were sufficient proofe, could not be gainfaid : for that Author (fuch as he is) is peremptoric herein. But, how soeuer Annius his Authors deserue to be suspected, it stands with no reason, that we should conclude all to be false which they affirme. They, who maintaine this Tradition, justifie it by divers good Allegations, as a matter confirmed by circumstances found in all Authors, and repugnant vnto no Historicatall. For it is manifest by the relation of Diodorus ( which is indeede the foundation whereupon all haue built) that Arbaces and Belofus were Partners in the action against Sardanapalus; 40 and that the Bacirians, who joyned with them, were thought well rewarded with libertie, as likewife other Captaines were with governments; but that any third Person was so eminent, as to have Asyria it selfe, the chiefe Countrie of the Empire, bestowed upon him, it is a thing whereof not the least apparence is found in any Historie. And certainely it stood with little reason, that the Asyrians should be committed vnto a peculiar King, at fuch time as it was not thought meete to trust them in their owne walls and houses. Rather it is apparent, that the destruction of Nonine by Arbaces, and the transplantation of the Citizens, was held a needfull policie, because thereby the people of that Nation might beekept downe, from aspiring to recouer the Soucraignetie, which elfe they would have thought to belong, as of 19 right, vnto the Seate of the Empire.

Vpon fuch confiderations did the Romans, in ages long after following, destroy Carthage, and diffolue the Corporation, or Bodie politike, of the Citizens of Capua 5 because those two Townes were capable of the Empire : a matter esteemed over dangerous dangerous euen to Rome it felfe, that was Miftris of them both. This being fo, how Tall, conta can it be thought that the Affyrians in three or foure yeares had erected their King-Rulliam, or 2. dome a-new, vinder one Pul? or what must this Pul have beene ( of whose deferuings, or entermedling, or indeede of whose very name, we finde no mention in the Warre against Sardanapalus) to whom the principall part of the Empire fell, either by generall confent in division of the Provinces, or by his owne power and purchase very foone after ? Surely he was none other than Belofus; whose neare Neighbourhood gaue him oportunitie (as he was wife enough to play his ownegame) both to get Africa to himfelfe, and to empeach any other man, that should have attempted to feize vpon it. The Province of Babylon, which Belofus held, being (as Herodotus Herodotus reports) in riches, and power, as good as the third part of the Perlian Empire, was able to furnish him with all that was requisite for such a businesse; if that were not enough, he had gotten into his owne hands all the gold and filter that had beene in the Palace of Niniue. And questionlesse to restore such a Citie as Niniue, was an enterprife fit for none to take in hand, except he had fuch meanes as Belofus had; which Pul, if he were not Belofus, is likely to have wanted.

Befides all this, had Pul beene a diffinit person from Belosus, and Lord of Assiria, which lay beyond the Countries of Babylon and Melopotamia, it would not have beene an casic matter for him, to passe quite through another mans Kingdome with an Armie, feeking bootie a farre off in Ifrael: the only action by which the name of Phal is knowne. But if we grant, that he, whom the Scriptures call Pulor Phul, was the fame whom prophane writers have called Eelofus, Belefes, and Beleftis, (in like manner as Infephus acknowledgeth, that hee, whom the Scriptures called neuer o- Infep.onl. 1.20, therwise than Darius the Mede, was the Sonne of Astrages, and called of the Greekes cap. 13. by another name, that is, Cyaxares) then is this feruple vtterly removed. For Babylon and Mesopotamia did border upon Syria and Palastina : fo that Belofus, having fetled his affaires in Afria towards the East and North, might with good leifure encroach you the Countries that lay on the other fide of his Kingdome, to the 30 flance concurring, to proue that Phul who invaded Ifrael, was none other than Belofiss. For the Prince of the Arabians, who joyned with Arbaces, and brought no small part of the forces wherewith Sardanapalus was overthrowne, did enter into that a-Ction, meerly for the loue of Belofus. The friendship of these Arabians was a thing of maine importance, to those that were to passe ouer Euphrates with an Armie into Syria. Wherefore Belofus, that held good correspondence with them; and whose most fruitfull Prouince, adjoyning to their barraine quarters, might yearely doe them inestimable pleasures; was not only like to have quiet passage through their borders, but their vtmost affistance; yea, it slands with good reason, that they, who loued not Ifrael, should for their owne behoofe have given him intelligence, of the 40 destruction and civill broiles among the ten Tribes; whereby, as this Pul got a thousand talents, so it seemes that the Syrians and Arabians, that had felt an heavie Neighbour of Ieroboam, recoursed their owne, fetting up a new King in Damaleo. and clearing the coast of Arabia, (from the Sea of the Wildernesse to Hamath) of the Hebrew Garrisons. Neither was it any new acquaincance, that made the Nations divided by Euphrates hold together in fo good termes of friendship; it was ancient confanguinitie; the memorie whereof was anaileable to the Sprians, in the time of Daniel, when the Aramites beyond the River came over willingly, to the fuccour of Hadadezer, and the Aramites about Damafeo. So Belofus had good reason to looke into those parts; what a King raigning so farreoff as Winiue, thould have to doe in 50 Spris, if the other end of his Kingdome had not reached to Emphrates, it were hard

South and West. He that lookes into all particulars, may finde every one circum-

But concerning this last argument of the businesse which might allure the Childeans into Palestina, it may be doubted, least it should seeme to have ill coherence with that which hath beene faid of the long Anarchie that was in the ten Tribes.

For if the Crowne of Jissel were worne by no man in three and twentic yeares, then is it likely that Belojus was either wivilling to fitting, or walled to take the adamatage when it was faired, and first diffeouered. This might have compelled tho fe, who alone were not firong enough, to fecke after helpe from fome Prince that lay further off; and fo the opinion of tho fet had dishinguish. Path from Belojus, would be fomewhat confirmed. On the other fide, if we lay, that Belojus ad paffe the Riuerof Employator, as foon cas here is out oil likelihood of making a proferous journey, then may it ferme that the micriganum in Jissel was not foliong as we haute made fit for three and twentic yeares letture would have alloorded better opportunitie, which ough too to have been loss.

For answere hereunto, we are to consider, what Orofins and Enfebrus have written concerning the Chaldees: the one, that after the departure of Arbaces into Oledia, they laid hold on a part of the Empire: the other, that they prevailed and grew mightie, betweene the times of Arbaees and Deicees the Medes. Now, though it be heid an error of Orofins, where hee suppose th that the occupying of B.dilonia by the Chaldeans, was in manner of a rebellion from the Medes; yet herein be and Fufelius doe concurre, that the authoritie of Arbaces did restraine the ambition, which by his ablence grew bold, and by his death, regardfull only of it felfe. Now though fome have conjectured that all affiria was given to Belofus (as an overplus, belides the Province of Babylon, which was his by plaine bargaine made aforehand) in re- 20 gard of his high deferuings, yet the opinion more commonly received is, that hee did only encroach vpon that Province by little and little, whileft zirbaces lived, and afterwards dealing more openly got it all himfelfe. Seeing therefore, that there paffed but twelve yeares betweene the death of Arbaces, and the beginning of Menahem his raigne; manifest it is, that the conquest of Asyria, and setting of that Countrie, was worke enough to hold Belofus occupied, belides the reftauration of Niniue, which alone was able to take vp all the time remaining of his raigne, if perhaps he lived to feeit finished in his owne daies. So that this argument may rather ferue to proue that Phul and Belofus were one person; forasmuch as the journey of Phul against Ifrael was not made vntil Belofus could finde leifure; and the time of 30 aduantage which Belofus did let flip, argued his bufineffe in some other quarter, namely in that Province of which Phal is called King. Briefly, it may be faid, that he who conquered Afria, and performed fomewhat young Countrie to farre diflant as Palefima, was likely to haue beene, at least, named in some historie, or, if not himselfe, yet his Countrie to have beene spoken of for those victories; but wee neither heare of Phal, in any prophane Author, neither doth any Writer, facred or prophane, once mention the victories or alls what foener of the afterns, done in those times; whereas of Belofes, and the power of the Childrens, wee finde good

Surely, that great flaughter of fo many thouland Affection, in the quarrell of Sar-qui dampalia, together with other calamities of that long and was attunate warre, which once whelmed the whole Countrey, not ending but with the reine and viter defolation of Aimine, must needed have to weakened the three of Affiviat that it could not in thirtie yeares space be able to imade Paleilima, which the annetion Kings, raigining in Aimine, had, in all their greatenises, for fine to attempt. Yet the feet affactions, difabiling that Countrey, did helpe to enable Balgine to subdue it; who having once extended his dominion to the borders of Mecha, and being (elpecially if he had compounded with the Medes) by the interpolition of that Countrey, secure of the Serbhians, and other warlike Nations on that side, might very well turns Southward, and trie his fortune in those Kingdomes, whereinto civile distention of the inhabit 19 tants, and the bordering coute of the Arabins and Arabins and Arabins and Arabins and Arabins and the Sorting coute of the Arabins and Arabins and Arabins and the Ordering coute of the Arabins and Arabins and Arabins and the Sorting to the Chaldens and Arabins and Arab necear, Darim the Odede, Artsflusfu, and Absfluerofs, with the like, are thought, or knowne, to be meant the fame, whom prophane Historians, by names better knowne in their owne Countries, have called Absolutions, Crusares, and Attacerses: especially considering, that hereby we shall neither contradict any thing that hath beene written of olde, nor neede to trouble our solutions and others with training new consideres. This in effect is that, which they alledge in maintenance of the opinion commonly received.

Now this being oncegraunted, other things of more importance, will of them feliuse sailly follow. For it is a matter of no great confiquence to know the truth of 10 this point (confidering it apart from that which depends thereon) Whether Pal were Belgin, or fome other man; the whole race of these different and Belginian Kings, wherein are found those famous Princes, Addongly, Manchestry Anguad Palon, and the strength of the Altronomical observations recorded from their times) is the maine ground of this contention. If therefore Belginian Belginian their times if he were father of Teglat-Phile A'm, from whome Schman fin, Sanadon definition and a Belginian Kings, more than the position of the whole and in Belginian Kings, monogeneous is in manifelt, that we must be the Teglat-Phile A'm, from whome Schman fin, somether in the Belginian Kings, monogeneous is manifelt, that we must be the Teglat-Phile A'm, who is knowned to have raigned in those yeares, which Philometry the Belginian and the Altronomical Content of the Belginian and the Belginian A'm, who is knowned to have raigned in those yeares, which Phile Mental Alfringed vino Nadonalian. As for Metaledy, who topplanted Affer helden, manifelt it is, that he and his fuccessors were of another house. This is the feope and end of all this displayation.

But they that maintaine the contrarie part, will not be fatisfied with fuch conic.

Aure. They lay hold upon the conclusion, and by shaking that into pecces, hope to onerthrow all the premisses, you which it is inferred. For (fay they) if Aubans of Salmans shaking, that raigned in Babylon, could not be Salmans shay, or any of those other Assyring Kings, then is ignantifelt, that the races were distinctly and that Phol and Babylos were fenerall Kings. This consequence is so plaine, that it needes no confirmation. To proue that Nabons shay was a distinct person from Salmans shaying race brought such as proued to the salmans shaying the salmans shaying the salmans shaying was king of Babylon, and not of Assyria. This is proued by his name, which is meerely Chal Lean, whereas Salman, the first part of Salmans.

fur name, is proper to the Affricas. It is likewife proued by the Attronomical lob-fertuations, which proceeding from the Bakinnans, not from the Affricast, due flow, that Nabonalist, from whom Polacusic drawes that Bracks, or account of times, was a Babylonian, and no Affricas. Thirdly, and more through, it is confirmed by the facecility of Nabonalist, which was Atardeouspelins, called in his owne language Mero-docken pold, but more briefly in fight his propheries, Attroduced, by the Former Edd 39-th part of his name; or Merodack Bakelant, the Some of Bakelant. Now if Attroduced, the former of Stations for, then was Atlantage for none of Bakelant, King of Babel, were the forme of Bakelantagers, then was Atlantage for none other then Bakelant King of Babel, and not Sationalist King of Affricas.

What can be plainer? As for the cadence of the fet two manes, 20 high in a Selmans for which in Greeke or Luine writing hath no differences, we care tangle by Scaliger, that in the Hebrow letters there is found no affinite therein. So concerning the places of Bebylopis, whereinto Selmans for carried captine forme part of the ten Tribes; it may well be granted, that in the Province of Bebylop Selmans for that gotten form what, yet will into follow that he was King of Bebylop is felfe. To conclude, Meroduch beganne his raigne ouer Bebylop in the fixty ware of Heschi, at which the Selmans for tooke Semans; therefore, if Sulmans for were King of Bebylop then 50 must we far yet hat he and Calendarb, were allone man. The care the arguments of that noble and learned Virter 10 fept Sediger; who not contented to follow the common opinion, founded typon likelihood of conjectures, bath drawne his proofes from matter of more necessfare inference.

Touching all that was faid before of Phul Belofus, for the prouing that Phul and Belofus were not fundrie Kings; Joseph Scaliger pitties their ignorance, that have fpent their labour to fo little purpose. Honest and paincfull men he confesseth that they were, who by their diligence might have wonne the good liking of their Readers, had they not by mentioning Annius his Authors given fuch offence, that men refused thereupon to reade their Bookes and Chronologies. A short answere.

For mine owne part, howfocuer I beleeue nothing that Annius his Berofus, Metallbeites, and others of that stampe affirmes, in respect of their bare authoritie; yet am I not fo squeamish, but that I can well enough digest a good Booke, though I finde the names of one or two of these good fellowes alleaged in it: I have (somewhat peraduenture too often) alreadie spoken my minde of Annius his Authors: 10 neuertheleffe, I may fay here againe, that where other Histories are filent, or speake not enough, there may we without shame borrow of these, as much as agrees with that little which elfewhere we finde, and ferueth to explaine or inlarge it without improbabilities,

Neither indeede are those honest and painefull men (as Scaliger termes them, meaning, if I mistake him not, good filly fellowes) who set downe the African Kings from Pul forwards, as Lords alfo of Babylon, taking Pul for Belofus, and Salma. mallar for Nabonastar fuch Writers as a man should be assamed or viewilling to read. For (to omit a multitude of others, that herein follow Annius, though difliking him in generall) Gerard Overcutor is not fo flight a Chronologer, that hee should bee 20 laughed out of dores, with the name of an honeft meaning fellow.

But I will not make comparisons betweene Scaliger and Mercator, they were both of them men notably learned: let vs examine the arguments of Scaliger, and fee whether they be of fuch force, as cannot either be refifted or avoided. It will cafily be granted, that Nabona Bar was King of Babylon; that he was not King of Affria, fome men doubt whether Sesligers reasons be enough to proue. For though Nabomastar be a Chaldean name, and Salmanastar an Asprian; yet what hinders vs from beleeuing, that one man in two languages might bee called by two Acrall names? That Aftronomic flourished among the Chaldees, is not enough to proue Nationastar tral, cann, 13, either an Aftrologer, or a Chaldean. So it is, that Scaliger himfelfe calls them, Pro- 30 phetas nefcio quos, qui N A B O N A S S A R V M Astronomum fuisse in sommis viderunt : Prophoto I know not who, that in their fleepe have dreamt of NABONASSAR, that hee was an

Whether Nabonasiar were an Astrologer or no I cannot tell; it is hard to maintaine the negative. But as his being Lord over the Chaldwans, doth not prove him to have been clearned in their feiences; fo doth it not proue him, not to have beene alfo King of Affria. The Emperor Charles the fift, who was borne in Gant, and Phi-Lip his Sonne, King of Spaine, and Lords of the Netherlands, bad men farre more learned in all Sciences, and particularly in the Mathematicks, among their Subjects of the Low Countries, then were any that I read of then liuing in Spaine, if Spaine at 40 that time had any; yet I thinke, Posteritie will not vse this as an argument, to proue that Spaine was none of theirs. It may well be, that Salmanafar or Nabonaffar, did wfe the Affyrian Souldiers, and Babylonian Scholers: but it feemes, that he and his posteritie, by giuing themselves wholly to the more warlike Nation, lost the richer, out of which they first issued; as likewise King Philip lost partly, and partly did put to a dangerous hazard all the Netherlands, by fuch a course. As for the two vnanfwerable arguments, (as Sealiger termes them, being me thinks none other than anfweres to somewhat that is or might be alleaged on the contrarie side) one of them which is drawen from the vnlike found and writing of those names, Salmanas far and Nabonassar in the Hebrew, I hold a point about which no man will dispute; for it is 50 not likenesse of found, but agreement of time, and many circumstances else, that must take away the distinction of persons: the other likewise may be granted; which is, that Salmanaffar might be Lord of some places in the Province of Babylon, yet not King of Babylon it felfe: this indeede might bee fo, and it might bee otherwise.

Hitherto there is nothing faue conjecture against conjecture. But in that which is alleaged out of the Prophet E/ai, concerning Merodach the Sonne of Baladan; and in that which is faid of this Merodach, or Mardokenpadus, his being the Successor of Nahanaffar, and his beginning to raigne in the fixt years of Hezekia. I finde matter of more difficultie, then can be answered in hast. I will therefore deferre the handling of these objections, untill I meete with their subject in his proper place; which will be when we come to the time of Hezekia, wherein Meredach lined and was King. Yet that I may not leave too great a scruple in the minde of the Reader, thus farre will I here fatisfic him; that how ftrong focuer this argument may feeme, Sea-10 liger himselfe did line to retract it, ingennously confessing, that in thinking Merodach to be the Sonne of Nabonaffar, he had beene deceived.

Now therefore let vs confider, in what fort they have falhioned their florie, who taking Pul to be a diffinct person from Belosus or Belestis, have in like fort, as was neceffarie, distinguished their off-spring, making that of Pul to faile in Alarhaddon, which left all to Merodach the Babylonian. And here I must first confesse mine owne want of Bookes, if perhaps there be many, that have gone about to reduce this narration into some such order, as might present vnto vs the bodie of this Historie, in one view. Divers, indeede, there are, whom I have feene, that fince to feph Scaliger delivered his opinion, have written in fanour of some one or other point thereof:

20 but Sethus Caluifus himfelfe, who hath abridged Scaligers learned Worke, De emendatione Temporum, hath not beene carefull to give vs notice, how long Belefus, Baladan, Pul, or Tiglat Pulaffar, did raigne, (perhaps because he found it not expressed in Scaliger ) but is content to let downe Baladan, for the fame person with Nabonassar, which Scalizer himselfe renoked. In this case therefore I must lay downe the plot of these divided Kingdomes, in such fortas I finde it contribed by Augustinus Tormiellus; who only of all that I have feene, fets downe the fuccession, continuance, and acts, of those that raigned in Asyria after Sardanapalus, distinguishing them from Relatus and his Posteritie, of whom he hath the like remembrance. This Torniellus is a Regular Clarke of the congregation of S. Paul, whose Annales were printed the 20 last yeure; he appeares to me a man of curious industrie, sound judgement, and free Spirit: yet many times (and I take it, wilfully) forgetfull of thanking, or mentioning those Protestant Writers, by whose Bookes hee hath received good information, and enriched his workes by inferting somewhat of theirs. But in this businesse he hath openly professed to follow Scaliger, whose helpe, without wrong or dishonour to himfelfe, he hath both vsed and acknowledged. For mine owne part, I will not spare to doe right vnto Torniellus; but confesse my selfe to have received benefit by his writing; and wish that his Annales had sooner come to light; for that as hee hath much confirmed mee in some things, so would hee hauc instructed and emboldened mee, to write more fully and lefter improvily in other things,

40 which now I have not leifure to reuife. Particularly in that conjecture (which I had faintly delivered, and yet feared leaft it had over haftily passed out of my hand, and beene exposed to other mens constructions) of the sourc Kings that inuaded the Vallie of Siddim, and were flaine by Abraham, I finde him adventuring, as I have C.1. 0.13 done, to fav, that they may probably be thought to have beene fome pettic Lords; the contrarie opinion of all Writers not with standing. But now let vs consider how he hath ordered these last Assyrian and Babylonian Kings. After the destruction of Sardanapalus, Arbaces being the most mightie, sought to get all to himfelfe, but was opposed by Belofus; in which contention, one Phul, a powerfull man in Afgria, fided with Belofus, and they two prevailed fo farre, that fi-50 nally Arbaces was content to share the Empire with them, making such a division thereof, as was long after made of the Roman Empire, betweene Octavian, Anthonie, and Lepidus.

Another conjecture is (for Torniellus offers not this, or the rest, as matter of certainetie) that Arbaces made himfelfe Soueraigne Lord of all, and placed the feate of his Empirein Media, appointing Belofus his Lieucenant in Bab/poina, and Phul in Affria. But inflore fpace, that is, in foure yeares, it came to paffe, by the judgement of God, that Phul and Belofus rebelled against Arbutes, like as Arbutes had done against Surbanpalus, and in fead of being his Viceroyes, made themfelues adolute Eings. And to this later opinion Tornellus himselfe leanes, holding it much the more probable, as being more agreeable to that which is found in prophase Histories. Why he did make and publish the former fupposition, refoluse to hold the later, I shall anon, without any wrong to him, make bold to gueste. Hauting thus deutled, how Phul and Pelofus might, at the first, attaine to be Kings, hee erders their time, and their successors.

Foure yeares after Arbases, Phul beginnes to raigne, and continues eight and fortic yeares. The flat phulafar (who se name, and the names of other Princes, I will disurelly, according as the Authors whome I have in hand are pleased to disurefise them) succeeding wro Phul, raigned three and twentie. Salmanassiar followed him, and raigned tenne. After him Senaberish raigned seen: and when he was staine, I san handown his Sonne tenne weares in whome that Line failed.

The fame time that Phultooke vpon him as King of Affria, or not long after, (why nor rather afore) for foit had been emore likely) Belofin Mirped the Kingdome of Bubjon, and held it threefore and eight yeares; at the leaft threefore and eight yeares did paffe, before Habonaffar followed him in the possession.

To Exbonaffer, whome (with Sealiger) he thinkes to be Baladam, are affigned fixe and twentie yeares: then, two and fiftie to Adreadash, or Alterdacempadus: to bure and twentie to Ren Alterdash; and laftly, one and twentie to Rabadaffer, the father of Arabachamofor, who is like to offer matter of further disputation.

Concerning the original of these Allyrian and Babylonian Kingdomes, I may truly fay, That the conjectures of other men, who give all to Belofus, and confound him with Phal, appeare to me more neerely resembling the truth. Neither doe I thinke, that Tornicitus would have conceived two different wayes, by which Phul might have gotten Affria (for how Belofus came to get Babylon, it is plaine enough) if either of them alone could have contented him. He adhæres to the later of the 30 two, as better agreeing with Diodore, and other Historians. But he perceived, that to make Plud on the fuddaine King of Affris; or to give him fo noble a Province. as would, of it felfe, inuite him to accept the name and power of a King, was a thing most vnlikely to have happened, vnlesse his deserts (whereof wee finde no mention) had beene proportionable to fo high a reward. And for this cause (as I take it) hath he deuifed the meanes, whereby Phul might be made capable of fo great a thare in the Empire. If this were a true or probable supposition, then would a new doubt arife, Why this Phul, being one of the three that divided all betweene them, was vtterly forgotten by all Historians? yea, why this Dinision it selfe, and the civile Warres that caused it, were never heard of. Questionlesse, the interver- 40 ting of fome Treasures by Belosus, with his Judgement, Condemnation, and Pardon following, were matters of farre leffe note. Therefore I doe not fee, how one of the two inconveniences can this way be avoided; but that either we must confesse, the Dominion given to Phal to have been exceeding his merits, or else his merits, and name withall, to have beene strangely forgotten: either of which is enough to make vs thinke, that rather the conjecture, inferring fuch a sequele, is wide of the truth. As for the rebellion of Phul and Belofus against Arbaces, it was almost impossible for the Affyrians to recouer such strength in foure yeares, as might ferue to hold out in rebellion: for Belofus, it was needleffe to rebell, confidering, that Arbaces did not seeke to molest him, but rather permitted (as being an ouer- 50 great fauourer of libertie) cuen the Medes, that were under his owne Gouernment, to doe what they lifted.

But it is now fit that wee peruse the Catalogue of these Kings: not passing shrough them all (for some will require a large discourse in their owne times) but fpeaking of their order and time in generall. If it bee fo vnlawfull to thinke, that fome of Annus his tales (let them all be counted his tales, which are not found in other Authors as well as in his) may bee true, efpecially finch, as contradict no acknowledged truth, or apparant likelihood, why then is it faid, that Plni did raigne in Affiria eight and fortice yeares? For this bath no other ground than Annies. It is true, that painefull and judicious Writers have found this number of yeares, to a gree fitly with the course of thungs in Historic yest all of them tooke it from Annies. Let it therefore be the punishment of Annies his forgeric (as questionless he is often guiltic of this crime) that when he tells truth, or probabilitie, he be not belief or his owne fake; dough for our owne fakes we make vic of his boldresse, taking his wordes for good, whereas (nothing else being ordered) we care vn willing our selves to be Authors, of new, though not vnprobable conjectures. Hen in we shall have the this commoditie, that we may without builting alter a little, to helpe our owne opinions, and lay the blame vpon Annies, against whom we stall be clure to all the cut we little to the course of the proposal conjectures.

to finde friends that will take our part.

The raignes of Theglathphale and Salmana for did reach, by Anniuchis meafure, to the length of hue and twentic yeares the one, and feuenteene the other;
Tornelluk hath cut off two from the former, and feuen from the later of them, to it (as I thinke) his owne computation; vling the libertie where of I foake lait: for that 20 any Author, faue our good Marajhenes, or those that borrowed of him, hath youe about to tell how long each of these did raigne, it is more then I haue yet found.
To Senacherib and Afarbadion, Torniellus gives the fame length of raigne, which is found in Marajhenes. I thinke there are not many, that will arrogate so much vito themselves, as may well be allowed vinto a man so judicious as is Princlus: yet could I with, that he had so borne to condemne the followers of Annius, in this besimess, wherein hehimselse hath chosen, in part, rather to become one of them, than to say, as else he must have done, almost nothing.

The like libertie we finde that he hath yfed in measuring the raignes of the Chaldeans; filling yeall the space between the end of Sardanapalas, and the beginning 30 of Nabonasias, with the threesfore and eight yeares of Saelass. In this respect it was, perhaps, that hee thought Belojas might have begunne his raigne somewhat later then Phalifor threesfore and eight yeares would seemed along time for him to hold a Kingdome, that was no yong man when he took epossession of it. But how is any whit of his age abated by shortning his raigne, seeing his lifereacheth to the end of fasch a time, as were alone, without adding the time wherein he was a private man, enough for a long liver. Indeede, eight and fortic yeares had beene somewhat of the most, considering that thee scenes by the storiet obase been little leffe, as fuch time as hee joyned with Abases; and therefore the addition of twentie yeares did well descrute that note (which Tamiessa aduited ly gives) that if this raigne extended 40 not so farre, then the raigne of such as came after him, occupied the middle time,

In either doe reprehend the boldnelle of Torniellus, in conjecturing, nor the modellic of Seatigge and Sethus Calui'ns, in forbearing to fix downe as warrantable, fisch things as depend only ypon likelihood. For things, where of the perfect knowledge is taken away from vsby Antiquitie, must be deferbed in Historie, as Geographers in their Maps deferibe those Countries, where of a syet there is made no true discouerie, that is, either by leauing some part blanke, or by inferting the Land of Pigmies, Rocks of loadestone, with Head-lands, Bayes, great Riuers, and other particularities, aggreeable to common report, though many times controlled by followsoing experience, and found contraries to truth. Yet indeede the ignorance growing from distance of place, allowes not such libertie to a Describer, as that which ariseth from the remedileste oblinion of consuming time. For it is true that the Poet faith:

Nen-

Nor Southerne heate, nor Northerne fnow That freezing to the ground doth grow, The subject Regions can fence, And keepe the greedie Merchant thence. The subtile Shipmen way will finde, Storme neuer to the Seas with winde;

Therefore the fictions (or let them be called conjectures) painted in Maps, doe Berue only to milleade fuch discouerers as rashly beleeue them; drawing upon the publishers, either some angrie curses, or well deserved scorne; but to keepe their owne credit, they cannot ferue alwaies. To which purpose I remember a pretie jeast of Don Pedro de Sarmiento, a worthie Spanish Gentleman, who had beene emploied by his King in planting a Colonie vpon the Streights of Magellan: for when I 20 asked him, being then my Prifoner, some question about an Iland in those streights, which me thought, might have done either benefit or displeasure to his enterprise, he told me merrily, that it was to bee called the Painters wines Iland, faying, That whilest the fellow drew that Mappe, his wife sitting by, desired him to put in one Countrie for her; that shee, in imagination, might have an Iland of her owne. But in filling up the blankes of old Histories, we neede not be so scrupulous. For it is not to be feared, that time should runne backward, and by restoring the things themsclues to knowledge, make our conjectures appeare ridiculous: What if some good Copie of an ancient Author could be found, thewing (if wee haue it not alreadie) the perfect truth of these vicertaineties? would it be more shame to have beleeved 20 in the meane while, Annius or Torniellus, than to have beleeved nothing. Here I will not fay, that the credit, which we give to Annius, may chance otherwhiles to be given to one of those Authors whose names hee pretendeth. Let it suffice, that in regard of authoritie, I had rather trust Scaliger or Torniellus, than Annius; yet him than them, if his affertion be more probable, and more agreeable to approued Histories than their conjecture, as in this point it feemes to me; it having moreoner gotten some credit, by the approbation of many, and those not meanely learned.

To end this tedious disputation; I hold it a sure course in examination of such opinions, as have once gotten the credit of being generall, fo to deale as Pacunius in 40 Capua did with the multitude, finding them delirous to put all the Senators of the Citie to death. He lockt the Senators vp within the State-house, and offered their liues to the Peoples mercie; obtayning thus much, that none of them should perish, vntill the Commonaltie had both pronounced him worthic of death, and elefled a better in his place. The condemnation was haftie; for as faft as every name was read, all the Towne cryed, Let him die : but the execution required more leifure; for in fubflituting another, fome notorious vice of the Person, or basenesse of his condition, or infufficiencie of his qualitie, made each new one that was offered to be rejected: fo that finding the worfe and leffe choife, the further and the more that they fought, it was finally agreed, that the old flould be kept for lask of better. 73 CHAP.23. S.5. of the Historie of the World.

Of the Olympiads, and the time when they beganne.

Fter this division of the Assertan Empire, followes the instauration of the Olympian games, by Iphitus, in the raigne of the fame King 🔊 Vzzia, and in his one and fiftieth yeare. It is, I know, the general opinion, that these games were established by Iphitus, in the first of Intham : yet is not that opinion fo generall, but that Authors, waigh-to tie enough, have given to them a more early beginning. The truth is, that in ficting those things vnto the facred Historie, which are found in prophane Authors, wee should not bee too carefull of drawing the Hebrewes to those workes of time, which had no reference to their affaires; it is enough, that fetting in due order thefe beginnings of accompts, we joyue them to matters of Ifrael and Iuda, where occa-

These Olympian games and exercises of activitie, were first instituted by Heroules. who measured the length of the race by his owne foot; by which Pythager as found out the stature and likely strength of Hercules his bodie. They tooke name, not from the Mountaine Olympus, but from the Citie Olympia, otherwise Pifa, neare va-20 to Elis; where also Jupiters Temple in Elis, famous among the Gracions, and reputed among the wonders of the World, was knowne by the name of the Temple of Justiter Olympius. Thele games were exercised from enery fourth years compleat in the plaines of Elis, a Citic of Peloponnelius, neare the River Alphens.

After the death of Hercules, these meetings were discontinued for many yeares, Addoubles, till Iphitus by adulfe from the Oracle of Apollo, re-established them, Lyamogo the Arthur Law-giner then lining: from which time they were continued by the Green as, till Haranges, the Arthur Law-giner then Indian and Arthur Law-giner the the raigne of Theodolius the Emperor, according to Cedrenus; other thinks that they were diffolued under Confirmation the Great.

From this inflitution, Varra accompted the Gracian times, and their flories, to be 20 certaine : but reckoned all before either doubtfull, or fabulous : and yet Plinie gines which are a little credit to all that is written of Greece, till the raigne of Crete, who became in the fine and fiftieth Olympiad, as Enfebrus out of Diodore, Coffor, Polybius, and others hath gathered, in whose time the seuen wife Gracians flourished. For Solon had speech with Crassus, and Crassus was ouerthrowne and taken by Cyrus.

Many patient and piercing braines hauelaboured to finde out the certaine beginning of these Olympiads, namely to set them in the true years of the World, and the raigne of fuch and fuch Kings: but feeing they all differ in the first accompt, that is, of the Worlds yeare, they can hardly jumpe in particulars thereon depending.

Cyril against Iulian, and Didymus, beginne the Olympiads the nine and fortieth of Eulebius who is contrarie to himfelfe in this reckoning, accompts with those that Entire de Prope finde the first Olympiad in the beginning of the four chundreth and fixth years after Except toward Troy, yet he telleth vs that it was in the fiftieth yeare of Pasia, which is (as I find it) two yeares later.

Erstofthenes placeth the first Olympiad foure hundred and seuen yeares after Tray, Escaph, and reckoning the yeares that passed betweene; to whom Dionysius Haliannassas, Dio-Charles darus Siculus, Solinus, and many others adhere.

The distance betweene the destruction of Troy, and the first Olympiad, is thus collected by Eratofchenes. From the taking of Troy to the descent of Hercules his Po-50 fteritie into Peloponnefus, were fourescore yeares; thence to the Ionian expedition, threefcore yeares; from that expedition to the time of Lyourgus his government in Sparta, one hundred fiftie nine; and thence to the first Olympiael, one hundred and eight yeares. In this account the first yeare of the first Olympiad is not in-

But vaine labour it were, to feeke the beginning of the Olympiads, by numbring the yeares from the taking of Troy, which is of a date farre more vacertaine. Let it fuffice, that by knowing the inflauration of these games, to have beene in the source hundrethand eight yeare current after Troy, wee may reckon back to the taking of that Citie, fetting that, and other accidents, which have reference thereto, in their proper times. The certaintie of things following the Olympiads; mult teach vs how to finde when they beganne.

To this good vie, we have the enfuing yeares, vnto the death of Alexander the Great, thus divided by the same Eratofthenes. From the beginning of the Olympiads, to the paffage of Nervies into Greece, two hundreth fourescore and scuenteen yeares; 10 from thence to the beginning of the Pelapannefian Warre, eight and fortic yeares; forwards to the victoric of Lylander, seuen and twentie; to the battaile of Leuctra, thirtie foure; to the death of Philip King of Maceden, fine and thirtie; and finally to the death of Alexander, twelve. The whole fumme arifeth to foure hundred fiftie and three yeares; which number he otherwife also collecteth; and it is allowed by the most.

Now for placing the institution of the Olympiads in the one and fiftieth yeare of Vzziah, we have arguments, grounded upon that which is certaine, concerning the beginning of Cyrus his raigne, and the death of Alexander; as also vpon the Astronomicall calculation of fundrie Eclipses of the Sunne as of that which happened when 20 Xernes fet out of Serdis with his Armie to inuade Greece; and of divers other.

Touching Cress, it is generally agreed that his raigne as King, before hee was Lord of the great Monarchie, began the first years of the fine and liftieth Olympiad. and that he raigned thirtie yeares; they who give him but twentienine yeares of Mull, de Din. l. raigne (following Herodotus rather than Tullie, Instine, Eufebrus, and others) beginne a yeare later, which comes all to one reckoning. So is the death of Alexander let by 144.1. a yeare later, which comes all to one reckening. So is the death of Alexander let by Emang. Lious, all good Writers, in the first yeare of the hundreth and sourteenth Olympiad. This to de dem. E. later note of Alexanders death, scrues well to leade vs back to the beginning of Cywang, 1,2, c.z. rus; as many the like observations doe. For if we reckon youards from the time of Alexander, we shall finde all to agree with the yeares of the Olympiads, wherein Cy- 20 rus beganne his raigne, either as King, or (taking the word Monarch, to fignific a Lord of many Kingdomes) as a great Monarch. From the beginning of Cyrus, in the first yeare of the five and fiftieth Olympiad, vnto the end of the Persian Empire, which was in the third of the hundreth and twelith olympiad, we find two hundred and thirtie yeares compleat; from the beginning of Cyres his Monarchie, which lafted but feuen yeares, we finde compleat two hundred and feuen yeares, which was the continuance of the Persian Empire.

Now therefore feeing that the first years of Cyrus his Monarchie (which was the last of the fixtieth Olympiad, and the two hundreth and fortieth yeare from the inflitution of those games by Iphilus / followed the last of the seuentic yeares, of the 42 captiuitie of Inda, and defolation of the Land of Isi ael; manifest it is, that we must reckon back those seuentic yeares, and one hundred threescore and ten yeares more, the last which passed under the Kings of Inda, to finde the first of these Olympinds; which by this accompt is the one and fiftieth of Vzzia, as wee haucalreadie noted.

The Eclipses whereof we made mention, serue well to the same purpose. For examples fake, that which was feene when Xerxes mustered his Armie at Sardis, in the two hundreth threefcore and feuenth years of Nationallar, being the laft of the threefcore and fourteenth Olympiad; leades vs back vnto the beginning of Aerxes, and from him to Cyrus, whence we have a faire way through the threefcore and ten 50 yeares, vnto the destruction of terufalcer; and so vpwards through the raignes of the last Kings of Inda, to the one and fiftieth yeare of Vzzia.

Thus much may fusfice, concerning the time wherein these Olympiads be-To

To tell the great folemnitic of them, and with what exceeding great concourfe of all Greece they were celebrated, I hold it a superfluous labour. It is enough to say, that all bodily exercises, or the most of them, were therein practised; as Running. Wraftling, Fighting, and the like. Neither did they only contend for the Maftrie in those feats, whereof there was good vse, but in running of Chariots, fighting with Whorle-bats, and other the like ancient kinds of exercises, that served only for oftentation. Thither also repaired Orators, Poets, Musitians, and all that thought themselues excellent in any laudable qualitie, to make triall of their skill. Yeathevery Cryers, which proclaimed the victories, contended which of them 10 should get the honour, of having plaied the best part.

The Eleans were Presidents of those Games; whose justice, in pronouncing without partialitie, who did best, is highly commended. As for the rewards given to the Victors, they were none other than Garlands of Palme, or Oline, without any other commoditie following, than the reputation. Indeede there needed no more. For that was held fo much, that when Diagoras had feene his three Sonnes crowned for their feuerall victories in those games, one came running to him with this gratulation : Morere DIAGORAS, non enimin calum ascensuruses; that is: Die DIAGORAS, For thou shalt not clime up to heaven: as if there could bee no greater happinesse on earth, than what alreadie had befallen him. In the like sense Horaco 20 speakes of these Victors, calling them,

Haraticana (L.)

Such as like heavenly wights doe come With an Elæan Garland home.

Neither was it only the voice of the People, or the fongs of Poets, that so highly extolled them, which had wonne these Olympian prises; but even grave Historians 20 thought it a matter worthie of their noting. Such was (as Tullie counts it ) the va- Tellia Octability nitie of the Greekes, that they efteemed it almost as great an honor, to have wome Flacos. the victorie at Running or Wrastling in those games, as to have triumphed in Reme for some samous victorie, or conquest of a Prouince,

That these Olympian games were celebrated at the full of the Moone, and vpon the fifteenth day of the Moneth Hecatombeon, which doth answere to our June; and what meanes they yied to make the Moneth beginne with the new Moone, that the fifteenth day might be the full; I have shewed in another place. Wherefore I may now returne vnto the Kings of Inda, and leave the merric Greekes at their games, whom I shall meete in more serious emploiments, when the Persian quarrells draw 40 the bodie of this Historie into the coasts of Ionia and Hellespont,

Of IOTHAM and his Contemporaries.

OTHAM the Sonne of Vzziah, when he was fine and twentie yeares old, and in the fecond of Pekab King of I/rael, was annointed King in a King 15.45 Ierusalem, his Father yet liuing. He built an exceeding high Gate to the Temple of threescore cubits vpright, and theresore called Ophel: besides divers Cities in the Hills of Juda, and in the Forrests, Towers, and Palaces : he inforced the Ammonites to pay him Tribute, to wit, of Silver an hundreth talents, and of Wheate and Barly two thousand measures: hee raigned fixe and twentic yeares : of whom Iosephus gives this testimonie. Einsmodi vero Princeps hic fuit, ot nullum in eo virtutis genus desideres; ot qui Deum adeo pie coluerit, hominibus fuis adeo iuste prafuerit, orbem ipfam tanta sibi cura esse passus sit, & tantopere succest, of universum regnum hostibus quidem minime contemnendum, domesticis autem eius incolis atque ciuibus felix, fauslum & fortunatum sua virtute efficerit; This was fuch a Prince, as a man could finde no kinde of vertue wanting in him: he worthipped God to religiously, he governed his men fo righteously, he was to provident for the Citie, and did to greatly amplifie it, that by his vertue and proveffe he made his whole Kingdome not contemptible to his enemies, but to his Seruants, Inhabitants and Citizens.

This is all that I finde of Iotham: his raigne was not long, but as happie in all 10 things, as he himfelfe was denout and vertuous.

Auchomenes about this time succeeded Phelesteus in Corinth: after whome, the Corinthians erected Magistrates, which gouerned from yeare to yeare. And yet Pausanias in his second Booke, with Strabe and Platarels, in many places are of opinion, That Corinth was governed by Kings of the race of the Bacida, to the time of Cypfelus, who droue them out.

Teglathphalassar, or Tiglathpeleser, the sonne of Phul, the second of the Babylonians and Affyrians that was of this new race, about this time inuaded Ifrael, while Pekab (who murthered his Master Pekaiah) was King thereof. In which Expedition he tooke most of the Cities of Nephtali and Galile, with those of Gilead, ouer Iordan, 20 and carried the inhabitants captine. This Tiglath raigned hue and twentie yeares, according to Metasthenes. But Krentzhemius findes, that with his sonne Salmanassar he raigned yet two yeares longer: which yeares I would not afcribe to the fonne, because the Aera of Nabonassar beginnes with his single raigne, but reckon them to Tighlath Phulasar himselfe, who therewith raigned seven and twentie yeares.

Afebylus, the sonne of Agamnestor, about the same time, the twelfth Archon in Athens, ruled five and twentic yeares. Aleamenes gouerned Sparta: after whome, the Estate changed, according to Eusebius: but therein surely Eusebius is mistaken. For Diodore, Plutarch, Paufanias, and others, witnesse the contrarie. Paufanias affirmeth, That Polydorus, a Prince of eminent vertues, succeeded his father, and raig- 30 ned threescore yeares, and out-lived the Alesseniack Warre: which was ended by Theopompus, the sonne of Wicander, his royall companion.

At this time lived Naham the Prophet, who fore-told the destruction of the Affrian Empire, and of the Citie of Ninine; which fucceeded (fayth Infephus) a hundred and fifteene yeares after. The Cities of Cyrene and of Aradus were built at this time, while in Media, Sofarmus and Medidus raigned, being the second and third Kings of those parts.

of Achaz and his Contemporaries.

HAS, or Achse, succeeded vnto Iotham in the seuenteenth yeare of Peka, the sonne of Remalia: the same being also the last yeare of his sathers raigne, who began in the fecond of the same Peka, and raigned sixteene, but not complete yeares. This Ahaz was an Idolater, exceeding all his predeceffors. He made molten Images for Baalim, and burnt his sonne for facrifice before the Idoll Moloch, or Saturne, which was represented by a man-like brazen bodie, bearing the head of a Calfe, set vp not farre from Ierusalem, in a Valley 50 shadowed with Woods, called Gehinnom, or Tophet, from whence the word Gehenna is vsed for Hell. The children offered, were inclosed within the carkasse of this Idoll, and as the fire encreased, so the facrificers, with a noyse of Cymbals and other Instruments, filled the ayre, to the end the pitifull cryes of the children might not be heard; which vnnaturall, cruell, and deuillish Oblation, Jeremie the Prophet vehemently reprehendeth, and of which S. Hierome vpon the tenth of Mathem hath written at large. By the prohibition in Leuitiens the eighteenth, it 67, 1935. appeareth that this horrible linne was ancient; in the twelfth of Deuteronomic, it is called an abhomination which God hateth. That it was also practifed elsewhere, and by many Nations remote from Indea, divers Authors witnesse; as Virgil in the fecond of his Eneids, - Sanguine placaflis, &c. and Silius, - Poscere cede Deos. Saturne is faid to have brought this custome into Italie, besides the casting of many foules into the River of Tyber, in flead of which, Hereules commanded that the 10 waxen Images of men should be throwne in and drowned. The Deuill also taught the Carthaginians this kinde of butcherie, in fo much that when their Citie was befieged, and in diffreste, the Priest made them believe, that because they had spared their owne children, and had bought and brought vp others to bee offered, that therefore Saturne had flirred vp and ftrengthened their Enemies against them : whereupon they presently caused two hundred of the noblest youths of their Citie to be flaine, and offered to Saturne or Satan, to appeale him: who besides these foreto be flaine, and outered to samme on sam, composite that with outer and Ching, of Maffer Example, and of Galatia, with the Maffagets, and others, in the le his fertices: Further, as if the Down in the Maffagets and others, in the le his fertices: Further, as if the Down in the Down in the Composite that the Down in the Composite that the Down in the Composite that the Co were not content to destroy the foules of many Nations in Europe, Alia, and Africa, 20 (as Meofia writeth) the Mexicans and other people of America, were brought by Acil, de Hill. the Deuill under this fearefull feruitude, in which he also holdeth the Floridans and man, the more than Virginians at this day. For the wickednesse of this King Ahaz, God stirred up Rezin of Damaseus, and Pekah the Sonne of Remaliah, King of Ifrael against him, who inuaded Indea, and beficged Jerufalem, but entred it not.

The King of Syria, Rezin, possess himselfe of Elab by the Red Sea, and cast the Iemes out of it, and Pekah flaughtered in one day twelue hundred thousand Indeans, 2. Chron. 19. 6. of the ablest of the Kingdome, at which time Maafeiah the Sonne of Achaz was alfo flaine by Ziehri, with Azrikam the Gouernour of his house : and Eleanath the se-30 cond person vnto the King. Besides all this, two hundred thousand prisoners of women and children, the Ifraelites led away to Samaria: but by the counfell of the Prophot Oded, they were returned and deliucred back againe.

As Ifraeland Aram vexed Inda on the North; fo the Edomites and the Philistims, who cuermore attended the ruine of Indea, entred you them from the South; and tooke Bethfemes, Aialon, Gaderoth, Socho, Timnah, and Gemzo, flew many people, and chron. 28. carried away many prisoners. Whereupon when Achar, saw himselfe entironed on all fides, and that his Idolls and dead Gods gaue him no comfort, hee fent to the Affrican Tiglathpilefer, to delire some aide from him against the Ifraelites and Aramites, presenting him with the filter and gold both of the Temple, and Kings 2. Kings 16.

Tiglathpile fer wanted not a good example to follow, in making profit of the troubles that role in Palefina. His Father having lately made himfelfe from a Provinciall Lieutenant, King of Babylon and Afreta, had a little before led him the way into India, inuited by Menahem King of Ifrael. Wherefore now the Sonne willingly hearkened to Achaz and embraced the advantage. As for Belochus himfelfe, he was content to affigue fome other time for going through with this enterprife; because (as I have faid before) he was not firmely fetled at home, and the Smian Kingslay directly in his way, who were yet strong both in men and fame. But Tiglath, having now, with the treasures of Ierusalem, prepared his Armie, first inuaded the Terri-50 torie of Damafeus, wanne the Citic, and killed Rezin, the last of the race of the Adads, who beganne with Danid and ended with this Achaz. At Damafeus Achaz met Tiglath, and taking thence a patterne of the Altar fent it to Vriab the Prieft, commanding the like to be made at Ierufelem, whereon at his returne hee burnt Sacrifice to the Gods of the Syrians. In the meane while Tiglath possest all Basan, and the rest beyond fordan, which belonged to the Tribe of Reuben, Gad, and Manaffe. And then pailing the River, he maftered the Cities of Galilee, inuaded Ephraim, and the Kingdome of Israel, and made them his Vassalls. And not withstanding that he was innited and waged by Achaz, yet after the spoile of Ifrael, he posses himselfe of the greater part of Iuda, and as it feemeth inforced Achaz to pay him Tribute. For in the Ground of Kings the eighteenth it is written of Ezechia, that he revolted from Afbur, or rebelled against him, and therefore was inuaded by Senacherib. After Ahaz had beheld and borne these miseries, in the end of the fixtcenth years of his raigne hee died ; but was not buried in the Sepulchers of the Kings of Inda. With Abaz lived Medidus, the third Prince in Media, who governed fortic yeares, 10 Este, in chron, faith Eufebius : Diodorus and Ctefias finde Anticarmus in flead of this Medidus, to have beene Sofarmus his Successiour, to whom they give fiftie yeares. Tiplath Philefer held the Kingdome of Affria, all the raigne of Ahaz : yet fo, that Salmanaffar his Sonne may feeme to have raigned with him fome part of the time. sally 20, 16. For we finde that Abaz did fend onto the Kings of A s H V R to helpe him. The Genew note faies, that these Kings of Ashar were Teglath Pileser, and those Kings that were under his Dominion. But that hee or his Father had hitherto made fuch conquells, as might gine him the Lordfhip oper other Kings, I doe neither finde any Historic, nor circumstance that proucth. Wherefore I thinke that these Kings of Albar, were Tiglath, and Salmanaffar his Sonne, who raigned with his Father, as 20 hath beene faid before; though how long hee rap ned with his Father, it bee hard

At this time beganne the Ephori in Lacedanon, a hundred and thirtie yeares after Marin vita Soil. Lyourgus, according to Platerch. Enfebius makes their beginning farre later, namely in the lifteenth olympiad. Of thele Ephori, Elalus was the first, Theopompus and Po-tectoris, being then joynt Kings. These Ephori, chosen every yeare, were controllers, as well of their Senators as of their Kings, nothing being done without their adulfe and confert. For (faith Cieero) they were opposed against their Kings, as the Roman Tribunes against the Consults. In the time of Ahaz died Afehylus, who had ruled in Athenseuer fince the fiftith yeare of Vzzias Alesmenon the thirteenth of the Medon- 30 ticle, or Governours of the Athenians (so called of Medon who followed Codrus) succeeded his Father Afebylus, and was the last of these Gouernors: he ruled only two yeares. For the Athenians changed first from Kings (after Codens) to Gouernors for life; which ending in this Aleamenon, they erected a Magistrate whom they termed an Archon, who was a kind of Burghomafter or Gouernor of their Citie for ten yeares.

This alteration Paufanias in his fourth Booke beginnes in the first yeare of the eight Olympiad. Eufebius and Halicarnaffaus in the first of the seuenth Olympiad: at which time indeede, Caross the first of these, beganne his ten yeares rule.

The Kingdome of the Latines gouerned about three hundred yeare by the Syluy, of the race of Ineas, tooke end the fame Abastime : the foundation of Rome 40 being laied by Romulus and Remus in the eight years of the fame King, Codoman builds it the elegenth of Achaz, Bucholzer in the eighth as I thinke he should others fomewhat later, and in the raigne of Ezechia. Cicero, Entropius, Orofius, and others, fquare the time of the foundation to the third yeare of the fixth Olympiad. But Halicarnaffens, Solinus Antiochenus, Clemens Alexandrinus, and Eufebius, to the first yeare of the feuenth: who feeme not only to mee, but to many very learned Chronologers, to have kept herein the best accompt.

Of the Antiquities of Italie, and foundation of Rome in the time of Ahas.

Of the old Inhabitants, and of the name of Italie.

N D here to speake of the more ancient times of Italie. and what Nations possest it before the arrivall of . . neas, the place may feeme to inuite vs: the rather because much fabulous matter hath beene mixed with the truth of those elder plantations. Italie before the fall of Troy, was knowne to the Greekes by divers Hallowitz names : as first Hesperia, then Ausonia, the one name arising of the Seate, the other of the Ausones, a people inhabiting part of it : one ancient name of it was also Oenotria, which it had of the Oenotri: whom Halicarnassaus thinks to have been the first, that brought a Colonic of Areadians into that Land. Afterward it was called Italie of Italies : concerning which changes of names, Virgil speakes thus.

> Est locus Hesperiam Gray cognomine dicunt : Terra antiqua, potens armis, atque vbere gleba: Oenotrij coluere viri, nunc fama minores Italiam dixisse, ducis de nomine, gentem.

There is a Land which Greekes Hesperia name, Ancient, and strong, of much fertilitie. Oenotrians held it, but we heare by fame, That by late ages of Posteritie, ' T'is from a Captaines name called Italie.

Who this Captaine or King may have beene, it is very vncertaine. For Firell 40 speakes no more of him, and the opinions of others are many and repugnant. But like enough it is, that the name which hath continued fo long vpon the whole Countrie, and worne out all other denominations, was not at the first accepted without good cause. Therefore to finde out the original of this name, and the first planters of this noble Countrie, Reinecesius hath made a very painfull search, and not improbable conjecture. And first of all he grounds vpon that of Halicarna | faut; usi. 1.5. who speakes of a Colonie which the Eleans did leade into Italie, before the name of who peakes of a colonic which the seaso out grade into man, detecting them had been failed was given to it: Secondly, ypon that of miline, who faith, that the middlem notifies, was a Colonic of the Ætelians: Thirdly, ypon that of Strabe, who affirmes the strately. same of Temesa or Tempsa, a Citie of the Bruty in Italie : Lastly, vpon the auto thoritie of Plime, who shewes that the Halians did inhabite only one Region of the plin. 13.65. Land, whence afterward the name was derived over all. Concerning that which is faid of the Eleans and £tolians, who (as he shewes) had one originall; from them hee brings the name of Italie. For the word Italia, differs in nothing from Aitolia , faue that the first Letter is cast away , which in the Greeke words is common, and the letter of is changed into (a); which change is found in the name of Athalia, an illandineere Italie, peopled by the Athalians: and the like changes are very familiar in the Aolie Dialect; of which Dialect (being almost proper to the Acousts) the accent and pronunciation, together with many words little altered, were retained by the Latines, as Dionyfius Halscarnaffeus, Quintilian, and Priscian the Grammanan teach. Hereunto appertaines that of Inlian the Apoltata, who called the Greekes coulins of the Latines. Also the common original of the Greekes and Latines from Isuan; and the Fable of Janus, whose Image had two faces, looking Eatl and Welt, as Greece and Italie lay, and was flamped on Coynes, with a Shippe on the other fide; all which is, by interpretation, referred to Ianan, 10 father of the Greekes and Latines: who fayling ouer the Ionian Sea, that lyes be-trucche « Lielia and the Westerne parts of Greece and Italie, planted Colonies in both. Now whereas Reyneceius thinkes, that the names of Ailas and Italies belonged both to one man, and thereto applyes that of Berofus, who called Cethan, Ita-lus; though it may feeme firengthened by the marriage of Dardanus, whileft he abode in Italie with Electra, the daughter of Atlas, yet is it by arguments (in my valuation) greater and stronger, callly disproved. For they who make mention of

Atlas, place him before the time of Mojes : and if Allas were Cethin, or Mitim, then was be the forme of Janan and nephew of Japheth, the eldest sonne of Noah:

which antiquitie farre exceedes the name of Italie, that began after the departure of 20

Likewise Firgil, who speakes of Allas, and of Dardenss his marriage with Ele-

Of the Aborigines, and other Inhabitants of Latium, and of the reason of the names of Latini and Latium

N Italie the Latines and Hetrurians were most famous; the Hetrurians having held the greatest part of it under their subjection; and the Latines by the vertue and felicitie of the Romans, who were a branch of them, subduing all Italie, and in few ages whatsoeuer Nation was knowne in Europe : together with all the Westerne parts of Afra, and North of Africk.

The Region called Latium, was first inhabited by the Aborigines, whom Halicarnaffeus, Varro, and Reyneccius (following them) thinke to have beene Arcadians: and this name of Aborigines (to omit other fignifications that are strained) imports as much as originall, or native of the place, which they possessed: which title the . Arcadians are knowne in vaunting manner to have alwaies vfurged, fetching their antiquitie from beyond the Moone; because indeede, neither were the inhabitants of Pelaponnesus inforced to forfake their seates so oft as other Greekes were, who dwelt without that halfe Island, neither had the Arcadians fo vusing a dwelling as 20 the rest of the Pelapannesians, because their Countrie was lesse fruitfull in land; mountainous, and hard of accesse, and they themselves (as in such places commonly are found) very warlike men. Some of these therefore having occupied a great part of Latium, and held it long, did according to the Arcadian manner, stile themfelues Aborigines, in that language, which either their new Seate, or their Neighbours thereby had taught them. How it might bee that the Arcadisms who dwelt fomewhat farre from Sea, and are alwaies noted as vnapt men to proue good Mariners, should have beene Authors of new discoueries, were a question not casie to be answered, were it not so, that both fruitfulnesse of children, in which those ages abounded, inforceth the fuperfluous companie to feeke another feate, and that fome 30 expeditions of the Arcadians, as especially that of Enander, into the same parts of I.

After the Aborigines, were the Pelasgi, an ancient Nation, who sometimes gaue name to all Greece: but their antiquities are long fince dead, for lack of good records; Neither was their glorie fuch in Italie, as could long fustaine the name of their owne Tribe; for they were in short space accounted one people with the former inhabitants. The Sicani, Aufones, Aurunci, Rutili, and other people, did in ages following disturbe the peace of Latium, which by Saturne was brought to some civilities and he therefore canonized as a God.

This Saturne S. Augustine calleth Sterces or Sterculius, others terme him Sterce-40 tins, and fay, that hee taught the people to dung their grounds. That Latium tooke his name of Saturne, because he did latere, that is lie hidden there, when he fled from Iupiter, it is questionlesse a fable. For as in Heathenish superstition, it was great vanitie to thinke that any thing could be hidden from God, or that there were many Gods of whom one fled from an other; fo in the truth of Historie, it is well knowne, that no King raigning in those parts was so mightie, that it should bee hard to finde one Countrie or an other, wherein a man might be fafe from his pursuit. And yet, as most fables and poeticall fictions, were occasioned by some ancient truth, which See lib. r. cap. 4 either by ambiguitie of speech or some allusion, they did maimedly and darkely ex- $.1. & sq. presse (for so they fained a passage ouer a River in Hell, because death is a passage to 50 another life, and because this passage is hatefull, lamentable, and painefull, therefore they named the River Styn of Hate, Cocytus of Lamentation, and Acheron of Paine: fo also because men are stonic hearted, and because the Greeke wast people, and was stones, are neare in found, therefore they fained in the time of Deucalion flones connerted into men, as at other times men into flones) in like manner it may tra hath nothing of his meeting with her in Italie; but calleth Electra and her lifter Maia (poetically) daughters of the Mountaine Atlas in Africa, naming Italus among the Kings of the Aborigenes; which he would not have done, had Atlas and Italias beene one person. As for the authorizie of Berofus in this case, we neede the leffe to regard it, for that Remedies himfelfe, whole conjectures are more to be valued then the dreames wherewith Appin bath filled Berelie, holdes it but a figment.

Hereules out of the Countrey, not long before the Warre of Troy.

That the name of Italie began long after Atlas, it appeares by the Verses of Vir- 20 oil last rehearfed, wherein hee would not have faid, - Nunc fama minores Italiam dixisse ducis de nomine gentem, had that name beene heard of ere Dardanus left the Countrey. But figeing that, when Herenles, who died a few yeares before the Warre of Trey, had left in Italiea Colonie of the Eleans (who in a manner were one and the fame Nation with the Atoliens, as Strabo, Herodotus, and Paufanias teach) then the name of Italie began: and feeing Virgil makes mention of Italus among the Italian Kings, it were no great boldnesse to say, that Italias was Commaunder of these Eleans. For though I remember not, that I have read of any fuch Greeke as was named Italia, yet the name of Eiglis, written in Greeke Aitolus, was very famous both among the Etolians, and among the E- 40 leans, he being fonne of a King of Elis, and founder of the Actalian Kingdome. Neither is it more hard to derive the name Italia from Atolia, then Italia from Ætolia. So may Virgils authoritie stand well with the collections of Reyneceius; the name of Italie being taken both from a Captaine, and from the Nation, of which he and his people were.

be , that the original of Saturnes hiding himfelfe was fome allufion to that old opinion of the wifeit of the Heathen, that the true God was ignotus Deus, as it is noted in the Ads; whence also Esay of the true God saies, to Deus abdens te. For it can not be in vaine that the word Saturnus thould also have this very fignification, if it bee deriued (as some thinke) from the Hebrew Satar, which is to hide: Howbeit I denie not, but that the original of this word, Latium, ought rather to be fought elfewhere.

Remeeeins doth conjecture that the Ceteans, who descended of Cethim, the Sonne of lawar, were the men who gaue the name to Latirum. For these Celeans are remembred by Homer as aiders of the Troises in their Warre. Strabointerpreting the place of Homer, calls them subjects to the Crowne of Troy. Hereupon Reyneceim gathers, 10 that their abode was in Ala: viz. in agro Elaitico; in the Elaitian Territorie, which agreeth with Strabo. Of a Citic which the Lollans held in Afra, called Elea, or Elaia, Paulanias makes mention; Stephanus calls it Cidamis, or (according to the Greeke writing) Cidamis, which name laft rehearfed bath a very neare found to Cethim, Citim, or Cithim; the Greeke Letter (D) having (as many teach) a pronunciation very like to (TH) differing only in the firength or weakeneffe of vtterance, which is found betweene many English words written with the same letters. Wherefore that these Ceteurs being descended of Cethins, Cittim, or Kittim, the Sonne of Isuar, who was Propenitor of the Greekes, might very well take a denomination from the Citie, and Region, which they inhabited, and from thence be called Elaites, or Elais 20 tes, it is very likely, confidering that among the Arcadians, Phocians, Atolians, and Eleans, who all were of the Aolique Tribe, are found the names of the Mountaine Eleus, the Hanen Eleas, the people Elaita, the Cities Eleus, Elaia, and Elateia, of which laft it were fomewhat harsh in the Latine tongue to call the Inhabitants by any other name then Elatini, from whence Latini may come. Now whereas both the Ceteiand Acadians, had their original from Cethin, it is nothing valikely, that agreeing in language and fimilitude of names, they might neuertheleffe differ in found and pronunciation of one and the fame word. So that as he is by many called Submas to whom fome (deriving the Sabines from him) give the name of Sabas: in the like manner might he whom the Arcadians would call Elatus (of which name 20 they had a Prince that founded the Citic Elateia) bee named of the Ceteans Latinus. Reynecoins purfuing this likelihood, thinks, that when Euripylus, Lord of the Ceteans, being the Sonne of Telephin, whom Hereales begat vpon Auge, the Daughter of Alene King of Areadia, was flaine by Achilles in the Troian Warre: then did Telephus, brother to Euripelus, conduct the Ceteurs; who (fearing what cuill might befail themselves by the Greekes, if the affaires of Trey should goe ill) passed into that part of Italie, where the Arcaelians were planted by Ocnotrus. And Reynecoins farther thinks, that Telephus being the more gracious among the Oenotrian Arcadians, by the memorie of his Grand-mother Auge, an Arcadian Ladie, was well contented to take an Areadian name, and to be called Elatus, which in the dialect and pronunciation 40 either of the Ceteans, or of the Oenotrians, was first Elatinus, and then Latinus: That this name of Elatus may have been taken or imposed by the Areadians, it is the more easie to be thought, for that there were then two Families, the one of Aphidas, the other of Elatus, who were Sonnes of Areas King of Areadia, which gave name to the Countrie; and betweene these two Families the succession in that Kingdome did paffe, almost enterchangeably for many ages, till at the end of the Traisn warre it fell into the hand of Hippothous of the race of Elatus, in whose Posteritie it continued untill the laft. Againe, the name Latinus, having a derivative found, agrees the better with the supposition of such an accident. This is the conjecture of Reyneccius, which if he made ouer-boldly, yet others may follow it with the leffe reproofe, 50 confidering that it is not cafe to finde either an apparent truth, or faire probabilitic among these disagreeing Authors, which have written the originals of Latium.

ð. III.

Of the ancient Kings of the Latines untill A NEAs his comming.

He Kings which raigned in Latium before the arrivall of Ancas were. Saturnus, Pieus, Faunus, and Latinus. Of Saturne there is nothing remembred, faue what is mentioned alreadie, and many fables of the Greekes, which whether they be appliable to this man, it is for him to judge, who shall be able to determine, whether this were the Saturne

To of the Greekes, called by them Keeres, or fome other, filled Saturne by the Aberigines. For the age wherein he lived, may very well admit him to have beene the fame: * sarchielater but the names of * Sterces, and Sterentius (for it may bee this name was not bor- cals the idels rowed from the skill which he taught the people, but rather the foile which they of the heathen laied on their grounds, had that appellation from him) doe rather make him feeme and hence it

Of Picus it is faid that he was a good Horfe-man. The fable of his being chan-we read to: ged into a Bird, which we call a Pie, may well feeme (as it is interpreted) to have Belgebal, Brigegrowne from the skill which he had in footh-faying, or dinination, by the flight and but, which is interested chattering of Fowles. Faunus, the Sonne of Pieus, raigned after his Father. Hee Dominias State-

Fauna, called Fatua, the fifter of Faunus, was also his Wife, as all Historians a- the name of antiol, in leagree; shee was held a Prophetesse, and highly commended for her chastitie; which sed God that praise in her must needes haue be ne much blemished by her marriage, it selfe be- in a like sense ing meerely incestuous.

It is not mentioned that Faunus had by his fifter any child, neither doe we reade flicke vato of any other Wife which he had, faue only that Firgit gives vnto him Latinus as his And The An Sonne, by a Nymph, called Mariet.

But who this Mirica was it is not found, faue only that her abode was about the Riuer Liris neare Minturne.

Of the name Latinus, there are by Pomponius Sabinus recounted foure : one, the Sonne of Faunus, another of Hercules, a third of Vlyffes by Circe, the fourth of Telerisachus. Suides takes notice only of the fecond, of whom he faith, that his name was suides in the Telephus, and the people anciently named the Ceti, were from his furname called word Lesius. Latini. This agrees in effect with the opinion of Reyneceins, the difference confilling almost in this only, that Suid as calls Telephus, the Soune of Hercules, whereas Revneccius makes him his Nephew, by a fonne of the fame name. This Latinus hauing obtained the fuccession in that Kingdome after Faunus, did promise his only Daughter 40 and Heire Lauinia, to Turnus the fonne of Vendia, who was lifter to Amata Latinus

But when Eners arrived in those parts with fifteene ships, or perhaps fewer, wherein might bee imbarked according to the rate which Thucydides allowes to the Veffells then vsed, about one thousand and two hundred men: then Latinus finding that it would fland best with his affurance, to make alliance with the Troing, and moued with the great reputation of Aneas, which himselfe had heard of in the Warre of Troy, gaue his Daughter to him, breaking off the former appointment with Turnus, who incenfed herewith, fought to auenge himselfe by warre; which was foone ended with his owne death.

Of Amata the Wife of Latinus, it is very certaine, that were finee an Italian, finee could not have borne a Daughter marriageable at the arrivall of Amen; vnleffe we should wholly follow Suidas, and rather give the conduct of the Cetei into Italie; to Telephus the Father, than to his Sonne, who served in the last yeare of the Troian Warre. But Reyneceius holds her an Afiatique, and thinks withall that Lauin's was borne before Telephus came into Italie. That this name Amata, by which Virgil and If disamattens call her was not proper, but rather a furname, it may feeme by Varro: who calleth her Palatia: which name very well might be derived from the Greeke name Pallas, Amata which figuifieth beloued, or decre, was the name by which the High Prieft called enery Virgin, whome hee tooke to ferue as a Nume of Pella; wherefore it is the more callly to be thought a furname, how focuer Wirgil discourse of her and Venilla her lifter.

Lawinia, the daughter of Latinus, being given in marriage to Eneas, the Kingdome of Letimo, or the greatest part of that Countrie, was established in that race; wherein it continued vistill it was ouer-growne by the might and greatnesse of the Romans.

Q. IIII.

Of ENERS, and of the Kings and Governous of Aba.

NEAS himfelfe being of the royall blond of Tree had the commound of the Dardanians: he was a valuant man, very rich, and highly honoured among the Trains. By his wife Cressis, the daughter of Prismus, he had a forme called Afamius, whose furname was Inlus, having before the ruine of Troy (as Pregil notes) 20 beene furnamed this. But when Aneus was dead, his wife Laainia, the daughter of Latinus, being great with child by him, and fearing the power of this Afranias, fledde into the Woods, where the was delinered of a fonne, called thereupon Sylvius, and furnamed Post-humus, because he was borne after his fathers Funerall. This flight of Lauinia was fo cuill taken by the people, that Afeanius procured her returne, entreated her honourably, and vfing her as a Queene, did foster her young some, his halfe-brother Sylnius. Yet afterwards, whether to avoid all occasions of difagreement, or delighted with the figuration of the place; Afamius leaving to his mother in law the Citie Lauinium, which Ameas had built, and called after his new wines name, founded the Citie 20 Albs Long and therein raigned. The time of his raigne was according to fome. eight and twentie yeares: Vugil gives him thirtie; others five and thirtie, and eight and thirtie. After his deccase, there arose contention betweene Sylvius, the sonne of Energy and Islanthe forme of Affanius, about the Kingdome: but the people inclining to the forme of Lauinia, Julius was contented to hold the Priefthood, which he and his race enjoyed, leaving the Kingdome to Sylvius Posthumus, whose posteritic were afterward called 5 day.

The raigne of the Alban Kings, with the continuance of each mans raigne, I finde thus fet downe.

Ilia, called alfo Rhea and Sylnia.

The most of these Kings lived in peace, and did little or nothing worthic of remembrance, Latinus founded many Townes in the borders of Latinus: who standing much upon the honour of their originall, grew thereby to be called Prifei Latini. Of Tie berinus some thinke that the River Tiber had name, being formerly called Albala: but Vireil gines it that denomination of another called Tibris, before the comming of Eneas into Italie. The Mountaine Auentinus had name (as many write) from Auentinus King of the Albanes, who was buried therein; but Virgil hath it otherwife. Inlines, the brother of Auentinus, is named by Eufebius as father of another In-10 lius, and grandfather of Iulius Proculus; who leaning Alba, dwelt with Romulus in Rome. Numitor, the elder sonne of Process, was deprined of the Kingdome by his brother Amulius; by whome also his sonne Agesthus was flame, and iliahis daughter made a Nunne of Vefta, that thereby the iffue of Numitor might be cut off. But the conceined two fonnes, either by her vncle Amulius, as fome thinke; or by Mars, as the Poets faine; or perhaps by some man of warre. Both the children their vncle commaunded to be drowned, and the mother buried quicke, according to the Law; which fo ordained, when the Vestall Virgins brake their chattitie. Whether it was So, that the mother was pardoned at the entreatic of Antho, the daughter of Annalius, or punished as the Law required (for Authors herein doe varie) it is agreed by 20 all, that the two children were preserved, who afterward revenged the crueltie of their yncle, with the flaughter of him and all his, and reftored Aumitor their grandfather to the Kingdome: wherein how long he raigned I finde not, neither is it greatly materiall to know; for as much as the Estates of Alba and of Latinin were presently eclipsed by the swift encrease of Rome; vpon which the computation of Time following (as farre as concernes the things of Italie) is dependant. After the death of Numitor, the Kingdome of Alba ceased; for Numitor left no male issue. Romulus chose rather to line in Rome; and of the Line of Sylvius none else remained. So the Albanes were gouerned by Magistrats; of whom onely two Dictators are mentioned, namely Caius Cluilius, who in the dayes of Tullus Hoffelius, King of 20 the Romanes, making Warre vpon Rome, died in the Campe; and Merius Suffering, the fuccessor of Clustus, who furrendred the Estate of Alba vnto the Remanes, hauing committed the hazard of both Signories to the successe of three men of each fide, who decided the quarrell by Combat : in which, the three brethren Horati, the Champions of the Romanes, prenailed against the Curiatij, Champions of the Albanes. After this Combat, when Metius (following Tullus Hoftslius with the Albane forces against the Veientes and Fidenates) withdrew his Companies out of the battaile, hoping thereby to leaue the Romanes to fuch an ouerthrow, as might make them weake enough for the Albanes to deale with Tullus; who notwithstanding this falschood obtained the victorie, did reward Metius with a cruell death, causing him. 40 to be tyed to two Chariots, and so torne in peeces. Then was Alba destroyed, and the Citizens carried to Rome, where they were made free Denizens, the noble Families being made Patritians; among which were the Iulij: of whome C. Iulius Cafar being descended, not onely gloried in his auncient, royall, and forgotten pedegree, in full affemblie of the Romanes, then gouerned by a free Estate of the People: but by his rare industrie, valour, and judgement, obtained the Soueraignetic of the Roman Empire (much by him enlarged) to himselfe and his posteritie; whereby the name of Eneas, and honor of the Troian and Alban Race, was forcuined, that feldome, if euer, any one Familie hath attained to a proportionable height of glorie.

Of the beginning of Rome, and of ROMVLVs birth and death,

F Rome, which denoured the Alban Kingdome, I may here best show the beginnings, which (though fomewhat vncertaine) depend much vpon the birth and education of Ronalus, the grand-child of Numitor, the last that raigned in Alba. For how not onely the bordering people, but all Nations betweene Emplorates and the Ocean were broken in pecces by the yron teeth of this fourth Bealt, it is not to be described in one to place, having beene the worke of many Ages; whereof I now doe handle onely the first, as incident vnto the discourse preceding. Q. Fabius, Pictor, Portius, Cato, Calabarmus Pilo, Sempronius, and others, fecke to deriue the Romans from Janus : but Herodo. tin, Marfyles, and many others of equal credit, give the Greeius for their aunceftors; and as Stralio reporteth in his fifth booke; CARCILIUS rerum Romano, um feritior eo argumento colligit, Roman à Gracis effe conditam quod Romani Graco ritu, antiquo instituto HERCVLI rem faciant, matrem quoque EVANDRI venerantur Romani; CAECILIVS (faith he) a Romane Historiographer, doth by this argument gather, that Rome was built by the Greekes, because the Bomanes, after Greekish fashion, by auncien! Ordinance doe facilitie to HERCVLES: the Romanes also worthin the mother of 20

Plutareb in the life of Romalus remembers many founders of that Citie: as Romamust be fonne of Plyffes and Circo; Romas the fonne of Emsilian, whome Diamedes fent thither from Troy; or that one Romas, a Tyrant of the Latines, who drave the Tufcans out of that Countrey, built it. Solinus beltowes the honour of building Rome vpon Enander, faying, That it was before times called Valentia, Lieraelides giues the denomination to a captine Ladie, brought thither by the Greeigns; others fay, That it was aunciently called Febris, after the name of Februs, the mother of Alars; witnesse Saint Augustine in his third Booke de Civitate Dei. But Liuie will haue it to be the worke of Romulus, cuen from the foundation: of whome and his 30 conforts Inneral to a Roman Citizen vaunting of their originall, answered in these > Astamen vt longe repetas, longed, readlass Maiorum quifquis primus fuit ille tuorum, Aut pafter fuis, aut illud qued dicere note.

Yet though thou fetch thy pedegree fo farre; Thy first Progenitor, who ere he were, Some Shepheard was, or elfe, that He forbeare. meaning either a Shepheard, or a Theefe.

Now of Royalus begetting of his education and prefernation, it is faid. That he had Rhea for his mother, and Mars was supposed to be his father; that he was must by a Wolfe, found and taken away by Faulfula, a Shepheards wife. The fame yangtural nurling had Cyrus, the same incredible fostering had Seminamis; the one by a Bitch, the other by Birds. But, as Plutarch faith, it is like youngh that Amilius came concred with armor to Rhea, the mother of Ramulas, when he begat her with child: and therein it feemeth to me that he might have two purpofes; the one, to deftroy her, because she was the caughter and heire of his elder brother, from whom he injuriously held the Kingdome; the other to fatisfie his appetite, because she so was faire and goodly. For thee being made a Nunne of the Goddeffe Vesta, it Banches folders was death in her, by the Law, to breake her chastitie. I also finde in Fanches his Antiquitez de Gaule, that Meronce, King of the Franci, was begotten by a monfler of the Sea : but Fanchet fayes, Let them believe it that lift; Il le creira ani vondra:

allo of Alexander, and of Scipio African, there are poeticall inventions: but to answere these imaginations in generall, it is true, that in those times, when the World was fuil of this barbarous Idolatrie, and when there were as many Gods as there were Kings, or pallions of the minde, or as there were of vices and vertues; then did many women greatly borne, coner fuch flips as they made, by proteiling to be forced by more then humane power : to did Oenone confesse to Paris, that thee had been erauithed by Apollo. And Anchifes boafted that hee had knowne Fenus. But Rhea was made with child by fome man of Warre, or other, and therefore called Mars, the God of battell, according to the fense of the time. Oenene was ouer-

To come by a ttrong wit, and by fuch a one as had those properties ascribed to alreade. The Mother of Meronée might fancie a Sea Captaine to bee gotten with yong by fuch a one: as the Daughter of Insolus fancied, according to Lerodotus. edinero was a bastard and begotten vpon some faire Harlot, casted for her beautie Fema, and was therefore the child of luft, which is Venus, Romalus was nurat by a Wolfe, which was Lupa, or Lupina, for the Curtefans in those daies were called Wolfes, gas nume (faith HALICAR NASSARVS) honeftiori vocabulo amice appellantur: Which remove by an honester nume called friends. It is also written, that nonclus was in the end of his life taken vp into heaven, or rather out of the world by his Father Mars, in a great forme of thunder, and lightning: fo was it faid that Eners vanished away by the 20 River Mameus: but thereof Lineallo speaketh modelly; for hee rehearful the other opinion, that the florme was the furie of the Senators , but flormeth to adhere partially to this taking vp; and many Authors agree that there was an vnnaturall darkeneile, both at his birth and at his death, and that he might bee flaine by thunder or lightning, it is not vulkely. For the Emperour Anafrafius was fiaine with lightning, fo was Strato the Father of Pompey flaine with a thunder-bolt : fo Carus the Emperour (who fucceeded Probus) whilefthe lodged with his Armie you the River Tigrie, was there flaine with lightning. But a Mars of the same kinde might end him that beganne him; for he was begotten by a man of Warre, and by violence destroied. And that he died by violence (which destinie followed mott of the 20 Roman Emperours) it appeareth by Tarquinius Superbus: who was but the feuenth King after him: who when he had murthered his father in law, commanded that he should not be buried, for (faid he) Romulus himselfe dyed and was not buried. But let Halicar naffans end this dispute : whose words are these. They (faith he) who draw neerest to the truth, say that he was slaine by his owne Citizens; and that his cruelite in punishments of offendors, together with his arrogencie, were the coule of his flaughter. For it is reported that both when his mother was rauffeed, whether by some man, or by a God, the whole body of the sunne was celipsed, and all the earth concred with darkenesse like with night, and that the fame did happen at his death.

Such were the birth and death of Romalus: whose life historified by Plutarch, 40 doth containe (besides what is here already spoken of him) the conquest of a sew miles which had foone beene forgotten, if the Roman greatheffe built upon that foundation, had not given it memorie in all ages following, euen vnto this day. A valiant man be was, very strong of body, patient of traueil, and temperate in diet, as forbeating the vie of wine and delicacies but his raging ambition lice knew not how to temper, which caused him to flay his brother, and neglect renence of the death of Talius his companion in the Kingdome, that he himfelfe might be Lord alone in those narrow Territories. He raigned seuen and thirtie yeares: first alone, then with Tating, and after his death fingle, till he was flaine, as is alreadic linewed: after which time the Sourraignetic fell into the hands of Aums, a man to him vn-50 knowne, and more Priest-like than King-like: wherein Rome it selfe in her later times bath somewhat resembled this King. For having long beene sole Gonernesse till Constantinople shared with her: afterwards, when as the Greeke Emperous was crushed by forraine enemies, and the Latines disposled of Imperiall power, shee fell into the subjection of a Prelate, swelling by degrees from the Sheepe-hooke to the Sword, and therewith victorious to excelling magnificence, from whence by the fome degrees it fell, being driven from luxurie to defensive armes, and therein hauing beene infortunate, at length betakes her selse againe to the Crossers staffe.

And thus much of Rome in this place by occasion of the storie of the times of King Abox, during whose raigne in Iurie, the foundations of this famous Citie were laied.

of the beginning of Ezecutas, and of the agreeing of Prolomies, NABONASSAR, NABOPOLASSAR, and MARDOCEM-PADYS, with the Hillerie of the Bible.

S the first yeare of Alars his raignewas confounded with the laft of his Father Jotham fo was the later end of his lixteene yeares taken up in the three first of Ezekias his Sonne. This appeares by the raigne of Ho-(es, over Wisel, which beganne in the twelfth of Abaz, and therefore the third thereof was concurrent with his fourteenth. But the third of Hafea was the first of Ezekin; fo it followes, that Ezekin beganne to raigne in his Fathers fourteenth yeare. Like e- 20 nough it is, that the third years of Hofes, the fame being the fourteenth of Alice, was almost spent when

Facility legistrate, and fo the presently years of Abat may have been concurrent, for the medioart, with the first of Eaches.

By Supposing that Hofes beganne his Kingdome, when the twelfth yeare of Aliaz. was almost complear, forme would finde the meanes how to difform the first of Hezelia from the lifeconth of Abaz, placing him yet one years later, of which years, Abaz may perhaps have lived not many daies. But feeing that the fourteenth and filecenth yeares of Ezekia, may not be removed out of their places; it is vaine labour

In the Convercents of Ezekia, Senaciteats inunding Inda, and the Countries adjoyning, loft his Armie by a miraculous ftroke from heaven, fled home, and was finine. The yeare following it was that God added fifteene yeares to the life of Ezelis, when he had alreadic raigned fourteene of his nine and twentie: and the fame yeare was that miracle feene of the Sunnes going back; of which wonder (as I beare) one tracholomen Scaltet, who is much commended for skill in Astronomie, hath by calculation found the very day, which answered vnto the twentie fifth of April, in the Islam yeare, being then Thursday. I have not scene any workes of Scalet : but forcely to finde a motion to irregular and miraculous, it is necessarie that he produce forme record of observation made at such a time. How somer it be, the 50 differently were of Ezekin is agreed upon; and therefore wee may not alter the first. action 2007. As for that laving, which is virall in the like cafes, that A is Az fort with his Bathers, and Example Some raigned in his feed, it doth no more prove that Enchis raigned not with his Father, than the like faying doth inferre the like at the death of leke(aphat, and fuccellion of Jehoram; whereof, as concerning the beginning of the

Sonne to raigne whileft his Father lived, we have alreadie faid enough. Of this godly King Ezekins, we finde, that his very beginning tellified his deuotion and zeale. For whether it were fo that his unfortunate and ungratious Father (who had out-worne his reputation) gaue way to his Sonnes proceedings, which perhaps it lay not in him to him er; or whether (as I rather thinke) the first years and first moneth of his raigne, wherein Ezekins opened the dores of the Temple, 2 chron. 19.23. were to be understood as the beginning of his fole gouernement; we plainely finde it to have beene his first worke, that he opened the dores of the house of the Lord, which Achaz had flut vp, cleanfed the Citie and Kingdome of the Idolls, reitored the Priefts to their offices, and effates, commanded the Sacrifices to bee offered attenues. which had beene for many yeares neglected, and brake downe the brafen Serpent of Mofes, because the people burnt incense before it, and hee called it Nebullitan, 2.Kings 18. which lignifieth a lumpe of braffe. He did also celebrate the Paffe-ouer with great magnificence, inuiting thereunto the Ifraelites of the ten Tribes. Many there were, cuen out of those Tribes, that came up to Ierusalem, to this feast : but the generall multitude of Ifrael did laugh the Meffengers of Ezekia to feorne.

It was not long ere they that scorned to solemnize the memoriall of their deliuerance out of the Egyptian feruitude, fell into a new feruitude, out of which they neon uer were deliuered. For in the fourth of Ezekia his raigne, Salmanaffar the Sonne of Tiglath, the Sonne of Belochus, hearing that Hofen King of Ifrael had practifed with See King of Agypt, against him : inuaded Ilrael, believed Samaria, and in the third yeare (after the Inhabitants had endured all forts of miferies) forced it, and carried thence the ten Idolatrous Tribes into Afgriaand Media: among whom Tobias and his Sonne of the fame name, with ... in whis Wife, were fent to Ninine, in whose Seats and Places the Afgrians fent ftrangers of other Nations, and among them many of the ancient Enemies of the Ifraelites, as those of Cutha, Ana, Hamah, and Sphernaim, belides Bibylonians: whose Places and Nations I have formerly described in the Treatife of the holy Land.

30 Thefe later Afgrian Kings, and the Persians, which followed them, are the first. of whom wee finde mention made both in Prophane and Sacred bookes. These therefore ferue most aptly to joyne the times of the old World, (whereof none but the Prophets \ aue written otherwife than fabuloufly) with the Ages following that were better knowne, and described in course of Historie. True it is, that of Cyrus and fome other Persians, we finde in the Bible the same names by which other Authors have recorded them : but of Phul & Salmanaffar, with other Afgrian, and Children Kings, discribic of name bath bred quellion of the persons. Therefore, whereas the Scriptures doe speake of Salmanassar, King of Assur, who raigned in the time of Ahaz, and Ezekia, Kings of Inda, and of Hofea King of Ifrael, whom he 40 carried into captiuitie; and whereas Ptolomie makes mention of Nabonassar, speaking precifely of the time wherein he lived; it is very pertinent to fliew, that Salmonaflar and Nabonaffar were one and the fame man. The like reason also requireth, that it bee shewed of Nebuchadnezzar, that hee was the same, whom Ptolomic calleth

Nabopolassar. Of both these points Bucholeerus hath well collected sufficient proofe from the exact calculations of fundrie good Mathematicians. For by them it appeares than betweene Nabonaffar and the birth of Christ, there passed seven hundred fortie and fixe yeares : at which distance of time the raigne of Salmanaslar was. One great proofe hereof is this, which the fame Bucholeerus alleageth out of Erafmus Reinholdus, 50 in the Prutenick Tables. Mardocempadus King of Babylon (whom Ptolomic, fpeaking of three Eclipses of the Moone, which were in his time, doth mention) was the same whom the Scriptures call Merodach, who fent Embaffadors to Hezekia, King of Inda. So that if wee reckon backwards to the difference of time, betweene Meroduch and Salmanassar, we shall finde it the same which is betweene Mardocempadus and Nabe-

nation. Likewife Ennelius doth thew, that whereas from the defirmation of Semanta, to the denastation of Ierufalem, in the nineteenth of Nebusinalnessar, we collect out of the Scriptures, the diffance of one hundred thirtie and three yeares : the felfe fame difference of time is found in Ptologije, betweene Asbonaffar and Nabovelatian, Forwhereas Piologic feemes to differ from this accompt, making 2V about far more ancient by an hundred and fortie yeares, than the detiruction of Jerufalen, wee are to understand that he tooke Sameris in the eighth years of his raigne; so that the seuen foregoing yeares added to thefe one hundred thirtie and three, make the accompts of the Scriptures fall euen with that of Ptolomie, Ptolomies computation is, that from the first of Mabounffor to the fifth of Mabopolaffor, there passed one hundred twentie 10 and feven yeares. Now if wee adde to thefe one hundred twentie feven; the thirteencenfuing of Nabuchalpellars yeares, before the Citie and Temple were defined ed, we have the fumme of one hundred and fortie yeares. In fo plaine a cafe more procles are needleffe, though many are brought, of which this may ferue for all, that Projects placeth the first of Autopoissfor one hundred twentie and two yeares, after the firth of Alban of ar, which agreeth exactly with the Scriptures. To thefe notes are added the confent of all Mathematicians; which in accompt of times I hold more fare than the authoritie of any Historie; and therefore I thinke it follow to make doubt, whereas Historians and Mathematicall observations doe so throughly concurre.

Yet for almuch as that argument of the learned Stallger doth reft vnanfwered, whereby he proud Baladan the Pather of Acroduch, to have beene this 21 about far. I will not foure to loofe a word or two ingining the Reader latisfaction herein. It is true, that the next observations of the beauculy Bodies, which Ptolomie recorded, after the time of Aubonaffer, were in the raigne of Mardocompadus; the fecond yeare of whose raigne, is, according to Ptolomic concurrent in part with the twentie. feuen of Nabonoffar. For the fecond of three ancient Eclipfes which he calculates, being in the fecond years of Mardocompadus, was from the beginning of Makonaffar twentie feuen yeares, fenenteene daies, and eleuen houres : the accompt from Anlandfir, beginning at high noone the first day of the Agyptica moneth That, than 20 answering to the twentic fixt of Februarie; and this Eclipse being fiftie minutes before mid-night, on the eighteenth day of that Moneth, when the first day thereof agreed with the nineteenth of Februarie; to that the difference of time betweene the two Kings Aubenaffar and Mardocempadas, is noted by Ptelemie, according to the Agrician yeares. But how does this prone, that Marcheempadus or Merodach, was the Sonne of Nabonaffar? yea, how doth it proue, that he was his next Success for, or any way of his Linage? It was enough to fatisfic me, in this argument, that Sadiger himselfe did afterwards believe Atardocompadus to have beene rather the Nephew, than the Sonne of Baladan, or Nabanaffar. For if he might be either the Nephew, or the Sonne; he might perhaps be neither the one, nor the other. But 40 because our Countrie-man Lidyate hath reprehended Scaliger for changing his opinion; and that both Torniellus, who followes Sesliger herein, and Sesbus Calaifius, who hath drawne into forme of Chronologie, that learned worke, De Emendatione Temporam, doe hold up the fame affection, confounding Baladan with Alaboration I have taken the paines to fearch, as farre as my leifure and diligence could reach, after any fentence that might proue the Kindred or fuccession of these two. Yet cannot I finde in the Almagest (for the Scriptures are either silent in this point, or aduerfe to Sealiger; and other good authoritie, I know none, in this bulineffe) any fentence more nearely proping the fuccession of Merodach to Nationaffar, than the place now laft rebearfed; which makes no more, to thew that the one of these was so Father to the other, than (that I may vie a like example) the as neare fuccession of William the Conqueror, declares him, to have beene Sonne, or Grand-child to Edward the Confessor. This considered, wee may safely goe on with our accompt from Nabonaffar, taking him for Sulmanaffar; and not fearing, that the Readers will be driven from our booke, when they finde fomething in it, agreeing with Annies, forasmuch as these Kings mentioned in Scriptures, raigned in Babylon, and Albria.

in those very times which by Diodorus and Ptolomie are assigned to Belosus, Nabonal-far, and Mardocempadus, and the reft: no good Historie naming any others, that raigned there in those ages, and all Astronomicall observations, fitly concurring,

32 Hen Salmanaffar was dead, and his fonne Sennacherib in poffellion of the Empire, in the fourteenth yeare of Ezechias, he demanded of him fuch Tribute as was agreed on at fuch time as Tiglath, the Grand-father of Sennacherib, and Father of Salmanaffar, inuited by Ahaz, inuaded Rezen King of Damafeus, and delivered him from the dangerous Warre which Ifrael had undertaken against him. This Tribute and acknowledgement when Ezechias denied, Semacherib, having (as it feemes) a purpose to in-20 uade Agypt, fent one part of his Armie to lie before Jerufalem. Now though fize. chias (fearing this powerfull Prince) had acknowledged his fault, and purchased his peace, as he hoped, with thirtie hundred talents of liluer, and thirtie talents of gold: wherewith he prefented Sennacherib, now fet downe before Lachis in Iudaa, yet vnder the colour of better affurance, and to force the King of Indianto deliver hoftages, 2, King 18, 20 the Affyrian enuironed Ierufalem with a groffe Armie, and having his Sword in his hand, thought it the fittest time to write his owne conditions.

Exechias directed his three greatest Counsellers, to partie with Rabfaces, ouer the Wall; and to receive his demands: who wfed three principall arguments to perfwade the people to yeeld themselves to his Master Semacherib. For though the 20 Chancellar, Steward, and Secretarie, sent by Ezeebias, defired Rabfaces to speake vnto them in the Syrian tongue, and not in the Ienifb, yet hee with a more foud voice directed his speech to the multitude in their owne language. And for the first, hee made them know, That if they continued oblinate, and adhered to their King, that they would, in a short time, bee inforced to cate their owne dung, and drinke their owne vrine: Secondly, he altogether disabled the King of Agypt, from whom the Indexus hoped for fuccour; and compared him to a broken staffe, on which who focuer leaneth pierceth his owne hand : Thirdly, that the Gods who should helpe them, Exceluse had formerly broken and defaced, meaning chiefly (as it is thought by some) the brasen Serpent, which had beene preserved ever since catoles time: 40 and withall he bad them remember the Gods of other Nations: whom, not withstanding any power of theirs, his Master had conquered and throwne downe; and for God himfelfe, in whom they trufted, he perfwaded them by no meanes to relie on him; for he would deceive them. But finding the people filent (for fo the King had commanded them) after a while when he had understood that the King of 4rabia was marching on with a powerfull Armie, he himselfe left the Asprisa forces

But Ezerbias fending those Counsellers to the Prophet Esay, which had lately beene sent to Rabfaces, received from him comfort, and affurance, that this Heathen Idolater should not prevaile; against whom the King also befought aide from almightie God, repeating the most infolent and blasphemous parts of Sennacheribs letter, before the

The reason that moved Sennacherib to defire to possesse himselfe in hast of Jerusalem, was that he might thereinto have retraited his Armie, which was departed, as it feemeth from the fiege of Pelulium in Agypt, for feare of Terhies : and though the Scriptures are filent of that enterprise (which in these bookes of the Kings, and of the Chronisles or Parelipomenon, (peake but of the affaires of the Ierres in effect) yet the ancient Berofiss, and out of him Iofephas, and S. Fter this maruellous delinerie, Ezekias fickened, and was told by Ifaiab, West that he mult die: but aiter he had befought God with teates for his delucrie, #faith as he was going from him returned againe, and had warrant from the Spirit of God to promife him recourrie after three dayes, and a prolongation of his life for fifteene yeares. But Ezekius fomewhat cloubtfull of this exceeding grace, prayeth a figne to confirme him: whereupon, at the prayer of Halab, the shadow of the Sunne cast it selfe the contrarie way, and 2. Rings 20 went backe tenne degrees, vpon the Dyall of Achaz. The cause that moved Ezekins to lament (faith Saint Hierome) was, because he had as yet no sonne, and then in despaire that the Mephas should come out of the house of David, or at least of his Seede. His disease seemeth to be the Pestilence, by the medicine given him by the Prophet, to wit, a maffe of Figges, layed to the Botch or Soare.

This wonder when the Wife men of Children had told to Merodach, King of Babylon, the first of that house, he sent to Ezekias, to be informed of the cause: at which time Exekins thewed him all the Treasure hee had, both in the Court and in the Kingdome: for which he was reprehended by the Prophet Ifaiab, who tolde him; The dayes are at hand, that all that is in thine house, an I what some rby fathers have layed Elay and up in flore to this day, flat be carried into Babel; nothing thall be left, fayth the Lord. It may feeme itrange, how Ezekia should have got any treasure worth the shewing: for Senacherib had robbed him of all, the yeare before. But the spoyle of the same Senseherib his Campe repayed all with advantage, and made Eachia richer upon the fuddaine then ever he had beene; which vnexpected wealth was a ftrong temptati-40 on to boalling. After this time Ezelia had rest, and spending without novse that addition which God had made vnto his life, he died, having raigned nine and twentie yeares. In two respects they say that hee offended God: the one, that hee rejoyced too much at the defirmerion and lamentable end of his enemie; the other, that hee for much gloried in his riches, as he could not forbeare to their them to francers. But the reason which moved Exekins (speaking humanely) to entertaine the limbassadors of Merodach in this friendly and familiar manner, was, because he came to visit 50 him, and brought him a prefent, congratulating the recoverie of his health; as also in that Meradael had weakened the house of Senseberib, his fearefull enemie. For Alexadael, who was Commaunder and Lieutenant under Senacherib in Babelon, vfurped that State himfeld in the laft years of that King, and held it by firong hand against his some Affactandion; who was not onely simple, but impaired in streng h,

But forasmuch as the last yeare of Salmanassar was also the first of Senacherib his fonne, we reckon the time, wherein the house of Phul held the Assyrian Kingdome, to have been an hundred and one yeares; of which, the last flue and twentie were spent with Exciting under Salmanassar Senachrib, and Assarbadom.

Forto reconcile so great a difference, as is sound in those Writers that varie from Eschias, is more than 140 dare vndertake. I will onely here set downe the roll of Kings that raigned in Media, accordingly as sundrie Authors have deliuered it.

Diodorus Sieulus following Ciefius (as perhaps Annius made hist Metaflhenes follow Diodore, with some little variation, that he might not seeme a borrower) placeth them thus.

Altybara. Sthe continuance of these two he doth not mention.

Merestor hath laboured with much diligence, to reconcile these Catalogues, and to make them also agree with Eusseline. But for assume that is seemen to me an impossible matter, to attaine with of these forgotten times, by conjectures of bounded vpon Ctessa and Metassibenes, I will lay the burthen vpon Eusseline, who lieucid in an age better furnished than ours, with books of this argument. Let it therefore suffice, that these two Kings (whom I hauterckoned as contemporaries with Exchis) Medician and Cardienes, a refound in Eusseline: for whether Cardienes were Diederesh his Arbianes, I will not stay to search. The Kings of Media, according to Eusseline and Cardienes.

These names, and this course of succession I retaine; but adde vnto these, Cyaxares the sonne of Asyages, according to Xenophen; and sometimes sollow Herodoins, in setting downe the length of a Kings ratigne, otherwise than Ensemble than the cost of which variations, I will render my reasons in due place.

The twentie nine yeares of Ezekia were concurrent, in part, with the rule of the four first that were chosen Gouernours of Albeas for ten yeares; that is, of Charays, Elimetas, Elidiaus, and Hippanes. Touching the first of these I beare nothing, faue that Rome was built in his first yeare; of which perhaps himselfed did not heare. Of the second and third I finde only the heames. The fourth made himselfe knowne by a strange example of justice, or rather of cruelic, that here shewed wpon his owne Laughter. For he finding that shee had offended in whe hastlitie, caused her to be lock twp with an Horse, guing to mether of them any foode: so the Horse, constrained by hunger, denoured the vnhappie Woman.

50 In Rome, the first King, and Founder of that Citie Romalus, did raigne both before, and somewhat after Ezekia.

In Lydia, Candaules the last King, ruled in the same age.

This Region was lift called Masnis, Lydus the fonne of Atyratigning in It, gaue the name of Lysics, if we believe fuch authoritie as we finde. This Kingdome was afterward, by the appointment of an Oracle, conferred your Argon, who came of Alexan the forne of thread by Jardams, a bond-woman. The race of these Iteracidal continued raigning liftie time yearse (in which two and wentie Generations passed) the thing the continued raigning liftie fine yearse (in which two and wentie Generations passed) the last of this race, who doated so much you the beautic of his owne Wife, that her could not be econtent to enjoy her, but would needse enforce one Gyges, the fonne of Dafsplus, to behold her naked bodie; and placed the wnwilling man screetly in her chamber, where he might seek progressing to bedward. This was not so to follow are continued, but that the Queene perceived Gyges at his going forth, and understanding the matter, tookeit in such high distaines, that thee forced him the next day to requite the Kings follie with treason. So Gygs, being brought againe into the fame chamber by the Queene, slew Candaules, and was rewarded not only with his Wise, but with the Kingdome of Lydia. He raigned thirtie eight yeares, beginning in the last of Eachsta, one yeare before the death of Romalus.

After Grees, his fonne Areys raigned nine and fortie yeares, then Sadyattes, twelue; Halyattes, fittie feuen; and finally Crafus, the fonne of Halyattes, fourteene yeares:

who loft the Kingdome, and was taken by Cyrus of Persia.

And here by the way we may note, that as the Lyshun Kings, whom Cressus his 20
Progenitor disposses, are deduced from Iterates, so of the same Iterates there sprang many other Kings, which gouerned several Countries very long; as in Assa, the Myslams; in Greec, the Lacedenmanns, Chessians, Sorinthams, and Argues; and from the Argues; the Macedonians; as likewise from the Cornilians, the Syraulanes: beliefes many great and famous, though prinate,

But of the Heralide that raigned in Lydis, I have not troubled my felfe to take notice in the times of their feuerall raignes: forlittle is found of them, befide the bare names, and the follic of this laft

Of the Kings that raigned in Ægypt, betweene the deliuerance of Israel from thence, and the raigne of Ezrkia in Juda, when Ægypt and Iuda made a league against the Assyrians.

ð. I.

That many names of Ægyptian Kings, found in Historie, are like to have belonged only to Viceroyes. An example proving this out of WILLIAM of Tyre his Historie of the boly Warr

Hz emulation and quartells ariling in these times, between the might kingdomes of \( \mathcal{E}(p) rad \), for equire our paines, in collecting the most memorable things in \( \mathcal{E}(p) rad \), and setting downed briefly the state of that Countrie, which had continued long a flourishing Region, and was of great power, when it contended with \( \mathcal{E}(p) rad \), and other ancient fire. 30 I can fland to; though I hold it no flame to faile in fluch conjectures. That which I have deliutered, in speaking mine opinion of the \( \mathcal{E}\) gyptian Dynassius, must be reagaine helpe me. For it may truely be caffirmed, T hat the great number of Kings, which are said to haue raigned in \( \mathcal{E}\) gytt, were none other than Viceroyes or Stewards, sinch as soleph was, and such as were the Soldanse in later ages. Therefore, I will not only sobbeare to seeke after those, whom \( \mathcal{Herodots}\) deliuering them by number, without rehearling their names; but will saue the labour of marshalling them in order, whose names only are sound; the yeares of their raignes, and other circumflances, prouing them to have beene Kings in deede, being not recorded.

tances, proung them to hade oene kings in decede, being in recorded.

But that I may not feeme before hand, to lay an imaginarie ground, whereupon after I may build what I lift; it were not amilife, to giue vnto the Reader fuch fatisfaction in this point, as apparent reafon, and truth of Hiftorie doth affoord. First therefore, we cought not to beleeue those numbers of Generations, which the lying Priests haue reckoned vp; to magnific their Antiquities. For wee know, that from Abraham, our Sauione Christ was remoued only fortic two defectors, which makes it euident, that in farre thorter time, namely before the Persian Empire, there could not haue passed away twice as many successions in £gpt: especially considering, that many of these, whose continuancies expersised, haue raigned longer, than fortie yeares. It followes that we should square the number of the £gptim than fortie yeares.

50 Kings, in some even proportion, to those which did beare rule in other Countries.

As for the rest, whose names wee finde scattered here and there; any man that will take the painest to reade the nineteenth booke of the holy Warre, written by William Archbishop of Tyre, may cassily personal thinsels, that it is not hard to find names enough that it is not hard to find names are not to the country of the c than Regents or Viceroies. Yet will I hereinfert, as briefly as I can, fomethings making to that purpofe, for the pleafure and information of fuel, as will not trouble themfelines with running ouer many Authors.

When Elbaskeh the Califa ruled in Aggipt, one Dargan, a powerfull and a fubtile man, made him Glic Salkan, by force and cunning, chaling away Sanaran Araban, who was Salkan before and atter him. This Dargan minitred matter of quarreil to Canadische Ting of the Maken; and fulfatined, with little loffe, an inuation, which Analytic made vpon Aggipt. Hereupon hee grew to infolent and proud, that Sanar the former salkan hoped to make his partie good againfi him; if hee could get any forces wherewith to enter Aggipt. Briefly, Sanar fuech to Norsdam, King to of Langton, for aide, who fends an Armie of his Tinker, under the command of Sarvan against the Salkan Langan, So Deag and Sanar met, and fought: The Victorie was Langan, but he enjoyed it not thoring the fire was faine by treation, whereby Sanar did receive his Dignitie which to ethablish he flew all the Kindred and Friends of Dargan, that he could finde in the great Clice of Cana.

To all these doings, the Calaph Elbaskeh gaue little regard is for he thought it little concerned birm, which of them lined, and had the administration of the Kingdome, while I he en night have the presist of it, and enjoy his pressure. But never troubles presently arise, which (one would thinke) doe nearely touch the Calaph himselfe. Syraem with his Taskes, whom Sasar hast posten to come into Jeepps, will not 20 now be interacted there to leave him, and quietly goe their way home. They serve you the Towne of Reliais, which they britise, and there attend the arrival of more Companie from Damfog, for the conquest of all Acesses. The Saskan perceives their intent and finds himselfernot strong enough to expell them, much lesse to repell the Tasksh michael was likely to second them. He there fore sends McGengers to King Almaniske of Tendalow, whom with large promises, bee gets to bring him aide, and so drives out the Tasks. Of all this trouble, the great Calaph heaves nothing, or not for much, as should make him look to the playing of his owne game.

A greater mischiese ariseth, concerning the Csliph Elizaceth particularly, in his owne Title. Syracon, Captaine of the Turkes, that had beene in deeppt, goes to the 200 Caliph of Baldach (who was opposite to him of Accept, each of them cialming as heire to Mahomet, that falle Prophet, the Soueraignetic ouer all that were of the Saracen Law) and tells him the weakenesse of the aegiptian, with his owne abilitie of doing feruice in those parts, offering his best meanes for the extirpation of the Schifmaticall Caliph, and the reduction of all Acgypt, with the Westerne parts, under the fubjection of the Babylonian. This motion is reacily and joyfully entertained; all the Eafterne Prouinces are up in Armes; and Syracon, with a mightie power, defcendeth into Accept. The noise of this great expedition so affrightern King Aenaricke, that with all his forces hee hafteth into Acquet; well knowing how nearely it concerned him and his Kingdome of terufalem, to keep the Sarracens from joyning 40 all under one head. Sanar the Soldan perceiving the faith full care of the Christians his friends, wellcomes them, and beffirs himfelfe in giving them all manner of content, as it behooved him: for by their admirable valous, be finally drave the enemies out of the Countrie. But this victorie was not fo foone gotten, as it is quickly told.

Strangeit is (which moftconcernes our prefer the purpose) that of for desperate a danger, the Califfs, as yet, fermes to know nothing. May we not thinke him to have beene Kingia title only, who medled so little in the Cournement? The Salam, finding that the Christians (without whose heipe, all was lot) could not well flay, so long as his necessities required; makes large offers to King Almerick, youn condition, that he should abide by it. He promifest a great Tribute (Wham of Type calls 50 its Tribute; the Saraems, perhaps, called lie Pension, which the Kings of femplates should receive out of Egypt, for this behooveful affishance. But the Cristians vnderslanding that the Salam (how much secure be took exponsion) was subject to an higher Lord, would make no bargaine of fisch importance, with any other than the Caliph himselfe. Hereupon Hugh Farle of Cofarea, and a Knight of the Templars, are fire with Elbadech, to ratific the concnants. Now shall wee see the greatness of the Coliph and his estate.

The Emba fladors were conneighed by the soldon to Cairo; where arriving at the Palace, they found it guarded by great troupes of Souldiers. The first entrance was through darke Porches, that were kept by many armed bands of £theopians, which, with all diligence, did reuerence wno the soldon, as he passed along. Through these streights the Warders led them, into goodly open Courts, of fuch beautic and riches, that they could not retain the grautic of Emba fladors, but were enforced

50 to admire the things which derained their cies. For there they faw goodly marble Fullars, gilded Beames, all wrought oner with emboffed works, curious pauements, filh-ponds of marble with clear ewaters, and many forts of fitrange Birds, wiknowne in thefe parts of the world, as comming perhaps from the Eaft mater, which then were undifcoured. The further they went the greater was the magnificence, for the Calipb his Emmekes conucighed them into other Courts within thefe; as farre excelling the former, as the former did firpsaffe ordnarie houses. It were tedious perhaps to rehearfe, how, the further they entred, the more high flate they found, and caufe of merualle, fuffice; that the good Archbifltop, who wrote the fe things, was neuer held a vaine Author. Finally, they were brought into the Calipbs wome

20 lodgings, which were yet more flately, and befter guarded, where entring the Prefence, the Solam, having twice profitated himselfe, did the chird time call off his Sword, that he ware about his neck, and throw himselfe on the ground, before the curtaine, behind which the Caliph fate. Prefently the trauerfe, wrought with gold and pearles, was opened, and the Caliph himselfe discovered, fitting withgreen Majettie on a throne of gold, having very few of his most inward fervants and Euromehrs about him. When the Solam had humbly kissed his Masters teet, he briefly told the cause of his comming, the danger wherein the land stood, and the offers that he had made vnto King Almaricke, destring the Caliph himselfe to ratife them, in prefence of the Emballadors. The Caliph answered, That he would throughly perform call

30 which was promifed. But this contented not the Embaffadors: They would hate him to giue his hand yoon the bargaine; which the Agyptians; that flood by, thought an impudent requeft. Ye this great nelfe condel cended at length, after much deliberation, at the earnest request of the Soldan, to reach out his hand. When the Earle of Cofarea saw that the Catiph gaue his hand, neither willingly nor bare, hee told him roundly thus much in effect. Sin, Truth Reksen on holes to lide it selfe; Princes, that will hold couenant, must deale openly, nakedly, and sincerely g Giue vs therefore your bare hand, if you meane that we shall trust you, for wee will make no bargaines with your Glouc. Much adoe there was about this: for it feemed against the Majestic of such a Prince to yeeld so farre. But, when it would none o

40 therwise be, with a smiling cheare (though to the great gricee of his Seruants) hee wouthfasted to let the Earle take him by the bare hand; and so rehearsing the conenants word by word, as the Earle spake them, he ratified all; dismissing sinally the Embassadors, with such rewards as testission his Greatnesse.

In this Calipb and his Sultan, wee may different he Image of the ancient Pharach; and his Pieco 9: we fee a Prince of great cflate, fitting in his Palace, and not ovexing himselfe with the great preparations made againft him, which terrife his neighbour Countries: we fee his Viceroy, in the meane feafon, vling all Roiall power; making warre and peace, entertaining, and expelling Armies of thrangers; yea, making the Land of Exppt tributarie to a formain Prince. What greater authoritie was given 50 to 10 feph, when Pharach faid vnto him, Thou shall be over mine kease, and at thy word shall my people be armed, only in the Kings Throne will I be about thee, Bebold, I have for the cover all the Land of Exppt?

I doe not commend this forme of Gouernement; neither can I approoue the conjecture of mine Author, where he ethinks, that the Agyptians, cuer fine

Jujeples time, have felt the burthen of that feruitude, which he brought vpon them. when he bought them, and their Lands, for Pharach. Herein I finde his judgement good; that he affirmes this manner of the Agyptian Kings, in taking their cafe, and ruling by a Viceroy, to be part of the ancient customes, practifed by the Pharaohs, For we finde, that even the Ptolomies (excepting Ptolomeus Lagi, and his fonne Philadelphus, founder and establisher of that race) were given, all of them, wholly to pleafe their owne appetites, leaving the charge of the Kingdome to Women, Eunuches, and other ministers of their defires. The pleasures which that Countrie affoorded, were indeede fufficient, to inuite the Kings thereof vnto a voluptuous life; and the awfull regard wherein the Agyptians held their Princes, gave them 10 fecuritie, whereby they might the better trust their Officers, with so ample Commission. But of this matter I will not stand longer to dispute. It is enough to have thewed, that the great and almost absolute power of the Viceroies governing &gypt, is fet downe by Mofes, and that a lively example of the fame is found in William of Tyre; who lived in the fame age; was, in few yeares after, Chancellor of the Missidome of Icrufalem; and had full discourse with Hugh Earle of Cafarea, touching all these matters. Wherefore it remaines, that wee bee not carried away with a vaine opinion, to believe that all they were Kings, whom reports of the fabulous Appliant, have bonored with that file; but reft contented with a Catalogue of fuch, as wee finde by circumstance, likely to have raigned in that Countrie; after 20 whom it followes that we should make enquirie.

From the departure of Israel out of Agypt, vnto the raigne of Thuoris (who is generally taken to be the same that the Greeks call Proteus) there is little or no difagreement about the Agyptian Kings. Wherefore I set downe the same which are found in Eustines, and give to cuery one the same length of raigne.

Abbrews was the fift of the fe, who fucceeded with o Cheechres, that perified in the Red Sea. This King feemes to Reinecture to be the fance whom Diederus calls Vehoreus, the founder of Atomphis. But whereas mention is found in Diederus of a great King, named of prantfus, from whom Vehoreus is faid to be the eighth; it will yo either hardly follow, that Trimms (as Reinectus conjectures) was the great of fynancipus or elfe that this Abbrews was Vehoreus; for the diffance betweene them was more than eight generations. Merestor judgeth of prantfus to have beene the builband of Accuebres, orns the fecond his Daughter; thinking that Manethon

(cited by *Iofephus*) doth omit his name, and infert his wines, into the Catalogue of Kings, because he was King in his wines right. As for *Ichoreus*, it troubles not *Moratur to finde him the eighth from this man. for he takes *Qodens*, not to fignific in this place of *Diodore* (as that *Greeke* word elfe doth) the eighth, but to be an *Asignism name, belonging allo to *Ichoreus*, who might haue had two names, as many of the relthad. I will not vexe my braines in the vaprofitable fearch of this, and the like inextricable doubts. All that *Diodore* hath found of this *Offmundyns*, was wrought vpon his monument; the most thereof in figures, which I thinke the *Catalogue and *Qodens* of *Qoden

I hold-this goodly pecce of worke, which *Diodare* so particularly describes; to haue beene erested for a common place of buriall, to the ancient Kings and Queenes of *Ægyp*, and to their Viceroies; whilest yet they were not so ambitious, as eurey one to have his owne particular monument, striumg therein to exceede all others. This appeares by the many statuaes, therein placed, by the Warres, the judgement Seate; the receiving of Tribute, the offering Sacrifice to God, the accompt of Revenuenes, and plentie of all Catraile and Foode; all which were there curiously wrought, shewing the

But fince by those wordes, or where the it. it thould feeme that hee lay not there interred, wee may lawfully suspect that it was insept, whose bodie was preferred among the Horenes, to bee buried in the Land of Canama, and this emptie Monument might King Orm, who out-lined him, creed in honor of his high deferts, among the royall Sepulchers. of CHERRES, ARMEVS, RAMESSES, and AMENOPHIS. Of MYRIS, and the Lake that beares his name.

E Hen Acherres had raigned eight yeares, Cherres succeeded, and held the Kingdome fifteene yeares; then raigned Armeus fine yeares, and after him Rameffes, threefcore and eight. Of Armens and Rameffes is that Historic vinderstood by Eufebius, which is common among the 10 Greekes, under the names of Danaus and Agyptus. For it is faid that Dansus, being expelled out of Egypt by his Brother, fled into Greece, where he obtained the Kingdome of Argos: that he had fiftie Daughters, whom vpon feeming reconciliation, hee gaue in marriage to his Brothers fiftie Sonnes, but commanded enery one of them to kill her hufband the first night; that only Hypermuestra, one of his Daughters, did faue her hulband Lynceus, and fuffered him to escape; finally, That for this fast, all the bloudie fifters, when they died, were enjoyeed this foolift punishment in Hell, to fill a leaking Vessell with water.

The raigne of Dansus in Argos was indeede in this age; but that Armens, was Danaus ; and Rameffes , Agyptus ; is more then Reineceius beleenes ; heerather takes 20 Armeus to have beene Myris, or Meris, who caused the great Lake to be made which beares his name. For my owne part, as I can eafily beleeue, that he which fled out of Egypt into Greece, was a man of fuch qualitie as the Soldan Sanar, of whom wee spake before; so doe I not finde how in so short a raigne, as fine yeares, a worke of that labour could be finished, which was required vnto the Lake of war is, and the Monuments therein; whereof his owne Sepulchre and his Wines being fome part, it is manifest that he was not buried in Arges. Wherefore of Arris , and of all other Kings, whose age is vncertaine, and of whose raignes we have no assurance. I may truly fay, that their great workes are not enough to proue them of the house of Pharach, feeing that greater deedes, or more absolute, then were those of Ioseph, 30 who bought all the people of Agypt as bond-men, and all their Land for bread; of Gelow, who founded Cairo; and of Sanar, who made the Countrie Tributarie; were performed by none of them,

It shall therefore be enough to fet downe the length of their raignes, whom we finde to have followed one another in order of fuccession: but in rehearing the great acts which were performed, I will not stand to examine, whether they that did them were Kings or no.

The Lake of Myris is, by the report of Diodore and Herodotus, three thousand fixe hundred furlongs in compasse, and fiftie fadomes deepe. It served to receive the waters of Nilus, when the over-flow, being too great, was harmefull to the Coun- 40 trie, and to supply the defect, by letting out the waters of the Lake, when the Riner did not rife high enough. In opening the fluces of this Lake, for the letting in or out of waters, were spent fiftietalents; but the Lake it selfe defraied that cost; feeing the tribute imposed vpon Fish taken therein, was enery day one talent, which Myris gaue to his Wife to buy fweet ointments, and other ornaments for her bodie. In the middest of it was left an Iland, wherein were the Sepulchers of Maris and his Wife, and ouer each of them a Pyramis, that was a furlong, or (according to Herodotus) fiftie paces high; having on the rops their statues, sitting in Thrones, I finde not the description of this Lake in Maps, answerable to the report of Historians; yet is it very great. The yeares of Armeus are by Manethon divided, by inferting one 50 Armesis (whom Eusebius omits) that should have raigned one yeare and odde moneths of the time; but I hold not this difference worthic of examination.

After Ramesses, his sonne Amenophis held the Kingdome fortie yeares. Some give him only nineteene yeares; and Mercator thinkes him to have beene the King that was drowned in the Red Sea: whereof I have alreadie spoken in the first Booke.

ò. IIII.

Of the Kings that raigned in the Dynastie of the Larthes.

ETHOSIS, or Zethus, raigned after his Father Amenophis, fiftic five vegres. To him are afcribed the famous acts of that ancient selothris. But the flate of the World was not fuch in these times, that so great an expedition, as the old Sefoffris made, could have beene either cafily performed, or forgotten in the Countries through which he paffed, had it now beene performed, as any man will perceive if hee looke upon my Chronologicall Table, and confider who lived with this Zethus. With this King beganne the Dinastie of the Larthes; which Reinecoius conjectures to have had the fame fignification, wherein the old Kings of Hetruria, were called Lartes, (the Hetrurians being iffued out of Lydia, the Lydians out of Egypt ) and to have fignified as much as Imperator or Generall. The Warres in which these Kings were Generalls. 20 I take to have been against the Athiopians: for fure I am, that they troubled not the Countrie of Palastina, that lay next vnto them on the one hand; nor is it likely that they transiled ouer the defert fands, on the other hand; to feeke matter of conquest, in the poore Countries of Africa. But these Generalls (if the Larthes were fuch) were not many. Five only had that title; and the last of these tooke it, perhaps, as hereditaric from the first; in such fort as the Roman Emperors were proud for a while, to be called Antonini, till the most unfuteable conditions of Heliogabalus, made his Successors forbeare the name.

Here it may be objected, that the Dynasties (as appeares by this particular) tooke name from the Kings, that the Kings also did administer the government them-20 felues: and that therefore I am deceived in afcribing fo much vnto the Viceroics. But it is to be confidered, that what is faid of these Larthes, depends only vpon conjecture, and that the authoritie of the Regents, or Viceroics, might bee greatenough, though some few Kings tooke the conduct of Armies into their owne hands. For fo we finde in Iohn Leo, that the Soldan of Agypt (after fuch time as the Ida Leo, 12. Soldan Saladine, murdering the Caliph, got the Soucraignetic to himselfe) had vnder him å Viceroy, stiled Eddaguadare, who had authoritie to place, or displace, any Maoistrates, or Officers; and that this mans Familie was almost as great, as the Soldans owne. Yet was there also the Amir Cabir, or Lord Generall of the Soldans forces, who had the charge of defending the Land, and might as he thought good spend of 40 the Soldans Treasure. So might the Office of the Viceroies continue, though the Kings themselves, taking the charge, or title of Generalls vpon them, did somewhat abridge the greatnesse of that second place. As for the names of the Dynasties, it skills not whence they were drawne; whether from their Countrie, as those of the Thebans and Dispolitans, or from fome eminent men, or man, who ruled in that time, as many thinke, that the feuenteenth Dynastie was called of the Sheep-heards, because Infeph gouerned in part thereof; or from the Kings themselues that raigned; as this was faid to be of the Larthes or Generalls. The next, as Manetho (but Annius his Manethe ) hath it, was without any Larthes or Generals, yet was it not without Kings, for a fmuch as Vaphres, and Selae, raigned therein, if many others did not. But let vs

50 now returne to the businesse which we left. Ramses was King after Zethus, or Sethosis, threescore and fixe yeares. He is mistaken for that second selostris, of whom I have spoken in the first Bookes. I finde nothing worth rehearfall of this Ramles, or of Amenophis, and Annemenes, that followed him in order, the former of which raigned fortie, the later fixe and twentie

yeares. Wherefore it may well bee, that the name which Zethus had from valour. was taken by these as hereditarie.

Thuoris, the last of the Larthes, raigned only seuen yeares; yet is hee thought to have been that Process, of whom Herodotis hath mention, faying, That he tooke Helena from Paris, and after the fack of Troy, restored her to Menelaus. I neede fay no more in refutation of this, then that the time of Thuoris his raigne, lasted not so long as from the Rape of Helen to her restitution.

This Proteus or Cetes (as he is named by fome) together with Thon, and others. mentioned by Greeke Writers in this bufineffe, or in other fuch matters, may freme to be vnder-Officers : for fuch only are like to have had their refidencie about Pha- 10 res, and the Sea coast, where Menelaus arrived.

Of Protess, who detained Helen, it is faid. That he could foretell things to come. and that hee could change himfelfe into all shapes : whereby is signified his craftic head, for which he is growne into a Prouerbe. The Poets fained him a Sea God. and keeper of Neptunes Scale-fillies, for belike he was some under-Officer to the Admirall, having charge of the Filhing about the Ifle of Pharos, as was faid before.

Remphes, the Sonne of Proteus, is reckoned the next King, by Diodore, as also by Herodotus, who calls him Ramfinitus, and tells a long tale, fit to pleafe children, of his couctoufnesse, and how his treasure-house was robbed by a cunning Theese, that at last married his Daughter. But of this a man may beleeue what he list. How 20 long this King raigned I know not, nor thinke that either hee, or his Father, did raigne at all.

Of Agyptian Kings whose names are found scattering in sundrie Authors, their times being not recorded. The Kings of Agypt, according to CEDRENUS. Of VAPHRES and SESAC.

Any other names of Agyptian Kings, are found scattered here and the there; as Tompher Jobis, of whom Saides delivers only the bare name and title; Senemures, or Senepas, mentioned in Macrobius, who perhaps was the same that by Suidas is called Senges, or Euenes, noted by occasion of a great Phisition that lined under him; Banchyris, recorded by the same Suidas, for his great justice; and Thulis, of whom Suidas tells great matters; as that his Empire extended to the Ocean Sea; that he gaue name to the Isle of Thule, which some take to be Iseland; and that he consulted with the Deuil, or (which is all one) with Seraphis, desiring to know, who before him had beene, or after him should be so mightie as himselfe. The answere or consession of the Deuill was remarkable; which I finde Englished in the translation of Plefis his worke, of the truenesse of Christian Religion. The Greeke Verses are somewhat otherwise, and more imperfect in those Copies that I have of Cedrenus and Suidas, but the sense is all one; which is this:

> First God, and next THE WORD, and then THE SPRITE. Which three be ONE, and joyne in ONE all three: Whose force is endlesse. Get thee hence fraile wight, The Man of Life vnknowne excelleth thee.

I should have thought that Suidas had borrowed all this of Cedrenus, had I not found somewhat more in Suidas, than Cedrenus hath hereof; as the forme of invocation which Tholas vied, and that clause, of his giving name to the Iland : though In this last point I hold Suidas to be deceined; as also Cedrenus is, or (at least) seemes to me, in giuing to this King fuch profound antiquitie of raigne. Indeede the very name of that Booke, cited often by Cedrenus, which he calls Little Genelis, is alone enough to breede suspition of some impossure: but the Frierly stuffe that hee alledgeth out of it, is such as would serue to discredit himselfe, were it not otherwise apparant, that he was a man both deuout, and of good judgement, in matters that fell within his compasse. I will here set downe the List of olde Egyptian Kings delinered by him, and leave the cenfure to others.

The first King of Egypt that he sets downe is Mizraim, the sonne of Cham. After him hee findes many of a new race, deriving their pedegree thus: Nintrod, the 10 fonne of Chus, was also called Orion; and further, tooke vpon him the name of the Planet Saturne, had to wife Semiramis, who was of his owne Linage, and by her three fonnes: Picus, furnamed Inpiter, Belus and Ninus. Picus chafing his father out of Asseria into Italie, raigned in his stead thirtie yeares, and then gaue up that Kingdome to Iuno, his fifter and wife, and to Beius his fonne: after which Belus, who raisened onely two yeares, Winus had the Kingdome, and married his owne mother Semiramis. But Picus went into Italie, to vilite his olde father Saturne; Saturne forthwith religned the Kingdome to him . Pieus Inpiter raigned in Italie threefcore and two yeares, had threefcore and tenne Wiues or Concubines, and about as many children: finally died, and lyes buried in the Isle of Crete. The principall of Inpi-

20 ters sonnes were Faunus, Perseus, and Apollo. Faunus was called by the name of the Planet Mercurie: hee raigned in Italie, after his father, fine and thirtie yeares: and then (finding that all his brethren conspired against him) he went into Agypt, with abundance of Treasure; where, after the death of Mizrain, hee got the Kingdome, and held it nine and thirtie yeares. After Mercurie, Vulcan raigned in Acquet foure yeares and a halfe. Then sol, the fonne of Vulcan, raigned twentie yeares and a halfe. There followed in order Sofis, Ofiris, Orus, and Thules, of whome we fpake before: the length of their feuerall raignes is not fet downe. After Tinles, was the great Sefostris King twentie yeares. His successor was Pharao, called Narcoho, that held the Crowne fiftie yeares, with which there passed from him the surname of 30 Pharao, to a very long posteritie.

These reports of Cedrenus I hold it enough to set downe as I finde them: let their credit reft voon the Author.

Others yet we finde, that are faid to have raigned in Aegypt, without any certaine note, when, or how long: about whome I will not labour, as fearing more to be reprehended of vaine curiolitie, in the fearch made after these alreadic rehearsed, then of negligence, in omitting fuch as might have been eadded.

Vaplires, the father in law to Salomon; and Sefac, the afflicter of Reliaboam, leade vs againe into faire way, but not farre. The name of Vaplires is not found in the Scriptures; but wee are beholding to Clemens Alexandrinus and Eufebius for it. clim Strands. 40 Thefe give vs not the length of his raigne; but we know, that he lived in the times Entitled Frage of David and of Salomon. He came into Paleftina with an Armie, tooke Gezar from Enangles e.g. the Canaanites, and gaue it to his daughter, Salomons wife; though for her fake perhaps it was, that in time following either he, or (as I rather take it) Selas his fonne and some did fauour the enemies of Salomon, who kept fo many Wives and Concubines, befides this Aegyptian Princeffe. In the life of Rehoboam all hath beene written that I finde of Selse, excepting the length of his raigne, which must have been sixe and twentie yeares, if he were that Smendis with whome Eufebius beginnes the one and twentieth Dynastic.

Now for a fmuch as it would ferue to no great purpose, that weeknew the length 50 of Sefae his raigne, and of theirs that followed him, vnleffe therewithall we knew the beginning of Sefac, vpon which the rest have dependance; this course I take. From the fourth yeare of Iehoaikem, King of Inda, in which Pharao Neco was flaine, I reckon vpwards the yeares of the same Neco, and of his predecessors, vnto the beginning of Sefae: by which accompt, the first yeare of Sefae is found, concurrent with the twentieth of Salomons raigne, and the twentie fixt of Sefae with the fift of Rebabans: wherein Sefae (poyled the Temple, and died, enjoying the fruits of his Sacriledge no longer, then Ioss the Ifraelite and Craffus the Romane did 3 who, after him, fooyled the Temple of Ierufalem.

To fill up the time betweene Selacand Neco, I have rather taken those Kings that I finde in the Greeke Historians, than them which are in Eusebins his Catalogue. For of these that are deligered by Enselves, wee finde no Name nor Act recorded elfewhere, faue onely of Boschoris, who is remembred by Diodore, Plutarch, and others, much being spoken of him, that makes him appeare to have beene a King. Hereunto I may adde, that the succession is often interrupted in Eulebius by Ae- 10 thiopians, which got the Kingdome often, and held it long: whereas contrariwife it appeares by the Prophet Elay, that the Councellors of Pharae did vaunt of the long and flourishing continuance of that house, infomuch, that they said of Pharach, I am the Sounc of the Wife, I am the Sonne of the auncient King. But that which ouerthrowes the reckoning of Eufebius, is, the good agreement of it with his missaken times of the Kings of Juda. For though it pleafe him well to see how the raignes of Iolius and West meete by his computation, yet this indeede marres all: the raigne of Iolias being misplaced. This error growes from his omitting to compare the raignes of the Kings of Inda with theirs of Ifrael: by which occasion, Ioram. King of Ifrael, is made to raigne three yeares after Abazia of Iuda; Samaria is 29 taken by Salmanaffar before Hezekia was King : and in a word, all, or most of the Kings, have their beginnings placed in some other years of their collateralls than the Scriptures have determined.

V I.

of Chemmis, Chrors, Cephrenes, and other Kings recited by Heroports and Diodors Sicvers, which raigned between the times of Reho-Boan and Exekta.

Oliowing therefore the Greeke Historians, I place Chemmis, or (according to Diodore) Chembis, first in the ranke of those that were Kings after sefa. Her migned fiftie yeares, and built the greatest of the three Pyramides, which was accompted one of this worlds Wonders. The Pyramis hath his name from the shape, in that it resembleth a flame of fire, growing from the bottome vpwards, narrower and narrower to the toppe. This of Chemmis being four-fiquare, had a Bafe of feuen akers enery way, and was aboue fixe akers high. It was of a very hard and durable Stone, which had lafted, when Diodore faw it, about a thousand yeares, without complaining of any injurie that it had fulfered by weather in 16 long pace. From the raigne of Chemmis, vnto the age of Chapallins Casar, wherein Diodore luned, are indeeded a thousand yeares; which gives the better likelyhood vnto this time wherein Chemmis is placed. As for this and other Pyramides, late Writers tellifie, that they have feene them yet flanding.

After Chemmis, Disdore placeth Cephreneshis brother; but doubtfully, and encliming rather to the opinion, that his fonne Chalvens flucceded. Hereketus hather Cheeps (who might bee Chalvens) and Cephrenes after him. The Gare faid to have been brethren; but the length of their raignes may argue the later to have beene 50 fonne to the former: for Cheeps raigned flitte years, Cephrenes fiftic fix. The fewere, as Chemmis had beene, builders of Pyramides, whereby they purchased great hatted of their people, who alreadie had ouer-laboured themselues in creding the first. The fewere or an end to be Tombes, for those that raifed them;

but the malice of the *Egyptans* is faid to have call out their bodies; and to have called their Monuments by the name of an Heardfinan, that kept his Beatis thereabouts. It may be, that the robbing them of their honour, and entituding a poore not fellow to their works, was held to be the calling out of their bodies; otherwife, it has been conceive, how the might bee, that they, who had not power to anode the like flauerie, laid vport them by the yonger brother, or fonne, thould have power or leifure to take fuch revenge you his Predeceffor. To the like malice may be afterbed the tale denifed against theory his Daughter; That her Father, wanting monie, did proflittle her, and that thee, getting of enery man that accompanied her, one to stone, did build with them a fourth Pyramis, that flood in the midded of the other three. Belike floewasts an infolent Laife, and made them follow their drudgerie, for her fike, longer a while than they thought to baue done, in raiting a Monument, with the floer flathers provides.

Oursermes, the fonne of Cephrenes, raigned after his Father fixe yeares. He would haue built as his foregoers did, but preuented by death, finished not what hee had begunne. The people thought him a good King, for that he did fet open the Tempies, which Cheaps and Cephrenes had kept thut. But an Oracle threatned him with a fhort life of fixe yeares only, because of this his denotion; For (faid the Oracle) Agypt should have beene afflicted an hundred and liftic yeares, which thy Predecessors 20 knew, and performed for their parts, but thou hast releafed it, there'ore that thou line but fixe yeares. It is very frange, that the Gods should bee offended with a King tor his pietie; or that they should decree to make a Countrie impious, when the people were defirous to ferue them; or that they having fo decreed, it should lie in the power of a King, to alter dellinie, and make the ordinance of the Godsto faile in taking full effect. Butthefe were Aegyptian Gods . The true Go D was, doubtloffe, more offended with the reftirution of fuch Idolatrie, than with the interruption. And who knowes, whether Chemnis did not learne somewhat at lerasairm, in the last yeare of his Father Sefac, that made him perceive, and deliver to those that followed him, the vanitie of his Acgyptian superflition ? Sure it is that his raigne, and 20 the raignes of Cheops, and Cephrenes, were more long and more happie, than that of Mycerinus, who, to delude the Oracle, reuelled away both daies and nights, as if by keeping candles lighted, hee had changed his nights into daies, and fo doubled the time appointed : a service more pleasing to the Deuill, than the restitution of Idolatrie durft then feeme, when it could speede no better. I finde in Esimeesius fiftie yeares affigned to this King; which I verily believe to have been fome errour of the print, though I finde it not corrected among other such over-lights : for I know no Author that gives him so many yeares, and Reineceius himselfe takes notice of the Oracle, that threatned Mycerimus with a shortlife, as is before shewed.

Bacchorus is placed next unto Mycerinus, by Diodore, who speakes no more of him to than this, that he was a strong man of body, and excelling his Predecession wir. He is spoken of by diuers Authors, as one that loud platice; and may be taken for that Banchyris, whom Saidus commends in that kinde: Enselvin reckons source and fortic years of this rights.

After Bacebown, one Salacus an Methiopian Followes, in the Catalogue of Diedore, but certaine ages after him. Herodown, quite omitting Bacebown, hath Alfedis 3 who made a tharpelaw (as it was then held) againfile had clovers, that their dead bodies fhould be in the creditors difpolition, till the debt were paied. This Alfedis made a Pyramis of brick, more coldy and faire, in his owne judgement, than any of those that the former Kings had raised. Besides this Assertion and placeth one anxion, a ablinde man, before the Aethiopian. The raignes of these two are perhaps those many ages, which the Aethiopian to magnise their antiquities, accounted betweene Bacebowns and him that followed them. But all this could make but sixe years, sand follong doth Famichus, blong doth Reineschs hold, that these two Kings, betweene them both, did gouerne. If any man would lengthen this time, holding it impro-

it by taking fome yeares from Sethon or Pfammetieus, and adding them to either of these. To adde virto these, without subtracting from some other, would breedea manifest inconnecince: fordinuch as part of $6/ac$ his raigne, must have beene in 1.8003.13.03. and the intt of Nebauchadnezzar. For mine owne part I like it better to allow fixe yeares only to these two Kings, than to look the wintessed of Heradettus, who, concurring herein with the Scriptures, doth speakes of Semaberibs warre: at which time Sethon was King of Aegypt. I will not therefore adde yeares wint these obscure names; for by adding who these ment three yeares, wee shall thrust the beginning 19 of Sethon out of place, and make it later than the death of Semaberib. In regard of this agreement of Heradetus with the Scriptures, lamt the more willing to hold with him, in his Aegyptian Kings. Otherwise it were a matter of no great enuie, to leave both Affebrican Annis out of the rolls, which were callily done, by placing Sefal lower, and extending his life yet fixe yeares (three, or more, c) if the like abridge-

bable, that the raignes of two Kings should have beene so soone spent; he may doe

Of subcase the Aethiopian, who tooke the Kingdome from Annylos, it is agreed by the most, that he raigned fiftie yeares. He was a mercifull Prince, not punishing all capitall offenes with death, but impossing bondage and bodily labour you male-factors; by whose toyle he both got rauch wealth into his owne hands, letting out 20 their ferture to hirs, and performed many workes, of more vie than pompe, to the fingular benefit of the Country. Zonara calls this King Sus, the Scriptures call him So. Hoses, the last King of Hrad, made a League with him against submanslar, little to his good: for the Argypian was more rich than warlike, and therefore his friendship could not prefer the Hradite from defundition.

It feemes, that the encrocking power of the Afgrian, grew terrible to Aggretabout these times; the victories of Tiglath Phulassar, and Salman slar, having eaten fo farreinto Syria, in the raigne of this one King So or Sabacus. Yen, perhaps it was in his daies (for his raigne beganne in the fourth of Menahem) that Phul him felfe did make the first entrance into Palestina. This caused So to animate the halfe subdued 20 people, against their Conquerours; but the helpe which he and his Successor gaue them was fo faint, that Senacheribs Embassador compared the Aegyptian succourto 2 broken flaffe of Reede. Such indeede had Hofen found it, and fuch Ezekin might haue found it, had hee not beene supported by the stronger staffe of Him, that rules all Nations with a rod of yron. It appeares by the words of Rabfake, that the opinion was great in Inda, of the Aegyptian forces, for Charrets and Horfe-men; but this power, whatfocuer it was, grew needfull, within a little while, for the defence of Accept it felfe, which So left vnto Sethon his Successor, having now fulfilled the fiftie yeares of his raigne. Herodotus and Diodorus have both one tale, from the relation of Aegyptian Priefts, concerning the departure of this King; faying, that he 40 left the Countrie, and willingly retired into Aethiopia, because it was often fignified unto him in hisdreames, by the God which was worshipped at Thebes, that his raigne should be neither long nor prosperous, vnlesse he slew all the Priess in deeypt; which rather than to doe, he refigned his Kingdome. Surely, these Aegyptian Gods were of a strange qualitic, that so ill rewarded their Servants, and inuited Kings to doe them wrong. Well might the Aegyptians (as they likewife did) worthip Dogs as Gods, when their chiefe Gods had the propertie of Dogs, which loue their Maftersthe better for beating them. Yet to what end the Priefts should have fained this tale, I cannot tell; and therefore I thinke that it might be some deuise, of the fearefull old man, who feeing his Realme in danger of an inualion, fought an 50 honest excuse for his departure out of it, and with-drawing himselfe into Aethiopia, where he had beene bred in his youth. What if one should say, that the Aethiopia into which he went, was none other than Arabia, whereof Tirbaka the King (perhaps at the infligation of this man) raifed an Armie against Senacherib, when hee meant to inuade Ægppl, within two or three yeares after? But I will not trouble my lefle with fuch enquirie. This I hold, that No, or Sabzene, was not indee de an Æthispian (for in his time liued the Prophet Efay, who mentioneth the antiquitie of Pharachi houfe) but only so furnamed for his education, and because isliming from thence, he got the Kingdome from Anysis, who was his opposite. The quiet and milde forme of his Gouernement, his holding the Kingdome folong without an Armie; and many other circumsances argue no lesse. But whether finally hee betook to a private life, or whether hee fore-went his Life and Kingdome cance, being now very old, it is time that we leaue him, and speake of Sethon his next Succession, who is omitted by Diadore, but remembered by Herodom, by a sure token of his having becne King.

VII.

Of SETHON who raigned with EZEKIA, and fided with him against SENACHERIB.

He first yeare of Sethons raigne falls into the twelfth of Ezekia, which was the fit of Senatherio. It was a troublesome age, and full of danger; the two great Kingdomes of Africand & Egypt, being then in a gaged in a Warre, the filte whereof was to determine, whether of them should rule or serve. The African had the better men of warre;

the Agyptian, better provision of necessaries: the Asyrian, more Subjects; the Agyptian, more Friends; and among the new conquered halfe Subjects of Assire manie that were Agyptian in heart, though Assyrian in outward shew.

Of this last fort were Ezekia, and his people; who, knowing how much it concerned Phara, to protect them against his owne great Enemie, preferred the friend-ship of so near and mighted a Neighbour, before the feruice of a terrible, yet farre 30 removed King. But herein was great difference, between Ezekis and his Subjects, For the good King, fixing his especiall confidence in God, held that course of policie, which he ethought most likely to turne to the benefit of his Countrie: the multitude of Indea, looking into the faire hopes which this Egystan league promised, were pushed up with vaine conceits, thinking that all was lake, and that now they should not neede to sear any more of those injuries, which they had suffered by the Africans, and so became forgetfull of God, taking conside but not of him. Esyst.

The Prophet Esys complained much of this presumption; guing the poople of Industron deritand. That the Egystian neeven, and not God, and their Horses specified, wand not Spring; that God himselfes should defend Israel you repentance, and that 40 As say a spould fall by the fiverd, but not of man. As for the Agyptims (faid the Esystance) Prophet 1 they are vanise, and they shall helpe in vanie, their strength is to Europea.

According to the Prophets words it came to passe. For in the treatie of Confederacie that was held at Zoan, all manner of contentment and assurance was given to the Ienes, by Sethon, or his Agents, who filled them with such reports, of Horses to the lewes, by Seshon, or his Agents, who filled them with fuch reports, of Horses and Charrets, that they did not looke (as Esay faith) who the holy one of Israel, nor focke Esay state, which the Lord. But he set is wisest.

After a while came Senacherib with his Armie, and wakened them out of these dreames; for Sethon their good Neighbour, as neare as he was, did sceme faire off, 50 being vnreadic, when his helpe was most needfull. It may seeme that he purposed, rather to make Palassim than Aeype the stage, whereon this great Warre should be acted, and was not without hope, that the Asprians and Emes, weakening one another, should yeeld vno him a faire aduantage ouer both. Yet he fought with monie; for he sent Horseand Camells laden with treasure, to hire the Arabians, whom

5 Vier. 18.24.

E/sy calleth a people that canner profit. These Arabians did not profit indeedes, for (belides that it seems by the same place of E/sy, that the rich treasures missarried, and stell into the enemies hands before any helpe appeared from Trihasa, all the strong Citics of inds were taken by Senatherib, except Libna, Labis, and terusclem it selfe, which were in fore districtle; till the fowor of God, and not of Man, deseate the Affrican, who did god, for feare, to his Tower, that is, he fled to Xinue, where he

Concerning this expedition of Senacherib, Herodotus takes this notice of it: That it was purposed against Agypt, where the men of warre, being offended with Sethen their King, who had taken away their allowance, refused to beare armes in de- 10 fence of him and the Countrie: that Sethon being Vuleans Prieft, bemoaned himselfe to his God, who by dreame promifed to fend him helpers: that hereupon Sethon, with fuch as would follow him, (which were crafts-men, shop-keepers, and the like) marched towards Pelulium; and that a great multitude of field-mice entring the Campe of Senacherib by night, did so knaw the bowes, quivers, and straps of his mens armour, that they were faine the next day to flie away in all hafte, finding themselves disarmed. In memorie hereof (faith Herodotus) the statue of this King is fet vp in the Temple of Vulcan, holding a Mouse in his hand, with this inscription. Let him, that beholds me, ferue God. Such was the relation of the Agyptian Prietls, wherein how farre they fwarued from the truth, being defirous to magnific their 20 owne King, it may easily be perceived. It seemes that this Image of Serbon was fallen downe, and the tale forgotten in Diodorus his time, or else perhaps, the Priests did forbeare to tell it him (which caused him to omit it) for that the Nation of the Jewes was then well knowne to the world, whereof enery child could have told, how much falsehood had been mingled with the truth.

We finde this historic agreeable to the Scriptures, thus farre forth; That Senaeberib King of the Asyrians, and Arabians, (To Heroclotus calleth him : the Syrians or peraduenture some borderers vpon Syria, being meant by the name of sirabians) liued in this age, made Warre vpon Ægypt, and was miraculously driven home. As for that exploit of the Mice, and the great pleasure that Pulsan did vnto his Priest; 30 happy it was (if Sethon were a Priest) that he tooke his God now in so good a moode. For within three or foure yeares before this, all the Priefts in Agree thould have beene flaine, if a mercifull King had not spared their lines, as it were halfe against the Gods will. Therefore this last good turne was not enough to serue as an example, that might firre up the Agyptians to pietic, seeing that their denotion, which had lasted so long before, did bring all the Priests into danger of such a bad reward. Rather I thinke, that this Image did represent Senacherib himselfe, and that the Monte in his hand, fignified Hieroglyphically (as was the Agyptian manner of expressing things) the shamefull iffue of his terrible expedition, or the destruction of his Armie, by meanes which came no man knew from whence. For the vengeance of 40 God, shewed your this yngodly King, was indeeded very good motive to victic. But the embleame, together with the Temple of Vuleam (being perhaps the chiefe Temple in that Towne where this Image was erected) might give occasion to such a fable; the Deuill helping to change the truth into a lie, that God might be robbed of his honour. Yet that we may not belie the Deuill, I hold it very likely, that &then, finding himselfe in danger, did call upon his Gods, that is, upon Vulcan, Serapis, or any to whom he had most denotion. But so had other of his Predecessors done in the like neede : yet which of them had obtained fuccour by the like miracle? Surely the tenes (euen fuch of them as most were given to Idolatrie) would have beene ashamed of the confidence which they reposed, in the Charrets of Asynt, be 50 canse they were many, and in the Horse-men, because they were wery strong; had it beene told them, that Sethon, in flead of fending those Horse-men and Charrets, was hefeeching Vulcan, to fend him and them good luck, or elfe (for these also were Agy)tian Gods) addressing his praiers to some Onyon or Cat. Howseeuer it was, doubtleffe the prophecie of Efsy tooke effect, which faid, They shall be all assumed of the government of the sum of profit shows, nor helpe, nor doe them good, but shall be a shown earlide a reprote. Such is commonly the issue of the minane wischome, when reting scure vpo pon prouison that it solfe hath made, it will no longer seeme to stand in neede of God.

Some there are who take Sethon to have beene fer downe by Eufebius, vnder the name of Turchus the Libinpian, and therefore the twentic yeares which are given to Turchus, they allow to the raigne of Sethon. The fea have well oble from each that reaches the Libinpian is mentioned in the Scriptures, not as a King of Legypt, but as a friend to that Countrie, or at leaft an enemie to Semecherib, in the warre laif poken of the Libinpians (as they are englished) ouer which hee raigned, being indeede Chufires or Arabians. Hereupon they suppose a right, that Eufebius hath missisken one King for another. But whereas they thinke, that this Turabus or Tinkhets, is placed in the roome of Sethon, and therefore give to Sethon the twentic yeares of Turschus, I hold them to have erred on the other hand. For this Sethiopsan (as he is called) beganne his raigne ouer Legypt, by Eufebius his accompt, after the death of Sentenberia and of Ezekit, in the first yeare of Musuffes King of Inds. Therefore he, or his veares, have no reference to Sethon.

inerodetus longest to tell how long Sethon raigned; Function peremptorily, ciring 30 Author, nor alleaging reason for it, sets him downe thirtie three yeares; many omit him quite; and they that name him, are not carefull to examine his continuance. In this case, I follow that rule which I propounded wnto my selteat the first, for measuring the raignes of the set set system Kings. The yeares which passed from the fift of Rehoboum, wnto the sourth of televisium, I so divide among the set springs, that giving to every one the proportion allowed wnto him by the Author in whom hee is sound, the rest is to be conferred you him whose length of raignes is were traine; that is whon this Sethon. By this accompt I finde the thirtie three yeares, that are set downe by Functions, to agree very nearely, if not precisely, with the time of Sethon raigne; therefore I conforme my owner ecknowing to his stough I could be content to have it one yeare leffe. The reason of this computation I shall render more at large, when I artise at the time of Psimmitius, whereupon it hat much dependance, and whereinto the course of this Hillorie will shortly bring me; the ∠E-gyptian affaires growing now to be enterlaced with the matters of Inda, to which it is neete that I return.

Of MANASSE and his Contemporaries.

The wickednesse of MANASSES. His imprisonment, Repentance.

NASSE, the Sonne of Ezechias, forgetting the pietie of his Father, and the prosperitie which followed him, fet vp, repaired, adorned, and furnished, all the Altars, Temples, and high Places, in which the Deuill was by the Heathen worshipped. Besides, hee himselfe esteemed the Sunne, the Moone, and the Starres, with all the hoft of Heauen, as Gods, and 20 worshipped them : and of all his acts the most abhominable was, that he burnt his Sonnes for a Sacrifice to the Deuill Moloch, or Melcher, in the Valley of Hinnon, or Benhennon : wherein was kindled the fire of Sacrifice to the Deuills.

He also gaue himselfe to all kinde of Witch-craft and Sorcerie, accompanied and maintayned those that had familiar Spirits, and all forts of Enchanters : besides, he thed fo much innocent bloud, as Ierufalem was replenished therewith, from corner to corner. For all his vices and abhominations, when he was reprehended by that aged and reuerent Prophet Efay (who was also of the Kings race, and as the Iemes 30 code ons con affirme, the Father-in-law of the King) he caused the Prophet neare vnto the Foun-Gheas Juga 75. taine of Siloe to be fawne in funder, with a wooden faw, in the eightieth yeare of his life:a crueltie more barbarous and monftrous then bath beene heard of. The Scriptures indeede are filent hereof, yet the same is confirmed by Epiphanius, Isidore, Eua chost 33:11 febius, and others, too many to rehearle, and too good to be suspected. Therefore the Lord waght copon them the Captaines of the Host of the Kings of A 111 vs., which tooke
M A N A S S E, and put him in fetters, and bound him in chaines, and exercised him to Babel:

Where after he had lien twentie yeare as a captine, and dispoiled of all honour and hope; yet to his heartie repentance and continuall praier, the God of infinite mercie had respect, and moued the Asyrians heart to deliuer him.

It is also likely that Merodach, because he loved his father Ezechias, was the easilier. perswaded to restore Manasse to his libertie & chate. After which and when he was againe established, remembring the miseries which followed his wickednesse, and Gods great mercies toward him, he changed forme, detelled his former foolish and denillish Idolatrie, and cast downe the Idolls of his owne erection, prepared the Altar of God, and facrificed thereon. He repaired a great part of Ierufalem: and dyed after the long raigne of fiftie five yeares. Glycas and Suidas report, that Manaffe was held in a case of yron by the Assirans: and therein fedde with bread of branne and water, which men may beleeue as it shall please their fancies.

of troubles in Agypt following the death of SETHON. The raigne of

Hat the wickednesse of King Manaffes was the cause of the euill, which fell vpon his Kingdome and Person, any Christian must needes beleeue : for it is affirmed in the Scriptures. Yet was the state of things, in those parts of the World, such, at that time, as would have invited any Prince (and did perhaps invite Merodach, who fulfilled Gods pleasure, vpon respect borne to his owne ends) desirous of enlarging his Empire, to make attempt vpon Iuda. For the Kingdome of Agypt, which was become the pillar, whereon the state of Inda leaned, about these times was miserably distracted with civill diffention, and after two yeares, ill amended by a division of the government betweene twelue Princes. After some good agreement betweene these,eletien of them fell out with the twelfth of their colleagues, and were all finally subdued by him, who made himselfe absolute King of all. This Inter-regnum, or meere Marchie, that was in Egypt, with the division of the Kingdome following it, is 20 placed by Diodore, who omitteth Sethon, betweene the raignes of Subacus, and Plammiticus: but Herodotus doth let the Ariflocratie, or twelve Governours, immediately before Psammitieue, who was one of them, and after Sethon. The occasion of this diffention seemes to have been the vucertainetic of title to that Kingdome (for that the Crowne of Agypt paffed by fuccession of bloud, I haue often shewed) which ended, for a while, by the partition of all among twelve, though things were not fetled, vntill one had obtained the Sourraignetic.

These twelue Rulers gouerned fifteene yeares, in good seeming agreement, which to preferue, they made strait couenants and alliances one with another, being jealous of their estate, because an Oracle had foretold, that one of them should 30 depose all the rest, noting him by this token, that he should make a drinke offering, in Vulcans Temple, out of a Copper goblet. Whileft this vnitic lafted, they joyned together in railing a Monument of their Dominion, which was a Labyrinth, built neare vnto the Lake of Maris; a worke to admirable, that (as Herodotus, who beheld it, affirmes) no wordes could give it commendation, answerable to the statelinesse of the worke it felfe. I will not here fet downe that unperfect description, which Herodotus makes of it, but thinke enough to fay, that he preferres it farre before the Pyramides, one of which (as he faith) excelled the Temple of Diana at Ephelus, or any of the fairest workes in Greece. Diodorus reports this Labyrinth to have been the worke of Marus, or Menides, a King which lived five generations before Pro-

40 tem, that is, before the Warre of Trey, and from this Labyrinth (faith he) D.edalus tooke the patterne of that which he made for Minos in Creete. Who this Marus, or Menides was , I cannot tell. Reineceius takes him to haue beene Annemenes, which raigned immediately before Thuoris. But this agrees not with Diodore: for Dedalus and Mines were both dead long before Amenenes was King. Belike Reineccius, defiring to accommodate the fabulous relations of Manethon, Charemon, and others, that are found in Infephus, touching Amenophis and his children, to the storic of A- Mandal mass, and Attisanes the Ethiopian, mentioned by Diodore; held it consequent, after he had conjectured Manethons Amenophis, to be Diodor his Amalis, that Serbon frould be Actifanes, and that Annemenes should be Marue. If in this case I might intrude 50 a conjecture; the times which we now handle, are those, about which Reineccius hatherred in making fearch; Amasis was Anysis; Attifanes was Sabacus; and Marus was one of these twelue Princes, to whom Herodotus gives the honour of building this famous Labyrinth. For Actifanes the Athiopian depoled Arnafis; Sabacus the Athiopian deposed Anysis; Attisanes governed well, and was milde in punishing offendors; To likewife was Sabacus; Offarus the next King after Affifares built this Labyrinth; and the next (fauing Sethon, whom Diodore omits, as having not heard of him) that ruled after Sabacus, performed the fame worke according to Herodotus. who was more likely to heare the truth, as living nearer to the Age wherein it was performed. The varietic of names, and difference of times, wherein Diodore below. red the Priests, might bee a part of the Egyptian vanitie, which was familiar with them, in multiplying their Kings, and boalting of their antiquities. Here I might adde, that the twelve great Halls, Parlours, and other circumitances remembred by Herodatus, in speaking of this building, doe helpe to proue, that it was the worke of these twelve Princes. But I hasten to their end.

At a folemne fealt in Fulcans Temple, when they were to make their drinke-offerings, the Pricit, forgetting himfelfe, brought forth no more than cleuen Cups. Hercupon Planmilions, who standing last, had not a Cup, tooke off his brasen Helmet, and therewith supplyed the want. This caused all the rest to remember the Oracle, and to suspect him as a Traitor; yet, when they found that it was not done by him upon fet purpose, or ill intent, they forbare to kill him, but, being jealous of their citate, they banished him into the marish Countries by the Sea side. This Oracle, and the euent, is held by Eigdore as a fable, which I believe to have beene none other: In the reft Heradotus and Diadore agree, faying, that Planmiticus hyred Souldiers out of Caria and Jania, by whose aide he vanquilled his Companions, and 20

made himfelfe fole King.

The yeares of his raigne, according to Herodotus, were liftie foure; according to Eulebius, fortic foure; Mercator, to reconcile thefe two, gines fortic foure yeares to his fingle raigne, and ten to his ruling, joyntlie with the Princes before spoken of. Indeede, he that was admitted, being a man growne (for hee cannot in reason bee funnofed to have beene then a yong fellow) into the number of the twelve Governours, must be thought to have lived vnto extreme old age, if he eruled partly with others, partly alone, threefcore and nine yeares. I therefore yeeld rather to Enfebius; but will not adventure to cut five yeares from the Artifocourse: though peraduenture Pfannitics was not at first one of the twelve, but succeeded (either by election, or 30 as next of bloud) into the place of some Prince that dyed, and was ten yeares companion in that government.

Another scruple there is, though not great, which troubles this reckoning. The yeares of these Aegyptisms, as we finde them set downe, are more by one, than serue to till up the time, betweene the fift of Reliaboum, and the fourth of Ichoinkim. This may not be. Wherefore either we must abate one yeare from Sethons raigne; that was of vincertaine length; or elfe (which I had rather doe; because Functions may have followed better authoritie than I know, or than himfelfe alleageth, in gining to Sethon a time so nearely agreeing with the truth) wee must consound the last yeare of one raigne, with the first of another. Such a supposition were not infolent. 40 For no man can suppose, that all the Kings, or any great part of them, which are fet downe in Chronologicall tables, raigned precifely so many yeares as are ascribed vnto them, without any fractions: it is enough to thinke, that the furplufage of one mans time, supplied the defect of anothers. Wherefore I confound the last years of those fifteene, wherein the twelve Princes ruled, with the first of Pfannations; who furely did not fall out with his Companions, fight with them, and make himfelfe Lord alone, all in one day.

Concerning this King, it is recorded, that he was the first in * Egypt , who entertained any strait amitie with the Greekes; that he retayned in pay his Mercenaries of Caria, Ionia, and Arabia, to whom hee gaue large rewards and possessions; and that 50 he greatly offended his Agyptian Souldiers, by bestowing them in the left wing of his Armie, whileft his Mercenaries held the right wing (which was the more hono-rable place) in an expedition that he made into Sprin. Vpon this difference it is faid, that his Souldiers, to the number of two hundred thou fand, for looke their naturall

Countrie of Agypt, and went into Athopia, to dwell there: neither could they be renoked by kinde Meffages, nor by the King himfelfe, who ouer-tooke them on the way; but when hee told them of their Countrie, their Wines, and Children, they answered, that their weapons should get them a Countrie, and that nature had enabled them to get other wives and children.

It is also reported of him, That he caused two Infants to bee brought up in such fort as they might not heare any word spoken; by which meanes, he hoped to find out, what Nation or Language was most ancient; forasmuch as it seemed likely. that nature would teach the children to speake that language, which men spake at

to the first. The issue hereof was, that the children cried, Becom, Becom, which word being found to fignifie Bread in the Phrygian tongue, ferued greatly to magnifie the Phrygian antiquitie. Goropius Becanus makes no finall matter of this, for the honour of his Low Dateh; in which the word Beeker, fignifies (as Baker in English) a maker of bread. He that will turne ouer any part of Goropius his works, may finde enough of this kinde, to perfuade a willing man, that Alam and all the Patriarchs, yed none other tongue than the Low Fulch, before the confusion of languages at Babel, the name it felfe of Babel, being also Dutch, and given by occasion of this confusion: for that therethey beganne to bable, and talke, one knew not what.

But I will not infift upon all that is written of Plammilious. The most regardable 20 of his acts was the flege of Azotu: in Palaflina, about which he fpent nine and twentie yeares. Neuerhaue we heard (faith Herodotus) that any Citie endured follong a siège as this; yet Pfammitieus carried it at the last. This Towne of Azetus had Estatents beene wonne by Tartan, a Captaine of Senacherib, and was now, as it feemeth relecued, but in vaine, by the Babylonian, which made it hold out fo well.

Whatreference these Agyptian matters might have to the imprisonment and enlargement of MANASSES. In what part of his raigne MANASSES. NASSES Was taken prifoner.

Ere it certainely knowne, in what yeare of his raigne Manaffes was taken prisoner, and how long it was before see obtayined libertie; I thinke wee should finde these Agyptian troubles to have beene no fmall occasion, both of his captinitie and enlargement: God so dispofing of humane actions, that even they, who intended only their owne businesse, fulfilled only his high pleasure. For either the civill warres in A-40 gypt that followed upon the death of Sethon; or the renting of the Kingdome, as it were into twelue peeces; or the warre betweene Pfammitteus and his Colleagues; or the expedition of Pfammitieus into Syria, and the fiege of Azotus, might minister vnto the Babylonian, either such cause of hope, to enlarge his Dominion in the South parts; or fuch necessitie of sending an Armie into those parts, to defend his owne, as would greatly tempt him, to make fure worke with the King of Inda. The fame occasions sufficed also, to procure the deliucric of Manasses, after he was taken. For he was taken (as to fephus hath it) by fubtilitie, not by open force, neither did they Mandalogad that apprehended him, winne his Countrie, but only wast it. So that the Ispec. hauing learned wit, by the ill successe of their folly, in redeeming Amazia, were like to 50 be more circumspect, in making their bargaine vpon such another accident : and the Babylonian (to whom the Aczyptian matters prefented more weightie arguments of hope and feare, than the little Kingdome of Indacould affoord, had no reason, to spend his forces, in pursuing a small conquest, but as full of difficultie as a greater, whereby hee should compell his mightiest enemies to come to some good agreement; when by quitting his present advantage over the Iewes, hee might make his way the fairer into Acgypt. Now concerning the yeare of Manaffes his raigne, wherein hee was taken prifoner; or concerning his captimitic it felfe, how long it lasted; the Scriptures are lilent, and Iolephus giaes no information. Yet I finde cited by Torniellus three opinions, the one of Beilarmine, who thinks that Manuffes was taken in the fifteenth yeare of his raigne; the other of the Author of the greater Hebrew Chronologie, who affirmes. that it was in his twentie feuenth yeare; the third, of Rabbi Kimbi vpon Ezekiel, who faith, that he was fortic yeares an Idolater, and lined fifteene yeares after his repentance. The first of these conjectures is vpheld by Torniellus, who rejects the second, 10 as more ynprobable, and condemnes the third as most false. Yet the reasons alleaged by Torniellus in defence of the first, and refutation of the last opinion, are such as may rather proughim to fauour the Cardinall, as farre as he may, (for where need requires, hee doth freely diffent from him) than to have vsed his accustomed diligence in examining the matter, before he gaue his judgement. Two arguments he brings to maintaine the opinion of Bellarmine: the one, that Ammon the Sonne of Manailes, is faid by Iolephus, to have followed the workes of his Fathers youth; the other, that had Manafles growne old in his finnes, it is not like that hee should have contimed, as hee did, in his amendment vnto the end of his life. Touching the former of these arguments, I see no reason, why the sinnes of Manufes, might not be distin- 20 guilhed from his repentance in his old age, by calling them workes of his youth, which appeared when he was twelue yeares old; though it were granted that hee continued in them (according to that of Rabbi Kimbi) vntill hee was but fifteene yeares from death. Touching the second; how socuer it be a fearefull thing, to cash off vnto the last those good motions vnto repentance, which we know not whether euer God will offer vnto vs againe; yet were it a terrible hearing, That the finnes, which are not for faken before the age of two and fiftie yeares, shall bee punished with finall impenitencie. But against these two collections of Torniellus, I will lay two places of Scripture, whence it may be inferred, as not vnlikely, That Manaffes continued longer in this wickednesse, than Bellarmine hath intimated, if not as long 20 as Rabbi Kimbi hath affirmed. In the fecond Booke of Kings, the cuill which Mawaffes did is remembred at large, and his repentance vtterly omitted; fo that his amendment may feeme to haue taken vp no great part of his life, the florie of him 8. Kings 21.17. being thus concluded, in the one and twentieth Chapter. Concerning the rest of the acts of MANASSES, and all that he did, and his finne that he finned, are they not writtenin the booke of the Chronicles of the Kings of Inda. The other place is in the foure and twentieth Chapter of the same Booke, where in rehearing the calamities, with which that Nation was punished in the time of Ichoiakim, the great Grand-child of tenin the booke of the Chronicles of the Kings of Inda. The other place is in the foure and eventieth Chapter of the fame Booke, where in rehearling the calamities with which that Nation was punished in the time of Iehonkins, the great Grand-child of the State of this Mansiles, it is said a Swely by the commandement of the Lord came this vien Inda, that he middle place is the limited by the Inda, that he most of the State of M. N. N. S. S. according to all that 40, he did, and for the imnocent blond hat he shed (or he filed torul downwith moneent blond) therefore the Lord would not pardon it. Who so considers well these places, may finde small cause to pronounce it most saide. That the repentance and amendment of Mansiles was no carlier than fifteen eyeares before his death; or most probable, That when he was swentie seuen years when he was twentie seuen years.

when he was twentte lever years of on, derepenting, and becoming a two man, as used in the feare of God fortile years after. I will no longer dispute about this mateer, feeing that the truth can not be disconcred. It sufficient to fay, that two yeares of child differition in Aegpt, fourteene or fifteene yeares following, wherein that Kingdome was weakened, by partition of the Soueraignetic; the warre of Psammitical and the state of the state o

Manaffer, was the last yeare of Sethen in Egypt, and the one and thirtieth of Meredach his raigne, or (accounting from the death of Mahaddon) the twenticht:
The feuen and twentieth of Manaffer was the tenth of the twelve Princes, and the three and tortieth of Manaffer was the tenth of the twelve Princes, and the three and tortieth of Maredach: his fortieth, was the twentie third of Pfammilieus and the sit of Nabhalffer, the some of Meredach in Babylon: but which of these the year of his imprisoment, or whether any other, I sorbear to shew mine opinion, least I should thereby seeme to draw all matters over violently to mine owne computation.

This was the firft great mattrie that the Bubylanians had of the Kingdome of Iuod. For though Achie promifed Tribute to Salmaniflar, yet Excelsia neuer payed it. True it is, that hee hoped to flay Semscherib: enterprife againft him, by prefen-1,King 18, ting him with three hundred talents of filter, and thirtie of gold, besides the plate which courered the dores and pillars of the Temple.

But Mansifes being prefied with greater necefficie, could refuse no tollerable conditions, that the Bahylanian would impose yoon him; among which it seemes, that this was one, (which was indeede a point of sentitude) that he emight not hold peace with the **Expitians*, whilest they were entmics to Bahylan. This appeares not only by his fortifying with men of warreall the firong Cities of Inda after his returne (which was rather against **Planmitteus*, whose partie hee had for fishen, than 20 against the Bahylanian, with whom hee had thenceforth no more controuers likewise by that opposition, which bese made afterwards to **Plana** 27cea*, in fauour of **Vabulassa**, which had been eagainst all reason and policie, if it had not beene his dutie by courant. Of this I will speake more in connenient place.

à. IIII.

Of the first and second Messenian Warres, which were in the raignes of Ezekia, and Manasses Kings of suda

Ow concerning fuch actions as were performed abroad in the world, about these times of Manafles, the most remarkeable were the Mussical in him Warres, which happening in this age, and being the greatestaction performed in Greece, between the Troian and Parssan Warres, deferue not to be passed out with filence.

The first Messensia Warre beganne and ended in the dases of Exekia; the second in the raigne of Manasser but to avoide the trouble of interrupting our Historie, I have thought it best, to rehears the men both in this place. Other introduction is 40 needlesse, than to say, that the posserties of Intervales, driving the siste of Pelops, and the Achaems, out of their seates, divided their lands between themselves, and erested the Kingdomes of Leeckman, Augus, Mussel, and Corints, all which agreeting well together a while, did afterwards forget the bond of Kindred, and Gought one anothers ruine with bloudie Warres; whereof these Messelman were the greatest.

The pretended grounds of the Meffenian Warre, are leave worth remembrance; they were so fleight. Ambition was the true cause of it, wherewith the Lucdarmonians were for transforred, that any thing served them as a colour, to accomplish their greedie desires. Yet other matter was alleaged, namely, that one Polychares 50 a Meffenian had slaine many Lucdamonians, for which the Magistrates of Spart defining to have him yeelded into their hands, could not obtaine it. The Meffenians on the other side, excused Polychares, for that he was growne frantick, through injuries received from Europhores a Lucedemonian. This Europimes had bargained to give pasture to the Cattell of Polychares, and was therefore to receive part of the increase:

but not contented with the gaine appointed, hee fold the Cattaile, and Slaues than kept them, to Merchants, which done, he came with a faire tale to his friend, faving, that they were follen. Whileft the lye was yet scarce out of his mouth, one of the flaues that had escaped from the Merchants, came in with a true report of all. The Lacedemonian being thus deprehended, confelled all, and promited large amends; which to receive, hee carried the Sonne of Polychares home with him; but bauing him at home, hee vilanously slew him. Wherefore, the Lacedemonians hauing refused, after long sute made by the wretched Father, to doc him right against this Theefe and Murderer, ought not to pick matter of quarrell, out of those things, which he did in that madneffe, whereinto they them felues had cast him. So said the Mellenians, and further offered to put the matter to compromise, or to stand vnto the judgement of the Amphietyones, who were as the generall Counfaile of Greece, or to any other faire courfe. But the Lacedamonians, who had a great defire to occupie the faire Countrie of Meffene, that lay close by them, were not content with fuch allegations. They thought it enough, to have some shew for their doings. which the better to colour, they reckoned up many old injuries, and so without sonding any defiance, secretly tooke an oath, to hold warre with Messene, till they had maltered it : which done, they seized upon Amphia, a frontier Towne of that Prouince, wherein they put all to the Sword without mercie, very few escaping.

Hercupon the Messenians tooke Armes, and were met by the Enemie. A furious 20 battaile was fought betweene them, which ended not vntill darke night, with vncertaine victorie. The Messenians did strongly encampe themselves; The Lacediemonians, vnable to force their Campe, returned home. This Warre beganne in the fecond years of the ninth Olympiad, and ended in the first of the fourtenth Olympiad, having lasted twentie yeares. The two enemie Nations tried the matter, for a while, with their proper forces; the Lacedemonians wasting the inland parts of Meffene; and the Messenians, the Sca coast of Laconia. But it was not long ere friends. on both fides, were called into helpe. The Arcadians, Argines, and Sicyonians, tooke part with Meffene; the Spartans had, belides many Subjects of their owne, aide from Corinth, and hired Souldiers out of Crete. So a fecond, third, and fourth battaile to were fought, with as great obstinacie as the first; fauing that, in the fourth battaile, the Lacedemonians were enforced to turne their backs; in the other fights, the victorie was still uncertaine though in one of them the Mefenians lost Euphaes their Kine.

in whose stead they chose Arifiademus.

Many yeares were spent, ere all this bloud was shed; for pestilent diseases, and want of monie to entertaine Souldiers, caused the Warre to linger. And for the fame reasons, did the Mesenians, for sake all their inland Townes, excepting Ithome, which was a mountaine with a Towne vponit, able to endure more, than the enemies were likely to doe. But, as some Authors tell vs, the Laced amoniums were so obflinate, in this Warre, because of their vow, that having absented themselves ten 40 yeares from Sparts, their wives fent them word, that their Citie would grow onpeopled, by reason that no children had beene borne them in all that time : Wherevpon they fent back all their ablest yong men, promiseuously to accompanie the yong women, who got fo many of them with child, as they became a great part of their Nation, and were called Parthenians. Diodorus referres the begetting of thefe * This Explose of their (validity and were called Partnermans, Diodorus reterres the begetting of thele was the youn-Partnermans to a former time. But in proceeds of this Messenian Warre, when the Dewas the youngest Sounce of will in an Oracle had admifted the Messenson to Sacrifice a Virgin of the stock of Maby Me * Agyptus, that fo they might be victorious against the Laced emonians; the lot fal-Agyptus, that to they might be victorious against the Lucaemonians; the locial-ocycles, ling vpon the Daughter of one Lyefen; Epibolus the Priest, willing to faucher, said; area-thee was only a foltered child, and not borne of the wife of Lycifeta: which answere to of thich giving delay to the execution of the Maide, Lycifen fecretly fled away with herinto Sil- Sparta. Then Ariffodemiis, which afterwards was King, voluntarily offered his t first the own Daughters but a young Moble man, being in lote with the Maide, when other-paged, wife he could not premaile, faid openly that flee was no Virgin, But that he haddefloured her, and got her with child: whereupon the Father in a rage ripped up his innocent Daughters belly, to disproue the Louers slander : at the graue of which Daughter of his, afterward falling by other superstitions into despaire of prevailing against the Lacedemonians, he slew himselfe, to the great hurt of his Countrie, which he loued most dearely. For after his death the Mesienians lost their courage, and finding themselves distressed by many wants, especially of victualls, they craved peace; which they obtained under most rigorous conditions. Halfe the yearely fruits of their Land they were bound to fend vnto Sparta; and they, with their Wines, to make folemne lamentations, at the death of enery Spartan King; they were also sworne to live in true subjection to the Lacedamonians; and part of their Territorie was taken from them, which was given to the Afmai, and fuch as had

This peace being made vpon so vneuen termes, was not like to hold long. Yet nine and thirtie yeares it continued (the Mellenians not finding how to help themfelues) and then brake out into a new and more furious Warre, than the former. The able your men, that were growne vp in the roome of those Mellenians, whom the former Warre had confumed, beganne to confider their owne ftrength and multitude, thinking themselues equal to the Lacedamonians, and therefore scorning to ferue fuch Masters, as had against all right, oppressed their Fathers. The chiefe 20 of these was Arislomenes, a noble Gentleman, of the house of Apytus; who perceiuing the vniforme defires of his Countrie-men, aduentured to become their Leader. He therefore founding the affections of the Argines, and Areadisms, which he found throughly answerable to his purpose, beganne open warre vpon the State of Lacedamon. This was in the fourth years of the three and twentieth Olympiad; when the Lacedamonians, basted to quench the fire before it should grow too hot, with fuch forces as they could raise of their owne, without troubling their Friends, to deale with their Enemies, ere any fuccour were lent them. So a firong battaile was fought betweene them, and a doubtfull; faue that the Mesenisms were pleafed with the iffue, for a fmuch as they had thereby taught their late proud Lords, 20 to thinke them their equalls. Particularly, the valour of Ariftomenes appeared fuch in this fight, that his people would have made him their King; but he, refuling the honour of that name, accepted of the burthen, and became their Generall. Within one yeare another battaile was fought, whereunto each part came better prouided.

The Lacedemonians brought with them the Corinthians, and some other friends to helpe: the Mellenians had the Argines, Arcadians, and Sicyonians. This also was a long and bloudie fight; but Ariflomenes did so behave himselfe, that finally hee made the Enemies runne for their lines. Of fuch importance was this victorie, that the Lacedamonians beganne to bethinke themselves, of making some good agreement. But one Tyrteus an Athenian Poet, whom by appointment of an Oracle they 40 had gotten to direct them, reenforced their Spirits with his Verses. After this Aristomenes tooke by surprise a Towne in Laconia, and vanquished in fight Anaxander King of sparta, who did fet you him, in hope to have recovered the bootic.

But all these victories of Aristomenes perished, in the losse of one battaile, whereof the honour (if it were honour) or furely the profit, fell vnto the Lacedamonians, through the treason of Aristocrates, King of Arcadia, who being corrupted by the enemies with monie, fled away, and left the Meffenians exposed to a cruell butcherie. The loffe was fo great, that all Andania their principall Citie, and the Townes in Mesene, flanding too farre from the Sca, were abandoned, for lack of men to defend them, and the Mount Era fortified, whither the multitude, that could not bee 50 fafe abroade, was conucied, as into a place of fafetic. Here the Laced amonians found a tedious worke, that held them eleuen yeares. For belides that Era it felfe was a firong peece, Aristomenes with three hundred flout Souldiers did many incredible exploits that wearied them, and hindred their attendance on the fiege. He wasted

king away Corne, Wine, Cattaile, and all provisions, necessarie for his owne pcople; the Slaues and houshold stuffe he changed into monie, suffering the owners to redeeme them. To remedie this mischiefe the Lacedamonians made an Edict, that neither Mellene, nor the adjoyning parts of their owne Countrie, should bee tilled or hulbanded; which bred a great tumult among private men, that were almost vndone by it. Yet the Poet Tyrtess appealed this vproare with plealing Songs. But Aristomenes grew fo bold, that hee not only ranged ouer all the fields, but aduentured vpon the Townes, surprised, and sackt amyele, and finally caused the enemics to encrease and strengthen their Companies; which done, there yet appeared no likelyhood of taking Era.

In performing these and other seruices, thrice Aristomenes was taken prisoner: yet still he escaped. One escape of his descrues to bee remembred, as a thing yery ftrange and meruailous. Hee had with too much courage aduentured to fet vpon both the Kings of Sparta; and being in that fight wounded, and felled to the ground, was taken vp fenfeleffe, and carried away prifoner, with fiftie of his Companions. There was a deepe naturall Cauc into which the Spartans vied to cast head-long, such as were condemned to die for the greatest offences. To this punilhment were Aristomenes and his Companions adjudged. All therea of these poore men dyed with their falls; Aristomenes (how soener it came to passe) tooke no harme. Yet was it harme enough to be imprisoned in a deepe Dungeon, among 20 dead carcaffes, where he was like to periffi through hunger and stench. But after a while hee perceived by some small glimmering of light (which perhaps came in at the toppe) a Foxe that was gnawing vpon a dead bodie. Hereupon hee bethought himselse, that this beast mult needes know some way, to enter the place and get out. For which cause he made shift to lay hold vpon it, and catching it by the taile with one hand, faued himselfe from biting with the other hand, by thrusting his coate into the mouth of it. So letting it creepe whither it would, he followed, holding it as his guide, vntill the way was too strait for him; and then dismissed it. The Foxe being loose, ranne through an hole, at which came in a little light; and there did Aristomenes delue fo long with his nailes, that at last he clawed out his passage. 30 When some fugitiues of Messene brought word to Sparta, that Aristomenes was returned home, their tale founded alike, as if they had faid, that a dead man was reniued. But when the Corinthian forces, that came to helpe the Lacedamonians in the fiege of Era, were cut in pecces, their Captaines flaine, and their Campe taken; then was it easily believed, that Ariflomenes was aliue indeede. Thus eleuen yeares paffed whilest the enemies hourring about Era, faw no likelyhood of getting it; and Aristomenes with small forces did them greater hurt than they knew how to requite. But at the last, a sauc, that had fled from Sparta, betraied the place. This fellow had enticed to lewdnesse the wife of a Messenian, and was entertained by her, when her hufband went forth to watch. It happened in a rai- 40 nie-winter-night, that the husband came home vnlooked for, whilest the Adulterer was within. The Woman hidde her Paramour, and made good countenance to her husband, asking him, by what good fortune he was returned so soone. He told her, that the florme of foule weather was such, as bad made all his fellowes leave their Stations, and that himselfe had done as the rest did; as for Aristomenes, he was wounded of late in fight, and could not looke abroade; neither was it to be feared, that the enemies would stirre, in such a darke-rainie-night, as this was. The slave that heard these tidings, rose vp secretly out of his lurking hole, and got him to the Lacedemonian Campe with the newes. There hee found Emperanus his Master, commanding in the Kings absence. To him he vttered all; and obtaining pardon 50 for his running away, guided the Armie into the Towne. Little or nothing was done that night. For the Allarme was presently taken; and the extreme darkeneffe, together with the noife of winde and raine, hindred all directions. All the next day was spent in most cruell fight; one part being incited, by neare hope of ending along worke; the other inraged by meere desperation. The great aduantage that the Spartans had in numbers, was recompensed partly by the affiliance, which women and children (to whom the hatred of seruitude had taught contempt of death) gaue to their husbands and fathers; partly by the narrownesse of the firects and other paffages, which admitted not manie hands to fight at once. But the Mesenians were incontinuall toile; their enemies fought in course refreshing themselues with meat and sleepe, and then returning supplied the places of their wearie fellowes, with fresh Companies. Aristomenes therefore, perceiuing that his men, for want of reliefe were no longer able to hold out, (as having beene three 10 dayes, and three nights, vexed with all miferies, of labour, watching, fighting, bunger, and thirst, belides continuall raine and cold) gathered together all the weaker fort, whom he compassed round with armed men, and so attempted to breake out through the midft of the enemies. Emperamus Generall of the Lacedemonians was glad of this: and to further their departure, caused his Souldiers to give an open way, leaving a faire pallage to these desperate madmen. So they issued forth, and arrived life in Areadia, where they were most louingly entertained. · Vpon the first bruit of the taking of Ers, the Arcadians had prepared themselves to the refere: but Ariflocrates their falle hearted King, faid it was too late, for that all was alreadie lost. When Aristomenes had placed his followers in fasetie, hee chose out flue hundred the luftiest of his men, with whom he resolued to march in all secrethast vnto Sparta, hoping to find the Towne secure, and ill manured, the people being runne forth to the spoile of Messene. In this enterprise, if he sped well, it was not doubted, that the Laced emonians would bee glad to recouer their owne, by reflitution of that which they had taken from others; if all failed, an honourable death was the worst that could happen. There were three hundred Arcadians that offered to joyne with him; but Arifforrates marred all, by fending speedie advertisement hereof, to Anaxander King of Sparta. The Epiffle which Anaxander fent backe to Aristocrates, was intercepted, by somethat mistrusted him to whom it was directed. Therein was found all his falleshood, which being published in open 20 affembly, the Arcadians stoned him to death, and casting forth his bodic vnburied, erected a monument of his treacherie, with a note. That the Periurer cannot de-

Of Aistomenes no more is remaining to be faid, than that committing his people to the charge of his sonne Gorgus and other sufficient Gouernours, who fhould plant them in some new seat abroad, he resoluted himselfe to make abode in those parts, hoping to find the Lacedemonians worke at home. His daughters hee bestowed honourably in marriage. One of them Demagetus who raigned in the Isle of Rhodes tooke to wife, being willed by an Oracle, to marrie the daughter of the best man in Greec. Finally Aristomenes went with his daughter to Rhodes, 40 whence he purposed to have travailed vnto Ardys the Son of Gyges King of Lydia, aud to Phraortes King of Media: but death preuented him at Rhodes, where he was honourably buried.

ceiue God.

The Messenians were inuited by Anaxilas (whose great Grandfather was a Messense) fenian and went into Italie after the former war) being Lord of the Rhegians in Italie, to take his partagainst the Zandleansin Scicilie, on the other side of the straights. They did so; and winning the Towne of Zančie, called it Messee, which name it keepes to this day.

This second Messenian warre ended in the first yeare of the twentie eight Olympiade. Long after which time, the rest of that Nation, who staying at home scrued 50 the Laced emonians found meanes to rebell; but were foone vanquished, and being driuen to forfake Peloponnesius, they went into Acarnania; whence likewise, after few ages they were expelled by the Lacedamonians, and then followed, their ancient Countrimen into Italie and Sicilie; some of them went into Africa, where they chose vnto themselues a seat.

It is very firange, that during two hundred and four cfcore yeares, this banifhed Nation retained their name, their ancient cultomes, language, hattred of Sparta, and loue of their forfaken Countrie, with a delire to returne vun to. I. Inthe third yeare of the hundreth and fccond Olympiad, that great Epaminondae, having tamed the pride of the Laced-amonium, revoked the Anglonium home, who came flocking out of all quarters, where they dwelf abroad, into Pelapannefue. There did Epaminon-das reflore vun to hem their old possession, and he lep them in building a faire Citie, to which, by the name of the Province, was called Messes, and was helded by them cure after, in despiglit of the Laced-amonium, of whom they never from thenceforth flood in force.

R. DYS King of Lydia, and Phraortes of the Medes, are spoken of by Paulanias, as raigning shortly after the Messenian warre. Ardys since case ding wnto his father Gyees, beganne his raigne of nine and forticy yeares, in the second of the fine and twentieth Olympiad. He followed the steppes of his father, who enchroaching ypon the Jonians in Alia, hardys wanne Prient, and affailed Affairus, but went away without it. In his raigne, the Commertant, being expelled out of their owne Countrie by the Scylhians, our-ranne agreat part of Alia, which was not freed from them before the time of Alyattes this mans Grand-child, by whom they were driven out. They 30 had not onely broken into Lydia, but wanne the Citic of Sardez; though the Callle or Citadell thereof was defended againft them, and held flill for King Ardys; whose long raigne was vnable, by reason of this great florme, to effect phrapries was not King untill the third yeare of the nine and twentieth Olympiad, which was live yeares after the Meffenian warre ended; the same being the law yeare of Manssies his raigne ouer Inda.

Dejoces the father of this Phraortes, was King of Media, three and fiftie of these five and fiftie yeares in which Manasses raigned. This Deioces was the first that ruled the Medes in a strict forme, commanding more absolutely than his predecessors 40 had done. For they, following the example of Arbaces, had given to the people fo much licence, as caused cuerie one to desire the wholesome seueritic, of a more Lordly King. Herein Deinees answered their desires to the full. For he caused them to build for him a starely Palace; he tooke vnto him a Guard, for defence of his perfon; he feldome gaue presence, which also when he did, it was with such austeritie, that no man durft prefume to spit or cough in his fight. By these and the like ceremonies, he bred in the people an awfull regard, and highly vpheld the Maiellie which his Predecessours had almost letten fall, through neglect of due comportiments. In execution of his Royall Office, hee did vprightly and fenerely adminifter justice, keeping secret spies to informe him of all that was done in the King- 50 dome. Hee cared not to enlarge the bounds of his Dominion, by enchroaching vpon others; but fludied how to gouerne well his owne. The difference found betweenethis King, and fuch as were before him, feemes to have bred that opinion which Herodotus deliners, that Deioces was the first who raigned in Media.

This was he that built the great Citic of Echatone, which now is called Tauris, and therefore he should be that King Arphaxad, mentioned in the slorie of Indith, as also Bon Alexadea, by the same accompt, should bee Nahuchadonofor the African, by whom Arphaxad was slaine, and Halapharus sent to worke wonders, upon Phudand Lad, and Is know not what other Countries, For Irckon the last yeare of Deines to have been ethe nineteenth of Ben Caleradach; though others place it otherwise, some carlier, in the time of Waradach Baddan, some later, in the raigne of Nabulaj-jür, who is also called Mahuchanofor,

In fitting this Booke of Iudith to a certaine time, there hath much labour beene 10 Spent, with ill successe. The raignes of Cambyfes, Darius, Hystaspis, Xerxes, and Ochus, haue beene fought into; but affoord no great matter of likelihood : and now of late, the times, foregoing the defiruction of Ierulalem, have beene thought voon, and this age that we have in hand, chosen by Bellarmine, as agreeing best with the stories though others herein cannot (I fpeake of fuch as faine would) agree with him. Whilest Camby fes raigned, the Temple was not rebuilt, which in the storie of Iu. dith, is found flanding and dedicated. The other two Persian Kines, Daring and Xerxes, are acknowledged to have been everif fauourable to the Iewes; therefore neither of them could be Nabuchodonofor, whose part they refused to take, and who fent to destroy them. Yet the time of Kernes hath some conveniences, aprly fitting 20 this Historie; and about all the opinion of a few Ancient writers ( without whose iudgement the authoritie of this Bookewere of no value) having placed this argument in the Persian Monarchie, inclines the matter to the Raigne of this vain-glorious King. As for Ochus, verie few, and they faintly, entitle him to the bufine ffe. Manifest it is, and granted, that in the time of this Historie, there must be, a returne from captinitie lately foregoing; the Temple rebuilt, Ioacim High Priest; and a long peace, of threefcore and tenne yeares or thereabout, enfuing. All these were to be among the lewes. Likewife on the other fide, wee must finde a King that raigned in Nimine, eighteene yeares at the leaft; that vanquished and flow a King of the Meass; one whom the Iewes refused to affift; one that fought to bee generally adored as 30 God, and that therfore commanded, all temples, of fuch as were accounted gods to be destroyed, one whose Viceroy or Captaine Generall knew not the Iewish Nation, but was faine to learne what they were of the bordering people,

Of all these circumstances; the Priesthood of Ioacim, with a returne from Captiuitie, are found concurring, with either the time of Manages before the destruction of Ierufalem, or of Xerxes afterward: the rebuilding of the Temple a while before, and the long peace following, agree with the raigne of Xerxes; the rest of circumflances requifite, are to be found all together, neither before, nor after the Captiuitie of the lewes and desolation of the Citie. Wherefore the briefe decision of this controuerfie is, that the Booke of Iudith is not Canonicall, Yet hath Torniellus done as much, in fitting all to the time of Xerxes, as was possible in so desperate a case. For he supposeth, that vnder Xerxes there were other Kings, among which Arphaxad might be one (who perhaps reftored and reedified the Citie of Echatane, that had formerly beene built by Deioces) and Nabuchodonofor might be another. This granted; he addes that from the twelfth yeare to the eight centh of Nabuchodonofor, that is flue or fixe yeares, the absence and ill fortune of Xerxes, in his Gracian expedition (which he supposeth to have beene so long) might give occasion vnto Arphaxad, of rebelling : and that Nabuchodonofor having vanquished and slaine Aphaxad, might then feek to make himfelfe Lord of all, by the Armie which he fent forth vnder Holofernes. So should the Jewes have done their dutie, in adhering to Xerxes their 50 Soueraigne Lord, and resisting one that rebelled against him; as also the other circumstances, rehearfed before be well applyed to the argument. For in these times, the affaires of Iurie were agreeable to the Historie of Iudith, and fuch a King as this cumtances, rehearled before be well applyed to the argument. For in these times, the affaires of Inter were agreeable to the Historie of Indith and such a King as this supposed Nabushodonofor, might well enough bee ignorant of the Ieves, and as proudas we shall need to thinke him. But the silterce of all Histories, takes away that he had been allowed to the heart of the leves, and as proudas we shall need to thinke him. But the silterce of all Histories, takes away that he had been allowed to the same that he had been allowed to the same that he had been allowed to the same that he had been allowed to the same that he had been as the same that he had been allowed to the same that he had been a same that he had been allowed to the same that h beliefe, from this coniecture : and the supposition it selfe is verie hard, that a rebell, whose King was abroad, with an Armie consisting of scuenteene hundred thoufand men, thould prefume to farre, vpon the ftrength of twelue hundred thouland foot, and twelve thousand Archers on horsebacke, as to thinke that he might doe what he lift, yea that there was none other God than himselfe. It is indeed easie to find enough that might be said against this deuise of Torniellus ; yet if there were anie necessitie, of holding the Booke of Indith, to bee Canonicall, I would rather 10 choofeto lay aside all regard of prophane Histories, and build some desence vpon this ground; than, by following the opinion of any other, to violate, as they all doe, the text it felfe. That Indith lived under none of the Persian Kings, Bellarmine (whose workes I haue not read, but find him cited by Torniellus) hath prooued by many arguments. That shee lived not in the Raigne of Manasses, Tornielles hath prooued verie substantially, shewing how the Cardinall is driven, as it were to breake through a wall, in faying that the text was corrupted, where it spake of the destruction of the Temple foregoing her time. That the Kings Arphaxad and Nabuchodonofor, found out by Torniellus, are the children of meere fantalie, it is fo plaine, that it needs no proofe at all. Wherefore we may truly fay, that they, which have contended about the time of this Historie, being well furnished of matter, wherewith to confute each other, but wanting wherewith to defend themselues (like naked men in a stonic field) haue chased Holosernes out of all parts of time, 20 and left him and his great expedition, Extra anni (olifque vias , in an age that neuer was, and in places that were neuer knowne.

Surely to find out the borders of IAPHETH, which were towards the South, and over against Arabia; or the Countries of Phud and Lud, that lay in Holofernes his way; I thinke it would as much trouble Cosinographers, as the former question hath done Chronologers. But I will not busie my selfe herewith; having alreadie fo farre digreffed, in " ewing who lived not with Manaffes, that I thinke it high time, to returne vnto mine owne worke, and rehearle what others I finde, to have had their part, in the long time of his Raigne.

ò. VI.

Of other Princes and actions that were in these times.

HE first yeare of Manasses was the last of Romulus; after whose death, a Sabyne chosen; a peaceable man and seeming verie religious in his kind. Hee brought the rudepeople, which Romalus had employed onely in warres, to some good civilitie, and a more orderly fashion of 40 life. This hee effected by filling their heads with superstition; as perswading them, that he had familiaritie with a Nymph called Egeria, who taught him a many of Ceremonies, which hedelinered vnto the Romans as things of great importance. But all these deuices of Numa were, in his owne judgement, no better than meere delulions, that ferued onely as rudiments, to bring the Sauage multitude of theeues and out-lawes, gathered into one bodie by Romulus, to some forme of milder difcipline, than their boysterous and wilde natures was otherwise apt to entertaine. This appeared by the Bookes that were found in his graue, almost fixe hundred yeares after his death, wherein the Superstition taught by himselfe was condemned as vaine. His graue was opened by chance, in digging a peece of ground that 59 belonged to one L. Petilius a Scribe. Two Coffines or Chefts of stone were in it, with an infcription in Greeke and Latine letters, which faid that Numa Pompilius the fonne of Pompo, King of the Romans lay there. In the one Coffin was nothing found, his bodie being vtterly confumed. In the other were his Bookes, wrapped in two bundels of wax; of his owne conflitutions feueu, and other feuen of Phyfollowhie. They were not onely uncorrupted, but in a manner fresh and new. The Pretour of the Citie defiring to have a fight of these Bookes, when hee perceived whereunto they tended, refused to deliuer them backe to the owner, and offered to take a folemne oath that they were against the R eligion then in vie. Hereupon the Senate, without more a doe, commaunded them to bee openly burnt. It feemes that Numa did meane to acquite himfelfe, vnto wifer ages which he thought would follow, as one that had not beene fo foolish as to believe the Doctrine wherein he inftructed his owne barbarous times. But the poylon wherewith hee had infected 10 Rome, when hee fat in his Throwne, had not left working, whenhee ministred the Antidote out of his graue. Had these Bookes not come to light, vntill the dayes of Tully and Cafar, when the mift of ignorance was somewhat better discussed; likely it is that they had not onely escaped the fire, but wrought some good (and peraduenture generall) effect. Being as it was, they ferued as a confutation, without remedie, of Idolatrie that was inuctorate.

Numa Raigned three and fortic yeares in continual peace. After him Tullus Ho-Stilius the third King was chosen, in the fix and fortieth of Manages, and Raigned two and thirtie yeares, bufied, for the most part in warre. Hee quarrelled with the Albanes, who met him in the field, but in regard of the danger, which both parts had 20 cause to scare, that might grow vnto them from the Thuscanes, caused them to bethinke themselues of a course, whereby without effusion of so much bloud, as might make them too weake for a common enemie, it might bee decided, who fhould command, and who obey.

There were in each Campe three Brethren, Twinnes borne at one birth (Dionylius faves that they were Cofen Germans) of equally eares and strength, who were appointed to fight for their fenerall Countries. The end was that the Moratii. Champions for the Romans got the victorie, though two of them first lost their lives. The three Curatif that fought for Alba (as Linie tels it) were all aline, and able to fight, yet wounded, when two of their opposites were flaine; but the third Hora-20 time, pretending feare, did runne away and thereby drew the others, who by reason of their hurts could not follow him with equall speede, to follow him at such diflance one from another, that returning upon them, he flew them, as it had beene in fingle fight, manafter man, ere they could joyne together and fet vpon him all at once. Diany flus reports it fomewhat otherwife, telling verie particularly, what woundes were given and taken, and faying, that first one of the Horaig was slaine, then one of the Curatii, then a second Horatius, and lattly the two Curatii, whom the third Horatius did comming feuer one from the other as is shewed before.

This is one of the most memorable thinges in the olde Roman Historic, both in regard of the action it felfe, wherein Rome was laid, as it were in wager, against Al-40 ba, and in respect of the great increase which thereby the Roman State obtained. For the Citie of Alba did immediatly become subject vnto her owne Colonic, and was shortly after, upon some treacherous dealing of their Governour, utterly razed, the people being remodued vnto Rome, where they were made Citizens. The strong Nation of the Latines, whereof Alba, as the mother Citie, had beene chiefe, became ere long dependent upon Rome, though not subject unto it, and diverse pettie States adjacent, were by little and little taken in: which additions, that were finall, yet many. I will forbeare to rehearfe (as being the works of fundrie ages, and few of them remarkeable confidered apart by themselves (vntill such time as this fourth Empire, that is now in the infancie, shall grow to bee the maine subject of 50 this Historic.

The feuenth yeare of Hippomenes in Athens, was current with the fitst of Mans/fes. Also the three last Gouernours for tenne yeares, who followed Hippomenes, were in the same Kings time. Of these I find onely the names, Leogrates, Aplander, and Erizias. After Erixias yearely Rulers were elected.

These Governours for tenne yeares, were also of the race of Acidon and Codring, but their time of rule was shortned, and from tearme of life reduced vnto tenne yeares; it being thought likely, that they would gouerne the better, when they know that they were afterwards to line prinate men under the command of others I follow Dienzitus of Habearnallus, in applying their times vnto those yeares of the Olympiad, wherin the Chronologicall table, following this worke, doth fer them. For CHAP. XXVIII.

God of Daud his Father; and in his twelfth yeare he purged Iuda and Ierufalem from the high places, and the groues, and the carued and molten Images: and they brake downe in his light the Altars of BAALIM. He caused all the Images, as well those which were grauen, as molten, to be stampt to powder, and strewed on their graves that had erected them: and this he commanded to be done throughout all his Dominions. Hee also flew those that facrificed to the Sunne and Moone, and caused the Chariots and Horses 30 of the Sunne to be burnt. Of Infias it was prophecied, in the time of Iereboam the first, when he creeted the Golden Calfe at Bethel, that a child should be borne vnto the house of Dauid, Iosias by name, and vpon thee ( said the Prophet speaking to the Altar) shall bee sacrifice the Priests of the high places, that burne incense upon thee. a prophecie verie remarkeable.

In the eighteenth yeare of his Raigne, hee rebuilt and repaired the Temple, at which time Helkiah the Prieftfound the Booke of Holes, called Deuteronomie, or, of the Lane, which hee fent to the King; which when hee had caused to bee read before him, and considered of the seuere commaundements therein written, the profperitie promifed to those that observe them, and the for-40 row and extirpation to the rest, he rent his garments, and commaunded Helkiah, and others, to aske counfell of the Propheteffe Huldah, or, Olda, concerning the Booke, who answered the messengers in these words. Thus faith the Lord, behold I will bring cuill vponthis place, and vponthe inhabitants thereof, enen all the curses that are written in the Booke, which they have read before the King of Iuda, because they have for saken mee, and burnt incense to other Gods. Onely for the King himselfe, because he was a louer of God and of his Lawes, it was promifed that this cuill should not fall on Iuda 2.8(10), 22.15, and Ierufalem in his dayes, but that hee himselfe should inherit his graue in 2.6(10):03.44

Influs affembled the Elders, caused the Booke to bee read vnto them, made 50 a couenant with the Lord, and caufed all that were found in Ieru(alem and Beniamin to doe the like, promiting thereby to observe the Lawes and commaundements in the Booke contained.

The execution done by Iolias vpon the Altar, idols, monuments, and bones of the false Prophets, at Bethel, argueth his Dominion to have extended vnto those he not onely professeth himselfe to have taken great care in ordering the reckoning 12/40 Mille L.t. of times; but hath noted alwayes the yeares of the Greeks, how they did answere vn-14.345 to the thinges of Rome, throughout all the continuance of his Historie. Whereas therefore he placeth the building of Rome, in the first years of the seuenth Olym- 10 piad, and affirmes, that the same was the first yeare of Charaps his gonernment in Athens; I hope I thall not need excuse, for varying from Paulanias, who settes the beginning of these Atlenians somewhat sooner.

In the Raigne of Manafies it was, that Midas, whome the Poets fained to have had Affes cares, held the Kingdome of Phrygia. Manie fables were denifed of him; especially that hee obtained of Bacchus, as a great gift, that all thinges which hee should touch, might immedatly be changed into Gold: by which meanes hee had like to have beene starued (his meat and drinke being subject to the same transformation) had not Bseebus deliuered him from his miferable facultie, by caufing him to wall himselfe in the River Pactolus, the ftreame whereof hath ever fince for- 20 footh, abounded in that precious Mettall. Finally it is faid hee died by drinking Buls bloud; being inuaded by the Seythians,

In this age flourished that Antimachus, who (faith Plutarch in the life of Romalus) observed the Moones Eclipse at the foundation of Rome.

The Milesians, or (as Eusebius hath it) the Athenians, having obtained some power by Sea, founded Macteratis a Citic on the coast of Egypt. Plannitions herein feemes to have affifted them, who yfed all meanes of drawing the Greekes into Agypt, accounting them his furest strength. For neither Miletus, nor Athens, were now of power sufficient to plant a Colonie in Egypt by force.

About this time Archius with his companion Mifeellus, and other Corinthians, 20 founded Syracufa in Sicile: a Citie in after-times exceeding famous.

The Citie of Nicomedia fometime * Atlastis, was enlarged and beautified in Strate there is this age, by Zipartes natine of Thrue, Sybilla of Samus according to Panfanias lined

About these times also was Croton founded upon the Bay of Tarentum by Misthis Crieftin- cellus, the companion of Archias that built Syracufa: Strabe makes it somewhat deth. Pasfl.s. more ancient, and so doth Paulanias,

About the same time, the Parthenians, being of age, and banished Lacedemon, were conducted by Phalantus into Italie, where it is faid they founded Tarentum : but Iustine and Paulanias find it built before, and by them conquered and amplyfied. Also 40 about the same time, Manasse yet liuing, the Citie Phases was founded in Pamphylia, Gela in Sicily, Interamne in the Region of the Vmbri, now called Vrbin in Italie. About which time also Chalcedon in Asia, ouer against Byzantium, (now Constantinople) was founded by the Megarenses : who therefore were vpbraided as blind, because they chose not the other side of Bosphorus. It were a long worke to rehearse all that is faid to have beene done in the flue and fiftic yeares of Manaffes; that which hath alreadic beene told is enough : the rest, being not greatly worth remembrance, may well be omitted, referring onely Ben Merodach, and Nabulaffar, to the bufineffe that will shortly require more mention of them.

Countres, that had beene part of the Kingdome of the tenne Tribes. Yet I doe nor thinke, that any victorie of loss in warre got possession of these places; but rather that Ezekias, after the flight and death of Senacherib, when Merodach opposed himselfe against Aarhaddon, did vie the aduantage which the faction in the North presented vnto him, and laid hold vpon so much of the Kingdome of Ifrael, as hee was able to people. Otherwise also it is not improbable, that the Babylonian finding himselfe vnable to deale with Plananiticus in Syria (as wanting power to raise the fiege of Azolus though the Towne held out nine and twentie yeares) did give vnto Manaffes, together with his libertie as much in Ifrael, as himselfe could not casilv defend. This was a good way to breake the amitie that the Kings of Juda had fo 10 long held with those of Egypt, by casting a bone betweene them, and withall by this benefit of enlarging their Territorie with addition of more than they could challenge, to redeeme the friendship of the Ienes, which had beene lost by injuries done, in feeking to bereaue them of their owne. When it is faid, that Manaffer did s. chron. 3.14. after his deliverance from imprisonment, put Captaines of warre in all the strong Citics of Juda; it may be that some such businesse is intimated, as the taking possession, and fortifying of places deliuered into his hands. For though it be manifest that he tooke much paines, in making lerufalemit felfe more defenfible; yet I should rather belowe, that he having alreadic compounded with the Babylonian, did fortific himfelfe against the Agyptians, whose side hee had for saken, than that hee travailed in 20 making fuch prouitions, onely for his minds fake. The carnefineffe of Iofias in the King of Babel his quarrell, doth argue, that the composition which Manasses had made, with that King or his Ancestor, was vpon such friendly tearmes, as required not only a faithfull observation, but a thankfull requitall. For no perswasions could fuffice to make Iofias fit ftill, and hold himselfe quiet in good neutralitie, when Pharao Acco King of Agypt passed along by him, to warre vpon the Countries about the Riper of Euphrates.

The last yeare of iosius his Raigneit was, when a New the sonne of Psimmittiess, came with a powerfull Armit courades the border of Indea, determining to a.c. times, 35-20, passed that way being the nearch toward Emphastice, either to throughten the passingers 30 of that River, about Careensist or Cerestians, for the defence of Syria (as long after this, Dwelessania Sind by Ammianus Ameelimus to have done) or perhaps to insude Syria (felse, For is seement but the tratalle of Psimmitus. bad not been eitledy consumed about that one Towne of Lastin, but had put the Lastinis in possession of no sind part of Syria, especially in those quarters, that had formerly belonged vinto the Adules Kings of Damssson of Damsson.

Neither was the indultire of Neco lefte than his Fathers had beene, in pursuing the warre against Bubel. In which warre, two things may greatly have awaled the Agyptims, and advanced their affaires and hopes: the extraordinarie valour of the mercenarie Greeker, that were farre better Souldiers than Agypt could of it selfe 40 afford, and the danger wherein Asyria shood, by the force of the Obedes, which vnder the command of more absolute Princes, began to feel it selfe better; and to show what it could doe. These were great helpes, but of shorter endurance than was the warre; as in place more convenient shall be noted. At the present it seemes, that either some preparation of the Chaldams to reconquer, did enforce, or some disabilitie of theirs to make resistance, did invite the King of Agypt, into the Countries bordering ypon Emphrates; whither Pharao Neco ascended with a mightie

These two great Monarchs, having their swords drawne, and contending for the Empire of that part of the World, Infinst addied with himselfe to which of 50 these he might addier, having his Territorie fet in the mid way between both, so as the one could not inuade the other, but that they must of necessitie tread your theverie face and bodie of his Countrie; Now though it were so that Neebimselfe desired by his Embassiadors, leave to passenge by Indas, protessing that hee

mie, as did, soone after this, out face Nabhassa, yoon his owne borders, left vnto the Lewes, a lawfull excuse of Eare, had they storone to give it any checke yoon the 20 way. Wherefore I beleeue, that this religious and vertuous Prince Lossa, was not stirred yo onely by politicker espects, to stop the way of Neese, but thought himselfe bound in sitth and honour, to doe his best in defence of the Bassanasa Crownes, whereunto his Kingdome was obliged, either by couenant made at the enlagement of Manasses, or by the gift of such part as hee held in the Kingdome of the tenne T ribes. As for the Princes and people of Inda, they had now a good occasion to shew, both vnto the Bassonans, of what importance their friendship was, and to the Esperiums, what availant Nation they had abandoned, and thereby made

Some thinke, that this action of Iossas, was contrariet to the aduice of Ieremie 30 the Prophet; which I doe not finde in the Prophecie of Ieremie, nor can finde reason to beleeue. Others hold opinion, that hefograt to ask the counfell of God; and this is veric likelys seeing hee might beleeue that an enterpise grounded vpon fidelitie and thankfulnesse due to the King of Bubel, could not beed sipleasing vnto the Lord. But the wickednesse of the people (in whom the corruptions of former times had taken such roote, as all the care of Iossas in reforming the Land, could not plucke vp) was questionsels fairer from hearkung how the matter would stand with Gods pleasure, and much farther from enquiring into his secret will, wherein it was determined, that their good King, whose life thood betweene them and their punishment, should now bee taken from among them, and that in 49 such fort, as his death should giue enterance to the miseries ensuing. So Iossas leaving all the strength hee could make, neare vnto Aweisde. In the halfe Tribe the first principal countries of the halfe Tribe to the first possible to the halfe Tribe to the superior of the superior that the superior the halfe Tribe to the halfe Tribe to the halfe Tribe to the superior that the superior the halfe Tribe to the halfe Tribe to the superior that the superior the

F these warres, and particularly of this victorie, Herodotus hath mention, among the acts of Neco. He tels vs of this King, that he went about to make a channell, whereby Ships might paffe, out of Nilus into the Redfea. It should have reached about a hundred miles in 10 length, and beene wide enough for two Gallies to row in front. But in the middest of the worke, an Oracle foretold that the Barbarians should have the benefit of it, which caused Aeco to desist when halfe was done. There were confumed in this toile some businesse twelue hundred thousand Exptians; a losse great enough to make the King for fake his enterprife, without troubling the Oracle for admonition. How soener it were he was not a man to be idle; therefore hee built a Fleet, and leavied a great Armie, wherewith hee marched against the King of Babel. In this expedition he vied the service, as well of his Navie, as of his landforces, but no particular exploits of his therein, are found recorded, faue onely this victorie against Iostas, where Herodotus cals the place Magdolus, and the Iewes Sy- 20 rians; which is a small errour, seeing that Indaa was a Pronince of Syria, and Magdoins or Magdala is taken to have beene the fame place (though diversly named) in which this battaile was fought. After this, Necus tooke the Citie of Cadytis, which In Ant. Inc. 1.10 Was per haps Carchemift, by Euphrates, and made himselfe Lord, in a manner, of all

Syria, as Iofephius witneffeth, Particularly we finde, that the Phanicians, one of the most powerfull Nations in Syria, were his Subjects, and that by his command they furrounded all Africa, fetting faile from the gulfe of Arabia, and so passing along all the Coast, whereon they both landed, as need required, and fowed corne for their fustenance, in that long youage which lasted three yeares. This was the first nanigation about Africa, 30 wherein that great Cape, now called Of good hope, was discovered; which after was forgotten, vntill Valco de Gama the Portingall found it out, following a contrarie course to that which the Phanicians held, for they, beginning in the East, ranne the way of the Sunne, South and then Westward, after which they returned home by the pillars and fireights of Hercules (as the name was then) called now the firaights of Gybraliar, haung Africke ftill on the right hand : but the Portingals, beginning their voyage not farre from the fame firaights, leave Apricke on the Larboard, and bend their course vnto the East. That report of the Phanicians, which Herodotus durst not believe, how the Sunne in this journie was on their right hand, that is, on made hereof, makes mee the better to beleeve, that such a Voyage was indeed

But leaving these discourses of Neco his magnificence, let vs tell what he did, in matters more importing his Estate. The people of Inda, while the Agyptians were busie at Carchemilh, had made Iehoahaz their King, in the roome of his father Iosias. The Prophet Ieremie cals this new King Shallum, by the name of his younger brother; alluding perhaps to the fhott Raigne of Shallum King of the tenne Tribes: for Shallum of Ifraei Raigned but one moneth; Ieheahaz no more than three. Hee was not the eldeft fonne of Iolias: Wherefore it may feeme that he was fet up as the best affested vnto the King of Babel; the rest of his house being more inclined to the 50

the Northide of them, is a matter of necessarie truth; and the observation then 40

a. King. 34. 10.32 As explian, as appeares by the fequell. An Idolater he was, and thriued accordingly. For when as Acco had dispatched his businesse in the North parts of Syria, then did he take order for the affaires of Judga. This Countrie was now fo farre from making any relistance, that the King himselfe came to Riblah in the Land of Hamath, where the matter went foill on his fide, that Neco did cast him into bonds and carrichim prisonerinto Egypt, giuing away his Kingdome to Eliakim his elder brother, to whom of right it did belong. This Citie of Riblath, in after times called Antiochia, was a place vnhappie to the Kings and Princes of Inda, as may bee obserued in diuers examples. Yet here Ieboiakim, together with his new name, got his Kingdome; an ill gaine, fince he could no better vieit. But how cuer Jehojakim thrisped by the bargaine, Pharao sped well, making that Kingdome Tributarie, without any stroke stricken, which three moneths before was too stoute to give him peace. when he defired it. Certaine it is, that in his march outward. Neco had a greater

10 taske lying ypon his handes, than would permit him to wast his forces ypon Iudea: but now the reputation of his good fuccesse at Meridde, and Carchemille, together with the diffention of the Princes Iofias his fonnes (of whom the eldeft is probably thought to have flormed at the preferment of his yonger brother) gave him power to doe, euen what should please himselfe. Yet hee did for beare to make a conquest of the Land; perhaps upon the fame reason, which had made him so earnest, in seeking to hold peace with it. For the Iewes had suffered much, in the £gyptians quarrell, and being left by these their friends, in time of need, vnto all extremities, were driven to for lake that partie and joyne with the enemies; to whom if they showed themselues faithfull, who could blame them? It was therefore enough to reclaime 20 them; feeing they were fuch a people, as would not vpon eueric occasion shift side, but endure more, than Pharae, in the pride of his victories, thought that any henceforth should lay vpon them : so good a Patron did he meane to be vnto them. Neuerthelesse he laid vpon them a Tribute, of an hundred Talents of silver, and one Talent of gold; that so he might both reape at the present, some fruit of his paines taken, and leave vnto them some document in the future, of greater punishment then verball anger, due to them, if they should rebell. So hee departed carrying along with him into Egypt the vnfortunate King Iehoahaz, who died in his Captinitie.

The Raigne of Ichonhaz was included in the end of his Fathers last yeares; o-30 therwise it would hardly be found, that Ieloiakim, his successour, did Raigne tenne whole yeares; whereas the Scriptures give him eleven, that is current and incomplete. If any man will rather cast the three moneths of this short Raigne, into the first yeare of the brother, than into the fathers last; the same arguments that shall maintaine his opinion, will also proue the matter to bee vnworthie of disputation; and fo I leaue it.

Iehoiakim in impictic was like his brother, in foction hee was altogether Agratian, as having received his Crowne at the hand of Pharas. The wickednesse of these laft Kings, being expressed in Scriptures none otherwise, than by generall wordes, with reference to all the cuill that their Fathers had done; makes it apparent, that 40 the poyfon wherewith Abaz and Manaffes had infected the Land, was not so expelled by the zealous goodnesse of Iolias, but that it still cleaved vnto the chiefe of the people, Tea unto the chiefe of the Priests also; and therefore it was not strange, that 2. Chrom.cap. 26. the Kings had their part therein. The Royallauthoritie was much abased by the serfator dangers wherein the Countrie stood, in this troublesome age: the Princes did in a manner what they lifted; neither would the Kings for beare to professe, that they could denie them nothing. Yet the beginning of Iehoiakim had the countenance of the Egyptian to grace it, which made him infolent and cruell; as we find by that example of his dealing with Pria the Prophet: though herein also the Princes doe ap-peare to have been infligators. This Holy man denounced Gods judgements ago gainst the Citic, and Temple, in like fort as other Prophets had formerly done, and did in the same age. The King with all the men of power, and all the Princes, hearing of this determined to put him to death. Hereupon the poore man fled into Errot: but fuch regard was had vnto lebotakim, that Vria was delivered vnto his Embassadour, and sent backe to the death; contrarie to the custome vsed, both in those dayes and since among all Civill Nations of giving refuge vnto strangers. that are not held guiltie of fuch inhumane crimes, as for the generall good of mankind fhould be exempted from all priviledge.

It concerned Pharas to give all contentment possible to Ishoiskim for the Alixvian Lion that had not flirred in manie yeares, beganne about these times, to roare folloud voon the bankes of Euphrates, that his voice was heard vnto Nilus, threatdrawne the house of Merodach from opposing the Agyptian in his conquest of Syning to make himselfe Lord of all the Forrest. The causes that hitherto had withris, require our consideration in this place; before we proceed to commit them together at Charchemift, where shortly after this, the glorie of Egypt is to fall.

ò. III.

Of the Kings of Babylon and Media. How it came to passe that the Kings of Babel could not give attendance on their befinefie in Syria: which caused them to loose that

ERODACH the sonne of Biladan who taking the advantage that Sennacheribs miladuenture and death, together with the diffention betweene his children prefented, made himfelfe King of Babylon, was e-Eleuen yeares troubled with a powerfull Eenemie Marhaddon the fonne of Senacherib, Raigning ouer the Affrians in Nininie; from whom whilest he could not any other way divert his cares, he was faine to omit all bulinefle in Syria, and (as hath beene formerly shewed) to make ouer vnto Ezekia, some part of the Kingdome of the tenne Tribes. From this moleflation, the death of Afarhadden did not onely fet him free, but gaue vnto him some part of Affria if not (as is commonly but leffe probably thought) the whole Kingdome. How 39 greatly this was to the liking of the Affyrians I wil not here fland to enquire; his long Raigne following, and his little entermedling in matters of Syria make it plaine, that he had worke enough at home, either in defending or in claablishing that which he had gotten. In feph:us gives him the honour of having wonne Ninime it felfe; which we may beleeue; but furely he did not hold it long. For in the times foone following that great Citie was free, and vanquished Phraortes the Median, Perhaps it yeelded vpon some capitulation; and refused afterwards to continue subject when the Kings being of the Chaldean race, preferred Babylon before it.

Some thinke that this was the Affrian King whose Captaines tooke Manafles prisoner; but I rather believe those that hold the contrarie; for which I have given 40 my reasons in due place, To say truth I find little cause why Meredach should have looked into those parts, as long as the Ierres were his friends and the Agyptians, that maligned the Northerne Empire, held themselues quietathome, which was vntill the time of Pfammiticus, about the end of this Kings Raigne, or the beginning of his fonne.

Ben Overodach the sonne and succession of this King, is not mentioned in the Scriptures; yet is hee named by goods confent of Authours and that spoake little of his doing s. The length of his Raigne is gathered by inference to have beene one and twentic yeares, for fomuch remaineth of the time that paffed between the beginning of his Fathers and his Nephewes Raignes (which is a knowne fumme) de- 50 ducting the yeares of his Father , and of his fonne Nabulaffar This (as I mke it) was he that had Manaffes Prisoner and released him. Hee spedillin Spria; where Pfammitious, by the vertue of his Mercinarie Greekes, did much prevaile. This may haue beene some cause that he released Manasses, and did put into his handes some part more of the Kingdome of Samaria: which is made probable by circumflances alleaged before.

Nebulaffar that Raigned in Babylon after his Father Ben Merodach, had greater busines in his own Kingdome, than would permit him to looke abroad; infomuch asit may bee thought to have beene a great negligence or ouer-fight of Plammitious and Neco, that they did not occupie some good part of his Dominions beyond Euphrates. For it was in his time, that Phraortes King of the Medes inuaded Allyria, and beseiged Ninine; from whence he was not repelled by any force of Nabulassar, but constrained to remoue by the comming of Seythians, who in these ages dido-10 uer-flow those parts of the World, laying hold you all, that they could mafter by ftrong hand. Of these Soythians, and the Lordship that they held in A. it is convenient that I speake in this place; shewing briefly afore-hand, how the Medes, vpon whom they first fell, were busied in the same times with hopes of conquering

Phraortes, the sonne of Deioces, King of the Medes, having by manie victories enlarged his Dominions, conceiued at length a faire polifibilitie of making himfelfe

That Citie (as Herodotus reports it) having beenea Soueraigne Ladie was not Hirod Eb. 1; forfaken of all her dependants; yet remained in fuch cafe, that of her felfe shee was an well enough.

This makes it plaine, that how focuer Merodach had gotten poffession of this imperiall feat, and made it subject as was the rest of the Countrie; yet it found the meanes to fet it felfe at libertie: as after this againe it did, when it had beene regained by Nabulaffar his Grand childe.

Sharpe warre, and the veric noueltie of fuddaine violence, vie to difmay anie State or Countrie, not inured to the like: but cuftome of danger hardeneth even those that are vnwarlike. Praise had beene the Palace of manie valiant Kings lately Raigning therein, it had fuffered, and refifted, all the furie, wherewith either Domesticall tumults betweene the sonnes of Senscherib, or forraigne warre of the Ba-20 bylonians, could afflict it: and therefore it is the leffe wonderfull, that Phraortes did speed so ill in his journie against it. He and the most of his Armic perished in that expedition: whereof I find no particular circumftances (perhaps he vndervalued their forces, and brought a leffe power than was needfull) It is enough, that we may herein beleeue Herodotus.

Craxares the fonne of Phraortes, a brauer man of warre then his Father, wanne as much of Asia the leffe, as lay Eastward, from the River of Halys; hee sought reuenge vpon the Affrians for the death of his Father, and befreged Niniue it felfe, having a purpose to destroy it. Irather beleeve Evs EBIVs, that he tooke the Citie and fulfilled his displeasure upon it, than HERODOTVS, that the Scythian Armie came upon 40 him whilest he lay before it. For where equal authorities are contradictoric (as Eusebius, though farre later than Herodotus, yet having seene other Authours, that are now loft, is to be valued according to his great reading) there doe I hold it beft, to yeeld ynto the best likelihoods.

To thinke that the Seythians came vpon Cyaxares, whilest hee lay before Ninine, were to accuse him of greater improvidence, than ought to bee suspected in one commended as a good Souldier. But to suppose that hee was faine to leave the Towne, when a warre so dangerous fell vpon his owne Countrie, doth well agree both with the condition of such businesse as that Soythian expedition brought into those partes, and with the State of the Chaldean and Affrian affaires en-

The Astruction of this great Citie is both foretold in the Booke of Tobit, and there iet downe as happening about these times; of which Booke whosever was the Authour, hee was ancient enough to know the Storie of those ages, and hath committed no such errour in reckoning of times, as should cause vs to distrust him in this. As for the Prophetic of Nahum, though it be not limited vnt any certaine tearme, yet it appeares to have taken effect, in the finall destruction of Aimine by Nabnehodonofor, according to the common opinion. For the Prophet hath mention of a Conquest of exerpt, foregoing this calamitie, whereof we will speake in due place. Some that afcribe more authoritie than the reformed Churches yeeld, to the Booke of Tobit, are carefull, as in a matter of necessitie, to affirme, that about these times Niniue was taken; but they attribute (conjecturally) the victoric over ir, to Bere Aleredach : a needleffe conjecture, if the place of Eulebius be well confidered. Yet I holdit probable, that Nabulaffar the fonne of Ben Merodach did feize voon it, and placea King or Viceroy therein, about such time as the Countrie of 10 الال was abandoned by Cyaxares, when the Soythian warre ouerwhelmed Media. For then was the Conquest wrought out readie to his hand; the swelling spirits of the Aminites were allayed, and their malice to Babylon fo affwaged, that it might be thought a great fauour, if Nahulassar, appointing vnto them a peculiar King, tooke him and them into protection; though afterwards, to their confusion, this vnthankfull people and their King, rebelled againe, as shalbe shewed in the Raigne of Mabuchadencler.

abled, to performe any action of worth vpon the Agypticus in Syria: it is time that I speake of that great Soythian expedition, which grievoufly alilicted not only the Babylonians, but the Ades and Lydians. with the Countries adjacent, in such wife that part of the trouble redounded cuen to the Agyptians themselves. Of the Soythian people in generall, Herodotso makes verse large discourse, but interlaced, as of matter ill knowne, with many Fables, of this expedition he tels many particulars, but ill agreeing with confent of time. Concerning his fabulous reports, it will be needleffe to recite (bem, for they are farre enough diffant from the bufineffe in hand. The computation of times, which by 40 inference out of his relations, may feeme very firange, needeth fome answerein this place: leaft otherwife I should either seeme to make my selfe too bold with an Authour, in citing him after a manner different from his owne tale; or elfe to bee too forgetfull of my felfe, in bringing to act vpon the Stage, those persons, which i had alreadie buried. Eight and twentie yeares he faith that the Seythians Raigned in Afig. before Crawgres delivered the Countrie from them. Yet hee reports a warre, betweene Cyaxares and Halyattes the Lydian, as foregoing the fiege of Ninine; the fiege of Ninine being ere the Soythians came. And further he tels, how the Soythians, hauing vanquillied the Medes, did paffe into Syria, and were encountred in Palastina by Pfsimilian King of Expt, who by giftes and entreatie procured them to de-59 part from him. These narrations of Herocolum may, every one of them, see trues though not in such order of time as he bath marshalled them. For Pfammiticus was dead before Cyanarus beganne to Raigne; and Cyanarus had front halfe of his fortic yeares, ere Halyattes was King of Lydia; fo that he could not, after those Lydim warres, Raigne eight and twentic yeares together with the Seythiams. It is true, that Eufebius dothallo call Pfammis the fonne of Phama Neva, by the name of Pfammis may, by fome fitained conjecture, beethought to have beene he that met with the Seythiams: for he lived with both Cyssae's and Halpates. But Eufebius himfelfe referres all that buffenffe of the Seythiam irruption in Plastime, to Pfammities with Father of Reva, whom he leanes dead before the Raigne of Malyates. Therefore I dare not relie vpon Merodotim, in this matter, other wife then to beleeve him, that fuch things were in thefe ages, though not in fuch order as he fest them downe.

10 It remaines, that I collect as well as I can, those memorials which I find of this expedition scattered in diuers places: a workenecessarie, for that the greatnesse of this action was such, as ought not to be comitted in agenerall Historie; yet not calle, the consent of those that haue written thereof, being nothing neare to vniformitie.

I have noted before, that in the Raigne of Ardys King of Lydia, the Cimmerians ouer-ranne that Kingdome, and were not expelled, virill Halyattes the Nephew of Ardys got the upper hand of them. In thele times therefore of Ardys, Sadvattes. and Halyattes, are wee to find the eight and twentie yeares, wherein the Seythians Raigned ouer Afa. Now forafmuch as Pfanmitieus the Agretian had fome dea-20 lings with the Scythians, euen in the heigth of their prosperite, wee must needes allow more than one or two of his last yeares, vnto this their Dominion. But the beginning of Halyattes his Raigne in Lydia, being three and twentie yeares compleat after the death of Pfammitieus, leaves the space verie scant, either for the great victories of the Scythians, necessarily supposed before they could meet the Agyotian in Syria, or for those many losses, which they must have received ere they could bee drinen quite away. To increase this difficultie, the victorious Raigne of Nabuchodonofor in Babylon, is of no small moment. For how may we thinke it possible, that he should have adventured the strength of his Kingdome against the . A cyptians and Iewes, had he stood in daily feare of looling his owne; to a more mightie Nati-30 on, that lay vpon his necke? To speake simply as it appeares to me; the victories ascribed to Cyaxares and Halyattes ouer these warlike people, were not obtained against the whole bodie of their Armie, but were the defeatures of some troupes, that infelted their feuerall Kingdomes; other Princes, and among these, Nabulassar having the like successe, when the pleasures of Asia had mollified the courages of these hardie Northerne Laddes. Wherefore wee may probably annexe the eight and twentic yeares of the Seytmans rule, to as manie almost the last of Nabulaffars fay of the time, wherein As fuffered the violence of these oppressors.

What Nations they were that brake into Asia; with the cause of their Iournic.

TOuching the expedition it selfe, Herodatus tels vs, that the Cimmerians being driuen our of their Countrie by the Septhians, insaded and wasted some part of Assand that the Septhians not contented with hasing wonne the land of the Cimmerians, did follow them, I know not why, into farre remooued quarters of the world, for the week by chances falling woon. Media and LEgypt, in this pursuit of men that were gone another way into Lydis. Hereby we may gather that the Cimmerians were an odious and base people; the Septhian, as mischieuous and sooiling or else Herodatus, and some other of his Countrimen, great slanderers of those, by Whom

whom their Nation had beene beaten, and Ionia, more than once, grieuously ranfackt. The great valour of the Cimmerians or Cimbrians is fo well knowne, and their manie Conquetts fo well tellified in Histories of dinerfe Nations, that the malice of the Greekes is infunicient to flaine them with the note of Cowards. These were the polleritie of Gomer, who peopled the greatest part of our Westerne World; and whose restow did ouerwhelme no small portion of Greece and Asia, as well before and after, as in the age whereof we doe now entreat. He that would more largely informe himfelte of their originall and actions, may perufe Goropius Becanus his 4muse of manie things in which Booke, that may be verified, which the learned ortelins is faid to have spoken, of all Goropius his works, that it is easie to laugh at them, 19 but hard to conjute them: There wee find it proued, by fuch arguments and authorities, as are not lightly to be regarded, that the Cimmerians, Seythians, and Sarmatians, were all of one Linage and Nation; howfocuer diftinguished in name, by reason of their diverse Tribes, professions, or perhaps dialect of speech. Homer indeede hath mention of the Cimmerians; whose Countrie whether he place in the West, as neare unto the Ocean and boundes of the Earth, Or in the North, as being farre from the Sunne, and couered with eternall darknesses, certaine it is that he would have them neare neighbours to Hell: for hee had the fame quarrell to them, which Herodotus had, and therefore belike would have made them feeme a kinde of Goblins. It was the manner of this great Poet (as Herodotus writing his life affirmes) to infert into 20 his workes the names of fuch as lived in his owne times, making fuch mention of them, as the good or ill done by them to himfelfe deferued. And for this reason it is proved by Euflathius, that the Cimmerisms were fo differed by him, because they had wasted his Countrie. Perhaps, that inuation of Phrygia by the Amazons, whereof Homer puts a remembrance into Prismas his discourse with Helen, was the verie fame, which Eulebius noteth to have happened formewhat before the age of Homer, at what time the Cimmerians with the Amazons, together inuaded Afia. This is certaine, that both the Amazons and the Cimmerij ( who in after-times were called Cimbri) did often breake into Greece and Ain; which though it bee not in expresse tearmes written, that they did with joynt forces, yet seeing they inua. 30 ded the felfe fame places, it may well be gathered, that they were companions. One journie of the amazons into Greece, mentioned also by Eusebius, was by the ftraights of the Commerians, as we finde in Diodore, who further to leth vs, that the Sevelians therein gave them affiliance. The fame Authour, before his entrie into which himselfe acknowledgeth to bee fabulous. doth report them to have beene Wines of the Seythians, and no lesse warlicke than their Hufbands; alleadging the example of that Queene, who is faid to have flaine the overt Perfian Cyrus. That it was the manner of the Cimbri to carrie their wines along with them to the warres; and how desperate the courage was of those women; the terrible descent of them into Italie, when Asrius the Roman ouerthrew 40 them, gives proofe sufficient. I will not here enter into a discourse of the Amazons; other place will give mee better leifure to speake of them; but seeing that they are noted by diverse Historians to have belonged vnto the Cimmerians, to the Serthians, and to the Sarmatians, wee may the better approous Goropius his conclusion. That these three Nations were one, at least that they were neare allies.

Now concerning the expulsion of the Cimmerians by the Soythians, it appeares to have been enone other than the fending a Colonic of them forth into Alia, with an Armie of Seythians to helpe them, in purchasing a new scat, and establishing the

The Sarmatians also were companions in this journie. For the Citic of None- 50 grad in Russia (which Countrie is the same that was called Samustia) friend in their way homewards, as shall anon be further shewed. So that all the North was vp in Armes : and therefore it is no maruaile though manie Countries felt the weight of this great inundation. Such another voiage was that, which the same people made fine hundred yeares and more after this, when they were encountred by the Romans. For they issued from the parts about the Lake Meetis; they were then likewise affifted (faith Plutareb in the most likely report of them) by the Seythians their neigh- Plutareb in the bours; they had in their Armicaboue three hundred thousand fighting men, be-lite of Martin, fides a huge multitude of women and children; they wandered ouer manie Countries, beating all downe before them, and finally, thinking to have fetled themfelues in Italie, they divided their companie, for the more calle passage thirther and were confumed in three terrible battailes by the Roman Confuls. Mere necessitie enforced these poore Nations, to trouble the World, in following such hard aduentures. To For their Countrie, being more fruitfull of men than of full chance, and thut up on the North fide with intolerable cold, which denied iffue that way to their ourfwelling multitudes; they were compelled to discharge upon the South, and by right or wrong to driue others out of possession, as having title to all that they had power to get, because they wanted all, that weaker, but more civile, people had. Their sturdie bodies, patient of hunger, cold, and all hardnesse, gaue them great aduantage ouer fuch as were accustomed vnto a more delicate life, and could not be without a thousand superfluities. Wherefore commonly they preuailed verie farre; their next neighbours giving them free paffage, that they might the fooner be ridde of them; others giving them, belides pallage, victuals and guides to conand duct them to more wealthic places; others hiring them to depart with great prefents; fo as the farther they went on, the more pleasant Lands they found, and the more effeminate people.

Of the Cimmerians warre in Lydia.

30 THE first Companie of these, consisting for the most part of Cimmerians, held the way of the Euxine Seas, which they had still on the right hand; leaving on the other fide, and behind them, the great Mountaines of Cancasius. These hauing passed through the Land of Colchis, that is now called Mengrelli, entered the Countrie of Pontus, and being arrived in Paphlasonia, fortified the Promontorie Herad.lib.4. whereon Sinope, a famous Hauen Towne of the Greekes, was after built. Here it feemes that they bestowed the weakest and most vnseruiceable of their traine, together with the heaviest part of their cariages, vnder some good gard: as drawing neere to those Regions, in conquest whereof they were to trie the vtmost hazard. For in like fort afterwards did the Cimbri (of whom I spake euen now) dispose of 40 their impediments, leaving them in a place of strength, where Antwerpe now stands, when they drew necre vnto Gaule, vpo which they determined to aduenture themfelues in the purchase. From Sinope, the way into Phrygia, Lydia. and Ionia, was faire and open to the Cimmerians, without any ledge of Mountaines or any deepe

Rivers to state their march: for Iris and Halys they had alreadic passed. What battailes were fought betweene these inuaders and the Lydians, and with what variable successe the one or other part wanne and lost, I finde not written, nor am able to conjecture. This I find, that in the time of Ardys, the Cimmerians got pofseffion of Sardes the Capitall Citie of Lydia; only the Castle holding out against them. Further I observe, that whereas Herodotus tels of the acts performed by G. ges ond Ardys Kings of Lydia, before this invasion, and by Halyattes and Crasius in the times following: all that Ardys did against the Cimmerians, and all (faue burning the Milesians Corne fields) that was done in twelue yeares by Sadiattes his Son (who perhaps had his hands fo full of this businesse, that hee could turnethem to nothing elfe) is quite omitted. Hereby it may seeme, that neither of the two did anie thing

worthie of remembrance in those warres, but were gladenough that they did not

Certainly, the miferies of warre are neuer fo bitter and manie, as when a whole Nation, or great part of it, for faking their owne feates, labours to roote out the established possessor another Land, making roome for themselves, their wives and children. They that fight for the malterie are pacified with tribute, or with fome other feruices and acknowledgements, which had they beene yeelded at the first, all had beene quiet, and no sword bloudied. But in these migrations, the assailants bring fo little with them, that they need all which the defendants haue, their Lands and Cattell, their houses and their goods, even to the cradels of the sucking 10 infants. The mercilesse tearmes of this controuersie arme both sides with defperate resolution : seeing the one part must either winne, or perilh by famine; the other defend their goods, or loofe their lives without redemption. Most of the Countries in Europe haue felt examples hereof; and the mightie Empire of Rome was ouerthrowne by fuch inualions. But our Isle of Brittaine can best witnesse the diuerlitic of Conquests; having by the happie victorie of the Romans, gotten the knowledge of all Civile arts, in exchange of libertie, that was but flenderly inftru-Steel therein before; whereas the iffue of the Saxon and Danifb warres, was, as were the causes, quite contrarie. For these did not seeke after the Dominion only, but the entire possession of the Countrie, which the Saxans obtained, but with horrible 20 crueltie, eradicating all of the British Race, and defacing all memoriall of the ancient inhabitants through the greater part of the Land. But the Danes (who are alfo of the Cimmerian bloud) found fuch end of their enterprife, asit may feeme that the Commercians in Lydia, and Soythians in the higher Afia, did arrive vnto. So that by confidering the processe of the one, we shall the better conceine the fortune of the other. Manie battailes the Danes wonne; yet none of fuch importance, as sufficed to make them absolute Conquerours: Manie the Saxens wonne vpon the Danes, vet not fo great, as could drive them quite away, and backe from hence, after they had gotten firme footing. But in course of time, the long continuance even of veterenmitie, had bred fuch acquaintance betweene them, as bowing the natures of 30 both these people, made the one more pliant vnto the other. So their disagreeable qualities, both ill and good, being reduced into one milde temper, no fmall number of the Danes became peaccable cohabitants with the Saxons, in England, where great flaughter had made large roome; others returning home, found their owne Countrie wide enough to receive them, as having difburthened it felle of manie thousands, that were sent to seeke their graves abroad. And such (as I thinke) was the end of the Cimmerian warre in Lydia; whereunto though some victoric of Halyattes may have haltened the conclusion, yet the wearifome length of time feemes to have done most in compelling them to desire of rest. I know not why I should feare to adde hereunto my further conjecture; which is, that the matter was so com- 40 pounded betweene the Cimmerians and Halyaites, thatthe River of Halys should divide their Territories. For Halys was henceforth the border of the Lydians, and on the Easterne side of the River was the Countrie of the Amazons, that is indeed, of the Cimerians and other Seythian people; whose wives and daughters these warlike women are supposed to have beene.

And hereunto the quarrell enfuing, betweene Halyaites and Cyanares the Oneile, hath verie good reference. For Halyattes (as is faid ) fought in defence of certains Seythians, vpon whom the Median fought reuenge. And it flands with reason, that the Lydians and Cimmerians, being much weakened with mutuall flaughters, the wid haue joyned in a league of mutuall defence for their common fafetie: though 0-50 therwife it had beene dangerous to Halyattes, if he had permitted the Median to extend his Kingdome fo farre Westward, what socuer the pretences might bee, of ta king reuenge vpon fuch as had spoiled each of their Countries. As for that occalion of the warre betweene these two Kings, which Herodolus relates, I find it of little waight, and leffe probabilitie. He tels of Soythians, that being chased out of their Countrie by faction, came vnto Cyaxares; who committed vnto them certaine Boyes, to bee inftructed in the Soythian tongue, and feate of Archerie. Now it for fell out (faith he) that these Seythians vsing much to hunt, and commonly bringing home formewhat with them, did neuertheleffe other whiles miffe of their game, and come home as they went. Hereupon the King being froward and cholericke, birterly reuiled them; and they, as impatient as he, killed one of the Boyes that was under their charge, whom dreffing like Venison they presented vnto him; which done they fled vnto Halyattes. This Herodotus deliuers, as the ground of a warre that lafted fixe yeares betweene the Medes and Lydians: the one King demmanding these Fugitiues to bee delivered into his hand, the other refusing to betraic such men as were become his suppliants. To this I will say no more, than that I see no cause that might induce the Seythians, to betake themselves to either of these Kings. vnto whom their Nation had wrought so much displeasure. Particularly they had reason to distrust Cyaxares, for the treacherie that he shewed in the massacring of their Countriemen, that were in his Kingdome; of whom it is now meet that wee should speake.

The warre of the Scythians in the higher Alia.

A S the Commercans held their courfe Westerly, along the shores of the Eucine Sea; so the Seythians and Sarmatians tooke the other way, and having the Caspian Sea on their left hand, paffed betweene it and Caucafus through albania, Colthene, and other obscure Nations, where now are the Countries of Sernan and Georgia, and so they entered into Media. The Medes encountered them in Armes, but were beaten, and thereupon glad to come to anie agreement with them. This was 30 in the time of Phraortes, whileft Pfammiticus Raigned in Egypt. If it were in the fixt yeare of Nabulassars Raigne ouer Babylon (supposing him to have Raigned five and thirtie; otherwise we must allow to Ben Merodach what we take from him) then doe the eight and twentie yeares of their Dominion end, one yeare before the great Nabuchodonofor was King; fo giving him good leave to provide fecurely, for the inualion of Syria, which expedition he began while his Father yet lived, as Iofephus out of Berefus relates the Historie.

Now the Medes, defirous to faue themselves as well as they might, from this terrible Nation, which when they had no lust to a second triall of the sword, refufed not to vindergoe the burther of a Tribute, but thought nothing dishonourable, AO that would ferue to remoone these troublesome guests into some other lodging. On the other part, the Seythians finding still the Countries pleasanter and better, the further that they marched into the South, did fuffer themselves to bee perswaded, that a little more trauaile, would adde a great deale more to their content. For they relied to much you their owne valour, that they feared no reliftance; and being the brauest men, they thought it reason that they should dwel in the best Region. That Phraortes perswaded them into Agypt, I doe not thinke; Babylon was neare enough; whither if hee could fend these Locusts to graze, than should not his unfriendly Neighbours have cause to laugh at his missortune. What shift Nabulassar made with them, or that at all he had anie, dealings with them I doe not reade. But it is 50 well knowne, that his Dominions lay in the middeft betweene Media and Agyit, as also, rhat they made all those parts of Asia Tributarie; wherefore we may verie well beleeve, that they watered their horfes in his Rivers, and that he also was content to give them provender.

tooke care that they might not looke vpon Agypt; least the fight thereof should more earlived taine them there, than anie force or perfusation, that hee could vie. would fend them going. Therefore he met them in Syria, prefuming more on the great witts which he ment to bellow upon them, than on his Armie that should keepe them backe. egypt was rich; and halfethe riches thereof had not beene ill from in fauing all. Yet Pfammitions tooke the most likely course, whereby to make his part good against them by strong hand, in case they had beene so obstinate as to 10 refuse all indifferent composition. For hee lay close vpon the edge of the Wildernoffe in Gaza (as I take it) the Southermost border of Palastina; whence hee neuer adnanced to meet with the Sorthians; but gaue them leave to feele as much of the Galding Sun-beames, ill agreeing with their temper, as ni all the length of Syria could beat upon them. When they were come as farre as Afralon, the next Citie to Gaza, then did be affay them with goodly words, accompanied with gifts, which were likely to worke to much the better, by how much the worfe they were pleafed with the heat of a Climate to farre different from their owne. Pfammitieus had at his backe a valt wildernesse, ouer the scorching fands whereof, the Septhians more patient of cold and wet, than of the contrarie differences, could ill haue indured to purfue him, through vnknowne wayes, had they fought with him and preuailed: especially the Kingdome of Agypt being readic to entertaine him with reliefe, and them with new trouble at the end of their wearie journie. Wherefore they were 30 content to be intreated, and taking in good part his courteous offers, returned back to visite their acquaintance in the high Countries. The Agyptian King (besides that he preferred his owne E state from a dangerous aduenture, by hyring this great Armie to depart from him ) found all his coft well repayed in the processe of his wars in Swis, where the Nations beyond Euphrates had no power to molest him, being more then euer troubled themselues, with the returne of their oppressors. For the Scythians, resoluting now to seeke no further, beganne to demaund more than the Tribute formerly imposed. And not contented to fleece the Naturals with grienous exactions, they prefumed to line at difcretion upon the Countrie, taking what they lifted from the Owners; and manietimes (as it were to faue the labour of taking often) taking all at once. This Tyrannous Dominion they long yfed ouer the higher Afia, that is, ouer the Countrie lying betweene the Caspian and Red Seas, and betweene India and Alia the leffe. Happie it was for the poore people, that in fo large a space of ground, there was roome enough for these new comers; otherwife the calamitie that fell, as it were by chance, vpon those private men, to whose wealth anie Soythian did beare a fancie, would have lighted in generall vpon all at one clap, leaving few alive, and none able to relieue their fellowes. Yet it feemes that the heaviest burthen lay vpon Media; for it was a fruitfull Countrie, not farre from their owne home, and lay under a Climate well agreeing with the conflitution of their bodies: there also it was that they had the fatall blow, by which their 40 infolent Rule was taken from them.

Herod Lb. 1.

Cyanares King of the Medes, who in this extremitie was no betterthen a Rentgatherer for the Soythians, perceiving that his Land lay vomanured and wafte, through the negligence of his people, that were out of heart by daily oppressions; and that the matter could not be remedied by open force; refolued to proue what might be done by stratagem. The managing of the businesse is thus delivered in briefe: That he, and his Medes, feasted the better part of the Seythians; made them drunke; and flew them; recouring hereby the possession of all that they had

Such another flaughter was committed upon the Danes in England; but it was re- 50 uenged by their Countrimen, with greater cruelties than ouer they had practifed before. That the Seythians, which escaped this bloudie feast, made any stirre in Media, I doe not find; neither doe I read that either in reuenge hercof, or vpon other pretence, the Medes were troubled by inualion from Septhia in time following.

This is the more strange, for that the Armie returning home out of Media was verie ftrong, and encountred with opposition (as Herodolus reports it) no leffe then it had found abroad. Wherefore it may be, that the device of Cyanares to free his Countrie, tooke good effect, with leffe bloud-fied than bath beene supposed. For if hee surprised all the chiefe of them, it was no hard matter to make a good compolition. Manie of them doubtleffe, in eight and twentie yeares, had so well setled themselues, that they were desirous of rest, and might be permitted, without anie danger, to remaine in the Countrie; manie (of whom I shall speake anon) having done what they could in the businesse, for which they came forth, were willing to returne home, with what they had gotten; fuch as were not pleafed with either of these two courses, might goe joyne with the Cimmerians in Lycia, or seeke their fortunes in other provinces, among their owne Companions. Whereas all the Families of the North are faid to have beene with Nabuchadnezzar, it may be understood, that a great part of the Seythians, vpon hope of gaine, or defire to keepe what they had alreadie gained, were content to become subject vnto Nabulasar: mens loue of their wealth being most effectuall, in taming the more virquiet loue of inordinate libertie. This is certaine, that Nabuchadnezzar, as euer after, fo in his first beginning 10:25.9. of warre, did beate the Egyptians, who in ages foregoing, had beene accustomed, to deale with the Babylonians after another fallion: and this new successe of that 20 King may be imputed, in regard of humane meanes, to fuch addition as this of new

Of the Scythian Armie returning out of Media, diverse Authours report a Storie, which confirmes mee in the opinion, that this Companie went forth to assist their kindred and friends, in acquiring a new scate, and establishing their plantation. For these had left their wives behinde them; a good argument to prove that they meant to come againe. The Scythian women, to comfort themselues in their husbands absence, became bed-fellowes to their slaues. These got a lustie brood of youths, that were loath to be troubled with Fathers in Law, and therefore prepa. red to fight with them at their returne. If they were only the children of flaues,

20 which compounded an Armie (as Herodotus would have it, who tels vs, that the Scythians were wont to pull out all their Bond-mens eies) it must needs be that they were verie Boyes, or else that the Women did verie little while continue chalt. Wherefore I rather beleeue the tale as it is told by the Ruffes themselues, who agreeing in the rest with the consent of Histories, make that report of their Anceftors returning homewards, which I will fet downe, as I find it, in M1. Doctor Fletcher his exact discourse of the Russe Common-wealth. They understood by the way that Russemmon, their Cholopey, or Bond-flanes whom they left at home, had in their absence possessed their 49.4. Townes, Lands, Houses, Wines, and all. At which newes being somewhat amazed, and yet disdayning the Villanie of their servants, they made the more speed home: and so, not fare AO from Nouograd, met them in warlike manner marching against them. Whereupon adulting what was best to bee done, they agreed all to set upon them with no other shew of weapon but with their hor fe-whips (which as their manner is every manrideth with all) to put them in remembrance of their feruile condition, thereby to terrifie them, and abate their courage. And so marching on, and lashing all together with their whips in ther hands, they gaue the onset. Which seemed so terrible in the eares of their Villaines, and stroke such a sense into them of the smart of the whip, which they had felt before, that they fled all together like Sheepe before the Driners. In memorie of this victorie, the Novogradians ever fince have flamped their Coine (which they call a Dingoe Nouogrodskoy, currant through all Russia herth the figure of a Horseman Baking a whip a lost in his hand. It may seeme, that all the 50 women of that Countrie, haue fared the worse euer since, in regard of this vniuerfall fault: for fuch a Pudkey or whip, as terrified those slaues, curiously wrought by her felfe, is the first present that the Mosconian Wife, even in time of wooing, sends to him that shalbe her husband, in token of subjection; being well assured, to seele it often on her own loines. But this was a Document vnto the Seythians, or rather find not that they did. Thus much I thought good to fet downe of the Soythian expedition; not only because it is the most memorable act performed abroad by that Nation, famous in Histories, and terrible to manie Countries; but for that it appeares to have beene a great cause, of the Egyptians prevailing hitherto in Syrin, and about Indan, which 10 continues yet a while the centre of our discourse.

Of Princes lining in diverfe Countries, in thefe ages.

· Auing thus farre digreffed from the maters of Iuda, to avoide all further occasion of doing the like, I wil here inserte a note of such Kings and men of marke, as were betweene the death of Manaffes, and the ruine of Ierusalem. Of the Agyptians, Babylonians, Wesles, and Lydians, I have spoken as much, as I thought needfull. In Rome, Tul-

Lus Hostilius held the Kingdome, vntill the one and and twentieth yeare of Iofius; at 20 which time Ancus Martius fucceeding Raigned Foure and twentie yeares. After him L. Tarquinius Priscus, a new-come stranger, but verierich, preuailed so far by his graciousnesse among the people, that he got the Kingdome to himselfe, disapointing the fonnes of Anew, ouer whom he was Tutor. He beganne in the fourth yeare of Zedekia, and Raigned eight and thirtie yeares. In this time it was, namely in the second yeare of the thirtieth Olympiad, that the Lacedamonians, bethinking them how to bee auenged of the Arcadians, who gaue succour to the Messenians against them in the former warre, entred the Territorie, tooke the Citie of Phigalia or Phialia, from whence their Garrisons were soone after beaten out. Cypfelus expelling the race of the Bacide made himfelfe Lord of Corinth about these times, and gouerned it in peace thirtie yeares; leaving for successour his sonne Periander, one of the feuen Sages, but a cruell Tyrant: who among other vile acts, flew his owne wife, and afterwards, as in her honour, stripped all the Corinthian women starke naked, burning their apparrell, as an acceptable offering to her Ghost. Hereby we may perceine that the wisedome of the Greekes, was not excellent in those dayes; when such a one as this could bee admired as excelling all the Coun-

In these times also were Zaleucus, and Draco, famous Lawgiuers, the one among the Locrians in Italie, the other in the Citic of Atkens. The Lawes of Draco were fo rigorous, that he was faid to have written them with bloud: for hee rewarded eue- 40 rie small offence with death. Wherefore his constitutions were soone abrogated, and power given to Solon, by the Athenians, to make new in their stead. But the Lawes of Zaleucus were verie milde. He forbad anie Gentlewoman to walke abread with more than one Bond-woman attending on her, valeffe it were when shee was drunke; or to goe forth of the Towne by night, vnleffe it were to some sweet-hearts bed; or to dresse herselse vp in immodest brauerie, vnlesse it were to inueigle a louer. By which pleasant Ordinances, he effected his desire : for none would seeme, in breaking the Statutes, to be in fuch case as challenged the dispensation. It is noted in this man as a fingular example of justice, that when his owne sonne had committed adulterit, and was therefore to loofe both his eyes, he did not cause him 50 to be pardoned, but gaue one eye of his owne to faue the yong man ( who alfo loft one) from vtter blindnesse.

I shall not henceforth need, so farre to wander, as hitherto I often have done, in pursuing of actions collaterall to the Historie, for inserting them in their order of time. The Chaldeans will soone fall under the Persians; the Persians, ere long, encounter with the Greekes, the Greekes, with the Romans, the Romans, with manie Nations. Concerning all these, as they shall successively present themselves, in their flourishing Estates it will be enough to recapitulate the most memorable accidents, that befell them in their Minoritie. But in the long space of more than thirteene hundred yeares, which passed betweene the calling of Abraham, and the destruction on of Ierusalem, we finde little matter, wherein the Historie of Israel, had anie dealing with otheir Nations, than the verie nearest borderers. Yet reade we of manie Kingdomes, that in these manie ages, were crected, and throwne downe; as like-10 wife, manie memorable acts were performed in Greece and elfewhere, though not following one another at anic neare distance; all which must have beene quite omitted, or else reserved vnto a veric vnseasonable rehearfall, had they not beene difposed in this method, whereof he that will not allow the conveniencie, may pardon the necessitie.

The oppression of Indea, and destruction of Ierusalem by the Chaldeans.

OW to returne to the Iemish Storie, from whence wee have so farre digrefied. In the third yeare of Ichoiakim, Nebuchodonofor the fecond, his Father yet liuing, entred Indea with a great Armie, who befeiging and forcing terufalem, made teboialim his Vassall in despight of Acco, that had established him King, and tooke with him for pledges

Deniel, being as yet achilde, with Ananias, Misael, and Azertas. Also he tooke a part of the Church treasures; but staicd not to search them throughly; for Necho 30 hasted to the succour of Ichoiakim, hoping to finde Nabuchodone for in Indea: wherein this great Babylonian had no disposition to hazard himselfe and his Armic, it being a Countrie of an euill affection towards him, as also farre off from any succour or sure place of retrait. If he had, as may be supposed, anie great strength of Seythian horsemen in his Armie; it was the more wifely done of him, to fall backe, out of that rough mourtainous, and ouer-hot Countrie, into places that were more euen and temperate. But belides all these reasons, the death of his father, happening at the fame time, gaue him iuft occasion to returne home; and take possession of his owner Kingdome, before he proceeded further in the second care, of adding more vnto it. This he did at reasonable good leisure : for the Egyptian was not readie to sollow him so farre and to bid him battaile, vntill the new yeare came in; which was the fourth of Ichorakim, the first of Nabuchodonofor, and the last of Neco. In this yeare the Babylonian lying vpon the Banke of Euphrates (his owne Territorie bounding it on the North-fide) attended the arrivall of Necho. There, after a resolued contention for victorie, Necho was flaine, and his Armie remayning forced to faue it felfe, which full ill it did, by a violent retrait. This victoric Nabuchodone for so well purfued, as he recoucred all Syria, and what focuer the Agyptians held out of their proper Territorie towards the North. The Agyptians being in this conflict beaten, and altogether for the present discouraged, Jehosakim held himselfe quiet, as being friend in heart vnto the Egyptian, yet having made his peace with the Chaldean the yeare 50 before; who contented with fuch profit as hee could then readily make, had forborne to laie anie Tribute vpon Iuda. But this coole referuednesse of Iehoiakim, was, on both fides, taken in ill part. The Agyptian King Pfammis, who fucceeded vnto Necho, beganne to thinke vpon restoring Iehoabaz, taken Prisoner by his Father, and fetting him vp, as a Domestical Enemic, against his yngratefull brother.

Against all such accidents, the Ind.can had prepared the vsuall remedic, practifed by his fore-fathers: for he had made his owne fonne techona King with him long before, in the second yeare of his owne Raigne, when the Boy was but Eight yeares olde. As for this rumour of Ichoahaz his returne; the Prophet Ieremie fortold, that it should proue idle, saying : he shall not returne thither, but hee shall die in the place whi-10.22.11.25 12 ther they have leddim captine, and flash see this Land no more. The Agyptians indeed, having spent all their Mercinarie forces, and received that heavie blow at Carehemile, had not remayning such proportion of sharpe steele, as of faire gold, which without other helpe, is of little effect. The valour of Neco was not in Pfanmis. Apries who Raigned after Pfammis, did once aduenture to thew his face in Syris; but to after a bigge looke, he was glad to retire, without aduenturing the hazard of a battaile. Wherefore this decaying Nation fought only with braue words, telling fuch friuolous tales, as men, that meane to doe nothing, vse, of their glorious acts forepaffed, against Iosias and Ichoshaz. In this case it was case for Ichosakim to gue them fatisfaction, by letting them understand, the sinceritie of his affection towardes them; which appeared in time following. But Nabuchodono for went to worke more roundly. He fent a peremptorie message to lehoiakim, willing him not to stand upon any nice points, but acknowledge himfelfea Subject, and pay him Tribute: adding hereunto fuch fearefull threats, as made the poore Indian lay afide all thought of Joseph. Anti, lib. Pharaob, and yeeld to doe, as the more mightic would have him. So he continued 20 in the obedience of Nabuchodonofor three yeares. At this time Ieremie the Prophet cried out against the Ienes, putting them in mind that he had now three and twen-tie yeares exhorted them to repentance, but because they had stopt their eares aagaine into their owne fields and Cities. The first imprisonment of the Prophet Ieremie seemes to have beene in the fourth yeare of this Jehoiakim, at which time Baruch the Scribe wrote all his Prophecies out of his mouth, whom hee sent to reade them vnto the people, and afterward to the Princes, who offered them to the King:

but fearing the Kings furie they had first set seremie at libertic, and aduised him and gainst him, and the rest of the Prophets, hee now pronounced their captiuitie at hand, and that they should endure the yoke of bondage full seuentic yeares. The fame calamitic hee threatned to all the neighbouring Nations, to the Agyptians, Moabites, Ammonites, Idum.eans, and the rest; foretelling that they should all drinke out of the Babylonian Pitcher, the wine of His furie, whom they had for faken, and after the feuentic yeares expired, that the Babylonians themselves should taste of the fame cup, and be veterly subuerted by the Medes, & the Ind.cans, permitted to return 20

Baruch to hide themselues. Iehoiakim after he heard a part of it and perceived the ill newes therein delivered, made no more adoc but did cut the Booke in peices and cast it into the fire. All which Ieremie caused to be new written, with this addition; that the dead bodie of Ieboiskim, should be cast out, exposed in the day to the heat, and in the night to the 100 frost, and that there should bee none of his seede to sit on the Throne of David.

Time thus running on, while Ichoiakim refted fecure of all danger, as Tributarie to the Babylonian, yet well thought of by the Agyptian; the mightie Citie of Tyre opposed it selfe against the Chaldean forces; and vpon just considence of her owne Arength, despised all preparation that could be made against her. Now for asmuch as the terme of feuentie yeares, was prescribed vnto the desolation, as well of Tyre, as of Ierusalem, and other Townes and Countries; it is apparent, that they which referre the expugnation of this Citie vnto the nineteenth yeare of Nabuchosenofor, have fure authoritie for their warrant. Whereupon likewife it followes of necessitie, that the siege thereof beganne in the seuenth of his Raigne; as having 50

Here I will take leaue to intrude a briefe note, concerning the feuerall beginnings that are reckoned of this great Prince his Rule, whereupon hath rifen much disputation. The third yeare of Iehoiakim, was the last of Nabulassar, who being delinered from other cares, tooke notice of fuch as had revolted from him vnto Pharao Neco, and feat this Noble Prince, his fonne, with an Armie into Syria, to reclaime them. In this expedition was Daniel carried away, who therefore makes Daniel Carried away. mention of the same yeare. The yeare next following, being the fourth of Ichoia- letem. 25.1 tim, was the first of Nebuchadnezzar; which Ieremie affirmeth in expresse wordes; and from this we reckon all his time and actions that follow. In his three and twentieth yeare he conquered £expt; and then beganne to Raigne as a great Monarch. finding none that durst offend him. The second from this yeare it was, wherein he faw that vision, of the Image confishing of fundrie Mettals; which did prefigurate the fuccession of great Kingdomes, that should rule the Earth, before the comming of Christ. I will not stand to dispute about this, which is the best conclusion that I find, of long disputations : but returne vato the siege of Tyre, which beganne in the feuenth of his Raigne. The Citie of Tyre coursed all the ground of an Island, that was divided from the maine by a deep & broad channel of the Sea. The Chaldrans had no Fleet, and were no Sea-men; the Tyrians, in multitude of goodly Ships, and skill to vie them, excelled all other Nations; and euerie Winde, from one part or other, brought needfull provisions into the Citie. Wherefore neither force, nor famine could greatly hurt the place; whereof neuertheleffe the judgements of God (denounced against it by Eliva-20 E(ay, Ieremie, Ezechiel,) had threatned the destruction; and the obstinate resolution Icon. of Nabuchodono for, had fully determined to performe it. This high-minded King, Extended impatient of reliffance, vndertooke a vaft piece of worke; euen to fill vp the Sea. that parted the Island from the Continent. The Citic of olde Tyrus, that flood oppolite to the new, you the firme Land, and the mountaine of Libania neare adjoyning that was loaden with Cedars, and aboundance of other trees, might furnish him with materials. Thirteene yeares were spent, in this laborious, and almost hopeleffe businesse. Which needeth not seeme strange: for Alexander working upon that foundation which was remayning of Nabuchodonofors Peere; and being withall affifted by a ftrong Fleet, was yet feuen months ere hee could 20 make way into the Citie. Wherefore, if the raging of the Sea was able to carrie away that wherewith Alexander laboured to couer a shelue; with much more violence could it ouerturne, and as it were confume, the worke of Nabuchodonofor. who laid his foundations in the bottome of the deepe; striuing as it were, to fill the emptic bellie of this Cormorant; whereas the Macedonian, did only Rop the throat of it. Euerie manknowes, God could have furthered the accomplishment of his owne threats, against this place (though it had not pleased him to vie, either miracle, or fuch of his more immediate weapons, as are Farth-quakes, and the like) by making at least the Seas calme, and adding the fauourable concurrence of all second helpes. But so it pleaseth him oftentimes, in chastising the pride of man, to any vie the hand of mangeuen the hand of man striuing, as may seeme, against all refistance of nature and fortune. So in this excessive labour of the Chaldaans Euerie head was made bald, and euerie shoulder was made bare. Yet Nabuchodonosor would not Excl. 19. gine ouer till he was mafter of the Towne.

When he was entred upon this desperate service; whether it were so, that some losses received, some mutinie in his Armie, or (which is most likely; and so Iosephis reports it) some glorious rumours of the Egyptians, gaue courage to his cuill willers, Iehoiakim renounced his Subjection, and beganne to hope for the contrarie of that which quickly fell out. For Nabuchodonofor gane him no leifure to doe much hurt but with part of his Armie marched directly into Indea; where the amazed 50 King made so little resistance (the Egyptians having left him, as it were in a dreame) that he entred Ierusalem, and laied hands on Iehoiakim: whom hee first bound and determined to fend to Babylon, but changing counfell, he caused him to bee slaine in the place, and gaue him the Sepulchre of an Asse, to be deuoured by beasts and ranenous birds, according to the former Prophecies: leaving in his place, Iehoiskim or

Iechonias his sonne; whom after three moneths and tenne dayes Nabuchodonofor removed and fent Prisoner to Babylon , with Ezekiel, Mardocheus , and Infedech, the high Priest. The mother of Iechonia, together with his scruants, Ennuches, and all the ablest men, and best Artificers of the Land, were also then carried away Captines. This Iechonias, following the counfell of Ieremie the Prophet, made no refiftance, but submitted himselfe to the Kings will; wherein hee both pleased God, and did that which was best for himselfe; though at the present it might seemeotherwife, to fuch as confidered the cuill that befell him, rather then the greater euill that he thereby avoided. This onely particular act of his is recorded; which was good. But it feemes that he was partaker, at least, of his Fathers faults, if not an in- 10 Higator: which was the cause, that his submitting himselse to Gods pleasure did not preserve his Estate: for so we reade in generall wordes, that he did cuill in the light of the Lord, according to all that his Father had done. In his flead Nabuchodonofor eltablished Atahaniahis Vnclein the Kingdome of Inda, and called him Zedechias, which is as much to fay, as the Instice of God. For like as Nece, King of Fgypt, had formerly displaced lehoshaz, after his Father losias was flaine, and set vp lehoiakim the forme of another Mother: fo Nabuchodonofor flew Ichoiakim who depended on the Exprians, and carrying his sonne Iechonias Prisoner to Babel, gaue the Kingdome to this Zedechias, that was whole Brother to that Icheahaz, whom Neco tooke with him into Agypt. From Zedechias hee required an oath for his faithfull obe- 20 dien ce, which Zedechias gave him, and called the lining God to witnesse in the same, that he would remaine affured to the Kings of Chaldea.

In the first yeare of Zedechias, Ieremie saw and expounded the Vision of the ripe and rotten Grapes' the one fignifying those Indeans that were carried away captine, the other those that staird, and were destroicd.

In the fourth of Zedechias, Jeremie wrote in a Booke all the cuill that should fall wpon Babylon, which Book or scrole he gaue to Sheraia, when he went with the King Zedechras to Babylon, to visite Nabuchodonosor; willing him first to reade it to the Captiue Iewes, and then to bind it to a stone, and cast it into Euphrates, pronouncing these words. Thus shall Babel be drowned, and shall not rife from the enill that I will bring upon 20 her. This journie of Zedechias to Babel is probably thought to have beene in way of visitation, carrying some presents. But I further thinke, that hee had some suite there to make, which his Lordly Master refused to grant, and sent him away discontented. For at his returne all the bordering Princes sent Messengers to him, inciting him (as it feemes) to those viquiet courses, from which Ieremie dehorted both him and them. The Prophet, by Gods appointment, made bonds and yokes; one of which he were about his owne necke, others hee fent vnto the fine Kings of Edom, Most, Ammon, Tyre, and Zidon, by those Messengers which came to visite Zedechias: making them know, that if they and the Kings of Iuda abode in the obedience of Babylon, they fhould then possessed enion their owne Countries; if not, they 40 should affuredly perish by the sword, by fire, and by pestilence.

Hee also foretolde them, that those Vessels which as yet remained in Ierusa. lem, should also trauaile after the rest, and at length they should bee restored againe.

The same yeare Ananias, the false Prophet, tooke off the wooden Chaine which Ieremie ware, in figne of the Captiuitie of the Ierres, and brake it: Vaunting, that in like manner, after two yeares, God would breake the strength of Babel, and the yoke which he layed on all Nations; reftore Iechonias, and all the Iewes, with the Veffels and riches of the Temple, and give an end to all these troubles. But Ieremie in stead of his wooden Yoke ware a Coller of yron : and in signe that Ananias had 50 giuen a deceitfull and false hope to the people, hee foretold the death of this cold Prophet, which seized vpon him in the second moneth. After this, when Zedechias had watered long enough betweene faith and paffion, in the eight yeare of his Raigne he practifed more feriously against Nabuchodonofor, with his Neighbours the Edomites, Anmonites, Mabites, Tyrians, and others that were promifed great aides of the Azyptians: in confidence of whose resistance, he determined to shake off the Babylonian Yoake. Hereof when Nabuchodonofor had knowledge, hee marched with his Armie in the dead of Winter, toward Ierusalem, and belieged it. Ieremie perswaded Zedechias to render the Citic and himselfe; but being confident of the helpe from Agypt and being perswaded by his Counsellors, and false Prophets, that it was vnpoilible that the Kingdome of Inda should bee extirpate, vntill the comming of Silo (according to the Prophecie of Iceob) hee despifed the wordes of Gen.49.10. Jeremie and imprisoned him. For Jeremie had told the King, that the Citie should be but being carried to Babel, die his naturall death.

Icrusalem being, the following yeare, surrounded by Nabnehodonosors Armies the King of Agypt, Phaze Hophra according to Ieromic (Hordesta callerh him Apries) Jacques entred the border of Iuda, with his Armie, to fuccour Zedechias, of whofe repolt he had beene the principall Author. But Ieremie gaue the Ienes faithfull counfell, willing them not to have anie trust in the succours of Egypt : for hee assured them, that they should return again, and in no fort relieue them. And it fell out accordingly. For when the Chaldaans removed from Jerusalem to encounter the Agyp-20 tians, these vaunting Patrons abandoned their enterprise, and taking Gaza in their way homeward returned into Egypt, as if they had alreadie done enough; leaving the poore people of Ierufalem to their destined miseries.

In the meane while the Ierres, who, in their first extremitie, had manumised their Hebrew Bondmen (as Gods Law required at the yeare of Inbile) and made them free, Leuit as 39. thereby the better to encourage them to fight; did now vpon the breaking vp of the Chaldean Armic, repent them of their Charitie: and thinking all had beene at an end, held them perforce to their former flauerie. But the Chaldees being retur- 101.34. ned to the siege, the Prophet Ieremie, when the State of Ierusalem beganne now to grow to extremitic, counfelled Zedechias to render himselfe vnto them; affuring to see

o him of his owne life, and the fafetic of the Citie, if he would so doe. But his obstinate heart conducted him to that wretched end, which his neglect of God, and his infidelitie and perjurie, bad prouided for him.

Three and twentie Moneths (as some doe reckonit) or according to losephus ico. 19. cighteene; the Bibylonian Armie lay before Ierufalem, and held it exceeding fireightly belieged. For they built Forts against it round about, or (as P. Caloriyr bath it) ex- 1.56-2.54. trunerunt contra cam turrem ligneam per circuitum, they surrounded the Citie with wooden Towers, so as the belieged could neither fally out, nor receive into the Citie any supply of men or victuals. Iofephus reports, that they ouer-topped the Wals, 106ph, 300, 320. with high Towers raifed vpon mounts; from which they did so beat vpon the lb.10,cep.11.

40 Wall with their Engines, that the defendants were compelled to for fake their flations. Now although it were so that the besieged also raised Counterbuildings, like vnto these, Yet the great King of Babel, who commanded all the Regions thereabouts, and had the Woods and Rivers to obey him, found meanes to overthrow all the Citizens endenours, and to beat downe as fast from without, as they raised from within, the bodie and foundation of his owne workes being guarded, by the Wals of Ierusalem interposed; and theirs within, laied open to their enemics disturbance. Belides, both famine and peltilence (which commonly accompanie men fireightly belieged) grew on fast vpon them, whereby, when the number, strength, and courage of the Iewes failed, the Chaldeans made a breach, and forcing an entric, to their Princes did feat themselies, as Lords of the Towne, in the middle gate. Zede-

chias beholding this vncomfortable fight, and finding no remedie of the danger present, lost both his courage and his hope at once; and shifted himselfe together with his Wines, Children, Princes, and principall fernants, out of the Citic, by a way under ground; leaning his amazed and guidleffe people, to the merciles fwords of their enemies. Thus he, who, when Ieremie the Prophet perswaded him to ren der himfelfe, despised both the Counsell of God and the force of Nabuchodonolor: wied now that remedie, which Wolphius truly termeth : triste, turpe, of infelix, profull, Ihamefull, and unfortunate,

By this fecret fubterrane vault, Zedechias making his flealth, recoursed (by the helpe of the darke night) the plaines or deferts of Iericho: but by reason of the traine, that followed him and his, (querie one leading with him those whom they held most deare vnto them) hee was casily traced and pursued. How great socuer Wifeb. dmin, lib. the companie was that attended on him, yet, as Iofephus reports it, they on whose fidelitic he most reposed himselfe, no sooner beheld the Chaldeans approach, but they all abandoned his defence, and shifted themselves into the Delarts as they to could. For whom God had for laken, no man followed, but the Ministers of his vengeance; by whom Zedechias being made Prifoner, with his Children, and Princes, he was conneighed to Rebla or Reblath a Citie (as some thinke) of 2 ephtalim, where Nabuchodonofor then laie, as a place indifferent betweene Ierufalem and Tyre, with both which at once he had to doe.

Now after Nabuehodonofor had laied before Zedekias the manie graces and benefits conferred ypon him, together with the notable falseshood and perjurie wherewith he had requited them; he commaunded his Children, Princes, and Friends to be flaine before his face. This being done, to the end that so lamentable a spectacle should be the last, that ever hee should behold in the World, hee caused his eyes to 20 be torne out of his head, and so carried him in a flauish manner to Babel, where hee confumed the rest of his wretched life in perpetuall imprisonment. Herein this most maruellous Prophecie of Ezechiel was performed; Adducam eum in Babylonom & ipfam non videbit. I will bring him into Babylon and he shall not fee it.

Thus in the Eleventh and last yeare of Zedekias which was the eighteenth of Nabuchodonofor, the Chaldeans entred the Citie by force, where sparing no sex nor age, they committed all to the fword that they therein found.

In the yeare next following, Nabuzaradan, General of the Armie, burnt the Kings Palace, and the rest of terusalem: and after this fire had lasted from the secuenth to the tenth day, he also burnt the Temple of God to the ground, when it had stood 30 foure hundred thirtie and one yeares.

After this upon a fecond fearch, Nabuzaradan (not yet fatiated with bloud) commanded feauentie and two others to bee flaughtered, which had hidden themfelues from the first furie, to wit, the chiefe and the second Priest, two Commanders of Zedechias his men of Warre, fine of his House-should-servants, and others to that number; carrying away to Babylon the ableit of the people throughout all Indag, and leaving the poorest labouring soules, with some that followed the partie of Nabuchedone for, to till the ground : ouer whom he left Governour, Godelia the Nephew of that Saphan, whom Iolias had formerly employed in the reformation of Religion, who is, for his juffice and equitie, by tofephus highly commended. This 20 man, a lew by Nation, left Zedechias, as it feemeth, in the beginning of the warre : and by Ieremies defire to line with him, it appeareth that he had embraced the fame aduice, which the Prophet gaue vnto Zedechias, which was, to submit himselfe altogether to the Babylonian, who being ordained by God to exercise his justice, was therefore reliftlesse. The Prophet Jeremie being left to his owne choice, either to liue in Chaldea, or elsewhere, he made election of Godoliah, to whom he was recommended; who not only embraced Ieremie, but gaue comfort to all the other Jewes that were left under his charge, promifing them fauour and libertie, fo long as they remained obedient Subjects to Nabuchodonofor, by whom hee was established 50 Prouinciall Gouernour of his owne Nation.

But ere that yeare was expired, a Prince of the late Kings house (who during the fiege of Ierufalem, had kept himselfe out of the storme, with Baalis King of the Ammonites) being followed by tenne other chosen men, while Godo ich feathed them in Malpha or Mitipa, the Citie of his relidence, traiteroully flew him, together with diners Chaldeans and Iewes that accompanied him. This done, hee made an escape, and in his way encountring with eightic perfons, repairing towards Gadaliah wirb prefents, he flew the most of them, and spared the rest, because they promised to discouer vnto him some Treasures, hidden in the fieldes during the warre. He also tooke with him a Daughter of Zedechias, committed to the care of Godoliah by Nabuchodonofor. This practife and intent of Ismael had beene formerly discourred vnto Godolia by Johanan, one of the Leaders of the few remaining Jewes: but Godoliah was incredulous.

Iudaa being now left without a Gouernour (for Ismael durst not take it upon himbut retired himselfe, or rather fled as fast as he could to the Ammonites) the residue of the Jewes, fearing the reuenge of the Chaldeans, resolved to flie away into Agrat. and befought Ieremie to aske counfell of God for them; who readily made them answere, that if they remained in Indea, God would provide for them and shew them mercie, but if they fought to faue themselues in Egypt, that they should then undoubtedly perish. Notwithstanding this aduice, the Iewes held their determination; and despising the Oracle of God, and constraining teremie and Baruch to accompanie them, they travailed into Egypt, and inhabited by the permiffion of Pharao, neere vnto Taphnes: where, when Ieremie often reprehended them for their Idolatrie, foretelling both the destruction of themfelues, and the Egyptians also, he was by these his own hardharted and vngratefull Countrimen, floned to death: and by the Egyptians, who greatly reuerenced him , buried neare the Sepulchre of their own

CHAP. I.

Of the time passing betweene the destruction of Jerusalem, and the fall of the Association of rian Empire.

ģ. I.

Of the connexion of Sacred and prophane Historie.

HE course of Time; which in prophane Histories might rather bee discerned through the greatest part of his way, hitherto passed in course worse foot-steps, than in any beaten path, having once in Greece by the Olympiads, and in the Easterne Countries by the accompt from Zabonsifer, left furer marks, and more appliable to actions concurrent, than were the warre of Troy, or any other token of former date; beginsat length in the ruine of stierufalem to discourse the connexion of antiquitie fore-spent, with the Royie of succeeding asset, Manistel it is.

ginsat length in the ruine of Henryldem to disconer the connexino of antiquitie fore figent, with that the originalland progresse of the florie of succeeding ages. Manisch it is, that the originalland progresse of thinges could ill bee sought in those that were ignorant of the first creation: as likewise that the affaires of Kingdomes and Empire afterwards growne vp are not to be sound among those, that have now no state nor policie remaining of their owne. Hauing therefore purfued the storic of the world vnto that age, from whence the memorie of fucceeding accidents is with little interruption or fabulous discourse deriued vnto vs , I hold it now conuenient briefly to shew, by what meanes and circumstances the historic of the Hebrewes. which of all other is the most ancient, may bee conjoyned with the following times, wherein that Image of fundrie mettalls, discoursed by God vnto 2Vabnchadnezzar, did raigne ouer the earth, when Ifrael was either none, or an vnregar-

Herein I doe not hold it needfull, to infift upon those authorities, which giue, as it were by heare-fay, a certaine yeare of some old Asyrian King vnto some action or event, whereof the time is found expressed in Scripture : for together with the end of Ninus his line in Sardanapalus, if not before, all fuch computations were blotted out; the succession of Belochus and his issue that occupied that Kingdome afterwards, depending upon the vicertaine relations of fuch, as were neither conflant in affigning the yeares of his beginning, nor of credit enough for others to relie vppon. Let it therefore suffice, that the consent and harmonic, which some haue found in the yeares of those ouer-worne Monarchs, doth preserve their names, which otherwise might have beene forgotten. Now concerning the later Kings of that Nation, how socier it be true that we finde the names of all or most of them in Scriptures, which are recorded by prophane Historians, yet hereby could wee only 20 learne in what agreach of them lived, but not in what yeare his raigne beganne or ended, were it not that the raigne of Nabuchadnezzar is more precifely applied to the times of Iehojakim and Zedekia. Hence have we the first light whereby to discouer the meanes of connecting the facred and prophane histories. For vnder Nabuchadnezzar was the beginning of the captinitie of Inda, which ended when 70. yeares were expired; and these 70. yeares tooke end at the first of cyrus, whose time being well knowne affords vs meanes of looking back into the ages past, and forwards into the race of men succeeding. The first yeare of Cyrus his raigne in Persia, by generall consent, is is owned with the first yeare of the 55.0 (ympiad, where, that he raigned three and twentie yeares before his Monarchie, and seuen yeares afterwards, it is apparent, and almost out of controuersie. Giving therefore source hundred and eight yeares unto the distance betweene the fall of Troy, and the instauration of the Olympiads by Iphitus; wee may easily arrive vnto those antiquities of Greece, which were not meerly fabulous. As for Princes ruling the whilest in fundrie parts of the world, S. Augustine and others may be trusted in setting downe their times, which they had by Tradition from Authors of well-approued faith and in-

From Cyrus forwards, how the times are reckoned vnto Alexander, and from him to the battaile of Actium, it were (peraduenture) in this place impertinent to fet downe. But seeing that the beginning and end of the Babylonian captiuitie are the 40 markes whereby wee are chiefly directed, in paffing from the first vnto the latest yeares of the world, through any storie, with least interruption, it is very expedient that we take some paines to informe our selues truly of the 70. yeares, during which it continued, euen from Nabuchadnezzar vnto Cyrus.

ð. I I. 50

A briefe rehearfall of two opinions, touching the beginning of the captivitie: with an answere to the cauills of PORPHYRIE, mucighing against S.MATTHEW. and DANIEL, upon whom the later of these opinions is founded.

Any Commentators, and other Historians, and Chronologers finde. that the captivitie then beganne when Jechonius was carried prisoner into Babylon, cleuen yeare before the finall destruction of terusalem vnder Zedekias. This they proue out of divers places in Exekiel, espe- szechet, was cially out of the fourteenth chapter, where he makes a plaine diffin- 6.3.2.11.6.15.

ction betweene the beginning of the captinitie, and vtter destruction of Jerusalem by Nabuzaradan, in these wordes. In the fine and twentieth yeare of our being in captinitie in the beginning of the yeare, in the tenth day of the moneth, in the fourteenth yeare after that the Citie was smitten. In which wordes hee beginneth the captinitie in plaine termes, cleuen yeares before the Citie was destroied. Beroaldus is of opinion that it beganne in the first of Nabuchodonofor, and the fourth of Ioakim, which hee ende-20 Hours to proue out of the second of Chronicles, but more especially out of S. Matthew. and Daniel, whose wordes afford matter of long disputation, but serve not to make good fo much as Beroaldus would enforce. That place of S. Matthew, and the whole booke of Daniel, have ministred occasion of scoffing and railing at the Chriftian religion to that wretched man Porphyrie, who, not understanding how the fonnes of King Iosias were called by divers names, as Epiphanius hath shewed at large, thought that the Apostle had spoken he knew not what in reckoning the fonnes. or, according to fome translations, the Sonne and Nephewes of that good King, begotten about the time of the captiuitie. Vpon Daniel also the same Porphyrie doth fpend the twelfth of his malitious bookes written against the Christians,

30 affirming that these prophecies and visions remembred by Daniel, were written long after his death, and at, or neare the time of Antiochus Epiphanes. This fond sup-position of his, Eusebius, Apollonius, and others, haue sufficiently answered. For the seuentie Interpreters who converted the old Testament about an hundred yeare before Epiphanes, did also turne this booke of Daniel out of Hebrew into Greeke, as a part of Scripture received. And were there no other argument to confound Parphyrie, than that of Alexander Macedon, it were sufficient, who lived divers yeares Mac. T. I. before Intiochus Epiphanes. For Iaddus the high Priest shewed that great Conquerour, when he came towards Ierusalem to have destroied it, this booke of Da- Toste ant. 40 ded vnto him, which not only staied his hand from the harme of that Citie and people, but his affurance and refolution was so confirmed and strengthned thereby, as despiling all future perill and relistance, he conquered Darius, and the Easterne Empire in a shorter time than Nabuchodono for had done one Citie, to wit, Tree in

It is true indeede that the lewes themselves give lesse authoritie to Daniel, than to Moles, and the Prophets, accompting his booke among those which they call Cetaphim, or Hagiographa, or holy Writings, which they fav Eldras and the Seniors of the Synagogue compiled after their returne from Babylon. But first, that the booke of Daniel (I meane so much as is found in the Hebrew) is Canonicall: secondly, that it so was written by Daniel himselfe, and not by Efdras and the Seniors; we may affure our selues by testimonie of Councells, and Fathers: For in the Councell of Landican held about the yeare of our Lord 368. after the death of Iouinian the Emperour, and after the Nicene Councell three and fortie yeares, this booke of Daniel was re-Aaa 2

ceiued, verified, and confirmed among the other Canonicall Scriptures, as in the Epitonie of the fame Councellit may be feene, and fo doth Meliton the most ancient Bilhop of Sardis number it, witnesse Eusebins in his Ecclesiasticall historie, the fourth booke, and fine and twentieth chapter, fo doth the fame Author in the Catalogue of Car onicall bookes upon Origen, so doth Hilwins in his Preface upon the Psalmes, and Epiphanius in his booke of Waights and Measures, &c. To these I may adde S. Hierome, Gregorie Nazianzene, and others. For the Hagingraphe bookes or holy Writings the lewes and Rabbines reckon to be these, Daniel, Psalmes, Prouerbs, 10b. Canticles, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclefiastes, Hefter, Efra, Nehemiah, and the Chronicles. And that it was Daniel, and not Eldras, that wrote this booke, Gods commandement vnto him by his Angell, to feale vp the fame to the time appointed, is an vnanswerable testimonie. Yea which exceede thall strength of other proofe, our Sauiour Christ who citeth no Apocriphall Scripture, in Mathew and Marke alleageth Daniel the Prophet, to wit, the last verse of his nineteenth chapter. Further, in the fift of Iohn, Christ distributeth the risen from the dead, as in Daniel the twelfth, verse the second. S. Paul describeth Antichrist out of Daniel, and the Reuelation is wholly an interpretation of Daniels visions.

Mark.13.14. Det.12.

ð. III.

That the 70. yeares of captiuitie are to be numbred from the destruction of Ierusalem; not from the migration of IECHONIA.

Auing thus farre digreffed, in maintaining that authoritie, which must often be cited in the present argument, it is now connenient, that we returne vnto the differences of opinion, concerning the beginning of these 70. yeares. Neither will I stand to trouble my selfe and others with laying open the grounds or weakenesse of that which Eusebius 20 and some few namelesse Authors, have sometimes held in this point, which is lately reniued by Beroaldus; but will forth-with enter into confideration of that opinion, which many both ancient and late Writers have so earnestly maintained, that it wants not much of being common.

Foure Kings of Inda were carried away captines to Babylon: First, Manasses; then Iehoiskim, and with him among others, Daniel the Prophet: thirdly, Iechonias, and with him Ezekiel: lastly, Zedekias, at which time the Citie and Temple were destroied. To the first of these captiuities the beginning of the 70. yeares is referred by none that I have read; to the fecond by few and with weake proofe; to the third by very many and with much confidence. For befides those places of Ezekiel al- 40 readiecited, there is a strong argument gathered out of Ieremie, which may seeme to make the matter plaine. For the Prophet in comforting the people that were carried away with Iechonias, vieth these words. Thus faith the Lord : After 70. yeares be accomplished at Babel, I will visit you, and performe my good promise towards you, and cause you to returne to this place.

But it stands indeede with little reason that we should seeke the interpretation of a prophecie out of circumftances, when the prophecie is fuch as doth sufficiently expound it selfe. Ieremie had alreadie, in the fourth yeare of Iehoiakim, denounced the judgement of God against the Land, for the sinnes and impositioncie of that obstinate people, in these wordes. Behold, I will fend and take to me all the families of 50 the North, faith the Lord, and Nabuchadnezzar, the King of Babel, my feruant, and will bring them against this Land, and against the Inhabitants thereof, and against all these Nations round about, and I will destroy them, and make them an astonishment, and an hising, and a continual defolation. Moreover, I will take from them the voice of mirth, and the voice of gladnesse, the voice of the Bridegroome, and the voice of the Bride, the noise of the mill-flones, and the light of the candle, and this whole Land shall be defolate, and an astonishment, and these Nations is half serue the King of Babel 70. yeares. And when 70. yeares are expreed, I will wisse the King of Babel. Here wee see prescribed vnto the captuitite the terme of 70. yeares, which were to commence, neither when the prophecie was vttered; nor when lehoiskim, who then raigned, was taken by Nebuchadnezzar; nor yet in the time of Iechonia; but with the vtter desolation of the Citie, whereof Ieremie did againe giue notice to those that were alreadie in Babylon, at such time

10 as he sent them the comfort of deliuerance before rehearsed. And so did the people vnderstand this prophecie, in those times when they saw it accomplished, beginning the 70. yeares at the time of the desolation, as manifestly appeares in the end of the Hiltorie of Iuda, where it is faid thus. They burnt the house of God, and lerem. 29. v.16. brake downe the wall of Ierusalem, and burnt all the Palaces thereof with fire, and all the pre- 17.018. tious vessells thereof to destroy all: And they that were left by the sword, carried he away to 2, chron. 6, 19 Babel, and they were feruants to him and to his fonnes, untill the Kingdome of the Persians had rule, to fulfill the word of the Lord by the mouth of IEREMIA, untill the Land had her fill of her Sabbaths: for all the daies that she lay desolate, she kept Sabbath, to fulfill 70. yeares. But in the first yeare of CYRVS King of Persia (when the word of the Lord,

20 (poken by the mouth of IEREMIA, was finished) the Lord stirred up the spirit of CYRYS. Wee seldome find one peece of Scripture so precisely and plainely expounded by another, as in this Prophecie, to have afterwards beene the Subject of altercation. For one can hardly deuise, how either the desolation could have beene expressed more sensibly than it was by the Prophet, or the suent of the prophecie have beene more exactly set downe, than it was in the place now last of all cited. If it bee requisite that we bring more proofe in so euident a case, the ninth chapter of Daniel yeeldstestimonie sufficient, vnto this exposition of Ieremia his prophecie, that Ierusalem was to lie wast 70. yeares. For in the first yeare of Darius the Mede. which was the last of the 70. Daniel obtained of God the deliuerance that had been 30 promised by praier, which he made vpon consideration of the time that was expired : as he telleth vs in these wordes. In the first yeare of his raigne, I DANIEL VI- Dange. derstood by bookes the number of the yeares, whereof the Lord had spoken unto IERE-MIAH the Prophet, that hee would accomplish 70. yeares in the defolation of Ierusalem. So that how focuer the time of Daniel his owne captiuitie bee reckoned from the taking of Iehoiakim, and that the people carried away with Iechonia, did accompt. as well they might, the yeares of their owne captinitie; yet with the generall defolation of the Countrie, wherein were few or none of the Ifraelites left remaining to inhabite, beganne in the nineteenth yeare of Nabuchodonofor the great captimitie, which by Gods appointment continued vnto the end of 70. yeares. This I will not further seeke to proue, by the authoritic of losephus and others affirming the same; for as much as that which alreadie hath beene produced, is enough to fatisfie any man that hath not fully determined to hold the contrarie.

Sundrie opinions of the Kings which raigned in Babylon during the 70. yeares.

Hat Kings raigned in Babylon, during these 70. yeares of the captiuitie, and how long each of them did weare the Diademe, it is a matter of no great importance to know, for as much as neither their acts were notable in the age wherein they lived, nor the length of their raignes, any way helpfull to the concordance of times, fore-going or fuccee- 10

Xenophen. Cyro- ding. The conquests recounted by Xenophon of Syria, Arabia, (or rather some part ofit) Hyrania, Bactria, and perhaps of fome other Countries, may feeme fruits of the victories obtained by Nebuchadnezzar the Great (or by some of his Ancestors) in the former part of his life, before he betooke himselfe to case, and to the sumptuous building of his great Babel, for the house of his Kingdome, and for the honor of his Majeltie, where it may feeme that he and his Heires kept a great state, and did very little. The idle behauiour of the Afgrian Souldiers, in fuch skirmilhes as afterwards they had with the Medes, doth argue no leffe. For whereas vnder Nebu. chadrezzar, they were fo flout and industrious, that (to omit other proofes) they attempted, and finished, that hardie peece of worke, of winning the throng Citic of 20 Tree, by joyning it vnto the continent, filling vp the deepe and broad channell of the Sea, dividing it from the maine with a mole, or peere of earth, and other matter, the reparation whereof, when the Sea had washed it away, was the very greatest of Alexanders works in the times following, they became timorous, that they durft not approch nearer to the enemie than their bowes would carrie, but were readie to turne their backs, as foone as any, though inferiour in numbers, aduenturing within the distance offered to charge them.

xenophone. Cyro. Now as their actions, from the end of Nebuchadnezzars warres, till the ruine of pag,lib.1.6.1.3. their Empire, were not worthie to bee recorded; so was the distinction of their times, and raigne of their feuerall Kings, vnworthie of the great labour that hath 20 in vaine beene taken in that businesse. For when it is granted, that the captiuitie of Inda, ending with that Empire, lasted 70. yeares, we may as reasonably forbeare to fearch into the particular continuance of two or three flouthfull Kings, as wee are contented to be ignorant of the ages of the Patriarchs, and their children, liuing in the Azyptian servitude; resting satisfied in both with the generall assured summe. Yet for as much as many haue trauailed in this businesse, vpon desire (as I take it) to approve the beginning and end of the 70. yeares, not only by the raignes of other Princes, ruling else-where, but by the times of the Asyrians themselues: I will not refuse to take a little paines in collecting their opinions, and shewing what I thinke, may best be held for likely, if the certaine truth cannot be found.

The opinions are many, and greatly repugnant, both in recounting the Kinges themselues, and in setting downe the yeares of their seuerall raignes. The first (as I take it) the furest, is theirs, who meerely follow the authoritie of the Scriptures, without borrowing any helpe from others. These name only three Kinges, Nabuchadnezzar, Euilmerodach, and Balthafar. Neither have they only the filence of Daniel, who names none other to be their warrant, but the prophecie of Ieremie precifely, and in a manner purposely teaching the very same. For God, by the mouth of that Prophet, shewing that he being absolute Lord of all would dispose of all, according to his owne will, and making it knowne that he had some Counfrom 17. 0.7. tries here named, into the handes of the King of Babel, faith thus : And all Nations 50 Shall serve him, and his Sonne, and his Sonnes Sonne, untill the very time of his Land come also; then many Nations and great Kinges shall serve themselves of him. These wordes expressing the continuance of the Chaldean Empire, and number of the Kings, will hard y be qualified with any diffinction. But indeede I finde no other necessitie of qualification to be vied herein than fuch as may grow out of mens defire to reconcile the Scriptures vnto profane authors. And this defire were not vnjust, if the confent of all histories were on the one side and the letter of the holy Text were single on the other fide.

But contrarywise, the Authors which are cited in this case, are so repugnant one to the other, and the proofes of their different reports are fo flender and vnfufficient, that the fuccession of these princes, had it not bin thus delivered in Scriptures. but onely fet downe by fome Author of equal credite with the reft . might verie well have found and descrued as good beliefe, as anie of those things which they tolerhous ania.

to have delivered in this point. For fome there are, who following tolephus, derive 16.10,0,0,0,12. that Empire, as by descent from father to sonne, through fine generations; beginning with Nabuchodono for the great, and giving to him 43. veres, to Euilmerodach 18, to Niglifar the fon of Euilmerodach 40, to Labofardach the fonne of Niglifar o. moneths, and lastly to Balthasar ( whom Iosephus intimates to be of the race of Nabuchodonofor, without naming his father) 17. yeares. And this opinion (faue that he forbeares to reckon the yeares, and plainely calles Balthafar the fonne of Libofardach) Saint Hierome doth follow, alledging Berofus, and Infephus as a scetator of Berofus for his Authors; though Berofus, as he is cited by Tofephis, report the matter farre otherwise. For he tells vs that Enilmerodach the sonne of Nabuchodono for did 1.6 contr. An-20 raigne but 2 yeares, being for his wickednesse and lust, slaine by his sisters husband pian. lub.1.

Nizsglifforoor, who occupied the kingdome after him 4 yeares, and left it to his owne fonne Laborofardach, who being an ill-conditioned boy, was at the end of 9 moneths slaine by such as were about him, and the kingdome given to one Nabonidus, who held it by the election of the Conspirators, and left it vnto Cyrus after 17. yeares. This relation ill agrees with that of Infephius, and both of them as bad with the Scriptures, in number eyther of yeares, or of generations; yet the particularities which they handle, haue procured vnto them some authoritic, so that the names which they have inferted, are taken as it were upon truft. There is a third opinion, which makes the three last kings brethren, and sonnes of Enilme-30 rodach; and this may well enough agree with the Scripture; though I had rather beleeue Xenophon, who faith that the laft king of Babylon was immediate succession Xenophone to his father. But whereas the Author of the Scholasticall Historie, who is foun-librader of this opinion, placeth betweene him that took Ierusalem, and Enilmerodach, another Nabuchodonofor: plaine it is that he hath, out of any Historie facred or profane, as little warrant to guide him, as we have reason to follow him. Enfebius, Sulpitius, Seuerus, and Theodoret, vpon better ground, haue supposed, that Euilmerodach and Balthafar were brethren and fonnes of the great Nabuchadonofor. This is built on the fift chapter of Daniel, wherein Balthafar (for of Euilmerodach there is none that euer doubted) is often called Nabuchodonofor his fonne. And fo common grew 40 this explication, that Saint Hierome called it the vulgaropinion. But the place of Icremy before cited, prooues that Balthalar was not the fonne indeede, but the grandchild of that great conquerour, though by the phrase very common in Scriptures; and familiar in those Easterne languages, he was called the sonne.

Annius his Metasthenes hits very rightly the 70 yeres of captuity, giving to Nobel. chodonofor 45 yeares, to Euilmerodach 30 yeares, and to the three fonnes of Euilmerodach, nephews of Nabuchodonofor 14 yeares; that is, to Reg-Affar the eldeft fonne three yeares, to Lab-Affar Dach the second sonne six yeares, and to Balthafar the third fonne fiue.

To this accompt agreeing with the Scriptures, both in the whole fumme of 50 yeares, and in the number of generations, I have fometime subscribed, as not daring to reject an appearance of truth, vpon no greater reason than because the Author was of Annius his edition . Yet could I not fatisfie my felfe herein; both for that none of the Ancient, and few fuch of the moderne Writers as deferue to be regarded, have consented with this Metasthenes; and for that in making Balthasar to fucceede vnto his brother in the kingdome, and not vnto his father, he is wholly against Xenophon, whose Historic of the elder Cyrus in his Affyrian warre I can not flightly value in many respects, and especially because it is very agreeable to the Scriptures, in the taking of Babylon, while the king was at his drunken feaft.

Seeking therefore diligently into all circumstances that might give any light in this obscuritie, I found manifest proofe, that the time allotted vnto Balthafar, by Panelus garfe Amius his Metasthenes, was farre short of the truth, which is enough to render all fuspected that he hath faid in distributing what part of the 70 years hee pleased among the reft. For in the third yeare of Balthafar, Daniel faw a vision, after which he was ticke certaine dayes, but when heer ofe vp he did the kings butineffe : from 10 which businesse, that hee did afterwards withdraw himselfe, and line retired, so long that he was forgotten in the Court, it appeares plainely, both by the many words which the old Queene vsed to set out his sufficiencie, and by the Kings asking of him, when he came into his presence, whether he were Daniel. Now to thinke that a man of fuch account and place as Daniel had held, could in two yeares have beene worne out of remembrance, were in my judgement a very strange conceipt, which rather than I would entertaine, I can well be contented, to thinke the whole florie (thus related) a part of Annius his impostures.

Out of these reports of Iosephus, Berofus, and others, many new opinions are framed, by conicctures of late Writers. For the endurance of the captinitie being 70 20 yeares, and these yeares extending vnto the first of Cyrus, in which course of time Nebuchadnezzar, his fonne and grand-child, must have raigned; it hath seemed needfull to supply the yeares of these three descents, by inserting some, whose raignes might fil vp the whole continuance of the captinitie, with which the time allorted by Berofus and others, to Euilmerodach and Balthafar, ioyned vnto the yeares following the nineteene of Nebuchadnezzar, (wherein Ierufalem was laid defolate) are Therefore Mercator and others following him, fashion the yeares of Enilmerodach in this fort. They fay, that the 18 yeares given to him by Iofephus in the tenth of his Antiquities, should bee read and numbred 28 yeares, and the two yeares 20 that Berofus hath allowed to Euilmerodach should be written 23:in the first number the figure of (1) is mistaken for the figure of (2) and in the later there should have bin added the figure of (3) to that of (2:) this granted (to wit) that Euilmerodach raigned 28 yeares, whereof fine together with his father, and 23 after his death, and the same number of 23 added to the 25 which Nabuchodonofor lived after the destruction of Jerusalem, make 49, then 4 yeares of Niglisar according to Berosus, o moneths of Labaffardach his fonne, and 17 yeares of Labonidus or Balthafar make vp the number of 70 yeares to the first of Cyrus. But whether by errour in figures, or in words, the numbers be vtterly mistaken, in all copies extant; vpon how weake a foundation do they build, who have nothing to helpe them, faue onely the bare 40 names of two vnknowne Kings, found in Authors manifeltly corrupted, and fuch as if they had been entirely extant, were not worthie, to have that place of Ieremie called into dispute, in regard of their authoritie?

A more particular examination of one opinion touching the number, persons, and raignes of the Babylonian Kings.

Ther suppositions, little different in substance from this of Mercator, 50 I purposely forbeare to rehearse, as falling under the same answere. That of lofeph Scaliger I may not forget, as deferuing to be confidered apart from the rest. He gives to Nabuchadnezzar 44 yeres, to Enilmerodach 2, to Belfazer, 5: and to Nabonidus 17. So that from the 10 of Nabuchadnezzar, in which Jerusalem was destroyed, vnto the time of Cyrus he accompteth onely 59 yeares; beginning (as many do) the captiuitie, 11 yeares fooner, from the transportation of Jechonia. But hercof enough hath beene said already. That which we are now to confider, is his distribution of the time running betweene the 10 of Nabushadnezzar, and the fall of the Chaldean Empire; wherein if he have erred, then is all further inquisition friuolous.

Concerning the length of Nabuchadnezzars raigne, I shall hereafter upon better occasion deliuer my opinion. The time which he giues to Euilmerodach is very short, and more precisely agreeing with Berofus than with the Scriptures. For wee 10 find in Ieremy, that this Euilmerodach in the first of his raigne, shewing all favour to Jechonia, did among other things take order for him at his table; and that he did continually eate bread before him all the dayes of his life. His portion was a continuall portion given him of the King of Babel, every day a certaine, all the dayes of his life terem, 52, verge vntillhe died. The very found of these words (which is more to be esteemed, than 33.034. the authoritie of Berofus, were he perfectly extant) imports a farre longer time than 2 yeares, wherein Iechonia, under this gentle Prince, enjoyed the comfort fent by God, whose commaundement he had obeyed in yielding himselfe to 2\(\text{abuchadnez}\)zar. Indeed how long Iechonia did liue it can not be proued; but plaine it is hereby that all his remaining daies he did not cate bread before this King. Now that he li-20 ued not so short a while after this as 2 yeates, it is more than likely, for he was but 55 yeres old when he was fet at liberty, having been 37 yeares in the prison, whereinto he was cast at the age of 18 yeares; after which time it seemes plaine that hee begat Salathiel, as well by the age of Zorobabel, who is faid to have beene but a yong stances of his imprisonment it selfe. Of Belfazer, to whom Scaliger gives the next five yeares naming him also Laborofoardoch, I should wonder why he calles him Nahuchadnezzars daughters sonne, were it not that herein I find him very carefull to helpe out Berofus, by shifting in his Niriglissoror, as husband to Nabuchadnezzars daughter, and Protector of his 30 fonne 4 of these yeares; by which meanes there remaines about one yeare to Belfazer alone, agreeing neerely with the o moneths affigned by Berofus to the fonne of Niglifar. But Ieremy hath told vs that it was to Nabuchadnezzar, and to his fon, and to his fonnes fonne (not to his daughters fonne) that the Empire was promifed: which difficultie if Scaliger could not helpe, it was well done of him, to passe it ouer man, and one of Darius his Pages three score yeares after this, as by other circum-

Nabonidus the last of these (whome others, desirous to reconcile Berofus to the Scriptures) have judged to be all one with Balthafar, is by Scaliger thought to bee Darius of the Medes. But herein Scaliger is no firme Berofian: for Berofius makes him of the same stocke or race a Babylonian. I speake not this to disgrace the trauaile of 40 that most learned man (for it highly commends his diligence and judgement, that he was not fo wedded to any author, as affected with the love of truth) but to shew that he himselfe having in some points disliked those Writers; whome in generall he approperty, might with greater reason have wholly reformed them by the scriptures, wherein can be no errour. Two things there are which chiefly did breed or confirme this opinion in Scaliger, that hee whome Berofus calles Nabonidus, was the same whom Daniel had called Darius of the Medes: First, the phrase of Scripture, which tignifies ynto vs., that Darius tooke the kingdome, not faying that hee wanne it by force of armes; Secondly, a fragment of Megasthenes found in Eusebius, wherein this Nabonidus is called the Median. Touching the word of the Originall; 50 or of the Greeke translation, which expressing no force of armes doth only signific, that Darius tooke or received the kingdome; I see no reason why we should thereupon inferre, that the next king entred by Election : feeing Daniel relateth not the meanes and circumstances of Balthafars death, but onely the swift accomplishment of his owne prophecie. Neither could it indeede haue properly beene faid (if Daniel had cared to vie the most expressione termes) that Darius of the Medes breaking into the citie, did win the kingdome; feeing this was performed by Cyrus in the abfence of Darius, though by his forces, and to his vie. Now concerning the fragment of Megasthenes, true it is, that in Eusebius his workes printed at Basile, in the yeare 1559. I finde onely thus much of Megasthenes, cited out of Alphaus; That Nabuchodonofor, was more valiant than Heronles; that hee subdued all Lybia, and the rest of Afra as farre as to the Armenians; and that as the Chaldrans report, being returned into his kingdome, and rapt with a divine furie, he cried with a loude voice. O Babylonians, I foretell yee of a great calamitie that shall come vopon you, which nevther Bel, nor any of the Gods Shall auert : There will come a Perlian, halfe an Affe, 10 that shall bring slauery uppon yee : and that, this and the like when he had spoken, he vanished. Of all this I belowe little or nothing, fauing that Nabuchodonosor knew before hand, that his Empire should be translated, as Daniel had foretold from the golden head, to the filner breast. But that he wan all Africa or Lybia, I hold it neither true nor probable.

If Scaligers copie of Eufebius were the more perfect, out of which Megallhenes tells vs that Nabuchodonofor wanne both Afrike and Spaine, I beleeue the fragment fo much the leffe: and am as little moued with the authoritie of it, where it calles a Median the pride and confidence of the Affrians, as where it tells of Nabuchadnezzar his owne vanishing away. Indeed that same title of halfe an Asse, by which he calleth Cyrus, makes me to suspect the fable as cunningly forged out of Apollo his Oracle, wherein he termeth him a Mule, because his parentage was more noble on the mothers fide, than on the fathers; as Mules are begotten by Afes vpon Mares. And thus much in answer of the two principall foundations whereon this opinion is built. As for the concinnitie and coherence which it hath within it felfe, I eafily allow it. But this proues nothing, for meere fictions have not wanted their commendations: neither can any man beleeve that one so indictious, industrious and deepely learned as Iofeph Scaliger, would ouer-shoote himselfe in setting downerepugnancies.

It now remaineth to examine the agreement of this with the Scriptures, from 30 which there is no appeale. And herein it seemes that Scalinger, well knowing his owne sufficiencie, hath beene little carefull to satisfie men that would frame Arguments against him. For if the prophecie of Daniel were true, that the kingdome of Balthafar was divided, and given to the Medes and Persians, either wee must thinke that Darius of the Medes was not Nabonidus, or else wee must bethinke our selves what Persian it might be that shared the kingdome with him. For it is not more certaine, that Balthafar loft his life and kingdome, than that his kingdome was diviuided and given to the Medes and Persians. Neither did the Medes and Persians fall out and fight for it, as by supposing Nabonidus to have beene Darius, they should be thought to have done; but these two Nations did compound the body of that Empire, and were accounted as Lords over all the subject provinces, insomuch that the Greeke Historians did commonly call those warres which Darius, and after him Xerxes, made vpon Greece, The warres of the Medes. Yea to cleare this point, euen Daniel himselfe resembles that King, with whom Alexander fought, vnto a Ramme with two hornes, calling him the King of the Medes and Persians. Wherefore the whole Nation of Chronologers were not to have been condemned by Iofeph Scaliger, for maintaining upon fuch good grounds, that Darius of the Medes, was partner with Cyrus in his victories, and not a Chaldean King by him fubdued. Neither was Insephus to be the leffe regarded for affirming that Balthasar was destroyed by Darim of the Medes, and his nephew Cyrus, though herein hee varied from Berofm, and to others, whose authoritie elsewhere he gladly citeth. For Iosephus had no reason to beleeue any mans faith or knowledge of those times, halfe so well as Daniels, whom I beleeue that hee vnderstoode as farre as was needefull in this case. Lawfull it was for him to alleage al Authors that had any mention, though vnperfect, of the same things that were contained in the writings of the lewes, to whose histories thereby he procured reputation in the Roman world, where they were ftrangers, and might feeme fabulous. Euen fo doe Eusebius, and other Christian Writers, willingly embrace the testimonies of heathen bookes making for the truth in some particulars; yet will they not therefore be tried in generall by the felfe same Eshmicke philosophers, but leave them where they are against the truth; as tolephus in this case hath left Berofus. And thus much I thought it meete to fay of Scaligers opinion in this point; holding neuerthelesse in due regard his learning and judgement, which if in some things it had not failed, the miracle had bin very great.

What may be held as probable of the Persons and Times of NABVCHO-DONOSOR his fuccessors.

T now remaines that I freely acknowledge mine owne weaknes, who cannot find how the 70. yeares of captinitie are to be divided among them which raigned in Babylon, though I finde that the distribution made of them, in such wiseas already is rehearsed, be ill agreeable to them which raigned in Babylon, though I finde that the distribution the holy Scriptures. Wherefore I may truely fay with Pererius, that 20 wee ought liberally to pardon those whose feete haue failed them in the slipperie wayes of Chronologie, wherein both learning and diligence are subject to take a fall at one time or other, by ignorance, forgetfulnesse, or heedelesse reckoning. Yet will I aduenture to deliuer my opinion, wherein the judgement of Lyra and others (holding those onely to have raigned ouer Chaldmans, whose Names are found in the Scriptures) appeares more conformable to reason and account of time, than any of the other Sentences or Coniectures before rehearled. Not that I will take upon me to defend Lyra his Coniectures, when hee supposeth by Niglifar and Labofardach to be meant the same persons which are called in Scriptures Euilmerodach and Balthafar (for this can by no good colour be maintained) but 30 onely to shew that the Kings by him cited, are likely to have occupied the whole time of seuenty yeares. First therefore let vs consider the raigne of Nebuchadnezzar, in whose eighteenth yere Ierusalem was taken and fackt, but in his nineteenth layd

Most of Writers haue given to him 43. yeares of raigne, following therein Berofus. There are who have added one yeare more, and some have made it vp 45. To dispute about the certainetie were needelesses for in shewing by what length of time the Scriptures measure him, we shall show the certaine truth.

Manifest it is, that the 19. yeare of Nabuchadnezzar, is joyned with the 11. of 1. Kin. 2.5.8. Zedekia; as also that his eight yeare, was the first yeare of lechonia his captinitie; the of trem. 31.12 40 raigne of Zedekia occupied all the meane space being of 11. yeares. This is generally 2-1/2/12. agreed vpon, so that it needes no further proofes: As for the beginning of his fuc- 2. Kim. 25, 27. ceffor Eurlmerodach, it was in the feuen and thirtieth yeare of Iechonia his captiuitie; & Icom, 52.31 so that Nebuchadnezzar after his eight yere (which was the first of Jechonia his bondage) raigned 35. whole yeares, and peraduenture a good part of the fixe and thirtieth, forasmuch as Iechonia was inlarged with so great fauour, not vntill the end of the yeare. Substracting therefore out of these foure and forty, which Nebuchalnezzars raigne did wel-neare occupie, those eighteene yeares of his which passed away before the captiuitie of Iuda, and ruine of the citie, we have remaining fix and twenty yeares of the feuentie, that were almost wholy spent, when his some began 50 to raigne.

It is now to be considered how the remainder of the seuentie yeres were divided betweene the kings ruling in Babylon untill the first of Cyrus. A question more difficult (as I faid before ) than greatly needefull : the whole fumme being certaine, and the distinction of times affording no benefit in knowledge of their actions, who were flouthfull Princes. Neither can any man the more justly suspect the beginning or end of the whole 70. yeares, for that the distribution of some part of them is only conjecturall; feeing that none who gives any other termes to their beginning or end, hath refused to follow both vnlikely and desperate consectures in distinctions ding them. I will therefore be bold to doe as others have done; knowing well before hand, that who focuer shall discouer my errour, must doe mee the pleasure (which I could rather with in a case more materiall) of making mee to vinderstand

Of the foure and fortie yeares remaining in accompt at Nabuchadnezzars death, we are to take away the latt, which was the first of Darius the Mede, and then hauing authoritie good enough to warrant vs from blame of prefumption, in guing vs feuenteene veares to Baltinalar, we finde left in our handes to bestow vpon Euilmero lach fixe and twentic yeares. Of the yeare belonging to Darius the Mede I have alreadie spoken what I thought sufficient, in delinering my opinion of the beginning and continuance of this captiuitie. That Balthafar did raigne feuentcene yeares, we haue the authoritie of 10 sephus, before cited in expresse wordes; We haue also the generall confent of all, or the most late Writers, interpreting Berofus his Nabonidus, who raigned fo long; and Balthafar to have beene one. But nothing moueth mee fo Bance 8, v. 1. o much to believe this Tradition, as first those evident places in Daniel, shewing that 20 13.00 15.001. in the third yeare of Balthafar he followed the Kinges businesse, and yet was forgot 20 ten ere the end of his raigne, (a proofe sufficient of no few yeares, passing under this man, especially seeing it is no where found that Daniels emploiments tooke end cither that yeare or the next.) Secondly, the confideration of Cyrus his warres against the Affrians, which beginning with the death of this mans father, and being alwaies prosperous, could hardly haue occupied any longer time, though wee make large allowance to his deedes in the lower Asia, which fell out in the mid-way: I haue alreadie shewed, that there appeares in the Scriptures likelihood enough to make it credible, that the raigne of Eudmerodath was not short : and that men of great judgment have found it most probable that hee was King three and twentie yeares. More, I thinke, they would have allowed him, had not the defire of fatis- 20 fying Berofus caused them to rest content with this. And surely it were greatly to be wished, that bookes of such antiquitic, as those of Berosus, were extant without corruption; a great light (no doubt) they would yeeld in many darke paffages of Antiquitie. I will yet confesse, that were his workes neuer so excellent, and in all thinges else vnquestionably true, I would not therefore condescend vnto him in fome one point, wherein the Scriptures were his open enemie. How much lesse ought I to obay a broken fragment of his, containing only feuen or eight lines, and part euen of the title corrupted, as they beleeue that follow him in the rest ? The Scriptures haue told vs that God gaue the Empire to Nabuchadnezzar, to his sonne, and to his sonnes sonne : How long each of them held it, wee finde not expressed; 40 yet would we gladly know it of Birofus, or of any other that would teach vs; prouided alwaies, that helping vs in a particularitie, he destroy not thereby the generall truth. More wordes are needlesse. It is enough to say with others, that Berosus or Josephus who cited him, hath been wronged by the carelesties of Scribes, and that it was as casse for those Scribes to erre in writing two for sixe and twentie, as for three and twentie, or perhaps more casie. For the omission of the second figure, was as likely the one way as the other; and the Character 5. lignifying 6. hatha nearer refemblance of & that stands for 2. than bath 2 which is vsed for 3. So that the numerall notes \$ 5 expressing 26. were not safe enough from being mistaken in the true copie, and might be altered, as ill written, if some crooked hand, or other mis- 50 chance not vnufuall, had omitted the first stroke of the former letter, or added a dash to the latter, which might cause them to seeme not two different figures, but the one a correction of the other, which how it could be supposed in  $\beta$   $\gamma$  standing for 23. I doe not well perceive. As for the arithmeticall figures now in vie, they were long after the time of Iosephus brought in by the Arabians, and therefore doe not appertaine to this businesse; vnlesse we should ghesse that his workes were corrupted in that vnlearned age, which following the Saracen conquest, was little occupied in the studies of humanitie, but in a sort wholly given over to the doctrine of Aristotle. If this will serve to make Berofus our friend, so let it be; if not, I will not purchase the fauour of his authoritie, by forsaking Ieremie and Daniel, when they feeme his opposites.

d. VII.

Of the victories which NABYCHODONOSOR obtained betweene the destruction of Ierusalem and conquest of

Ith what actions this time of 70. yeares was entertained by the Rabylonian Kings, few haue written, or little is remaining in record. Which may peraduenture haue beene some cause that the time it felse was and is yet fought to becabridged, as not having left fufficient matter to witnessethe length of it. But by such an argument wee might as well

20 denie to many people euen their being. For euery Nation (I know not whom I should except) betweene the beginning and last end of it, hath in some slouthfull age rather dreamt away the time, than spent it. It is therefore no maruaile, if the posteritie of Nabuchodonosor, finding all thinges readie to their hand, which their hearts could have defired, betooke themselves to their case and pleasures, thinking perhaps, like the prodigall sonnes of greedie fathers, their owne wisedome greater, which knew how to enjoy, than that of their Ancestors, which wearied away their daies in the reftlesse trauale of purchasing. Though indeede the raigne of Nabu-chodonoso was so divided, that his youthfull and stronger yeares having been exercifed in victorious armes, no small part of his life was remaining to bee spent in e-20 stablishing what was gotten, and gathering the fruit of his worthy labours past.

The nineteenth yeare of his raigne it was, when destroying vtterly the great and mightie Citic of Ierusalem, hee enriched himselfe with aboundance of spoile, and terrified all that would offer to refift him, by that fearefull example. From that time forward, vntill his three and twentieth yeare, he laboured in the conquest of those adioyning Regions, which God had exposed vnto his sword, and commanded to weare his yoke; namely the Edomites, Moabites, Ammonites, Tyrians, Sidonians, and Agyptions, though some of these were alreadie become his followers, and serued vnder him, when Ierusalem was beaten downe and burnt. But the Tyrians whose Citic was founded on an Iland, fafe enough from any danger of a Land-Armic, and 40 whose fleet was so strong that they needed not to feare any enemie at Sea, were neither daunted with the fall of their neighbour Cities, nor with the obstinate resolution of this mightie Prince, imploying all his power to their subuersion. That the Citie of Tyre was rather well pleased than any way discouraged with the fall of Ierusalem (which had held the same course that Tyrus did, and endured all that might be in the same quarrell against the common enemie) it appeares by the wordes which Ezechiel condemneth as the common voice of Tyrus; AHA, the gate &zech. 26,2. of the people is broken, it is turned unto mee; for feeing shee is desolate, I shall bee replenished. Yet at the length, even in the nineteenth yeare of Nabuchodonosor, that great worke of his whereof wee haue alreadie spoken, beganne to appeare about the wa-

50 ters, and threaten them with incuitable mischiefe. But those prophecies of Ieremie and of Esay, which appoint vnto this desolation Ieras. of Tyre the same terme of 70. yeares, that was prescribed vnto the raigne of the E/ai.23.15. Chaldaans, doe plainely show, that shee followed Ierusalem, the same nineteenth yeare of Nabuchodonofor, in the same, or a very like fortune. The particularities.

which doubtlesse were memorable in the issue of so great and laborious a siege, are in a manner vtterly lost. Thus much wee finde, That the Citizens perceiuing the Towne vnable to hold out, embarked themselues, and fled into the Isle of Cyprus. Neuerthelesse it seemes that this enasion served only the principall men, who escaping with their goods, abandoned the poorer fort vnto the enemies furie. For not only such people of Tyre as dwelt on the Continent (who are called her Daughters in the field) were put to the fword; but the like execution was done in the fireets, into which with excelline labour the Afgrian made way for his Horses and Cha-Equbea. 18. riots. Thus NABYCHODONOSOR confed his Armie to ferue a great fernice against Trs vs, wherein enery head was made bald, and enery (boulder was made bare, yet had be 10 no wages, nor his Armie; but was faine to restcontented with the Honor of having defiroted that Citie, which in all mens judgements had even held inuincible.

The destruction of these two great and powerfull Coc loading made the name of the Chaldeans dreadfull in the cares of all the Nations thereavent, Nabuchodonofor yfed the advantage of that reputation which hee had obtained by victories alreadic gotten, to the getting of more, and more profitable with leffe paine. The Kingdome of Lerpt was the marke at which he aimed 3 a Countrie to abounding in all riches and pleafures, that it might well have tempted any Prince, finding himfelfe strong enough, to seeke occasion of quarrell against it; and so farre an enemie to the Crowne of Babylon, that had it beene poorer, yet either it must have beene sub- 20 dued, or the conquest of spria could ill haue beene established. Neuerthelesse it was needefull that before hee entred into this businesse, the Countries adiacent should be reduced into such termes, that either they should wholly stand at his denotion, or at least be vnable to worke him any displeasure. And herein the decree of God concurred, as in all prosperous enterprises, with reason of state. For the people of Moab, Ammon, Edom, Damascus, Kedar, Hazor, and other adioyning Regions, whom God for their fins had condemned to fall under the Babylonian swords, were fuch, as regarding only their owne gaine had some of them, like Rauens, followed the Chaldean Armie, to feede upon the carcaffes that fell by the crueltie thereof, otherstaking aduantage of their Neighbours miseries, occupied the Coun- 20 tries which were by his victories belonging to Nabuchodonofor; all of them thinking, that when the Afgrian had fatisfied his furie, he should be faine to for fake those defolate parts, and leave the possession to those that could lay hand vponit. Particu-Excels 25.12. 20 larly the Edomites and Philiftims had showed much malice to the series when their Citie was taken. What good feruice they had done to the Chaldaans, I finde not; if they did any, it is likely to have been with reference to their owne purpofes, wherein they were disappointed. The Ammonites were not contented to reloyce at the fall of Ierusalem, but presently they entred upon the Countrie of Gad, and tooke posfession, as if not the Asyrians, but they, had subdued Israel. Neither can I perceive what other ground that practife had of Baalis King of the Ammonites, when hee fent 40 Ismael, a Prince of the bloud of Iuda, to murther Gedalia, whom the King of Babel had left Gouernour ouer those that remained in Ifrael, and to carrie captine into the Ammonites Countrie the people that abode in Mizpah, than a defire of embroiling Wabuchodonofor with fo many labours at once, as should make him retire into his term.40.14.00 owne Countrie, and abandon those wasted Lands to himselfe and others, for whom they lay conveniently. Such or the like policie the Moabites did exercise; whose pride and wrath were made frustrate by God, and their diffimulation condemned, as not doing right. All these Nations had the art of rauening, which is familiar to such as liue or border upon desarts; and now the time afforded them occasion to shew the uttermost so cunning of their theeuish wits. But Nabuchadnezzar did cut asunder all their deuices by sharpe and suddaine warre ouer-whelming them with vnexpected ruine, as it were in one night; according to the prophecies of Efay, Ieremie, and Ezekiel, who fore-told, with little difference of wordes, the greatnesse and swiftnesse of the mi-

ferie that should come upon them. With which of them he first began, I find not ; it feemes that Moab was the last which felt his hand : for fo doe many good Authors interpret the prophecie of E/ay, threatning Moab with destruction after three yeares, as having reference to the third yeare following the ruine of lerulalem: the next yeare after it being spent in the Egyptian expedition. This is manifest that all the principall Townes in these Regions were burnt, and the people slaine, or made flaues, few excepted, who being preferued by flight, had not the courage to returne to their habitations ouer-hastily, much leffe to attempt any thing against 2 abuchodonofor, but lived as miserable out-lawes, or at least oppressed wretches, vntill the end of the seuentic yeares, which God had prescribed vnto the desolation of their Countries; as well as of the Land of Inda.

d. VIII.

That Agypt was conquered, and the King therein raigning flaine by NABVCHODO NOSOR, contrarie to the opinion of most Authors : who following HERO-DOTVS and DIODORVS, relate it otherwife.

Hen by a long course of victoric Nabuchodonosor had brought into subiection all the Nations of Syria, and the bordering Arabians, in fuch wife that no enemie to himfelfe, nor friend of the Agyptian, was left at his back, that might gue impediment vnto his proceeding, or take aduantage of any misfortune; then did hee forth-with take in hand the conquest of £77pt himselfe, vpon which those other Nations had formerly beene depending. Of this expedition, and the victorious iffue thereof, the three great Prophets Efay, Ieremie, and Ezechiel, have written so plainely, that I hold it altogether needlesse to looke after more authoritie, or to cite for proofe halfe of that which may be alleaged out of these. Neuerthelesse wee finde many and good Au-30 thors, who following Herodotus, and Diodorus Siculus, are well contented to ftraine

, these prophecies with vnreasonable diligence vnto such a sense as gives to Nabuchodono for little more than the honour of having done some spoile in Agypt, omitting the conquest of that Land by the Babylonian, and referring the death of Aprics or Hophra to a chance long after following, which had no coherence with the ferimes or affaires. So prepofterous is the delight which many men take in the meanes and fecond helps conducing to their purpose, that often times they preferre the Commentator before the Author; and to vp-hold a fentence giving testimonic to one clause, doe carelessy ouerthrow the historie it selfe, which thereby they sought to haue maintained. The reports of Herodotus and Diodorus, concerning the Kings of 40 £gypt, which raigned about these times, are already rehearsed in the former booke:

but that which they have spoken of Apries, was purposely reserved vnto this place. Herodotus affirmes that he was a very fortunate King , but wherein hee telleth not; Herodotas deligi (vnleffe we should vnderstand that he was victorious in the Warre which he is faid to haue made vpon Tyrus and Sidon) that hee raigned fine and twentie yeares, and was finally taken and put to death by his owne fubicets; who did fet vp Amife, as King, which prevailed against him. The rebellion of the Agyptians hee imputeth to a great loffe which they received in an expedition against the Cyrenium, by whom almost their whole Armie was destroied. This calamitie the people of Agypt thought to bee well pleafing to their King, who had fent them on this dangerous 50 expedition, with a purpose to have them confumed, that so hee might with greater fecuritie raigne over fuch as staied at home. So they who escaped, and the friends of fuch as were flaine, rebelled against Apries, who fent Amasis to appeale the tumult; but Amasis became Captaine of the rebells, and was by them chosen King. Finally, the whole Land confented vnto this new Election; whereby Apries Bbbb 2

was driven to truft vnto his forraine Mercenaries , the Ionians and Carians , of whome bee kept in readinesse thirtie thousand good Souldiours that fought valuantly for him , but were vanquished by the great numbers of the Agyptian forces, amounting vnto two hundred and fiftie thousand, which were all by birth and education, men of warre. Apries himselfe being taken prisoner, was gently intreated by Amasis for a while, vntill the Agyptians, exclaiming vpon him as an extreame enemie to the land, got him deliuered into their handes, and strangled him, yet gaue him honourable buriall. Such is the report of Hero-Timber Sic. 110. dolars, with whome Diodorus Siculus neerely agrees, telling vs that Apries did vanquilh the Cyprians and Phanicians in battell at Sea, tooke by force and demolished 10 Si lon, wanne the other townes of Phanicia, and the Isle of Cyprus, and finally perished as is before rehearsed, when he had raigned two and twentie yeares. This authoritie were enough (yet not more than enough) to informe vs of Apries his hisftorie, if greater authoritie did not contradict it. But the destruction of Agypt by the Babylonian, fore-told by the Prophets, which hath no coherence with these relations, hath greater force to compell our beliefe, than have the traditions of Agypin Priests (which the Greeke Historians followed) and greater probabilities to per-Bis. 20.001 4.5. fivade those that looke only into humane reasons. For Esty prophecied long before of the shamefull captinitie of the Azyptians, whom the King of Asslur should carry away naked, yong and old, in fuch wife that the Jenes who fled vnto them for deliuerance from the Afgrian, should be ashamed of their owne vaine confidence in men fo vnable to defend them felues.

But Fzekiel and teremy, as their prophecies were nearer to the time of execution, fo they handled this Argument more precifely. For Ezekiel telleth plainely, that Agypt should be given to Nabuchschezzar, as wages for the service which hee had Probagging done at Tyre: Also he recounteth particularly all the chiefe Cities in Egypt, faying, That these by name should be destroyed and goe into captiuitie; yea, that ing, That these by name should be delivoyed and goe into captunite; yea, that specified in the state of the s be a violent exposition of these Prophecies, which by applying the iffue of such threatings to an infurrection and rebellion, concludes all, without any other alteration in segget, than change of the Kings person, wherein segget did succeed vn-39 to Apries, by force indeede, but by the uniforme confent of all the people. Certainely, if that notable place of Ieremie, wherein he foretelleth how the Iewes in Ægypt should see Pharaoh Hophra delivered into the hand of his enemies, as Zedekia had beene, were to bee referred vnto the time of that rebellion whereof Herodotus hath spoken, as the general opinion hath ouer-ruled it, then was it vainely done of the same Prophet ( which God forbid that any Christian should thinke, seeing he did it by the appointment of God himfelfe) to hide in the clay of a Bricke-hil, those very frones, vpon which the throne of Nabucho done for should be set, and his pauillion spread. Yeathen was that prophecie no other than false, which expressed the end of Pharaobthus. Behold, I will visite the common people of Wo, and Pharaoh and Agypt, with their Gods and their Kings, cuen P H AR AOH, and all that trust in him: and I will deliner them into the hands of those that seeke their lines, and into the hand of NA-BUCHADNEZZNA King of Babel, and into the hands of his fernants. The clearenes of this prophecy being such as could not but resute that interpretation of many other places, which referred all to the rebellion of Amalis, it caused me to wonder what those Commentators would say to it, who are elsewhere so diligent in sitting all to the Greeke Historians. Wherefore looking upon Junius, who had in an other place taken the enemies of Pharaoh Hophrato be Amasis, and his followers, I found him here acknowledging that the Agyptian Priests had notably deluded Herodotus 50 with lies, coined vpon a vaine-glorious purpose of hiding their owne disgrace and bondage. And furely it may we'll be thought, that the historie of Nabuchidnezzar, was better knowne to the Ieres whom it concerned, than to the Greekes that fearcely at any time heard of his name. Therefore I fee no cause why we should not rather believe Iosephus, reporting that Nabucho dono for in the three & twentieth years of his raigne, and the fift yeare of the destruction of Ieru(alem, did conquer £gypt, kill the King thereof, and appoint another in his flead, than Herodotus or Diouore; kill the King thereof, and appoint another in his itead, than Herodaliu Or Diobaste; infolius de sin who being meere ftrangers to this businesse had no great reason to labour in search: infolius de sin ing out the truth, but might reft contented with any thing that the Priests would  $\epsilon_{i,1}$ . tell them. Now if fetting aside all advantage of authoritie, we should only consider the relations of tolephus, and of the Greeke Historians, as either of them might bee verified of it selfe by apparant circumstances, without reflecting upon the Hebrew Prophets or Agyptian Pricits; me thinks the death of Apries can no way be appro-10 ued as hauing beene wrought by confent of the people, but affords great matter of fulpition; yea though no man had opposed the reports of Herodotus and Diadore For the great loue and honour which the \*Egyptians did beare vnto their Kings, is notorious by the vniforme testimonie of all others that have handled the matters of that Countrey, as well as by the report of Diodore himselfe. How then can wee thinke it probable, that Apries having wonne great victories, did for one only loffe fall into the hatred of all his people, or which may ferue to perswade vs, that a King of Azypt would feeke, or so demeane himselfe, that he might be thought to seke the destruction of his natural fubiects? As for that armie of thirtie thousand souldiours Carians and Ionians, which the King of Agypt whom Amalis tooke prisoner, 20 is faid to have kept for his defence: doth it not argue that hee was a forrainer, and one that armed himselfe against the Egyptians, wishing them few and weake; rather than any of the Pharaohs, who accounted the force of the Country, as affuredly their owne, as the strength of their owne bodies? It were more tedious than anie way needefull, to vse all Arguments that might be alleadged in this case. The very ceath of this supposed Apries, which the clamours of the people obtained of Amalis, who fought to have kept him alive, doth intimate that hee was some forcen Gouernour, not a naturall Prince; otherwise the people would have defired to faue his life, and Amasis to take it quickly from him. I will not labour any further to disproue that opinion, whereunto I should not have yeelded, though it had 20 flood vpon great apparance of truth, confidering that the voyce of Trueth it felfe cries out against it; but leave the circumstances proving the Conquest of Agypt by Nabucho dono for to be observed, where due occasion in course of the storie following shall present them.

How Ægypt was subdewed and held by NABVCHADNEZZAR.

f x T is a great loffe , that the generall Hiftoric of the World hath fuffered, by the spoile and waste which Time bath made of those Monuments, that should have preserved the memorie of such famous acti-ons as were accomplished by this mightie Prince Nabuchadono; or; wherein, whether his Vertue, or Fortune were greater, it is now vn-certaine. That his victories following the Conquest of Syria, and the Neighbour-Prouinces, were fuch as did more enlarge his dominion, than all his former warres had done, it may cafily be gathered out of Ezekiel: who reckons up in his thirtieth chapter (belides the whole Countrey of £gypt) Phut and Lud, with other Nations that may seeme to have reached out into Mauritania, as people subdewed by this great Babylonian. The circumstances of these warres are in a maner veterly lostbut that the victory was easie and swift, any man shall find, who wil take the pains to conferre the places, wherein the three great Prophets touch this Argument. Thus much I thinke worthy of more particular observation; that Pharoah, who (as is already noted in the former Booke) thought himselfe safe in Agypt by the well defenced fituation of his Countrey, did very vnwifely in suffering his enemics adhærents in Syria. For as the labour of this businesse did more harden than wearic the Chaldean army, so the confidence and vaine securitie of the Agyptians, relying vpon the difficult paffages which the enemy was to make through the Arabian defarts, and the much advantage which the great river of Nilus would afford vnto themselues, did litle auaile them in prouision for the warre, and much assonish them (as may justly be thought) in the time of execution: it being viually seene, that the hearts of men faile, when those helpes faile, in which they had reposed more confidence than in their owne vertue. Hitherto the kingdome of Leypt had flourilhed vnder the rule of the Pharaohs, about a thousand fine hundred and foure score yeares; but from this time forward it remained fortie yeares without a King, vnder the subjection of the Babylonians, and then at length it began to recover by litle and litle the former greatnes, yet fo, that it was never dreadful vnto others, God having faid of that people, I will diminish them that they shall no more rule the Nations. For wher-Ext. 29.13,14, as it hath beene faid of Pharaoh: I am the some of the wife, I am the some of the auncient Kings : and whereas he had vaunted, The River is mine, and I have made it; the Princes of Agypt now became fooles, the river failed them, the King himselfe was taken and flaine, and that ancient linage quite extinguished. This came to passe in the first yeare after the destruction of Ierusalem, and the three and twentieth tofeph.Ast.Ind. of Nabuchadnezzar, at which time (faith Infephus) Hee flew the King then raigning, 20 placed an other in his roome, and carried captines thence to Babylon, the Icwes whome hee found in that Countrie. Now concerning the time which Iofephus gines vnto this bufinesse, and the businesse it selfe, I have already shewed, that it is warranted by all the prophecies which infinuate the fame. As likewise the last destruction of lerusalem, and carrying away those vnto Babel, who inhabited the miserable ruines of that preatcity, which was in the same three and twentieth years of NEBVCHADNEZZAR. is not ynprobably thought by good authors to haue beene at the returne from this Leyptian expedition. But whereas Iosephus tells vs that there was another King put in the roome of Apries by Nabuchadnezzar, we must vnderstand, that he was onely a Vierroy, and not (as some have mistaken it) thinke that this was Amasis. For to place the beginning of Amasis his raigne in the three and twentieth of Nebuchadnezzer, were as well repugnant vnto the Prophecies before alleadged, as to all Chronologie and historie. Some there are, which to helpe this inconvenience imagine that there were two fuccessively bearing t' a name of Amasis; others that there were two Apries, the one flaine by Nabuchadnezzar, the other by Amasis: a question of small importance, because the difference is only about a name, it being once granted that the person mentioned in Scriptures, was depriued of life and kingdome by the As-Syrians. Yet for any thing that I can perceine, that Apries of whom the Greeke Historians wrote, could not be the deputie of Nebuchadnezzar, feeing that hee was the Grand-child of Pharao Necho, and made warre (as they report) vpon the Phanici- 40 ans, who were, before the Agyptians, become subject vnto the Crowne of Babylon. I might adde perhappes, that he whom Nabuchadnezzar left as Gouernour of A gypt, was more likely to have had fome Chaldean or Afgrian, than Agyptian name; vnleffe wee should thinke that hee had beene a traitor to his naturall Prince, and so rewarded by the Conquerour with Lieutenantship of the Country: about which it were but friuolous to dispute. Thus much in briefe we ought to beleeue, that Nabuchodonofor made an absolute Conquest of Agypt; that he was not so foolish as to giue it away, any man may gueffe; that he appointed one to rule the Countrey, it is confequent vnto the former, and hath authoritie of Iofephus; that this Gouernour (or some successour of his) was afterwards taken and slaine by Amasis, I see pro- 50 babilitie enough to perswade my selfe, and yet can well be content, that others vse their libertie, and beleeue what they lift. As for the armie which this Egyptian King Apries is supposed to have kept of Ionians and Carians; I hold them to be none other than the garrifons of mercenarie fouldiours which were left by the Afgrian for the guard of his Viceroy, and custodie of the new subdewed Prouince: as likewise the company returning from Cyrene and Barce, who togither with the friends of fuch as were flaine in that expedition, remembred before out of the Greeke Histarians. deposed and slew Apries, I take them to have beene the Agyptian fugitives which then recoursed their owne Countrie. Sure it is that this Prophecie of Ezekiel was verified, At the end of fortie yeares will I gather the Ægyptians from the people #304.30.01.2.

where they were scattered, and I willbring againe the captivitie of Ægypt, and will cause of there a smallkingdome. If the Egyptian Pricits alluded hecreunto in the tale which to they made of Amalis his obtaining the kingdome, then are they to be helped with this or the like interpretation; if they deuised matter that had no shadow of truth, onely to keepe the Greekes from knowledge of their Countries disgrace; then are they little to be regarded, fince we know the truth with them.

them to returne into the land of Pathrosinto the land of their babitation, and they shall be of the fundry accompts drawne from fundry acts of Nebve HADNEZZAR and of the destruction of Niniuie, by him; the time of which action is uncertaine.

Hele victories brought the greatnes of the Asyrian Empire to the full. and from them was reckoned the time of Nebuchadnezzars raigne in fundry places of Scripture. To speake any more of the questions arising about the supputation of Nebuchadnezzar his times, might will note; that whereas Daniel was carried captine in the third yeare of Ichoiakims raigne (which ranne along with some part of Nebuchadnezzars first yeare ) and was kept in diet three yeares more, before he was brought into the Kings presence; it could not be the second of Nabuchadnez zars kingdome, wherein he interpreted the 20 forgotten dreame of the great image, foreshewing the succession of Monarchies, but the second of his Empire. The same or the like may be said of divers places which referre fundry matters vnto their fet yeares; as that of Ezekiel before-cited, where hee fore-tells that Aegypt should be given in reward for the service done before Tyrus, dating his prophecie in the feuen and twentieth yeare; and that of Daniel, placing the erection of the golden Image in the eighteenth yeere: for these yeares held no dependance vpon either the beginning of Nabuchadnezzars kingdome, or of his Empire, nor yet vpon any of the captivities, but had reference to some memorable action, omitted in Scripture, and therefore not easie to be found, nor worth the labour of vncertaine fearch.

Of any warre made by Nabuchadnezzar after fuch time as hee returned from the Conquest of Aegypt I doe not reade: excepting that against Niniuie, the destruction whereof was fore-tolde by the Prophet Naum. Niniuie had long before beene taken by Merodach (as in due place hath beene shewed) and together with the rest of Asyria made subject to Babylon. Yet was it left under a peculiar King, who rebelling against the Chaldean, as Iehoiakim & Zedekias tributary Kings of Iuda had done. talled likewise of the same fortune. That the destruction of Niniaie followed the Conquest of Aegypt, it appeareth by the comparison which Nahum the Prophet made betweene this Citie that was to fall, and the Citie of No in Aegypt that was fallen already. But how long after this came to paffe, it is (me thinkes) vnpossible Nabum 3.8.

to find out. For whereas it is found in an Hebrew Chronologie, that it was in the first of Nabuchadnezzars raigne; the place of Nahum last cited is enough to disprove it. Whereas it is referred by some vnto the first of his Monarchie, which beganne at the end of the Aegyptian warres; the whole Prophecie of Nahum which went betweene the one and the order, argueth strongly, that there was a longer space of time inter-current. So that to enquire into the very years of this destruction, or other circumstances of the Warre, whether menaged by Nabuchodonofor in person, or by his Lieutenants, were somewhat like vnto the vaine curiofitie of Tyberius Casar, enquiring who was the Mother of Hecuba; or to the like idle paines which he thould take, who would feeke to learne what woman that Huzzab Queen of Winiuie was, who se wofull captiuitie the same Prophet Naum likewise did fore-tell.

δ. X I.

Of the later time of NEBVCHADNEZZAR; his buildings, madnesse, and death.

F the time which this great Monarch Spent in quiet, I thinke there are no monuments extant; faue those which wee finde among the prophecies of Daniel. Among these we may reckon his great workes at Babylon, wherewith he pleased himselfe so well that he brake out into these glorious wordes. Is not this great Babel that I have built for the house of the Kingdome, by the might of my power, and for the honour of my maiestie? Surely if those thinges be true that are by tosephus rehearsed of him out of Berosus and Megasshenes, hee might well delight himselfe with the contemplation of such 20 goodly and magnificent buildings. For it is faid, That he fortified Babylon with a triple wall; that besides other stately workes, he raised those huge arches wherewith were borne vp the high Orchards, hanging as it were in the aire, and equalling the tops of Mountaines; which most sumptuous frame, that out-lasted all the remainder of the Afgrian, and all the Perfian Empire, is faid to have beene reared, and finished in fifteene daies.

But of all this, and other his magnificence, we finde little else recorded, than that (which indeede is most profitable for vs to confider) his ouer-valuing of his owne greatnesse abased him vnto a condition, inferiour to the poorest of men. And not vndeferuedly fell thefe judgements of God vpon him. For whereas God had honoured him, not only with many victories, and much happinesse in his ownelise, 30 but with a discouerie of thinges to come after him, yea and had approved the certaintie of his dreame, by the miraculous reducing of it into his memorie, and interpretation thereof by Daniel the Prophet: hee neverthelesse became so forgetfull of God, whose wonderfull power he had seene and acknowledged, that hee caused a golden Image to be set vp and worshipped: ordaining a cruell death as reward vnto them that should dare to disobey his Kingly will and pleasure, which was vtterly repugnant to the law of him that is the King of Kings. Hercof S. Hierome hath well noted; velox oblinio veritatis, vt qui dudum seruum Dei quasi Deum adorauerat, nunc flatuam sibi sieri tubeat, "et spse quasi Deus in statua adoraretur : I hastic sorget-fulnesse of the truth, that hee who so lately had worshipped (DANIEL) the servant of God, as if hee had beene God himselfe, should now command a Statuato bee crected unto himselfe, wherein himselfe might bee worshipped as God. From this impictieit pleafed God to reclaime him, by the strange and wonderfull deliuerie of those bleffed Saints out of the fierie fornace; who being throwne into it bound, for refuling to commit Idolatrie, were affifted by an Angell; preserved from all harme of the fire; loofened from their bands; and finally called out with gratious wordes, and reftored to their former honour, by the King: who amafed at the miracle, made a decree tending to the honour of God, which by crection of his image he had violated. Yet this denotion of Nabuchadnezzar was not forooted in him, that it could 50 bring forth fruit answerable to his hastic zeale. Therefore was hee forewarned by God in a dreame of the terrible judgement hanging ouer his head, which Daniel expounding, aduited him to breake off his sinne by righteousnesse, and his iniquitie by mercie towards the poore, that there might bee an healing of his error. Hereby it feemes that iniustice and crueltie were the faults, for which hee was threatned, but this threatning sufficed not vnto his reformation. For that so great a Monarch should be driven from among men (according to the tenor of the dreame and interpretation) vea compelled to dwell with the beafts of the field, and made to cate graffe as the Oxen, was a thing fo incredible in mans judgement, that easily it might be thought an idle dreame, and much more eafily be forgotten at the yeares end. One whole veares leifure to repent was given to this haughtie Prince: which respite of the execution may seeme to haue bred in him a forgetfulnesse of Gods sentence. For at the end of twelue moneths, walking in the roiall Palace of Babel, hee was so ouer-ioyed to and transported with a vaine contemplation of his owne seeming happinesse, that without all feare of Gods heaticitudgement pronounced against lam, heevitered those loftic wordes before rehearsed, in vainting of the Maiesticall workes which he had reared, as well befeeming his maiesticall person. But his high speeches were not fully ended, when a voice from heaven, telling him that his Kingdome was departed from him, rehearfed ouer vnto him the sentence againe, which was fulfilled vpon him the very fame houre.

That Sa'omon and many other Princes and great ones, have taken delight in their owne buildings, it cannot any way be doubted; yet I doe not remember that ever I haueread of any, that were punished for rejoyeing in workes of this kinde (though 20 it is hard in ioy, or any passion of the minde to keepe a just measure) excepting only this Nabuchadnezzar.

The like may be faid of David: for other (and some very godly) Kings have mufired all their forces to the very last man; but few or none have been knowne to have been punished as Dauid was. Surely I not only hold it lawfull to rejoyce in those good things, wherwith God hath bleffed vs; but a note of much vnthankfulneffe to entertaine them with a fullen and vnfeeling disposition. Yet as all humane affections, wherein due reference to God is wanting, are no better than obscure cloudes, hindring the influence of that bleffed light, which clarifies the foule of man, and predisposeth it unto the brightnesse of eternall selicitie; so that insolent ioy, which 30 man in the pride of his vaine imagination conceineth of his owne worth, doth abone all other passions blast our mindes, as it were with lightening, and make vs to reflectour thoughts vpon our feeming inherent greatnesse, forgetting the whilest him, to whom wee are indebted for our very being. Wherefore these mala mentis gandia; The enill loyes of the minde, were not vnaptly, by the Prince of Latine Poets, bestowed in the entrance of Hell, and placed further inward than forrowes, cares, and feares; not farre from the yron Cabbins of the Furies. And certainly it is no vnlikely token of vengcance neare at hand, when these vnreasonable slushes of proud pentance and acknowledgement of ill deferuing. 40 This was verified upon Nabuchadnezzar, whose punishment was fingular and vnexampled. For he ranne among beafts in the fields and woods, where for feuen yeares hee liued, not only as a saluage man, but as a saluage beast, for a beast hee thought himselfe fecundum furm imaginationem, as Thomas roteth, and therefore L. i. de Ref. fed himfelfe in the same manner, and with the same foode that beasts doe; Not that git he was changed in figure externall according to Mediana, in so much as he appeared Media 2 decea beaft to other mens eies, as S. Hierome in the life of Hilarius (how true God knowes) Ham Down fide speakes of a woman that appeared to all other mens fight a Cow, but to Hilarius 629.7. only a woman; neither was he changed as Iphigenia the Daughter of Agamemnon was faid to be into a Hinde, nor made a Monster as Dorotheus and Epiphanius drea. and vaine joy, doe rage in a minde, that should have beene humbled with a just re-

Quando dicit (laith S.H I ER O ME) sensum sibi redditum, oftendit non formam for amififfe fed mentem; When he faith that his fenfe waireflored unto him, he sheweth that hee had not lost his humane shape, but his understanding. Seuen years expired, it pleased God to restore Nabuchodonosor, both to his vnderstan-

ding, and his estate, for which hee acknowledged and praised God all the rest of his life, confessing his power and euerlasting being; that he was the Lord of heauen and Date, 1, 31-6. earth, and wrought without relistance what he pleased in both; that his works were all truth, and his waies righteous. Which gave argument to many of the Fathers, and others, not to doubt of his faluation; namely S. Augustine, Theodoret, Lyra, Carthusianus, and others. And for that place of E/ay the fourteenth, out of which his perdition may be gathered, the aforenamed Authors apply the same to Balthasar, because Isay both in the thirteenth and fourteenth Chapter speaketh of the King, and the destruction of Babylon iountly.

Q. XII. of Evilmerodach.

Auing alreadic spoken what I could of the fuccession and yeares of Nabuchadnezzars posteritie; the most that may bee said of him, is said of Euilmerodach, which I will not here againe rehearse.

He lost some part of that which his Father had gotten; and left his Kingdome burning in a warrethat confumed it to alhes. He lost &- gypt by rebellion of the people, in the nineteenth yeare of his raigne, which was for- 20 tie yeares after his Father had conquered it. But this agrees neither with the accompt of Herodetus, who allowes to Amasis four and fortie yeares of raigne; nor with that of Diodorus, who gives him five and fiftie, faying that he died in the third yeare of the three core and third Olympiad, when Camby fes did conquer Egypt. There were indeed but feuen and thirtie yeares, which paffed betweene the fecond yeare of the foureand fiftieth Olympiad (which was the nineteenth of Euilmerodach, and the first of Amasis) and the fift of Cambyses his raigne, wherein hee wanne Ægypt; of which seuen and thirtie yeares it is credibly held, that P samennitus, the fonne of Amasis, raigned three: so that Amasis could be no longer King than source and thirtic yeares. But feeing that these two Greeke Historians have been abused 20 by Agyptian Priests, in the substance of that which was spoken of Amasis, it is no maruale though they were also deceived in the length of his raigne. This is the plaine answere to this objection. For to say either that the numbers were miswritten, and foure and fortie set downe in stead of foure and thirtie, or that Amass did temporise a while with the Asyrians, and not beare himselfe as absolute King of Agypt, wntill the nineteenth of Entherroelach (at which time, and not before, it hath been proued out of Exekvel, that Ægypt became againe a Kingdome) I holdit a fu-

Whether these Agyptian troubles did animate the King of the Medes to deale with Enilmerodach, as with a Prince greater in fame, and reputation, gotten by the 40 decaied valour of his people, than in present forces; or whether (as I rather thinke) fome foile received by the African invading Media, emboldened the Agyptians to rebell against him: I will neither undertake, nor seeke to define. Xenophon tells that the first service of yong Cyrus in warre was under Astrages King of the Medes, his Grand-father, in a prosperous fight against the Asprian Prince, who did set vpon him; at which time Cyrus was fifteen or fixteen yeares old. If therefore Cyrus lined threefcore and three yeares (as he is faid to have died well stricken in yeares) which is held to be the ordinarie terme of no short life, then was this encounter in the third yeare of Eailmerodach his raigne. Yet by the same reckoning it should follow, that the warre beganne more early betweene these Nations, for as much as the manner so of their fight informer times, with other circumflances infinuating as much, are found in the same place of Xenophon. And it may well be, that the death or destruction of Nabuchodono for gaue courage vnto those that had felt him a trouble some Neighbour, to stand vpon prouder termes with the Affrians, than in his flourishing citate they durft have vied. Howfoener the quarrell beganne, weefinde that it ended not before the last ruine of the Asyrian Monarchie. For the Babylonian, being too proude to digest the losses which he received by the Medes and their Allies the Perlians, drew vnto his partie the Lydians, and all the people of the leffer Alia. with gifts and firong perswalions, hoping so to ouer-whelme his Enemies with a frong inualion, whome in vaine hee had fought to wearie out with a linering

This happened after the death of Astrages, who left the World in the ninetcenth yeare of Eudmerodach, at which time Amalis tooke poffelhon of Agypt. So that the Affirian having his handes alreadie full of bufineffe, which more carneftly did affect him, seemes thereby to have given the better meanes onto the * Egyptians, of new erecting their Kingdome, which by long distance of place did fundrie times finde occasion to rebell in after-ages, and set vp a King within it selfe, against the farre more mightie Persian.

The iffue of these great preparations made by Euilmerodach against the Medes, was fuch as opened the way vnto the fulfilling of those prophecies, which were many yeares before vttered against Babel by Esay and Jeremie.

For the Asyrians, and their Confederates, who, trusting in their numbers, thought to haue buried the Medes, and Perfians, vnder their thicke shewers of arrowes and 20 darts, were encountred with an armie of flout and well-trained men, weightily armed for close fight, by whom they were beaten in open battaile, wherein Euilmerodach was flaine. So that great frame of Empire which Nabuchodonofor had raifed and up-held, being shaken and grieuously crackt under his unfortunate Sonne, was left to bee fultained by his vnworthy Nephew: a man more likely to have ouerthrowne it, when it was greatest and strongest, than to repaire it, when it was in way

A private coniecture of the Author ; feruing to make good those thinges, which are cited out of BEROSVS, concerning the Successors of EVILMER O-DACH, without wrong to the truth: the qualitie, and death of BALTHASAR.

Hough I have alreadie (as it seemes to mee) sufficiently proued that Balihafar was the Sonne, and immediate Successor Emilmendach, yet considering earnostly the consectures of those Writers, which following Berofus, insert Nigitar or Nirrgujjorog, and instounce 2009-toeris a famous Queene of Babylon, who greatly adorned and fortified that Citie; I haue thought it not superfluous here in this place to shew, by what meanes it was possible that some errour might have crept into the Historie of those times, and thereby haue brought vs to a needleffe trouble of fearching out the truth, as it were by candle light, in the vncertaine fragments of loft Authors, which we might have found by day light, had we adhered only to the Scriptures. First, therefore I obferue, that the time which Berofus divides betwixt Euilmerodach, and the two next Kings, agrees with the yeares in which Nabuchadnezzar lived wild among brute 50 beafts in the open field : Secondly, that the fuddainenesse of this accident, which came in one houre, could not but worke much perturbation in that state, wherein doubtleffe the honour of fo noble a Prince was highly regarded, his calamitie pittied, and his restitution hoped; the prediction of Daniel finding reputation in that clause which promised his recourrie, as being verified in that which had beene more incredible. Now if we doe in common reason judge, what course was like to be taken by the great ones of the Kingdome, for fetling the government, whileft the King was thus distracted, we shall finde it most likely, that his Sonne and Heire did occupie the roiall Throne, with condition to reftore it vnto his Father, when God should enable him to repossesse it. In this his rule Enilmerodach being to supplie the vtter want of vnderstanding in his Father, as Protectors doe the vnripenesse of it in yong, but reasonable Kings, might easily either commit the insolencies, or fall into the troubles, incident to such an office. That he had in him very small abilitie of gouernment, it appeares by his ill maintaining the Empire, when hee held it in his owne right. That his Sifter Nitocris (if Nitocris were his fifter) was a woman of an high spirit, it appeares by that which Herodotus reports of her, saying that shee was more cunning than Semiramis, as appeared in her magnificent and vietull workes about the River of Euphrates, and her fortification of Babylon against the Medes, who had gotten many Townes from the Afgrians, and among It them Ninine. Wherefore it were not vnreasonable to thinke, that such a woman, seeing how the Empire went to decay through her brothers milgouernment, yfed practifes to get the rule into her owne handes, and afterwards as a Mother, to leave it vinto her vineratious fonne. Other time than this, wherein Nitocris could have raigned, wee doe not finde: but we finde in Berofus (as Iosephus hath cited him) that Niglifar, who got the Kingdom from Euilmerodach, was his fifters hufband; which argues this to have beene the fame woman. As for Labaffardach the sonne of Niglisar, if at the end of sine Monoths raigne he were for his leud conditions flaine by the Nobilitie, as the fame Berofus reporteth, it feemes that God prepared hereby the way for Nabuchadnezzars reflitution (whose terms of punishment was then expired) by raising such troubles as should make him the more defired, both of the Princes and the People. I will not here vie many wordes to confute that which Berofus hath further fet downe of Enilmerodach, telling vs that he was flaine by his fifters hufband: for the plaine words of Scripture naming the yeare wherein he gaue libertie to Iechonia, doe plainely teflife that he out-lived the three or foure and fortieth yeare of his Fathers raigne, which was the last of his life.

This may fuffice to flew, that they who are faid to have fucceeded Enilmero dach in the Kingdome, might indeede haue so done, though not when hee held it in his owne right. Of Balthafar who was his Sonne and Heire, we finde, that he had fuch conditions, as God permitteth to be in a King for the ruine of the people. He was from his yong yeares of a mischieuous nature; having in his Fathers time slaine a Noble yong man that should have married his fifter, only for spight and envie to fee him kill two wild beafts in hunting, at which himfelfe having throwne his Jaueline had miffed them. Another great Lord he had gelded, because a Gentlewoman commending his beautic, faid it were a happie woman that should be his wife. Such 40 barbarous vilanies caused many which had loued his Father (as a good and gratious, though vnfortunate Prince) to reuolt from him vnto the enemie as soone as he was King. Neither doe I finde that he performed any thing worthy of record, but as a Coward and a Foole hee loft all; fitting fill, and not once daring to give battaile to them that daily tooke somewhat from him; Yet carelesly feasting when danger had hemmed him in on euery fide, and when death arrested him by the hands of those whom hee had wronged in his Fathers life. So the end of him was base and miserable; for he died as a foole taken in vnexcusable securitie, yet had not that happinesse (such as it is) of a death free from apprehension of feare, but was terrified with a dreadfull vition, which had shewed his ruine not many houres before, 50 euen whilest he was drinking in that wine, which the swordes of his insulting enemies drew out of him, together with his latest blond. It is therefore in this place enough to fay of him, That after a dishonourable raigne of seuenteene yeares he perifhed like a beaft, and was flaine as he deferued. The reft that concerneth him in question of his time, hath beene spoken heretofore; in matter of his affaires, shall be handled among the acts of Cyru, to whose storie that of Balthasfar is but an apendix.

Of the original and first greatnesse of the Persians.

That the Medes were chiefe actors in the subuersion of the Babylonian Empire.

H E Line of Belachus being now extinguished in Balthafur, the Empire of Balylon, and of Alfyria, wasioyned first to that of Media, which then was gouerned by Cyssares or Darius (Medis), after whom Cyrus became Lord and Monarch, both of Alfyria and of Media it felfs.

Of the race of Phul Belochus there were ten Kings befides himfelfe, and of Arbaces as many are found by Metafikenes. These two Provinciall Gouernours hauing cut downe the last branch of Ninus in Surdanapalus, divided between them the Easterne Empire.

Cyaxares (whom the Scriptures call Darins Medus) the last of the race of Arbaces dying about two yeares after that the Line of Belebhus was ended in Balthafar; the Dominions aftwell of the Conqueror, as of the conquered, fell to a third Familie, namely, to Cyns of the house of Achamenes, the Princes of which bloud raigning in Persia, had formerly been dependents on the Medes, and were of as little power at home, as of same abroad in the World.

Of the Familie of Achemenes, and Line of the Perfian Kings, wee shall hereafter finde occasion in due place to intreat.

The Nation of the Medes descended from Madds the third some of Laphet; that they had Kings some after the sloud, Lattentius and Diodous have bound record; For Lattentius remembreth an ancient King of the Medes called Hydafees, and Diodon speaketh of Pharms with his seuen Sonnes, slaine by the Assyrian in the beginning of their Empire.

But of these who succeeded Arbaes the first, that freed his Nation from the Assirius. I take the list and number from Eusebius, adding Davius Medius: of whome I have spoken in their proper places heretosore; and they are these.

And though the Greekes afcribe the conquest of Babylon to Cyrus alone, yet the Scriptures teach vs that Davius was not only King of Media, and had the Perlians his followers, but that the Armie victorious ouer Balthafar was his; as the Afgvian and Babylonian Empire also was during his ownclife. For wee finde in Daniel that Darius of the Medes tooke the Kingdome being threefore and two yeares old.
And further what Officers it pleafed him to fet ouer the Kingdome. And fo was equivariate it prophected by figs long before: Reheld I will first up the Medes against them, for, that it is a first of the Arthur Leville and the Arthur Leville And by LEREMIE; The Lord bathraifed up the Spirit of the King of the Medes, for his purpole is against Babel to destroy it; and in the eight and twentieth Verse, Prepure against her the Mations, with the King of the Medes, the Dukes thereof, the Princes 20 thereof, and all the Land of his Dominion. These Scriptures Inlins Affricanus doth well open, who taking authoritie from Diodor, Castor, Thallus, and others, delinereth that Babylon was taken before Cyrus beganne to raigne, which also agreeth with Strabe, where he faith. That as the Medes were fubiugated by the Persians, fo before that, both the Babylonians and Albrians were maftered by the Medes. And therefore the reports of Iustine, and Heronoius, are not to be received, who attribute the taking of Babylon to Cyrus alone.

By what meanes the Empire was translated from the Medes to the Persians.

Ow the Kingdome of the Medes fell into the handes of Cyrus, it is a doubt not fufficiently cleared by Historians ; but rather their different relations of his beginnings have bred the former opinion of those who give the conquest of Babel to the Persian only. For some there are who denie that Afrages had any other Successiour than Cyrus bis Grand-child by Mundan. Whereas Ciefius on the contrarie fide affir-40 meth that Cyrus was no way descended from Affysigs, (whom hee calleth Assigns or apana) but only that having vanquished him in battaile, and confined him to Baciria, he married his Daughter Amytis. But I finde the relations of Ctelias often cited and feldome followed, and himfelfe fometimes very justly reproued of willfull vntruth.

Figure a diligent and learned Historian of this age, produceth many probable reasons that Asystes had no such some as Cranares, or Darius Medus; and to confirme his opinion the more, he citeth Diodore, Instine, Strabo, Plato, Ariffolle, Ifeerates, and before them Castor, Thallus, and Phlegon, who doe not finde any fuch Succession. Neither doe Tallanes, Theophilus Antiochenus, Julius Affricanus, 70 C'ernens Alexandrinus, Iuftine Mertyr, Lactantius, Eufebius, S. Hierome, or S. Augufine, make report out of any faithfull Author by them read, that hath given other Sonne or Successiour to Alleages than Cyrus.

Yet feeing that this manner of argument abauthoritate negatine, doth neuer in-force confent; we may bee the bolder (all this great lift of Noble Writers by him alleaged not with standing) to affirme that either Altrages himselfe must have beene Darius of the Medes, which cannot agree with his place in the course of time; Or elfe to giue him fome other Succeffour, according to lofephus, and Menophon, the zondarene. fame whom Daniel calleth Darius. For it is manifelt, and without difforte, that the logant 100 c 13 King of the Medes commanded in chiefe, and was absolute Lord of that Con- Kend, 8, P. ed. quelt, Cyrus during his life being no other than the Lieutenant of his Armica and subject to his authoritie; The strength of both Nations, to wit, the Medes and Persians, with other the Vassalls of Darius, being joyned together to com-10 pound it.

But it is very certaine that the honour of that great victorie ouer Babylon was wholly given to Cyrus, who was the instrument preordained and forenamed by God himselfe, not only for this action, but for the deliuerie of his Church ; a great ter worke in the eies of God, than the subuersion of any State or Monarchie, how powerfull foeuer.

And it may well bee thought, that the Souldiers imployed in that feruice did rather ascribe the glorie to him that was the best man of Warre, than to the Median, who was greatest in riches and power. All which also falling your corns by fuccession, and continuing in his posteritie, did much augment the same of by succession, and communing in an posterior, and much augment the faint of his vertue, which among prophane Historians oner-grew altogether thehonour due to Cyanares, both because hee was old, and did nothing in person; as also because hee soone after quitted the world, and left all to Cyrus, who was possest of whatfoener belonged to Darius, before the fame of any fuch King or Conquerour was carried farresoff.

And for the Greeke Historians, they tooke all thinges from the relations of the Perfixes; who gaue to Cyrus all the praise of a most excellent Prince; making none his equall. Only Daniel in the first, fift, and fixt Chapters of his prophecies, makes it plaine that himfelfe not only lived a great Officer under King Darius but that he continued in that estate to the first of Cyrus, which being the yeare 20 of Daniels death, could not have beene diffinguished from the raigne of Darius if they had begunne together and raigned joyntly; Neither can it bee imagined that Davius held the Kingdome by Cyrus permission, considering that Cyrus beganne after him.

A things. Hele Teltimonies of the Scriptures, which neede no other confirmation, are yet made more open to our understanding, by that which * Achaphan hath written of these warres : The cause whereof, according to his report, was this. When the apprian had inlarged his Empire with victories, and was become Lord of all Spria, and many other Countries; hee beganne to hope that if the Medes could bee brought under his subjection, there should not then bee left any Nation adioyning able to make head against him. For the King of the Medes was able to bring into the field threefcore thousand foote, and about ten thousand horse, to which the forces of Persia being joyned made an exceeding Lords of Affa the leffe to his affiliance, alleaging that those Easterne Nations were very powerfull, and so firmely conioyned by league and many alliances, that it would not be easie, no not possible, for any one Nation to resist them. With these incitements strengthned with great presents, he drew to himselfs so many adherents as he compounded an Armie of two hundred thousand foote, and therefore thousand solve, of which, ten thousand horse, and fortie thousand foote were led by Crassus, who had great cause of enmittie with the Medes, in regard of the Watre made by them against his Father Affastes; But this great Armie was by Cyassus King of the Medes, and by Cyassus generall of the Person forces, veterly broken; Vp-pon which defeat the Assigns King for the Person forces, veterly broken; Vp-pon which defeat the Assigns King for all sols sine, so many of the Assigns are to uoted, as Bulyson it selfect could not longer be affaired without the succours of Merci anties, waged with great summes of money out of Afasthe lesse, & Asyps, and elsewhere. Which new gathered forces were also scattered by Cyassus hoo following his aduantage, possess thin selfect as a sol made prisoner.

The attempt of Babylon following foone after, the Armielying before it being paid by Davius, whom Xenophon calleth Cysavers, and led by Cyrus his fifters fonne, premailed again Babbolic, as in due time shall be fet downe.

Neither can it indeed bee affirmed of any the like writer, that in curry speech and circumstance he hath precifely tied himselfe to the phrase of the speaker, or nature of the occasion, but borrowed in each out of his owne insention, appropriating the same to the times and persons of whom hee treated. Parting therefore apart the Morall and Politique discourse, and examining but the Historie of thinges 3 queen, it will easily appeare that **Zenophon** hath handled his vadee takeh subjection such that by beautifying the face thereof, hee hath not in any fort corrupted the hodie.

à. IIII.

The estate of the Medes and Persians in times fore-going this

Or it is commonly agreed upon, that Achamenes, the sonne of Perfes 40 being Gouernour of Perfes, did associate himselfe with Arbaees, who commanded in Media in that rebellion against Sardampalus, and that each of them after the victoric obtained, held sorbimselfethe Dominion of those Countries which he had formerly ruled for the Aspri-mins as allo that they conveyed ouer the fame honor and power to their polleritie; which in Media was not abfolutely Regall, but with (ome reftraint limited, vntill fuch time as Deieces tooke yoon him the full authoritie and maiefile of a King From the death of Sardampalus to the raigne of Perieses, are witally accompred aboutan hundred and fortie yeares, in the laft fixtie whereof there raigned in Africa mightie Princes, namely Samanaffar and his Succeflours, whole great archiuements in Syria 19 and elfe where witneffe, that the Meder and Persuns found it not for their aduntatege to under-take any offensine warre against those victorious Kings, it being also probable that the league continued as yet betweene these the successions of Belechus, and Arbaces, who had formerly shared the Empire.

Now from the beginning of Deigees to the first of Astrages, there past aboue minette yeares, in which it is redotus have written truely, that Paracres conquered Persia, and how he and other the Kings of Astesia by many victories greatly enlarged their dominions, and commaunded many parts of Asia, it had beene but an vinaduised enterprise of the Astragaman, to have waited themseliues against the Syrians and Expressions, to lead on victorious a Nation on their backes. But that the Astesia had done nothing upon the South parts of Persia, and that the Persians themseliuses were not malters of Sussian in Naturbedones for time, it is manifelt in Daniel, who was then Gouernour for the Badylonian in Susa or Sussian, to the chiefe Cite thereof. It is true indeed, that the Astelians, either under Cyasares or Assiages, or both, had quarrell with Maspater the lather of Cressia, which after fome fix yeares dispute was compounded.

How the affaires of Per/sa Rood in 16 many ages, I doe not find any memorie. It feement that the roughnelle of the mountannous Countrey which they then poffeth, with the confederacie which they continued with the **Medes, gaue them more fecuritie than fame: For if their Kings, being the poffertite of ***Advances, had done any memorable acts, the greatmelle which they afterward obtained would not haue fulfered any forgetfulnelle thereof. But as we find all **Zemphons** reports, both of these Warres and the flate of those Countries to be very conformant and agreeable to the relation of many other good Authors, so it appeares.

that the race of Ashomens held the Principalitie of Perfa from father to some for many descents. And therefore we may better give credit to Xenophon, who affirmeth, That Cambifyet he father of Cyrus was King of Perfa; than to those that make him a meane man, and say, that Assigned gauchim his daughter Assigned with the marriage, to the end that her some (whose naturite he seared) might be disabled from any great undertaking by his fathers ignobilitie.

For what cause of griefe could it be to Assigned, that the sonne of his daughter should become Lord of the best part of Assigned, it was more likely, that vpon such a Prophecie his loue to his grand-child should haue encreased, and his care to beene the greater to haue married her to some Prince of strength and eminent of CYRVS his name and first actions

touching the name of Cyrus, Strabo fayth, That the same was taken from a River which watereth Persia; this great Prince having Agradatus for his proper name. But the great Cyrus was not the first of that name; Herodotus otherwife; and that Cyrus Strablis. fignifieth a father in the Persian Tongue, and therefore so intituled by the people,

It is true that for his Justice and other excellent vertues he was indeed called a Father; but that the name of Cyrus had any fuch fignification, I thinke it be mistaken.

Plutareh hath a third opinion, affirming, That Cyrus is as much to fay as the That in vit; Sunne, in the same Language. How societ it be, yet the Prophet Esay, almost two drax. hundred yeares before Cyrus was borne, gives him that name, Thus faith the Lord unto CYRVS his annointed &c.

Before the Conquest of Babylon, the victories which Cyrus Obtained were many and great: among which, the Conquest of Lydia, and other Proninces thereto subiect, rogether with the taking of Crassus himselfe, are not recounted by Enseites, 20 Orosius, and others, but placed among his later atchieuements, whose opinion for this difference of time is founded upon two reasons; namely, That of the Median there is no mention in that last warre against Crassus: and that the obtaining of Sardis is referred to the eight and fiftieth Olympiad, and the glorious victorie which Crrus had ouer Babylon, to the fine and fiftieth Olympiad.

The former of which might have beene vsed (and was by the Greekes) to exclude the Melles from the honour of having woon Babylon it felfe, which in duc place I haue answered. The later seemes to haue reference to the second Warre which Cyrus made vpon Lydia, when it rebelled; at which time he so established his former Conquest, as after that time these Nations neuer offered to revolt, Wherefore I like better in this particular to beleeue with Herodotus, whome the most of Chronologers follow, and finde the enterprise of Sardis to præcede that

Of CROESES the King of Lydia, who made warre upon CYRVS.

Haue in the last Booke spoken somewhat of Crassius, of his race and predecessors, as also of those Kings which governed Lydia in more uncient times: of which the first (to prophane Authors knowne) as Lydus, the fonne of Atys: Which familie extinguished, the Kingand Lydins, the forme of Atys: Which familie extinguished, the formed dome was by an Oracle conferred upon Argon, defeended from Horacides and the former to (thereto vrged vpon perill of his owne life by the Queene) the next day flaine. Which done, Grees enjoyed both the Queene and the Kingdome of Lydia, and left the fame to Atys his fonne, who was father to Sadyattes, the father of Halyattes throd, l.t. p.3, (who thrust the Cimerians out of Asia) and Halyattes begat Crasius: Which fine 4.55. Kings, of a third race, enjoyed that Kingdome an hundred and feuentic yeares. Halvattes the father of Craclus was an undertaking Prince, and after he had continued a warre against Cyanares the Median, a Prince verie powerfull, and maintained it fix yeares, a peace was concluded upon equal conditions betweene them.

Altyages, the fonne of Cyanares, and grandfather to Cyrus, thought himselfe greatly honoured by obtaining Aryenis, Crassis lifter, whom he married.

But Crafus lo farre enlarged his dominions after his fathers death, as he was nothing inferior in territorie to any King or Monarch of that age: Of which, about that time there were foure in effect of equall strength; to wit, the Median, the Babylonian, the Egyptian, and the Lydian: onely Nabuchodonofor, after he had ioyned Thanicia, Paleflina, and Egypt to his Empire, had thence-forward no competitor during his owne life.

But Crafus, notwithstanding the men and treasure spent in the quarrell of the Babylonisms, he yet mastred Lolis, Doris, and Ionia, Provinces possest by the Greekes in Alia the leffe, adioyning to Lydia; gaue law to the Phrygians, Bithinians, Carians, My Sans, P. phlagonians, and other Nations. And that he also inforst the Ephelians to 10 acknowledge him, notwithstanding they compassed their Citie with Dianaes giratheliasent. dle, tierodotus witneffeth. Moreouer, Athenaus out of Berofus (which also Strabo confirmeth) makes report of a Signall victorie which Crassius obtained against the Saccans, a Nation of the Scythians, in memorie whercof the Babylonians his allies did yearely celebrate a Feaft, which they called Sacea: All which hee performed in

And being now confident in the continuance of his good fortune, and enuious of Cyrus fame, doubting also, that his prosperous vndertakings might in the end grow perillous to himselfe, he consulted with the Oracle of Apollo, whom her prefented with maruellous rich gifts, what fuccesse he might hope for against Cyrus, if he undertooke him: from whom he received this riddle; CR OE SVS passing oner the River Halys, shall dissolve a great dominion. For the divell being doubtfull of the fuccesse, payed him with marchandize of both sides like, and might be inverted either way to the ruine of Perfia, or of his owne Lydia.

à. III. CROESUS his Expedition against CYRVS.

Ereupon Crassis being resoluted to stop the course of Cyrus fortunes, AO if he could, despised all the arguments vsed by Sandanes to the contrarie, who defired him to fore-thinke, That he vrged a Nation inhabiting a barren and mountainous Region, a people not couered with the foft filke of wormes, but with the hard skinnes of beafts;

not fed with such meat as they fancied, but content with what they found; drinkers of water, not of wine: and in a word, a Nation warlike, enduring, valiant and prosperous; ouer whom if he became victorious he could thereby enrich himselfe in nothing but fame, in which he alreadic excelled; and if by them beaten, and fubicated, so great would his losse appeare of all things which the world hath in account, as the same could neither hastily be told, nor readily conceived.

Notwithstanding this solide Councell, Crassus having prepared a powerfull armie, he led the same towards Media, but in his passage he was arrested at Pierium, a Citie of great strength in Cappadocia; which while he fought by all meanes to surprise or to force, Cyrus came on, and found the Lydians encamped before it. That each was inferior to other in strength or opinion, I doe not finde: for out of doubt, Crafus as he excelled any Prince of that age in riches and abilitie; fo was hee not under any in territoric and fame that then liued.

But as Cratippus of Mitylene answered Pompey when he complained against the Gods, because they fauoured a disturber and vsurper of the Commonweale against him who fought for the Romane libertie, That Kingdomes and Commonweales had their encrease and period from divine Ordinance: so at this time was the Winter of Cræsus prosperitie at hand, the leaves of his flourishing fortune readie to fall, and that of Crrus but in the flower and first spring. The God of all power, and not 10 Admetis Herdman, Apollo, had given date to theone, and a beginning of glorie to

When these two Armies were in view of each other, after the entertainement of diuerse skirmishes, the Persians and Lydians beganne to ioyne in grosse troupes: supplies from both Kings thrust on vpon the falling off, and advancement of either Nation: and as the Persians had somewhat the better of the day, so when the darke vaile of night had hidden each armie from the others view, Crassiss doubting what successe the rising Sunne would bring with it, quitted the field to Cyrus, and with all speede possible retyred, and taking the next way into Lydia, recoursed Sardis his first Citie and Regall Scat, without any pursuite made by Cyrus to retard 20 him. Where being arrived, and nothing suspecting Cyrus approach, or any other warre for that Winter, he dismissed the souldiors; and sent the troupes of his sundry Nations to their owne Prouinces, appointing them to reassemble at the end of fiue moneths, acquainting his Commaunders with his intents for the renewing of the warre at the time appointed.

d. IIII. The Conquest of Lydix by CYRVS.

CHAP.3.S.4.

Yavs in the following morning finding the Lydians departed, put his armic in order to purfue them, yet not so hastily, and at their heeles, at be delicouperd. But having good intelligence of Crassis his proceeding, he so measured his Marches, as he prefented not himselfe before Sardis, till such time as Crassis had disposed his armie to their

Wintring garrifons: when being altogether vnlooked for, and vnfeared, he furrounded Sardis with his Armie: Wherein Crafus having no other Companies than his Citizens and ordinarie Gards, after foureteene dayes siege the same was entred by affault, and all executed that refifted. Crafus having now neither armes to fight, nor wings to flye, Sardis being on all parts firongly encompaffed, thruft him felfe into In common the heape and miferable multitude of his validate, and had undergone the common constitution of the following for the common for the common for the common for the following for the fo fortune of common persons vanquished, had not a sonne of his, who had beene better sortingan dumbe all his life (by extremition fraffion and feare enabled) cried out to the foul- Cort. diors to spare Crafus. Who thereupon being taken and imprisoned, despoyled of Memorian meall things but the expectation of death, he was forthwith tied in fetters, and fet on morvois el in the top of a great and high heape of wood, to be confumed to albes thereon. To citamentum which when the fire was fer and kindled, remembring the diffeourle which he had some conhad with the Athenian Law-giver, he thrice cryed out on his name, Solon, Solon,

Solon: and being demanded what he meant by that innocation, be first vsed silence: but vrged againe, he told them, That he now found it true which Solon had long 50 fince told him, That many men in the rate and courses of their lines might well be accounted fortunate, but no man could differ the himselfe for happie indeede,

Of which answere Cyrus being speedily informed, remembring the changes of homine calumifortune and his owne mortalitie, he commaunded his ministers of Iustice to withdraw the fire with all diligence to faue Crafu, and to conduct him to his prefence: Which done, Crm demaunded of him, Who it was that had perfunded him? Of what feller easfon had conducted him to insuade his territoric, and to make him of a firend an enemie? To whom he thus answered, It was thy prosperous and my vn-prosperous delitaic (the Gracian God flattering therewithall my ambition) that were the inneutrers and conductors of Crafu warre against Crms.

Cyrus being pierft with Crassus answere, and bewayling his estate, though victorious ouer it, did not onely spare his life, but entertained him cuer after as a King and his companion, shewing therein a true effect of mercie indeed, Que non causan sed ortunam (bectat.

And herein is the reall difference difference betweene that behauior which wee call Benefeium Intonia, & gruium Principis: A theefe fometime sparing the life of him which is in his power, but vniusly: A King that gineth breath, and a continuance of being, to him that was the cause and author of his owne cuill.

The report made by Xenoplon is, That Cyrus did friendly entertaine Crassia at the first light, not mentioning that which Haroslant deliuers, and is here alreadic fet downe, that hee should have been burnt aliue. It may well bee, that Xenoplon pourtraying (in Cyrus) an heroicall Prince, thought an intent so cruell fitter to be torgotten than telearded, as too much misbefeeming agenerous nature. And it is very likely, that neereness fee falliance might with hold Cyrus (had he been either with vitions) from so cruell a purpose against his grandmothers brother. Howsocurit was, the Morall part of the Storie hath giuen credit and reputation to thereport of time later, as to many the like it often doth) and made it passe for currant, though the trust reposed in cressianterwards may seem to argue, that Cyrus did not yellatin inhumanely at the first.

For as: Hordeius himselfe telleth vs, when Cyrus past with his armie ouer Araxes into Sey. Int., he lest Creijus to accompanie and adulfe his sonne Cambyles, Gouernour of the Empire in his absence, with whom he liued all the time of Cyrus, and did afterward follow Cambyles into Ægipt, where he hardly escaped his tyrannous hand. What his end was I doe not finde.

But in this time the races of three of the greatest Kings in that part of the world tooke end; to wit, of the Babylonians, Medians, and Lydrans; in Balthafar, Cynnares,

How CYRVS woon Babylon.

Fter this Lydian warre enflued the great Conquest of Babylon, which as gaue wnto Cyrus an Empire. So large and mightie; that he was justly reputed the greatest Monarch then liuning wone arth. Howlong time the preparations for this great action took eyp, it is yntertaine; onely it seemes, that tenne whole yeares did passe betweene his taking those two Citres of Sardes and Budylan, which neuerthelessed doe not thinke to have beene wholly occupied in prouisson for the Assignment of the properties of the properties of the properties of a war made by certain the strength and be referred that which be that darked the purchased. And hereinto perhaps may be referred that which be that hathin his fragments of a war made by Cyrus you the sephians, though related as foregoing the victoric obtained against Carasia. He telleth us, That Crus invaded Seythin, and beling victorious over that yo Nation tooke Amorges their King prisoner: but being in a second battaile overthrowne by the wife of Amorges, Sparetha, and therein taken, the one King was deligered for the other.

Likewise it may be thought, that no small part of those troubles which arose in the lower Afia, grew foone after the departure of the victorious armie, before the Conquest was fully established.

For after Cyrus was returned out of Afta the lefte, many Nations, conquered formerly by Crafus, and now by Cyrus, reupted from him; againft whom he imployed Patista, and then thangas, who in it reduced the Phasius wider their former obedience: and then the reft of the Greeks inhabiting Afta the lefte, as the immus, Carians, Abelium, and Lycians, who refoluedly (according to the fitrength they had) defended themselues. But in the attempt you Bushjan it felfe it is not to be doubted, that Cyrus employed all his forces, having taken order before-hand, that nothing though the did fet all his reft. And great reason there was, that he should be nall this care and frength with other taking of that Citic, which belied the fame and reputation that it held, a being head of an Empire thereon depending, was so strongly fenced with a treble value of great height, and furrounded with waters var-foordable, so plentifully victualled for many yeares, that the inhabitants were not onely free from all doubt and feare of their citate, but desired and derided all purposes and power of their beigents.

The onely hope of the 246,655 and Perfans, who despaired of carrying by affault a Citie 6 well fortified and manned, was in cutting off all supplies of victuals and o-20 ther necessariates; whereof though the Towne was faid to be flored sufficiently for more than twentie years, yet might it well be deemed, that in such a world of peoples a dwelt within those gates, one great want or other would soner appeare, and vanquish the resolution of that vinwalike multitude. In expecting the successed this course, the bessegers were likely to endure much trauaile, and all in vaine; if they did not keep straight wach and strong eards you all quarters.

This was hard to doe, in regard of the valt circuit of those wals which they were to gird in, with numbers neither great enough, nor of men sufficiently assured where their Commander: The consideration whereof ministed vinto the Maylonians matter of good passime, when they saw the Lydians, Phrygians, Cappadocians, and o-Manylogan-

30 thers, quartered about their Towne to keepe them in, who having beene their ped.htm; anneient friends and allies, were more likely to loyne with them, if occasion were offered, than to vie much diligence on the behalfe of Gprus, who had, as it were, yefterday laid vpon their neckes the galling yoake of feruitnde. Whileft the belieged were pleafing themfelues in this deceitful gladneffe, that is the ordinarie fore-runner of fiddigine calamities; Gprus, whom the Ordinance of God made firong, conflant, and innentiue, deculied by fo many channels and trenches as were fufficient and capable of Euphrates, to draw the fame from the wals of Eufylus, thereby to make his approach the more facile and affured: which when by the labour of many hands hee had performed; hee flayed the time of his abuntage for the execution; for hee had left certaine banks or heads your, betweene the maine riner which furrounded the Citie, and his owne

Now Balds fire, finding noisher any want or weakeneff: within, nor any pofibilitie of approach for his enemies without, prepared an exceeding funptions feaft, publike Playes, and other Palitines, and thereto innited a thousand of his Princes or Nobilitie, be delect his wines, currizans, and others of that trade. This he did either to let the beliegers know, that his promitions were fufficient, not onely for all needfull vies, but even for jolitic and excesse: Orbecause he hoped that his enemies, under the burthen of many distress were well neere broken, or in honour of 50 Bel his most freezeneed 1801: Or that it was his birth or coronation day: Or for many or all these respects. And he was not contented with such magnificence as no Prince else could equall, but (vsing Daniels words) belisted binselfe op against the Lord of Hauen: For he and his Princes, wines and concubines, made carowing cuppes of the Vessels of God, in contempt of whom he praysed his owne puppers, (fayth S. Huerome) drinking in golden Cuppes, to praise Gods of Wood and Stone. While Balthafar was in this fort triumphing, and his braines well filled with vapors, he beheld a hand, which by divine power wrote on the wall opposite vnto him certaine words which he understood not: wherewith so great a feare and amazement feized him, as the joynes of his loynes were loofed, and his knees fmote one against the other. Which passion when he had in some part recoursed, he cryed out for his Chaldeans, Afrologians, and Southfayers, promiting them great rewards, and the third place of honour in the Kingdome to him that could reade and expound the writing; but it exceeded their art. In this diffurbance and aftonifhment the Queene hearing what had palt, and of the Kings amalement, after reuerence done vied this speech: There is a man in thy Kingdome in whom is the flirit of the holy Gods, and in the dayes of thy father, light, and understanding and wildome, like the wildome of the Gods. was found in him, whom the King NABVCHODONOSOR thy father, the King (1 fay) thy father made chiefe of the Inchanters, Altrologians, Chaldeans, and Southfavers, because a more excellent fririt and knowledge and understanding eye, were found in him, even in DANIEL &c. Now let DANIEL be called, and he will declare the interpretation.

This Queene, to/ephus takes for the grandmother; Origen and Theodoret for the in Dan. logoph mother of Balthafar; either of which may be true: for it appeareth, that thee was 20 not any of the Kings wives, because absent from the feast; and being past the age of dauncing and banquetting, the came in vpon the bruit of the miracle, and to comfort the King in his distraction; and whereas Daniel was forgotten and neglected by others of younger yeares and times, this old Queene remembred well what he had done in the dayes of Nabuchodonofor, grandfather to this Balthafar, and kept in mind both his religion and diuine gifts.

When Daniel was brought to the Kings presence, who acknowledged those excellent graces wherewith God had enriched him he prayed him together with promiles of reward and honour, to reade and interprete those wordes miraculously written to whom Daniel made answere in a farre different fiyle from that he yield towards his grandfather: for the cuill which he foretold Nabuchodonofor, he wished that the same might befall his enemies, but to this King (whose neglect of God and vice he hated) he answered in these wordes, Keepe thy rewards to thy selfe, and give thy gifts to another, yet will I reade the writing wato the King, and shew him the interpretation: Which before he had performed, he gaue him first the cause of Gods just judgement against him, and the reason of this terrible sentence; whereof the King and all his Wifemen were vtterly ignorant: Which being written at large in Daniel, hath this effect, That forgetting Gods goodnesse to his father, whom all Nations feared 19,20. and obeyed, and that for his pride and neglect of those benefits, as he deprined him of his effate and understanding; so upon the acknowledgement of Gods infinite 40 power he restored him to both. This King notwithstanding lifted himselfe up against the same God, and presumed both to abuse those vessels, dedicated to holy vies, and neglecting the Lord of all power, prayled and worshipped the dead Idols of Gold, Siluer, Braffe, Iron, Stone, and Wood: and therefore those wordes, from the Oracle of a true God delinered, (to wit) Mene Tekel, Vybraisin, gaue the King knowledge, that God had numbred the time of his Kingdome, and finished it: That he was weighed in the ballance of Gods justice, and found too light; and that his Empire was divided and given to the Medes and Persians.

The very cuening or night of this day, wherein Balthafar feafted and perifhed, Cyrus cither by his espiall, according to Xenophon, or inspired by God himselse, 50 whose ensigne he followed in this warre, found the time and opportunitie to inuite him: and therefore while the Kings head, and the heads of his Nobilitie were no leffe filled with the vapours of wine, than their hearts were with the feare of Gods judgement, he caused all the bankes and heads of his trenches to be opened and cut downe with that diligence, as by them he drew the great River of Eurbrates drie for the present, by whose emptie channell, his armie made their entrance, finding none to disturbe them. All the Towne lay buried (as the Poet fayth) in sleepe and wine: fuch as came in the Persians way were put to the sword, valesse they faued themselves by flight, as some did, who ranne away crying, and filling the arceteswith an vncertaine tumult.

the partie of Cyrus, did now conduct a felected companie to the Kings Pallace: which having easily forced, they rushed into the chamber where the King with his Princes were banquetting, flew both him and them without any mercie, who ftruggled in vaine to keepe those liues which God had newly threatened to take away. And now was the prophecie of Ieremie fulfilled, and that of Esay two hundred yeres before this subuction, who in his three & fortieth Chapter and elsewhere writeth E/a. c.47. this destruction so feelingly and lively as if he had beene present both at the terrible flaughter committed, and had feene the great and vnfeared change and calamitie of this great Empire; yea, and had also heard the forrowes and bewaylings of

in these words: Come downe and sit in the dust, O virgine daughter of Babel: sit on the ground, there is no throne, &c. And againe, Sit still and get thee into darkenesse, O daugh-20 ter of the Chaldeans, for thou shalt no more be called the Ladie of Kingdomes, For though it cannot be doubted, that God vsed Nabuchodono for and the Chaldaans, to punish the idolatric of the Indaans, yet E/ay teacheth vs in this place, That he did not yet forget that the execution of his judgements was mixt with a rigorous extremitie. For (layth: E/ay) in the person of God, I was wroth with my people. I have polluted mine in-heritance, and given them into thine hand: thou diddes show them no mercie, but thou diddest lay thy very heavie youke upon the ancient. I will rise up against them, sayth the Isina. Lord of Hostes, and will cut off from Babel the name and the remnant, and the sonne and Town Fullthe nephery. And in the thirteenth, Every one that is found finall be firicken through; and meredach and

So as there is no Historian who was either present at this victoric of Cyrus, or that received the report from others truly as it was, that could better leave the same to posteritie after it happened, than Elay hath done in manie places of his prophecies, which were written two hundred yeares before any thing attempted.

The greatnesse and magnificence of Babylon, were it not by divers grave Authors fet downe, might feeme altogether fabulous: for belides the reports of Saint Hierome, Solinus, and Orollus, Aristotle in the third of his Politikes, the second Chapter, received the report for true. That one part of the Citie knew not that the rest was taken three dayes after. Which is not impossible, if the testimonie of Diodorus Siculus may be taken; who findes the compaffe thereof at three hundred Diod, La. and threefcore Stadia or Furlongs, which makes five and fortie miles: the walls whereof had so great a breadth, as fixe chariots might passe in front thereon. And of height, according to Ctesias and Clitracus, three hundred threescore and fine foot, garnished with an hundred and fiftie Towers. Strabe in the beginning of his fixteenth Booke of Geographie gives it a greater circuit, adding five and twentie furlongs more to the former compasse, reckoning the same at three hundred fourescore and fine furlongs, which makes eight and fortie myle and one furlong: but findes the wall farre under that which Diodor reports: And so doth Curtius measure their thicknesse but at two and thirtie foot, and their height at an hun-50 dred cubites; which is also very much: euerie cubite containing a foot and halfe of the large measure, though to the whole circuit of the Citie he gives the same with Siculus, and eight furlongs more. Herodotus findes a greater content than Strabo doth, namely, foure hundred and fourescore furlongs in circle; the thick-

nesse of the wall he measures at fiftie cubites, and the height at two hundred of the same regall cubit. For entrance it had an hundred gates of Brasse, with posts and hookes to hang them on of the same mettall : and therefore did the Prophet Efay rightly intitle Babylon The Princesse and glorie of Kingdomes.

But when Cyrus had woon her, he ftript her out of her princely Robes, and made her a flaue, dividing not onely all her goodly houses, and her whole Territorie, with all the riches therein contained, among his fouldiors: but bestowing the inhabitants themselues as bondslaues upon those that had taken possession of

Touching the raigne of Cyrus, and the time which he enjoyed in rest and plea- 10 fore, I can fay no more of it, than that it is generally agreed by all Chronologers to have lafted onely feuen yeares: in which time he made fuch Conflitutions as differ little from the Ordinances of all wife Kings, that are defirous to establish a royall power in themselues and their posteritie.

δ. V I. The end of CYRVS.

He last warre, and the end of this great King Cyrus, is diversly written. Herodotus and Infline deliver, That after the Conquest of Affathe lesse Cyrus inuaded the Mallagetes, a very warlike Nation of the Seythians, gouerned by Tomyris their Queene: and that in an incounter betweene the Perlians and these Northerne Nomades, Tomyris lost her Armie, and her Sonne Spergapifes, that commaunded it: In reuenge whereof, this Queene making new leuies of men of warre, and following the warre against Cyrus, in a fecond battaile beat the Persian armie, and taking Cyrus prisoner, cut off his head from his bodic, and cast the same into a bole of bloud, vling these wordes: Thou that hall all thylife time thir fled for bloud, now drinke thy fill, and fati- 20

It should hereby seeme, that Cyrus knowing the strength and multitude of those frozen Nations, was perfuaded to abate their furie by some forcible invalion and depopulation, because in the time of Cyaxares, father to Astrages, those Scythians innaded Ne in and Afia the leffe, and held the fame in a fernile fubication eight and

This warre which Metasthenes calleth Tomprique, lasted (fayth he) fixe yeares, and tooke end at the death of Cyrus.

But in this particular I beleeue with Viginer, that this Scythian warre was rather the fame which Cyrus made against the Sacians, before the Conquest of Lydia, ac- 40 cording to Ctefins before cited, who calleth Tomyris, Sparetha, though he deliver the Viz prim. part. fuccesse of that warre otherwise than Herodotus doth: The rather (sayth Viginer) because Strabo in his eleuenth booke reciteth, That Cyrus surprised the Sacians by the same stratageme by which Iustine sayth he defeated the sonne of Tomyris. And the same Ctelias also reporteth, That the last warre which Cyrus made was against Amorrhaus, King of the Derbicians, a Nation (as the rost) of Scythia; whome though he ouercame, yet he then received the wound of his death, which he fuffe-

> Strabo allo affirmeth, That he was buried in his owne Citie of Pafagardes, which himselfe had built, and where his Epitaph was to bee read in his time; which is 50 said to have beene this: O vir quicunque es & undecunque advenis, neque enim te adventurum ignoraui: Ego sum CYRVS qui Persis imperium constitui, pusillum hoc terra quo meum tegitur corpus mihi ne innideas ; O thou man, who foeuer thou art, or whence foeuer thou commest: for I was not ignorant that thou shouldest come: I am CYRVS that founded the Persian Empire, doe not enuie unto me this little earth, with which my bodie is

This Tombe was opened by Alexander, as Qu. Curtius reporteth, either vpon Q curt. L. hope of treasure, supposed to have beene buried with him, or vpon delire to honour his dead bodie with certaine ceremonies; in which there was found an olde rotten Target, two Scythian Bowes, and a Sword. The Coffin wherein his bodie lay, Alexander caused to be concred with his ownegarment, and a Crowne of sold to be set vpon it. These things well considered, as they give credit to the reports of 10 Xenophon and Zonaras, fo they derogate much from Herodotus, who leaves his bodic Xon. ped 8.

And furely, had Cyrus loft the Armie of Perfia in Scythia, it is not likely, that his sonne would so soone have transported all his remaining forces into Segret. fo farre off from that quarter: the Seythian Nation then victorious, and bordering Media; neither had Cambyfes beene able in such hast to have undertaken and performed fo great a Conquest. Wherefore I rather believe xenophon, saying, That Crus died aged and in peace : and that finding in himfelfe, that hee could not long enjoy the world, hee called vnto him his Nobilitie, with his two fonnes, Cambifes and Smerdis; or after Xenophon, Tanaoxares: and after a long Oracion, wherein he affured himfelfe, and taught others, of the immortalitie of the Soule, and of the punishments and rewards following the good and ill deseruing of euerie man in this life; he exhorted his fonnes by the strongest arguments he had to a perpetuall concord and agreement. Many other things hee vttered, which make it probable, that he received the knowledge of the true God from Daniel, when he gouerned Sula in Perlia; and that Cyrus himselfe had read the prophecie of Elar, wherein he was expressely named, and by God (for the deliuerie of his people) præordained. Which act of deliuering the Iemes from their Captilitie, and of restoring the holy Temple and Citie of Hierusalem, was in true consideration the noblest worke that euer Cyrus performed. For in other actions he was an 30 instrument of Gods power, vsed for the chastifing of many Nations, and the establilling of a Gouernment in those parts of the world, which was not long to continue. But herein he had the graceto be an instrument of Gods goodnesse, and a willing aduancer of his Kingdome vpon earth; which must last for euer, though heauen and earth shall perish.

of CYRVS his Decree for building the Temple of God in Ierusalem.

Auing therefore spoken of his great victories, mentioned by fundry Historians, the glorie of all which was as a reward of this his feruice done vnto him that was Author of them and of all goodnesse: I hold it meete at length to speake of the Decree made in the first of his Raigne, being perhaps the first that euer hee made, after his possession of the Babylonian Empire: That the captine Ienes should return again into their owne Territorie, and re-build the House of God in Ierusalem, having now endured and finished the threescore and tenne yeares captinitie, by the Pro-50 phets foretold. For the accomplishing whereof, he gaue order to his Treasurers to furnish them with all things necessarie and wanting. He also restored vnto them five thousand foure hundred threescore and nine Vessels of Gold and Siluer, whereof Nabuchodonofor, the grandfather of Balthafar, had formerly robbed the Temple.

The number of the Jewes, which returned out of Chalden under their leader Zorobabel, the fonne of Salathiel, and nephew to King Jeconius, and Jefus or Jofua the fonne of Ioladak, were about fiftie thousand: where as soone as they arrived, they built an Altar to the liuing God, and facrificed thereon, according to their owne 1.Ed.3.3.Ed. Law, and afterward bethought themselves how to prepare materials for the rebuilding of the Temple. But no fooner did the Jewes begin to lav any one from than the Samaritanes and other idolatrous Nations adioyning gaue all the impediment they could. So did the Gouernours of those Provinces vnder Cyrus altogether countenance the disturbers, and in no fort favoured the leves, nor the labours and purposes they had in 10

Effect, va6- hand. And not onely those which were but Provinciall Lieutenants and other officers of leffe place, but Cambyfes himfelfe; who having the charge of the whole Empire, while Cirus was buffed otherwife, countermaunded the building begun. And whereas some Authors make doubt, that what socuer Camby ses did when himfelie had obtained the Empire, yet during the life of Cyrus there was no fuch impediment or prohibition: They may berein refolue themselves out of Eldras. That Eft. 1.1.5.2.33, by the conspiracies of the neighbouring Nations the building was hindered all the

And if wee feeke the naturall and politique causes which moued Cambyles to withfland his fathers decree, as well while he gouerned under him, as when himfelfe became fole and foueraigne Monarch, we shall finde them in that Epistle remembred by Eldras, written by Belemus, Mithridates, and the reft, Presidents and Councellors in Phanicia, wherein they complaine, that the Iewes were cuermore rebelious and troublers of Kingssthat their Citie being once built, they would then result to pay tribute, and fall from the obedience of the Empire, as they had formerly done in the times of other Kings,

But that which for that prefent feemed the most forcible impediment was, that 20 Cambyfee having it in his refolution to invade Agypt, and that it was a common opinion. That the Jenes were descended of those Nations, because they issued thence vnder Mafes, when they conquered India; their Citie being once repaired and fortified, they might returne to their old vomit, and give the same disturbance to Cambyfes Conquest, which they did to Senacherib, Nabuchodonosor, and other Kings of Babylon. For as it is written in Ezekiel, Agypt was the confidence of the house of I s-

But it is to be understood, as Codoman and others have observed, that Artaxerxes, to whom the Councellors & Gouernors of Phanicia complained against the Iewes, did not pracede, but fucceed Darius Hyflaspes, as in the fixt and seventh chapters of 40 Elder it is made plaine; and also that those Governors (whose Epistle sheweth as much) did not withstand the building of the Temple, but the fortifying and inclofing of the Citie, as by the reasons given in the said Epistle, and by the Kings an-

Also in the fixt of Exra, the foureteenth verse, the Kings are named in order as they governed, and Artaxerxes written after Darius; as: And they built and finished it (to wie the Temple) by the appointment of the God of Ifrael, and by the commandement of CYRVS and DARIVS, and ARTAHSHASTE King of Perlia. Laftly, in the feuenteenth of Ezra it is written; Now after these things, in the raigne of ARTAH-SHASTE King of Persia: which was as much to say as after the finishing of the to Temple in Darius time. And therefore Artaxernes in the fecond of Efdras is there named by anticipation not in his owne time and place.

And thus much concerning the rebuilding of the Citie and Temple of Hierufalem. Which action, though prospered by the hand of God, was very flowly pursued by the men whom it most concerned, but first set on foot by Cyrus. The other ordinances of Cyrus, with his forme and manner of gouernment, are to be found in Xenophon. At his death he bequeathed the Empire vnto his eldest sonne Cambyles, appointing Smerdis or Tanaoxares his younger sonne to be Satrapa or Licutenant of Media, Armenia, and Cadufia, and then died, after he had raigned (fayth Herodotus) one and thirtie yeares, or (according to Infine) but thirtie.

CHAP.2. S.8.

Y R v s had iffue two fonnes, Camby fes and Smerdis, with three daughters. Atoffa, Meroe, and Artyftona; Ctefias addeth to thefe, Amytis. Atoffa and Merse their brother Cambyfes married; Atofffand, Davius Hyflafpes obtained; fo did he Atoffa, Cambyfes being dead: who (as fome Writers haue supposed) inflamed both her husband Davius, and

Xerxes after him, to inuade Greece, to be auenged of the whole Nation for the cruell 20 intent that Aman (whom the old translation calleth a Macedonian) had against the Iewes, though the opinion of Iosephus be more probable, who findes Aman to be an Amalekite. But it is hard to be vinderstood, how Atolia, the daughter of Cyrus should have beene Esther; whose Historic seemes rather to appertaine to the time of Artaxerxes Longimanus, than of Darius the sonne of Hystaspes, or of Xerxes. The defire of Atoffa to have Greece brought vinder the yoake of Persia, was partly grounded voon the honour which thereby shee thought her husband might obtaine, partly vpon a feminine humor of getting many braue Dames, Corynthians, Athenia and others of that Nation to be her bond-women: Wherefore I cannot give affent to the opinion of Codoman, who vpon the neere found of the two names. 30 Atoffa and Hadaffa (by the later of which Efther was also called) makes them to haue beene one person. For though it be true, that Esther concealing her parentage a while, might be taken for a great Ladie; yet Codemans inference is nothing probable, that the should therefore, and for the great affection which the King bare vnto her, be thought the daughter of Cyrus. Certaine it is, that Esther did at length discouer her Kindred and Nation; whereby if Histories could not be kept free from this error, yet the people, and especially the Nobilitie, must needs have understood the truth: who neverthelessed do well know the parentage of Atoffa, that for her fake, as being daughter of Cyrus, her sonne Xerxes was preferred to the Kingdome before his elder brother, against whom also he could haue pretended a verie weake clayme. But of these things more hereafter in fitter place.

To which Philo agreeth; which number of yeares added make in all an hundred ninctic and one. But in this Catalogue Metasthenes hath left out Cambyses and Merxes, and names Artaxerxes Affuerus for the immediate successor of Cyrus in place (fayth Melansthon) of Darius the sonne of Hystaspes: for Metasthenes, as Melanethon conicctureth, doth not account Cambyfes in the Catalogue, because his 20 raigne was confounded with that of Cyrus.

There is a second opinion, though ridiculous, of seder Olam, who finds but source

Persian Kings from the beginning to the end of that Empire.

Genebrard, Schubert, and Beroaldus have also a differing account from the Greekes; whom neuerthelesse Eusebius and most of the Latines follow. And so doth Krentzheim, who hath fully answered, and as I take it, refuted all the former Authors varying from that account: For in this fort doe the Greekes marshall the Persian Kings with the times of their raignes.

This account (as I have faid) the most Chronologers and the best learned approue. These Persian Princes being all warranted by the authoritie of the Scriptures, as Pencer in his historical! Animaduersions hath gathered the places; finding

Secondly, Cambyles in the 11th of Daniel who may indeed be well effected for one of those three Kings in the second verse named and so the marginal Commentor vpon the Geneua vinderstands that place; but, under correction, mistakes the matter greatly, when he faith in the fame note, that Darius Hillaftes was an enemie to the people of God, and stood against them: his great fauour and liberalitie to the Jewes being elsewhere proued.

first Cyrus in the second of Chronicles, chap. 36. ver/. 22, 23. Efra I. chap. I. ver/. I. and Thirdly, is Darius Histafpes found in Ezra the first, c.4.v. v. who in the fixth verse In is also named Abassucrus.

Fourthly, in the eleventh of Daniel verse the second, Nerves is plainely foretold and described, and the great warre which hee should make against the Greekes by Daniel remembred.

Fiftly, Artaxerxes Longimanus in Ezrathe fourth, verse seuen, who is also called Arthalasta, c. 4. I.lib. Ezrav. 7. and cap. 7. v. 7.

Sixtly, Darius Nothus, Ezra cap. 4. verf. 24. & cap. 5. verf. 6. Nehem. cab. 12.

Seventhly, Artaxerxes Mnemon in Nehe, c. 2. v. 1. who was father to Artaxerxes Ochus, and Arlames for Darius the last he was of another Familie, the Line of Cyrus the Great ending in Ochus, who descended from Nerves the sonne of Atossa, Cyrus his Daughter; and the iffue male of Cyrus failing with his owne Sonnes.

But to proceede. Eulebius with the Latines, following the Greekes, apply the beginnings and ends of every Persian King with their Acts, to some certaine Olympiad; As the war of Allyages (Cyrus his maternall Grand-father) and Alyattes (Craelus his Father) to the nine and fortieth Olympiad; The beginning of Cyrus raigne to the nis rather; forms the and forecast Dympiad; in the explaining of Cypus raighe to the beginning of the fine and fittieth Olympiad; The tasking of Sands by Cypus to the eight and fiftieth Olympiad; The inuation of Agypt by Cambyles to the third yeare of the threefcore and third Olympiad, and to of the reft. Which reference with good agreement betweene feuerall formes of computation adde the more cereating of the computation and the three control of the computation and the more cereating of the computation and the control of the computation and the control of the computation and the control of the control of the computation and the control of the control of the computation and the control of the control of the computation and the control of the cont 20 dit vnto both.

Againe, this historicall demonstration is confirmed by the Astronomicall com- Ptol. in Almag. putation of Ptolomie, who refers the death of Alexander the Great, who died the 12. lib.3. cap.8. of Nouember, in the beginning of the hundred and fortieth Olympiad, to the foure hundred and foure and twentith yeare after Nabonassar. And the Fra of Nabonassar beganne on the fixe and twentieth of Februarie : which conferred with the Olympiad, was in the ninth Moneth of the first yeare of the eighth Olympiad; So that whether we follow the accompt of the Olympiads, as doe the Greeke Historians, or that of Nabonassar with Ptolomie, we shall finde every memorable accident to fall out right with each computation.

For Ptolomie reckons the time answerable to two hundred and foure and twentie Iulian yeares, and an hundred and fortie daies from Nabonassar, to the sixteenth of Iulie in the feuenth yeare of Cambyles.

The Greekes, and namely Diodorus Siculus, place the taking of Agypt by Cambyles in the second or third years of the threescore and third Olympiad, and the beginning of Cambyles feuenth years in the first of the threescore and fourth Olyntpiad: which first of the threescore and fourth Olympiad runnes along with part of the two and twentieth of Nabonassar. The like agreement is consequently found about the beginning and end of Cyrus.

Likewife the twentieth of Darius, who fucceeded Camby fes, is according to Ptoloone the two hundred and fixe and fortieth of Nahonaffar, which (observing the differences of Nabonassars . Era and the Olympiad, viz. eight and twentie yeares) it agrees with the third of the threescore and ninth Olympiad, wherein it is placed by the Greekes. In this Josephus agrees with the Greekes throughout, fauing that he joyneth Darius Medus, whom Xenophon calleth Cyanares, with Cyrus, in the destruction of Babylon, which is true, and not contrarie to the Greeke computation, but may very well stand with it.

Lastly, the disagreements and confused accompts of those that follow the other Catalogue of the Persian Kings formerly rehearled, doth give the greater credit to this of the Greekes, which being constant in it selfe, accordeth also with the computation of other Historians, and Astronomers, and likewise with the holy Scriptures.

Of CAMBYSES, and the conquering of Agypt by him.

E will therefore according to the truth giue the Empire of Perlia to Cambyfes, the sonne of Cyrus, though degenerate in all thinges, sauing the delire to increase the greatnesse of his Empire : whereof hee was posses in his Fathers time while Cyrus made warre in the North. Ctehas with others give him a longer raigne than agreeth with the Gracian accompt before received.

In the fifth yeare of his fole raigne, and in the third yeare of the threefcore and third Olympiad, according to Diodor and Eusebius, he invaded £gypt, and having 20 ouerthrowne the King thereof, Pfammenitus, he not only caused him to bee slaine, Herda, pages, but also did put to death all his kindred and dependants, with the most of his Herodotus and Gtesias give for cause of this Warre (being no other indeede than the Ambition of Camby (es) that when he fent to Amalis King of Egypt, to have his daughter in marriage, Amasis presented him with Nitetis the daughter of Apries his predecessour, which Camby les disdained.

Howfoeuer it were; true it is, that Camby fes gathered an Armie fit for fuch an enterprise, and caused the same to march. But before they entred Levet, Amalis died and left Pfammenitus, whom Ctessas calleth Amyrtaus, his successiour; who in- 30 ioyed Agypt after his father (according to the best copies of Herodotus) but sixe Moneths, though other Chronologers give him fixe yeares.

But how long foeuer he held the Crowne, in one battaile he lost it, and was himfelfe taken prifoner.

It is faid that Camby les following therein the example of Cyrus, did not only spare *Neither did life to the conquered King, but that hee also trusted him with the gouernement of Leypt, and that upon some revolt, or the suspition thereof, hee caused him to bee flaughtered. But the race of this King was not fo extirpated, if wee may belieue Herodotus and Thurydides, but that he left a Sonne called Inarus, who caused the Agyptian to reuolt both from Xerxes and Artaxarxes.

That Pfammenitus was at the first entreated gently by Cambyses, I hold it very improbable, if it be true which is also written of him, That he so much hated amalis the King of Agypt, who died before his arrivall, that hee caused his body to bee drawne out of the graue, and after divers indignities vsed, commanded the same to Tailouis, or like bee burnt, contrarie to the custome both of the Egyptians and Persians. For the for like, be-cause himselse Egyptians vsed to powder their dead bodies with falt, and other drugges, to the had vittombed end the wormes might not deuoure them. The *Persians durst not consume the carkaffe of them with fire, which they effected as a God, and therefore feared to feede it Cains Maries with Carrion.

The relt of CAMBYSES his acts.

Fter this victorie obtained in Egypt, Cambyfes fent an Armie into Cyprus, and constrained Enelthon King thereof to acknowledge him, who before held that Iland of the Egyptians.

While Cambyfes yet bulied himfelfe in £gypt, he fo much detefted the Idolatric of that Nation, as he caused the Images themselves, with to the Temples wherein they were worthipped, to bee torne downe and defaced. That done, he directed a part of his Armie into Lybia, to ouer-turne the Temple of Juniter Ammon; but the Deuill in defence of his Oratorie raifed fuch a tempel of Steel, et al. Sand, wherewith the greatest part of that Countrey is coursed, as the Persians were 1.1.

Notwithstanding which misaducnture, Herodotus and Seneca report, that disday- Her. 13. Sen. 14. ning to be relisted, he prepared the rest of his Armie, which himselfe meant to conduct into those parts, but that finding a beginning of those incommodities, which his first-fent troupe had tried, hee changed his purpose. For though conquering Kings have power oner men, yet the Elements doe not obay them, according to 20 that old English proucibe, Goe faith the King, stay faith the Tide.

After his returne from the attempt of Athiopia, hee caused Apis the Agyptian Bull, worshipped by that Nation as God, to be flaine: a deed very commendable, had it proceeded from true zeale, and beene executed as in seruice of him that only is , and liueth. But soone afterwards, when in a dreame it seemed vnto him that Smerdis did fit in the royall Throne of Persia (which apparition was verified in Smerdis the Magus) hee gaue it in charge to his fauourite Praxaspes, to murther Smerdis his brother. And having married his owne fifters, contrarie to the Persians Lawes, hee committed a most causelesse and most detestable murder upon the one of them, called Meroe, then by himfelfe with child, because shee bewailed the death

30 of her brother Smerdis. I finde it written of this Camby fes, That because his Prede- Her. Mar 80, 20. ceffors observed religiously the ordinances of their Empire, he assembled his Judges and enquired of them, whether there were any law among the Persians that did permit the brother to marrie his owne fifter: it being his owne intent fo to doe; The Iudges ( who had alwaies either lawes or distinctions in store to satisfie Kings and times) made answere, that there was not any thing written allowing any such conjunction, but they not with standing found it in their customes, that it was alwaies left to the will of the Persian Kings to doe what best pleased themselves; and fo, as Nauclerus termes it, inuenerunt occasionem: That is as much to fay, as the Iudges found a shift to please the King, and to secure themselues. And yet, where it con-40 cerned not the Kings private fatisfaction, he caused Sisamnus one of his Judges, and perchance one of those which fauoured his incestious match, to bee flaied a-line for an vniust judgement given, and the same his hide to bee hung vp over the judgement feate. After which bestowing the fathers Office on his sonne, he willed him to remember, that the same partialitic deserved the same punishment.

Among other his cruelties, that which he exercised against the some of his beloued Praxalpes was very strange and vngratefull. For when he desired to bee truely informed by him what the Perfians thought of his conditions, Praxafpes answered, That his vertues were followed with abundant praise from all men; only it was by many observed that hee tooke more than vsuall delight in the tast of Wine. With 50 which taxation inflamed, hee yled this replication: And are the Perfians double tongued, who also tell me that I have in all thinges excelled my Father Cyrus? thou Praxaspes that then witnesse, whether in this report they have done meeright: for if at the first shot I pierce thy sonnes heart with an arrow, then is it salse that hath beene spoken; but if I misse the marke, I am then pleased that the same be accounted true, and my subjects beleeved. This being spoken, he directed an arrow towards the innocent child, who falling dead with the stroke, Cambriles commanded his bodie to be opened, and his heart being broched on the arrow, this monfirous T yrant greatly rejoycing, shewed it to the Father with this faying, in stead of an Epitaph: Now PRAXASPES thou maiest resolue thy selfe that I have not lost my wits with Wine, but the Persians theirs, who make such report.

Many other barbarous cruelties hee exercifed, till at the laft, according to the phrase of our Law, he became selon de soy. For when he was informed that Patizites, and Smerdis the Magi, (Cedrenus writeth them Sphendanes and Cimerdius) Ministers of his domesticall affaires, taking advantage of the great resemblance betweene Smerdisthe Kings brother, and Smerdisthe Magus, poffet them selves of the Empire, hee made all haft towards Perfia, and in mounting haftily on horfe-backe, his fword dif-theathing pierced his owne thigh, where-with deadly wounded, falling into an ouer-late and remedileffe repentance of the flaughter which hee had executed voon his owne brother, he foone after gaue vp his wicked ghoft, when hee had raigned eight yeares, accounting therein those seuen Moneths in which the Magi gouerned, while he was abfent.

In Cambyfes the Male line of Cyrus fuled. For he had no iffue either by Atoffa or Zonaras com, Alivoe : yet Zonaras out of Hierome giues him a Daughter called Pantaptes, and a fonne called Orentes, who being drowned in the River Ophites by Antioch, the fame 10 was afterward in memorie of the Princes death called Orontes.

He built the Citie of Babylon in Agypt, in the place where Latopolis was formerly feated, and that of Meroe in the Hand of Nilus, calling it by the name of his fifter

YRVS and his two fonnes being now dead, and the Kingdome in the possession of one of the Migi, the counterfait of Smerdis, the Princes, or Satrapes, or Provincial Governours of the Empire (to Davin, who were all descended from Achamenes the first Person King, having discovered the fraud of this imposture, joyned their forces together, surprifed and rooted out the Conspirator with his Companions, and affistants. In which action (faith Iustine) Interhernes and Afphalines were flaine; but Herodotus otherwife, that they were only wounded, for he auoweth, that all the feuen Princes were 40 present at the election following.

For the Empire being now without a Gouernour, these Princes grew into confultation how the fame might be ordered from thence-forth. Otanes one of the fetien did not fancie any election of Kings, but that the Nobilitie and Cities should confederate, and by inft lawes defend their libertie in equalitic, giving divers reasons for his opinion, being as it seemed greatly terrified by the cruelties of Cambyses; As first, that it was not safe to give all power to any one, seeing greatnesse it selfe, euen in good men, doth often infect the minde with many vices, and the libertie and freedome in all things is most apt to infult, & to commit all manner of wicked outrage. Againe, that tyrants do commonly vie the feruices of wicked men, and fauour to them most, they vsurpe vpon the lawes of their Countrey; take other mens wines by force, and destroy whom they please without judgement.

Aegabyzus was of another opinion, affirming that the tyrannic of a multitude was thrice more intolerable, than that of one. For the multitude doe all thinges without without judgment runne into businesse and affaires with precipitation, like raging and ouer-bearing flouds.

He therefore thought it safest to make election of a few, and those of the best, wifest, and most vertuous; because it is euer found that excellent Counsailes are euer had from excellent men.

Darius gave the third judgement, who perswaded the creation of a King, because euen among few diuturnitie of concord is seldome found, and in great Empires it doth euer happen that the discord of many Rulers hath inforst the election of one Supreme. It were therefore, faith Darius, farre fafer to observe the Lawes of our Countrie, by which Kingly gouernement bath beene ordained.

The other foure Princes adhered to Darius, and agreed to continue the same Imperiall gouernement by God established, and made prosperous. And to avoide partialitie, it was accorded, that the morning following these seven Princes should mount on Horse-back, and on him the Kingdome should be conferred, whose horse after the Sunne-rifing should first ney or bray. to be fent into Persia, others say to be imprisoned, from whence by the death of Cyrus he was delivered, and made Governour of the Persian Magi. He afterward followed Cambyles into Egypt; he then joyned with the rest of the Princes against the Magi, and either by the neying of his horse, or, as others affirme, by strong hand he * Her. 163 237. ARIVS deuised equall lawes whereby all his subjects might beegouerned, the same being formerly promised by Cyrus. He gaue accesse to all his fubicets, and behaued him felfe fo mildly to all men that many Nations delired and offered themselues to become his Vassalls. But finding the same a difficult worke, he yled the service of Zopirus, who for the loue he bare Darius, did cut off his owne Eares and Nofe, and with other wounds yet fresh bleeding, he seemed to flie to the Babylonians for succour, to whom he accused the crueltie of Darius: who, for having given him advice to give over the fiege of their Citie, had in this fort difmembred and deformed him; whereupon the Babylonians gaue him that credit as they trusted him with the disposition and commandement of their greatest forces: which when Zopirus had obtained, after some small colourable ouer-throwes given to the Perfians vpon fallies, hee delivered the Citie into Darius his handes, who had lyen before it twentie Moneths.

Of DARIVS his favour to the lewes in building the Temple.

N the fecond yeare of Darius, hee gaue order that the building of the Temple at Hierusalem should goe on, and commanded that the same should be finished at his owne charge, and out of the reuennues of the Crowne. And whereas the Gouernours of those Provinces which are 50 fituate betweene Euphrates, and the Phanician, and midland Sea,

(whom Ezra calleth the Captaines beyond the Riuer) had hindred the worke in Camby fes his time, Darius gaue commandement that they should not thence-forth come neare ynto Ierusalem, to give any impediment to the building, but that they should with-draw themselves, and get them farre off till all were finished and at an end. In the old Latine it is written, procul recedite ab illis; With-draw your selues farre from them: In our English. Be vee farre from thence, to wit from the Citic, and Temple, now in building.

Hee also made a decree, which concerned his owne Subjects. That who some rearests. should thence forth hinder the setting up of the Temple of God, that his house should be torne downe, and the disturber hanged on a Gallowes made of the Timber thereof. He also in the same decree maketh innocation to God, That hath caused his name to dwell there, (to) destroy all Kings and People that put to their hands to alter, and to destroy this house of God which is in Ierusalem, &c. In foure yeares after which decree (the Jewes being really furnished with money and all thinges necessarie from Darius) the Temple was in all finished, to wit, in the beginning of the Spring, in the fixth years of Darius Hyltalpes, and in the two and fortieth after their first returne. of DARIVS his Southian Warre.

Fter the recoucie of Babylon hee inuaded the Soythians, whose King Ber.I.4. Instine calleth Lauthinus; and faith, that Darius under-tooke this warre 14st, Lin against him, because hee refused him his Daughter in marriage. The better to conuoy his Armie into Seythia, hee built a Bridge of small Vessells ouer the River Ister or Danubius, and gave the custodie of the fame in charge (among others of Afia the leffe) to the Ionians and Aolians, among whom was Miltiades, who perswaded the Asian Gracians to breake downe the bridge, to the end Darius might not returne thereby, and if by any other way, then not without great difficultie; but the same was relisted by Histiaus Prince of Milet, a Citie of Jonia, which Nation being a Colonie of the Greekes, Diodorus calleth Traitors to their Countrie, because they loyned themselves to Darius. But the Seythians Diedlist.

20 more elegantly termed them good flaues, for as much as they would not runne away from their Mafter, but were more mindfull of doing their duties, than of shaking off their bondage, when they were presented with as faire an occasion of libertie as could have beene defired. For the great Armie of Darius entring the defart Countrie called Beffarabia, found in it neither people to relift them, nor any fustenance to relieue them. For the Scythians were then, as are the Chrim Tartars, their posteritie, at this day, all horse men, vsing the Bow and Sword. They were not Plough-men, but Grafiers, driving their Heards from one place to another as opportunitie of pasture led them. Standing Townes they had none, but vsed for Houses the Waggons wherein they carried their wives and children. These Wag-40 gons they place at every Station in very good order, making Streets and Lanes in the manner of a great Towne, removeable at their pleasures. Neither hath the Em-perour himselfe, called now the great Chrim, any other Citie than such an Agora, (as they name it) or Towne of Carts. When as therefore Darius had wearied himscife, and wasted his prouision in those desolate Regions, wherein he found neither waies to direct him, victualls to refresh him, nor any houses, fruitfull trees, or living creatures, nor any thing at all, which either hee himselfe might make vse of, or by destroying it might grieue his enemies; he beganne to perceive his owne folly, and the danger into which it had brought him. Yet fetting a good face vpon a badde game, he fent braue meffages to the Soythian, bidding him to cease his flight, and eiso ther to make triall of his valour and fortune in plaine battaile, Or if he acknowledged himselfe the weaker, then to yeeld by faire meanes, and become his Subject, gi-

uing him Earth and Water, which the Persians vsed to demand as a signe that all was yeelded vnto them. To this challenge the Soythian returned an Hieroglyphicall answere; sending a Bird, a Frog, a Mouse, and fine Arrowes: which dumb shew

The first occasion of the Warre which DARIVS made upon Greece, with a rehearfall of the government in Athens, whence the - quarrell grew.

Ow the better to understand the reason and moriues of that great Warre, which followed foone after, betweene the Perlians and Greecians, it is necessarie to make a short repetition of the state of Athens, which Citie indured the hardest and worst brunt of Darius inuasion on that fide the Sea with admirable successe. Neither doe I hold it any importinencie, to be large in vnfolding every circumftance of fo great a bufineffe, as gaue fire to those warres, which neuer could be throughly quenched, vntill in the ruine of this great Persian Monarchie, Persepolis the capitall Citie of the Empire, was at the request of an Athenian Harlot consumed with a flame, as dreadfull as in the pride of their greatnesse, the Persians had raised in Athens,

Now therefore as out of the former bookes it may be gathered, how Athens, and other parts of Greece, were anciently gouerned, the same being alreadie set downe. though scatteringly, and in severall times, among other the Contemporarie occurrents of the Easterne Emperors, and the Kings of Indea; so I thought it very pertinent in this place to remember agains the two last changes in the State of Athens. As for the Lacedamonians they maintained fill their ancient policie under Kings, though these also after some fifteene descents bridled by the Ephori.

Codrus King of the Athenians in the former bookes remembred, who willingly died for the fafetie of his people, was therefore so honoured by them, as (thinking none worthie to succeede him) they changed their former government from Mo-30 narchicall to Princes for terme of life, of which Medon the sonne of Codrus was the first, after whom they were called Medontida; and of these there were twelve Ge-

wherein those creatures line, and his weapons withall into his handes. But Gobryas. one of the fourn Princes who had flaine the Maei, construed their meaning a-right. which was thus; O yee Persians, get yee wings like Birds, or dive under the water, or creepe into holes in the earth, for elfe yee shall not escape our arrowes. And this interpretation was foone verified by the Seythians themselves, who affailed the Persian camp, draue the horse-men into the trenches, and vexing the Armie with continuall Alarums day and night, were so fearelesse of this great Monarch, and so little regarded him, that within his hearing, and even in his fight, they did not forbeare the passime of coursing a Hare, which they had started by chance. By this boldnesse of theirs Darius was so discouraged that he for sooke his Camp by night, making many fires, and leauing all that were ficke and weake behinde him, and so with all speede marched away towards the River Ister. Hee was purfued hardly by the Seythians, who mist him, yet arriving at the Bridge before him, perswaded the Ionians to depart, affuring them that the Perlian King should never more be able to doe them either good or harme. Which wordes had certainely beene proved true had not Hrflians the Milesian prevailed with his people, to attend the comming of Daring. whom the Seythians did likewise faile to meete, when they returned from Mer to fecke him out.

Some actions of the Persians in Europe, after the Soythian

ARIVS having thus escaped out of Soythia, determined the invasion of Thrace and Macedon, in which Warre hee imployed Megabasus, who mastered the Parnians, and transplanted them, and possest Perinthus, Chalcedon, Bizantium, and other places, being allo soone after subjected, and added to the Persian Empire by Otanes, the sonne of 30

Sysamnes whom cambyses had excoriated for fulfe indgement. So were the Cities of Selybria and a Cardia likewise taken in for the Persian, who having now reduced under his obeyfance the best part of Thrace, did send his Embassadours to Amintas King of Macedon adioyning, demanding of him by the Earth and Water, the Souca Cardia, a citie raignetic ouer that Kingdome. Amintas doubting his owne ftrength, entertained voon the chort the Embaffadours with gentle wordes, and afterward inuiting them to a folemne and magnificent feast, the Persians greatly defired that the Macedonian Ladies might bee present: which being granted, the Embassadours who were well filled with wine, and prefumed upon their greatnesse, and many victories, beganne to vse such imbracings, and other lascinious behauiour towards those Noble Ladies, as Alexan- 40 der the Kings Sonne, great Grand-father to Alexander the Great, diffaining the Persians barbarous presumption, befought his father to with-draw himselfe from the affembly, continuing notwithstanding all honourable respect towards the Embaffadours, whom withall hee entreated that the Ladies might refresh themselues for a while; promifing their speedie returne. This being obtained, Alexander caufed the like number of well-fauoured yong-men to clothe themselues in the same garments, and to vie the same attires which the Ladies had worne at the feast, giving them in charge, That when the Persians offered to abuse them, they should forthwith transpierce them with their long kniues, of which they were prouided for that purpose, which was accordingly performed. Charge was soone after given by Darius for a feuere reuenge of this murder. But Alexander, somewhat before the death of Amintas, gaue his fifter Gygea in marriage to Bubaris, a principall Commander of Darius forces on that fide, who perswading her husband how helpfull the Alliance of Macedon would proue for the invalion of Attica intended, so prevailed, as Alexan-

Megacles. Solon, and others, who are the leffe to bee regarded, by reason of the

This Solon being a man of excellent wifedome, gaue lawes to the Athenians, which were published according to Gellius, in the three and thirtieth yeare of Tarquinius Priscus, and were in after-ages derived vnto the Romanes, and by the Decem viri (Magistrates in Rome created for that purpose) reduced into twelue Ta- 20 bles, which were the ground of the Romane lawes. But these goodly ordinances of Solon, were in his owne daies violated, and for a while almost quite extinguished. For whereas they were framed vnto the practife and maintenance of a popular gonernement; the effate of Athens was very foone changed into a Monarchie by Pififratus the sonne of Hippocrates: who finding the Citizens distracted into two factions whereof Megacles and Lycurgus two Citizens of noble Families were become the heads, tooke occasion by their contention and insolencie to raise a third faction more powerfull than the other two, and more plaulible, for that he feemed a Protector of the Citizens in generall. Having by this meanes obtained love and credit, he wounded him felfe, and faining that by malice of his enemies he had like to have 20 beene flaine for his loue to the good Citizens, he procured a guard for his defence, and with that band of men surprising the State-house, or Cittadell of Athens, hee made himselfe Lord of the Towne; Hegesistratus being then Gouernour. But the Citizens who in every change of gouernement had fought to remove themselves further and further from the forme of a Monarchie, could fo ill brooke this vfurpation of Piliftratus, that he was driven for lack of helpe to flie the Towne, as soone as Megailes and Lycurgus ioyning their forces attempted his expulsion. Yet as the building of his tyrannie founded upon the diffention of the Citizens, was ruined by their good agreement; fo was it foone after well reedified by the new breaking out of the old factions. For when Megacles found the power of Lyourgus to grow 40 greater than his owne, he did (as is the viuall practife of the weaker fide) call in the common enemie Pifistratus, to whom he gaue his Daughter in marriage; by which alliance the Familie of the Alemsonida, whereof Megaeles was chiefe, became very powerfull, yet so that Pifistratus by their power was made Master both of them and all the reft. But this agreement held not long; the Alemaonida, and especially Megaeles being incenfed against Pifistratus for his misdemeanour towards his Wife. Wherefore they practifed with the Souldiers of the Towne, proceeding in their treason so secretly, and so sarre, that Pissiratus upon the first discouerie of their intent, perceived no other remedie for his affaires than to with-draw himselfe to Eretria, where hee remained cleuen yeares. Which time being expired, having hired Souldiers out of many parts of Greece, hee againe recourred the principalitie of Athens: after which third obtaining his effate, hee governed Athens feventeene yeares, according to Ariffolle, and raigned in all thirtie and three yeares, faith Elianus, but as Instine hath it four and thirtie, accounting the time belike as well before as after his feuerall expulsions. Herodotus gives the Father and the Sonne Her. 16. fixe and thirtie yeares; Aristotie fine and thirtie. But Thuesdides affirmeth, that Thuesdides.10 hee died very old, leauing for his Successours his two Sonnes Hippias and Hippar. chus, who gouerned the Athenians with fuch moderation, as they rather feemed the Lineall fuccessours of a naturall Prince than of a Tyrant. But in the end, and fome three yeares before Hippias was expelled out of Athens, his brother Hipparchus was murdered by Harmodius and Aristogiton. The cause why, and the manner how performed, Thueidides hath written at large. And though Hipparchus were charged with vnnaturall lust after Harmodius, yet Plato in his Dialogue, intituled 10 Hipparchus, doth greatly magnific him, affirming that hee was a Prince of as many eminent vertues as that Age had any, altogether condemning the murderers and authors of that scandall. Hippias fearing that this enterprise upon his brother had more and deeper rootes than were apparent, first sought to discouer the further intents of Harmodius and Aristogiton, by a Harlot of theirs called Lemnia: who because shee would not reueale her Companions, did cut out her owne tongue. Then did Hippias, the better to strengthen himselfe, enter into a strait amitie with Antides, Tyrant of the Citie Lampfacus, whom hee knew to bee Lampfacus acigreatly favoured by Darius, to whose Sonne Hipoclus hee gaue one of his Daugh- tie of Missia vpters in marriage. But some three yeares after the death of his brother, doubting pen the Helle-20 I know not what strong practise against himselfe, hee beganne to viethe Citizens Her.l.s. with great seueritie, which neither Pifistrains the Father, nor Hippins himselfe had Thuridisan cuer exercised during their vsurpations till this time. And therefore the Athenians fearing leaft that this difeafe might rather increase, than diminish in Hippias, they flirred vp Clistines one of the noblest and best able of their Citie, to practife their deliuerie: who calling to his affistance the banished Alemanida, together with an Armie of the Lacedamonians, ledde by Cleomenes their King, to affrighted Hippias, as by composition hee gaue ouer his estate, and the possession of Athens, and from thence imbarking himselfe tooke land at * Sigeum, whence hee went to Lampfacus * Sigeum a proin Mysia gouerned by £antides, who presented him to Darius. Hee was deprimenence of oued of his estate, as Herodotus and Thucidides agree, twentic yeares before policy to the left trades.

Thus farre I have digreffed from Darius, to the end the Reader may conceiue the better the causes and motiues of this warre: whereof the hope that Hippias had to bee restored to Athens by the helpe of Darius, which made him solicite and perswade the Persians to conquer Greece, was one; but not the most

The Colonies transported out of Greece in Alia, which occupied the greatest part of the Sea-coast, hauing enioyed their libertie about fine hundred yeares, euen from the Ionick migration, to the time of Crafus, were by this Lydian King made Tributaries, and afterwards, as parcell of his Dominions, were taken in by

Cyrus, and left as hereditarie Scruants to the Crowne of Perfia. But as it is the cultome of all Nations halfe conquered (witnesse heland) to rebellagaine vpon enery aduantage and opportunitie: fo did the Jonians, and other Greeians, both in Cyrus his life, and after him, feeke by all meanes possible to free then felues.

At this time they found fuch men readic to spurre them into Rebellion, as had by the Persian been egiuen vnto them for bridles, to hold them in subjection. Euery one of those Townes had a Lord to rule it, whom they (abhorring the gouernment of one man) called their Tyrants. These Lords were very true to the Persian, by whose only might they held the people in subjection. And this their dutifull af- 10 fection they had well declared, when, Darius being in great extremitie, they vsed all meanes to deliuer him and his Armie (that otherwise had beene lost) out of the Southing hand. Of this great peece of feruice lifthen the Tyrant of Myletus expe-Etec the chiefe thankes, as having beene chiefe Author of their expecting Darius, when the real, either perswaded by the Seythians, or carried away with their owne delires, were readicto hauc abandoned him. But it came fo to passe that Darius being more fearefull of the harme that Hiflians (being powerfull and craftie) might doe to him in the future, than mindfuil of the good which he had alreadie received at his hand, found meanes to carrie him a-long to Sufa, where hee detayned him with all kinde viage of a friend, yet kept fuch good espiall vpon bim, as an enemic, 20 hee could not flart away. Hifteen had fubtilitie enough to discouer the Kings purpose, which ill agreed with his owne desires. For he thought it more pleasant, and more honourable to rule as Prince in one faire Citie, haung a small T critoric, than to fit and feaft at the great Kings table, and heare the counfailes by which a large Empire was menaged; being himfelfe an idle beholder, and enioying with much restraint of libertie, none other pleasures than a private man might bestow vpon

Wherefore he bethought himfeife of railing of fome tumults in the lower Afia, to pacific which if he might be fent, as one that had great experience and authoritie in those quarters, it would afterwards be in his power to flay at home, and either 20 farisfig the King with excuses, or deale as occasion shall require. Resoluing vpon this course, he sent very secret instructions to Aristagoras his kinsman, whom he had lest his Deputie at Mileten, admiting him to stirre vp some Rebellion. These dire-Etions came feafonably to Ariflagoria, who having failed in an enterprife vpon the like of Acros, through the falle dealing of a Perfian his Affociate, flood in leare of diffgrace, if not of fome further ill that might befall him, as one that had wasted the Kings treasures to no good purpose. Therefore he readily embraced the counfaile: and the better to draw the whole Countrie of Ionia into the same course, which he determined to runne, hee abandoned his tyrannie, and did fet Atiletus at libertie. This plaufible beginning wanne 40 vnto him the hearts of the Milesians: and his proceeding with other Ionian Tyrants (of whom some he tooke and sold as slanes to their citizens, others he chased away) caused the whole Nation to bee at his command. The Persian fleet, whereof hee lately had beene Admirall in the enterprise of Maxos, hee had surprised in his first breaking out, together with the principall Officers, and Captaines, fo that now he thought himselfe able to deale with the great Kings forces, lying thereabout, either by Land or Sea. But likely it was that the power of all Asa would shortly be vpon his neck, and crush both him and his assistants to peeces, vnlesse that he were able to raifean Armie that might hold the field, which the tonians alone were infufficient to performe. Therefore he tooke a journey to Sparta, where having affaied in vaine 50 with many arguments, and the offer of fiftie talents, to win to his partie Cleomenes King of the Lacedamonians : hee went from thence to Athens, and with better fucceffe belought the people to lend him their affiftance. The Athenian Embaffadors which had beene fent to the Persian Kings Lieutenants in the lower Asia, desiring them not to give countenance to itiphias, now a banished man, and lately their Tyrant, were a while before this returned with ill answeres, having found verie churlift entertainement. So that the cuill which they were to expect in all likely hood from the Perfun, made them willing to begin with him. To which purpose, their confanguinitie with the Ionians, and the perfualions of Ariflagoras, drew them on apace, if perhaps his treasure were not helping. Twentie shippes the Athenians furnished for this voyage; to which the Eretrians added fine more in regard of ancient kindnesse that had passed betweene the Ionians and them. With these and their owne forces joyned, the Ionians entred the River Caiffrus, which falleth into to the Sea by Ephefus: by which advantage they furprifed Sardis when no enemie was heard of or suspected; infomuch, as Artaphernes, who ruled as Vice-roy in those parts, had no other hope of fafetie, than by retreating him felfe into the Caftle; which the Gregians could not force: from whence he beheld the flaughter of the Citizens. and the Citie flaming.

The Persians at length, mixt with the Purgers, began to encourage them to defence, and recovered the Market place, strengthened by the Riner Pactolus, which ranne through it, and borrowing courage from desperation, they both desended themselves, and charged their enemies; who well adulting themselves, made all the half they could toward the Sea fide . But Artaphernes having gathered all the ac firength he could, purfued the Greeians, and found them necre Epinelius; where letting resoluedly vpon them, he slaughtered a great part of their Armie; the reit faning themselves in Ephefus. In this fight Enalcides, Captaine of the Eretrians, perished; but his fame and memorie was by that excellent Poet Simonides preserved. After this ouerthrow, the Athenians, which were fent to Ariflagoras and to the Iowhats, could by no arguments of theirs, no, not by their teares, be perfuaded to make any second triall of their fortunes, on that side the Sea.

Yet the burning of Sardis made a greater noyfe in the world, than the good fucceffe which the Persians had in one or two skirmilhes, could rayle. Wherefore the Ionians brauely proceeding, woon a great part of Caria; and fending their Fleet into 30 the Hellefpent, got Bizantium and other Townes into their hands . Yea, the Cyprians, lately subdued by Cambyses, began hereupon to take heart; and entring into confederacie with the Ionians, who were able to give them aid by fea, rebelled against the Persians.

These newes comming to the care of Darius, filled him with great indignation, and with an extreame hatred of the Athenians, vpon whome hee vowed to take sharpe reuenge. As for the Ionians, his contempt of them, and their knowledge of his power, made him to thinke, that they would not have dared to attempt fuch things, but by the instigation of those, to whom their ignorance of his great might had affoorded the courage to prouoke him. This was the maine ground of the 40 Warre commenced by Darius, and purfued by Nerves against Athens: To which, the folicitation of Hipping, before remembred, gaue onely fome forme and affiffance:

the businesse, when once it was thus farre on foot, being like ynough to have proceeded, though he had perished ere it were advanced any further.

Some other occurrents in this Ionian commotion extended the quarrell of Darius against many of the Handers, if not against the whole Nation of the Greekes; for all of them gaue to his Rebels free harbour: the Handers moreouer did helpe to furnish out a Nauic of three hundred and fixtie sayle against him. These prouocations did rather breede in him a defire to abate their pride, than any feare of harme that they were like to doe him. For what they had done at Sardis, was but 50 by furprise In eueric fight they were beaten by the Persians, who had not yet lost the fruits of their discipline, wherein Cyrus had trained them, nor all their auncient Captaines. In one sea-fight by the Isle of Cyprus, the Ionians indeed had the voper hand; but they were Phanicians, Agyptians, and Cilicians, whom they vanquished: neither was that victorie of any vie to them; the Cyprians, in whose aid they came, being vtterly beaten by the Perlian Armie at Land, and reduced into their old fubjection. So had the Persians likewise by open warre and faire force ouerthrowne the Carians in two battailes, and reclaimed that Nation; as also they had recovered the Townes vpon Hellespont, with some Lolian and Jonian Cities: when Avillagoras with his friends quitting Miletus, fled into Thrace, desirous to feat himselfe in Amphipolis, a Colonie of the Athenians. But the Edonians, on whose Territorie belike hee landed, ouerthrew him, and cut his troupes in pieces.

About the same time, Histiaus the first mouer of this insurrection came downe into those quarters; who having vndertaken the performance of great matters to Darius, was glad to flye from his Lieutenants, by whome his double-dealing was 10

But this cuasion preserved him not long. For after many vaine attempts that he made, he was taken in fight by the Persians, and hastily beheaded, least the King fhould pardon him upon remembrance of old good turnes; as it feemes that hee would have done, by the buriall which he commaunded to be given to his dead bodie that was crucified and by his heavie taking of his death.

Hilliam had fought to put himselfe into Miletus; but the Citizens doubting his condition, chose rather to keepe him out, and make shift for themselues, without his helpe. The strength of their Citie by land, which had in old time withstood the Lydian Kings, and their good Fleet which promifed vnto them the libertic of 20 an open sea, emboldened them to trie the vttermost, when very few friends were left vpon that Continent to take their part. But their Nauie was broken as much by threatnings as by force; many of their companions and fellow-rebels forfaking them vpon hope of pardon; and many being daunted with the causelesse flight of those that should have affisted them. Neither was it long before the Towne it selfe being affaulted both by Land and Sea, was taken by force, the Citizens flaine, their wives and children made flaves, and their goods a bootie to the Persians, whome for fixe yeares space they had put to so much trouble.

The Warre which DARIVS made upon Greece, with the battaile of MARATHON and DARIVS his death.

His warre with good successe finished by the Persians, and some attempts made on Europe fide with variable fuccesse: Darius obstinate in the enterprise and conquest of Greece (though at first he pretended to make the warre but against the Athenians and Eritraans, who jointly his embaffadours demaund an acknowledgement from them all : among whome, fome of them not so well resolued as the rest, submitted themselues; as the Aginets and others. Against these, the Athenians being inflamed (by the affistance of the tween Thefisia Lacedemonians ) after divers encounters forft them to give pledges, and to relinquish I do not know; the partie of the Perfians. Cleomenes led the Lacedemonians in this warre, and caused but those bo: his companion-King Demantus to be deposed : who thereupon fled to Darius, farre derers. & next the more confident of victorie, by reason of these discords, alienations, and civile warres among the Greekes. He therefore gaue order to Hippagor as to prepare a Fleet of shippes fit to transport his Armic ouer the Hellespont: the same consisting of an mie he committed to Datis, accompanied and affished by Hippias, the sonne of Pistfiratus, expelled out of Athens twentie yeares before, and by Ataphernes his brother, um, not farre Gouernour of Sardis, and the Sea-coast of Asia the lesse. These Commaunders ha-hundred Gallies and other Veffels; and first of all attempted the Islands called Crclades, which lay in the mid-way betweene Alia the leffe, and Greece. For (obtaining those places) the Persians had then nothing to hinder the transportation of their forces over the Erean Sea; but on the contrarie they might alwayes both relieue themselves in their passage, and shrowd themselves from all suddaine tempests and

To this end they first possess themselves of Samos, secondly they attempted Nawas: Which Island the inhabitants despairing of their owne forces, abandoned. So did the people of Delos, of which Apollo was native: Which Island Darius did not to onely forbeare to facke, but recalling the inhabitants, he gaue order to beautifie the places and Altars of Sacrifice, to Apollo erected. And having recovered these and other Islands, the Persians directed their course for Eretria in Eubera; for that Citie 10 Hered. (as alreadie bath beene fliewed) had affifted the Ionians at the taking and firing of Sardis. In this Island the Persians tooke ground, and besieged Eretria veriestraitly, and after fixe dayes affault, partly by force, and in part by the treason of Euphabus and Philagius, they tooke it, fackt it, and burnt it to the ground. Thus farre the winds of prosperous fortune filled their sayles. From Eubas the Persians past their Armie into Attica, conducted and guided by Hippias, late Prince of Athens, and marching towards it, they encamped at Marathon, in the way from the Sea, where 20 they landed, towards Athens.

The Athenians finding the time arrived, wherein they were to dispute with their owne vertue against Fortune, and to cast lots for their libertic, for their wines, their children, and their lives, put themselves in the best order they could to make resiflance, and withall fent away with speed to the Lacedamonians for succour, imploying in that Negotiation one Phidippides; who passing through Arcadia, encountred in the way a familiar Diuell, which he supposed to be Pan, who willed him to affure the Athenians of victorie, promifing that some one of the Gods should be present at the battaile to affift them and defend them against the multitude of their enemies. Phidippides at his returne feeing he could not bring with him any prefent fuccours

20 from Sparta, yet he thought it greatly anailing to bring newes from the Gods, and promife of affiftance from Heauen, which no doubt (though the deuice was likely to be his owne) yet it greatly encouraged the multitude and common people, who in all ages have beene more stirred up with fond Prophecies and other like superstitious fooleries, than by any just cause or solide reason. The Athenians being now left to themselves, with one thousand onely of the Plateans (who having beene formerly defended by the Athenians against the Thebans, did in this extremitie witnesse their thankefulnesse and gratefull disposition) began to dispute, Whether it were most for their advantage to defend the wals of Athens, or to put themselves into the field with fuch forces as they had, the same consisting of tenne thousand Athenians, 40 and one thousand of the Plateans. In the end, and after great diversitie of opinions,

Miltiades, who perfuaded the triall by battaile, prevailed. The Armies being now in view, and within a myle of each other, the Athenians disposed themselves into three troupes: two wings or hornes, as they tearme them, and the bodie of a battaile. The Persians, when they perceived so small a Troope advancing towards them, thought the Athenians rather disposses of their understanding, than possess with the resolution whereof they made shew. So invincible and relistlesse the Persans esteemed their owne numbers to be, and that small troupe of their enemics then in view, rather to be despised than to be fought withall: But in conclusion, the victorie being doubtfully ballanced for a while, fometime the vertue of the Greei-

50 ans, and fometimes the number of the Persians prevailing, the Grecians fighting for all that they had, the Persians for that they needed not, these great forces of Darius were difordered and put in rout; the Athenians following their victorie euen to the Sea-shore: where the Persians, so many of them as lost not their wits with their courage, faued themselves in their shippes.

The Persian Armie confisted of an hundred thousand foot and tenne thousand horse; of which there were slaine in the place sixe thousand three hundred and of the Grecians an hundred fourescore and twelve. For how socuer it came to passe, either by ftrange visions, which were afterward called Panici terrores, or by some other affright, it feemeth, that the inuading Armie, after the first encounter, fought with their backes towards their enemie, and lost that number, by Herodotus set downe, in their diforderly retreat, or rather in their flat running away. As for Iufines report. That two hundred thousand of the Persian Armie were slaine, the fame hath no apparance nor poffibilitie of truth. In this fight Hippias the persuader of the enterprile was flaine, fayth Justine and Cicero; but Suidas tels vs, That he esca- 10

ped and died most miserably in Lemnos.

The greatest honor of this victoric was cast upon Miltiades, who both persuaded the triall by battaile, and behaued himfelfetherein answerably to the counsell which he gaue. Themistocles had his first reputation in this fight, being but young and of the first beard. Those of the Gracians, of marke and commaundement, that fell in the first encounter, were Callimachus and Steflous. It is also said, That Cynegyrus following the Persians to their embarking, layd hands on one of their Gallies, to have held it from putting off the shore, and having his right hand cut off, he yet offered to arrest it with his left; of which being also deprined, he tooke hold of it with his teeth. This encounter happened in the first yeare of the threescore and 20 twelfth Olympiad, about the time of the Warre made by Coviolanus against his fellow-Romanes: Alexander the fonne of Amintas being then King of Macedon, and Phanippus then Governour of Athens, according to Plutareh; or Hybilides, after

This great fray thus parted, and the Persians returned backe into the leffer Alia, Miltindes fought and obtained an imployment against the llanders of Paros, one of the Cyclades, and paffing ouer his Companies in threefcore and tenne Gallies, after fixe and twentic dayes affault he brake his thigh, in feeking to enter it by the Temple of Ceres, wherewith him felfe being made vnable, and his companies discouraged, he returned to Athens; where those vngratefull Citizens forget- 30 ting all his feruices past, and that of all other the most renowned at the battaile of Marathon, did by the perfusion of Xantippus, the father of Perides (who enuied his fame) cast him into prison, and set on him a fine of siftie Talents; where his weake and wounded bodie being not able to endure the one, nor his effate to pay the other, he after a few daves ended his life.

Which enuie of the better fort to each other, with their private Factions, affifted by the vnthankfull and witleffe people, brought them, not many yeares after, from a victorious and famous Nation to base subjection and slaverie. Militades left behind him one fonne called Cymon, begotten on Hegispila, daughter of Olorus King of Thrace, who (favth Plutarch) was neither inferior to his father in valour, nor to 40 Themistoc'es in understanding, but exceeded them both in justice and good go-

Now Darius taking greater care how to recouer his honour, than forrow for the loffe received in Greece, gave order for new levies of men, and all other warlike prouisions. But the Egyptians revolting from his obedience (a Kingdome of great ftrength and revenue) greatly distracted his resolution for the reinvalion of Greece. The diffention also among his fonnes; of whom, the yonger being borne after he was King, and by so great a mother as A:0//a, disdained to give place to his elder brother, borne before Darius obtained the Empire, greatly vexed him . And lastly, death, who hath no respect of any mans affaires, gaue end to all his consultations 50 and enterprifes, and joyned him to the earth of his auncestors, about a yeare after the battaile of Marathon, and after that he had raigned like and thirtie yeres. He left behind him five fonnes, namely Artabafanes, born before he obtained the kingdome, Xerxes who succeeded him, Achemenes gouernor of Agypt, Massiles and Anabignes.

axes received from his father, as hereditarie, a double Warre; one to be made against the Agyptians, which he finished so speedily, that there is nothing remaining in writing how the fame was performed : the other against the Gracians; of which it is hard to judge, whether the preparations were more terrible, or the fuccesse ridiculous. In the confultation for the profecution of this Warre, which was chiefely bent against the Athenians, the Princes of Persia were divided in opinion. Mardonius, who had formerly commaunded in Thrace and Macedon, under Darius, and had also Hystaspes for his grandfather, as Xerxes had, and married Xerxes his fifter Artozoftres, perfuaded by many arguments the European warre. But Artabanus, brother to the late Darius, and vncle to Xerxes, maintained the contrarie counsell, laying before Xerxes the lamentable and ridiculous successe of the two late invalions, which Darius had made contrarie to his counsell: The one in person vpon the Seythians, the other by his Lieutenants vpon the Greekes; in each of which Darius left to his enemics both his Armie and his honour.

30 He therefore belought Xerxes to be right well aduised before he did too farre imbarke himselse in this businesse. For whatsoeuer undertaking hath deliberate and found counfell for conductor, though the successe doe not alwayes answere the probabilitie, yet hath Fortune nothing else thereof to vaunt, than the variablenesse of her owne nature, which only the divine Providence, and not any humane power,

But so obstinate was the resolution of Xerxes in prosecution of his former intent, that Artabanus, whether terrified by Visions (as it is written of him) or fearing the Kings hatred which he made knowne to all those that opposed his desire to this Warre (changing opinion and counfell) affifted the Gracian Expedition with all the 40 power he had.

After the Warre of Agypt was ended, foure yeares were confumed in describing and gathering an Armie for this invalion: which being compounded of all Nations subject to the Persian Empire, consisted of seuenteene hundred thousand foot, Her, It. and eightie thousand horsemen, besides Chariots, Camels, and other Beasts for Carriage, if we may believe Herodotus: for of this multitude, Trogus findes the number leffe by feuen hundred thousand footmen.

The Commaunders of the scuerall Nations were the Princes of the bloud of Persia, either by marriage in the Kings house, or otherwise: for to these were all commaundements of this nature given, some few people excepted, who had of 50 their owne leaders.

The charge of the whole Armie was bestowed on Mardonius, the sonne of Gobryas by a lifter of Darius, to whom were joyned some others of Xerxes his neerest kindred, as Generals over all; faving that the charge of tenne thousand select Persians, called the immortall Regiment (because if any one of the whole number died or were flaine, there was another prefently chosen in his stead) was given to Hydrans; the eightic thousand horsemen were led by the sonnes of Datis, who commanded the late Armie of Datis in Greece.

The Flect of Gallies were two thousand two hundred and eight, surnished by the Phometans, who had Commanuders of their owne Nation, and by the Cyprietz, Cicians, Papilians, Lycians, Dorians, Carians, Innians, Acidians, and Italessonians; who were trusted with the furnishing of their owne Vessels, and these of mendands by the Princes of Perss, as by Artislagues the sonne of Darians, and others. The rest of the Vessels for trust post attention of the Vessels for trust post attention of the Vessels for trust post and the Salaries furnished by Artensis, arthe daughter of Lygdames, Princesses of Balacans, such as the Salaries for the Vessels for the Vessels and the Islands adiopning, which her selse commanuded. Those Gallies by the prepared and furnished, exceeded all the rest of the Flect, excepting those of Ziden, in which Areas bimelse was insbarked.

XERXES Armie entertained by PYTHIVS: Ilis cutting off Mount Athos from the Continent: his bridge of Bostes over the Hellespont: and the diffeories betweene him and ARTABANYS expenses the theory of the Commic.

Hen this world of an Armie was throughly furnished, he cauded all the Nations of which it was compounded to make their Rendez-vois and repaire at Surdis in Lydis. And when hee had affembled to the number of Teuenteene hundred thousand foot, as he entred the bodie of Celens, he was by one Pythins the Lydism entertained, who out of his Flockes and Heards of Cattell gaue food to xerxes and his whole Armic. The Feathended, he also presented him with two thousand Talents of Siluer, and in Gold four Millions, wanting seuen thousand of the Persian Daries, which make so many of our markes.

The King our come with the exceeding liberalitie of Pythius, did not only refuse his treasfure oftered, but commanued that feuen thousand Durial should be giuen him to make vp his soure Millions; of which, so many thousands were wanting when he made the present. But soone after, when Pythius besought him to spare one of his site somes from his attendance into Greece (because himsless was old, and had none whom he could so well trust as his owne sonne). Notes most barbarroully caused the young man, for whome his father sought exemption, to be fundered into two parts, commanuating, that the one halfe of his carkasse shalles hould be layed on the right, and the other halfe on the left hand of the common way by which the Armie marched.

Two things he commanded to be done before he came to the Sea fide. The one was a paffage for Gallies to be cut behind Mount Athes, making the fame (with the halic Illand or Headland, whereon it flood) to be an entire Illand, fundring thereby from the Continent of Thrace fine Cities, befides the Mountaine and the Cher/fine or Necke of Land it felfe: a worke of more oftentation than of Vegand yet an enterprife of no great wonder, the Valley which held it to the Continent hauing but twelve furlongs (which make about a mile and halfe) to cut through, and the ditch being broad enough onely for two Gallies to paffe in from. The Cities so fewered from the maine, were Dien, Olephysus, Acorbhon, Thyfin, and Cleone.

He alfo gaue order, that a Bridge vpon Boats should be made ouer the Hellesport 50 betweene Abidus and Session, the Sea there hauing a myle of breadth, wanting an eight part; which after the finishing, was by a Tempest torne assinder and dissenced: wherewith Xerxes being more enraged than dissouraged, commaunded those to be slaine that were masters of the worke, and caused sixe hundred threefcore and foureteene Gallies to be coupled together, thereon to frame a new Bridge, which by the art and induftrie of the Phemitans was fo well anchored to refit both windes blowing into and from the Euxine Sea, as the fame being well boorded and rayled, the whole Armie of feuenteene hundred thoufand foot, and fourefcore thoufand Horfe, with all the Moyles and Carriages, palt ouer in into Europe in feuen dies and feuen nights, without intermiffion. This transportation of Armies did Cafar afterward vfc. And Calagula that mad Emperour, in imitation of Aerxes his Bridge, did build the like.

The Bridge finished, and the Armic brought neere to the Sea side, Xerxes tooke to a view of all his Troupes affembled in the Plaines of Abidus, being carried up and feated on a place ouer-topping the Land round about it, and the Sea adjoyning: and after he had gloried in his owne happinesse, to behold and commaund so many Nations, and so powerfull an Armie and Fleet, he suddenly (notwithstanding) burst out into teares, moned with this contemplation, That in one hundred yeares there should not any one furnine of that maruellous multitude: the cause of which fudden change of palifion when he vttered to Artabanus his vncle, Artabanus fpake to the King to this effect: That which is more lamentable than the diffolution of this great Troupe within that number of yeares by the King remembred, is, That the life it felfe which we enjoy is yet more milerable than the end thereof: for in 20 those few dayes given vs in the world, there is no man among all these, nor essential where, that ener found himfelfe so accompanied with happinesse, but that he oftentimes pleafed himfelfe better with the defire and hope of death than of living; the incident calamities, difeafes, and forrowes whereto mankind is fubicet, being for many and ineuitable, that the shortest life doth oftentimes appeare vnto vs ouerlong; to avoid all which, there is neither refuge nor reft but in defired death

With this melancholie discourse Xerxes being not much pleased, prayed Artabanus not to ouer-cast those joves which they had now in pursuit with sad remembrances. And holding still a doubtful conceit, that Artabanus vtterly condemned the 20 inualion of Greece, against which he had formerly given many strong reasons, delired him to deale freely with him, Whether he were returned to his first resolution, that the enterprise of Greece could not be prosperous? Or whether, according to the change of mind put into him by his late Vilion, he was confident of good fucceffe? Artabanus notwithstanding that he affured himselfe of the Kings resolution to goe on, and dared not by any new Arguments to batter the great purpose it selfe, yet he told the King, That there were two things which maruelloufly affrighted him, and which the King should finde, as he feared, to be most adverse; to wir, the Sea and the Land: The Sea, because it had no where in that part of the world any Port capable of fo great a Fleet: infomuch, as if any tempest should arise, all 40 the Continent of Greece could hardly receive them, nor all the Hauens thereof affoord them any fafetie: and therefore when fuch shelter shall be wanting vnto them, he prayed him to understand, that in such a case of extremitie men are left to the will and disposition of Fortune, and not Fortune to the will and disposition of men. The Land, besides other incommodities, will be found by so much the more an enemie, by how much the vnfatiate defire of man to obtaine more and more thereof doth lead him forward : for were there no man found to give relifance, yet the want of meanes to feed fuch an Armie, and the Famine, which cannot be preuented, will without any other violence offered disinable and confume it. By these Arguments Artabanus hoped to have diverted Nerves, not during perchance 50 to vtter what indeed he most feared; to wit, the ouerthrow of the Armie it selfe both by Sea and Land, which soone after followed. These Cautions were exceeding weightie, if Xexxes his obstinacie had not misprised them. For to inuade by Sea vpon a perillous Coast, being neither in possession of any Port, nor succoured by any partie, may better fit a Prince prefuming on his fortune, than enriched with vnderstanding.

derstanding. Such was the enterprise of Philip the second vpon England in the yeare 1588, who had belike neuer heard of this Counsell of Artabanus to Xerxes, or forgotten it.

Now concerning the second point, it was very likely, that Xerxet his Armie, which could not have less in it than two millions of Soules, besides his bealts for Service and Carriage, should after a few dayes suffer famine, and vsing Matahaudi words, Mourire sant engles, site without a knife. For it was impossible for Greece, being a reaged, strait, and mountainous Countrey, to yeeld food (besides what served themseltes) for twentie hundred thousand strangers, whom they neuer meant to entertaine but with the sharpened points of their weapons, destroying withall to what source they could not well inclose and defend. Nay, if we may beleeue Heredouts, the Armie of Xerxes, being reviewed at Thermoppla, consisted of fine millions, two hundred eightic three thousand two hundred twentie men, besides Laundres (Es, Harlors, and Horses, and was therefore likely to endure a specific shamine.

The effect of xerxes his answere was, That it was impossible to prouide for all things; and that who focuer should enterprise any great matter, if he gaue the hearing to all that could be objected of accidentall inconveniences, hee should never purfue the same farther than the dispute and consultation: which if his predecesfors, the Persian Kings, had done, they had never growne to that greatnesse, or posfelt fo many Kingdomes and Nations as they now did, and therefore concluded, 20 That great enterprises were neuer undertaken without great perils. Which resolution of Xerxes was not to be condemned, if any necessitie had enforst him to that warre. But feeing the many Nations newly conquered, which he alreadie commaunded, were more than could be constrained to obedience any longer than the powerfull prosperitie of the Persians endured, and that Greece was separated by the Sea from the rest of Xerxes Dominions (of whose resolution his father Darius had made a deere experience) the fruit of this warre was answerable to the plantation, and the fuccesse and end agreeable to the weake counsell whereon it was grounded. Furthermore, those millions of men which he transported, and yet in his owne judgement not sufficient (for he gathered in marching on, all the strength of Thrace 20 and Macedon) were an argument, that he rather hoped to feare the Greekes by the fame of his numbers, than that he had any confidence in their valour and refolution, whome he conducted. For it is wifely faid of those vncountable multitudes: Non vires habent (ed pondus, & impedimenta potius funt quam auxilium; They are great in bulke, but weake in force, and rather a luggage than an aid.

Besides, as it was impossible to marshall such a world of men in one Armie, so the diuers Nations, speaking diuers. Languages, bred the same confusion among the Perfus Commanders when they came to hight, as it did to the builders of Babel, when they came to worke. Whereas if Exercise had of his sine millions compounded tenne Armies of fiftie thousand chosen souldiors in each, and sent them yearely into 40 serees well victualled and furnished, he had either prevailed by the sword, or fort them to for sake their territorie, or brought them in obedience by necessitie and famine, which cannot be resisted. But while Exercise scole to out downe the bankes of Greece, and to let in a sea of men upon them, he was deceived both in his owne hopes, and in their hearts whom he imployed, and beaten by the Greekes, both by Land and Sea 3, yea, he himselfe, conducted by his fears, feel shamefully into Assi.

A great part of his Armie was buried in Greece: the remainder whereof, which wintred in Thessiate, and the department of the same the same the same summer following with the declaraction himselfe slaine.

ð. III.

Of the fights at Thermopyla and Artemisium.

Fter fuch time as Xerxes had transported his Armic oner the Heele font, and landed in Thrace, (leauing the description of his passage alonght that Coast, and how the River of Lusser was drunke drie by his multitudes, and the Lake neere to Pissers by his cattell, with other accidents in his marches towards Greees I will speak of the encounters he had, and the shamefull and incredible overthrowes which he received: As first at Thermopyle, a narrow passage of halfe an acre of ground, lying betweene the Mountaines which divide The false from Greece, where sometime the Phocians had rayled a wall with gates, which was then for the most part ruined. At this entrance Leonidas, one of the Kings of Sparta, with three hundred Lacedamonians, affifted with one thousand Tegesta and Mantineans, one thousand Arcadians, and other Pelovonnessans, to the number of three thousand one hundred in the whole, besides one thousand Phocians, foure hundred Thebans, seven hundred Thesbians, and all the forces (fuch as they were) of the bordering Locrians, defended the paffage two whole dayes together against that huge Armie of the Persians. The valour of the 30 Greekes appeared to excellent in this defence, that in the first dayes fight xerxes is faid to have three times leaped out of his Throne, fearing the destruction of his Armie by one handfull of those men, whom not long before he had etterly despifed : and when the second dayes attempt upon the Greekes had proped vaine, hee was altogether ignorant how to proceede further, and so might have continued. had not a run-agate Gracian taught him a fecret way, by which part of his Armie might ascend the ledge of Mountaines, and set youn the backes of those who kept the Straits. But when the most valiant of the Persian Armie had almost inclosed the small forces of the Greekes, then did Leonidas, King of the Lacedemonians, with his three hundred, and feuen hundred Thespians, which were all that abode by him, 20 refuse to quit the place which they had vidertaken to make good, and with admirable courage not onely relift that world of men which charged them on all fides ; but iffuing out of their strength, made so great a slaughter of their enemies; that they might well be called vanquishers, though all of them were slaine vpon the place. Xerxes having loft in this laft fight, together with twentie thousand other Souldiors and Captaines, two of his owne brethren, began to doubt what inconuenience might befall him by the vertue of fuch as had not beene present at these battailes, with whome he knew that he shortly was to deale. Especially of the Spartans he flood in great feare, whose manhood had appeared singular in this tryall, which caused him very carefully to enquire what numbers they could bring 40 into the field. It is reported of Dieneces the Spartan, That when one thought to haue terrified him by faying, That the flight of the Persian Arrowes was so thicke as would hide the Sunne; he answered thus: It is very good newes, for then shall we fight in the coole shade.

Such notable refolution having as freely been expressed in deedes, as it was vetered in words, caused the Persian to stand in great doubt, when he heard that the Citic of Sparta could arme well-nigh eight thousand men of the like temper, and that the other Lucademonians, though inferiour to those, were very valiant men. Wherefore he asked counsell of Demarkut, a banished King of the Spartans, who had alwayes well aduited and instructed him in the things of Greece, what course 50 were fitted to be taken in his surther proceedings. The opinion of Demaratus was, That all the Land-forces would alsemble together to defend the splamus, that straight necke of ground which joyneth relopomes to the Continent. For which cause he aduited, That three hundred shippes well manned should be fent vno the Coast of Learnia, to Spoyle the Countrey, and to hold the Lacedemonians and their neighbours bulied at home, whileft Xerxes at his leafure having subdued the rest. might afterward bring his whole power vpon them, who remaining deflitute of fuecour would be too weak alone to make relistance. To this purpose also the same Demaratus further aduised, that the said fleet of three hundred thips should seife your the Hand then called Cythera, now Cerigo, which lying neere to the Coast of Lacenia, might ferue as a fit place of Rendez-vous vpon all occasions either of their owne defence or endamaging the enemie : whereby that auncient speech of Chilon the Jacedemonian should be verified, that it were better for his Countrie-men to have that He drowned in the Sea than fland so inconveniently as for them it did. What effect this counsell might haue taken had it been followed it is not casse to guesse. But a 10 contrarie opinion of Achamenes brother to King Kernes was preferred as the fafer. For the Persian fleet had bin forely vexed with a grieuous tempest, which continued three whole daies together, wherein were loft vpon the coast of Magnesia foure hundred ships of warre, besides other vessels innumerable, accordingly as Artabanus had foreseene, that if any such calamitic should overtake them, there would not be sound any Harbor wide enough to give them fuccour. Therefore Achamenes perswaded his brother not to disperse his fleete; for if (faid he) after the losse of foure hundred shippes wee shall send away other three hundred to seeke aduentures, then will the Greekes be strong enough by Scato encounter the rest of the Nauie, which holding altogether is inuincible. To this counfell Nerves yeelded, hoping that his Land-armic 30 and fleete should each of them stand the other in good stead, whilest both held one course and lay not farre asunder. But herein he was farre deceived; for about the fame time that his armie had felt the valour of the Greekes by Land, his Nauie likewife made a forrowfull proofe of their skill and courage at Sea . The Grecian fleete lay at that time at Artemissium in the straits of Enbara, where the Persians thinking to incompaffe them, fent two hundred faile about the Iland to fall ypon them behinde. vling a like stratagem to that which their King did practife against Leonides in a case not vnlike, but with farre different successe. For that narrow channell of the Sea which divideth Eubers from the maine was in the same fort held by a Navie of two hundred threescore and eleuen faile against the huge Persian Armada, as the straits of 30 Thermopyle had formerly beene maintained by Leonidas, till he was fo circumuented as this Nauie might have been, but was not. The departure of those two hundred shippes that were sent about the Iland, and the cause of their voiage, was too well knowne in the Persian fleete and soone enough disclosed to the Greekes, who setting faile by night met them with a counter-furprife, taking and finking thirtie veffels, inforcing the rest to take the Sea, where being ouertaken with foule weather they were driuen vpon the rocks and all cast away. Contrariewise the Nauie of the Greekes was increased by the arrivall of fiftie three Athenian ships, and one Lemnian which came to their partie in the last fight. As these new forces incouraged the one side: so the feare of Xerxes his displeasure stirred up the other to redeeme their losse with 40 some notable exploit. Wherefore setting aside their unfortunate pollicie, they refolued in plaine fight to repaire their honour, and casting themselues into the forme of a Crescent, thought so to inclose the Greekes, who readily did present them battell

The fight indured from noone till night, and ended with equall loffe to both parts. For though more of the Perfams (hippes were funke and taken, yet the leffer loofs fell altogether as heatievpon the Greekiff fleet, which being finall could worfe beareit. Herein onely the Barbarians may feeme to haue had the worfe, that they forfooke the place of fight, leauing the wracke and fpoiles to the enemie, who neuerheleffe were faine to abandon prefently cuen the paffage which they had vn euerheleffe were faine to abandon prefently cuen the paffage which they had vn derraken to defend, both for that many of their flips were forely crufth in the battaile, and effecially because they had received aductrisfemen of the death of Econidas at Thermopyle. Before they waied anchors, Themifooles generall of the Athenians engraued vpon stone at the watering place an exhortation to the Ionians, that either they should reuolt vnto the Greekes or stand neutrall; which perswassion, he hoped would either take some place with them, or at the least make them suspected by the Perssass.

d. IIII.

The attempt of XERXES upon APOLLO's temple: and his taking of Athens.

Hen kæres had paffed the firaites of Thermopyla be wasted the Country of of the Phôsians and the regions adioning: as for the inhabitants they chose rather to flie, and reserve themselves to a day of battaile, than to aduenture their liues into his hands, typon hope of fating their wealth by making proffer vnto him of their service. Part of bis arms.

miche fant to spoile the Temple of Delphis, which was exceeding tich by meanes of many offerings that had there been made by diuers Kings and great personages; Of all which riches it was thought that Appear had better Innentorie than of the goods left in his owne Palace. To make relation of a great askonillment that fell you the companies which arited at the Temple to have facked it, and of two 20 Rockes that breaking from the mount Parassifies our whelmed many of the Barbarians, it were peraducture somewhat superstitions. Yet theredatus, who lined not long after, saith, That the broken Rocks remained cuen to his memorie in the Temple of Minerus, whither they rowled in their fill. And sirely this attempt of Xerxes was impious; for seeing he beleeued that Apollow was a God, he should not have dared to entertaine a couctous delive of intehing himselfe by committing faciled group on his Temple. Wherefore it may possibly be true, that licence to chastic his impictie in such manner asis reported, was granted wno the Diuell, by that Holie one, who saith, Will a man spoile his Gods? and elsewhere; Itash any nation shamged their Gods; whiches the office has the sait of the saith supration shamged their Gods; which yet are no Gods! Got to the lite of Kittim, and behold, and some the suppose the committed of the suppose of the su

The remainder of that which xorxes did may be expressed briefly thus. He came to Athens, which finding for faken he tooke, & bowns the Cittadel and temple which was there40 in. The Cittadel lindeed was defended a while by some of more courage than wisedome, who literally interpreting apollo's Oracle; shat Athens should bee safe in woodden walls, had fortified that place with boords and Palissades: too weake to hold out long, though by their desperate valour so well maintained at the first affault, that they might haue yeelded it woon tolerable conditions, had they not vainely relied ypon the prophecie: whereof (being somewhat obscure) it was wisely done of

How THEMISTOCLES the Athenian drew the Greekes to fight at Salamis.

He Athenians had, before the comming of Xerxes, removed their wives and children into Trazene, Agina, and Salamis, not fo highly prizing their houses, and lands, as their freedome, and the common libertie of Greece. Neuertheleffe this great zeale, which the Athenians did 10 of Greece. Neuerthelelic this great zeale, which the Athemans did thew for the generall good of their Countrie, was ill requited by the other Creekes, who with much labour were hardly intreated to flay for them at Salamis, whilest they removed the wives and children out of their Citie. But when the Citic of Athens was taken, it was prefently resoluted vpon, that they should forfake the Ile of Salamis, and with-draw the fleet to Ishmus: which neck of land they did purpose to fortiste against the Persians, and so to defend Peloponnes by Land, and Sea, leaving the rest of Greece, as indefensible, to the furie of the enemie. So should the llands of Salamis and Ægina have beene abandoned, and the Families of the Athenians (which were there bestowed as in places of securitie) have beene giuen ouer into mercilesse bondage. Against this resolution Themistocles, Admirall 20 of the Athenian fleet, very strongly made opposition; but in vaine. For the Pelaponne frans were to possessed with feare of looking their owne, which they would not hazard, that no perswasions could obtaine of them, to regard the estate of their difireffed friends, and Allies. Many remonstrances Themistocles made vnto them, to allure them to abide the enemic at Salamis; As first in private vnto Eurybiades the Lacedamonian, Admirall of the whole fleet; That the felfe same feare which made them for fake those coasts of Greece, vpon which they then anchored, would afterward (if it found no check at the first) cause them also to diffeuer the fleet, and euerv one of the Confederates to with-draw himfelfe to the defence of his owne Citie and chate; Then to the Councell of Warre which Eurybiades vpon this motion 20 did call together (forbearing to object what want of courage might worke in them hereafter) he shewed that the fight at Ishmus would be in an open Sea, whereas it was more expedient for them, having the fewer ships, to determine the matter in the firaights ; and that, befides the fafeguard of Egina, Megara, and Salamis, they should by abiding, where they then were, sufficiently defend Islamus; which the Burbarians should not so much as once looke vpon, if the Greekes obtained victorie by Sea: which they could not fo well hope for else-where, as in that present place which gaue them fo good advantage. All this would not ferue to retaine the Pe-Ispennelisms, of whom one, vnworthy of memorie, vpbraided Themistocles with the loffe of Achens, blaming Eurybiades for suffering one to speake in the Councell, that 40 had no Countrie of his owne to inhabite. A base and shamefull objection it was, to lay as a reproch that loffe, which being voluntarily fultained for the common good, was in true estimation by so much the more honourable, by how much it was the greater. But this indignitie did exasperate Themistocles, and put into his mouth a reply so sharpe, as availed more than all his former persuasions. Hee told them all plainely, That the Athenians wanted not a fairer Citie, than any Nation of Greece could boast of; having well-neare two hundred good ships of Warre, the better part of the Grecian fleet, with which it was easie for them to transport their Families and substance into any part of the world, and settle themselues in a more secure habitation, leaving those to shift as well as they might, who in their extremitie 50 had refused to stand by them. Herewithall he mentioned a Towne in Italie belonging of old to the State of Athens, of which Towne he said an Oracle had foretold, That the Athenians in processe of time should build it a-new, and there (quoth hee) will we plant our felues, leauing vnto you a forrowfull remembrance of my words, and of your owne vnthankfulneffe. The Peloponne/jam hearing thus much, beganne to enter into better confideration of the Albenians, who se affaires depended not, as they well perceived, you so weake termes, that they thould be driven to crouch to others; but rather were such, as might inforce the rest to yeeld to them, and con-defend vent on the vitermost of their owns demands.

descend even to the vttermost of their owne demands. For the Athenians, when they first embraced that Heroicall resolution of leauing their grounds and houses to fire and ruine, if necessitie should inforce them so farre, for the preservation of their libertie; did imploy the most of their private wealth, and all the common treasure, in building a great Nauie. By these meanes they hoped (which accordingly fell out) that no fuch calamitie should be fall them by land, as might not well be counterpoised by great advantages at Sea: Knowing well, that a strong fleet would either procure victorie at home, or a secure passage to any other Countrie. The other States of Greece held it sufficient, if building a few new ships they did somewhat amend their Nauic. Whereby it came to passe, that, had they beene vanquished, they could not have expected any other fortune than either prefent death, or perpetual flauerie; neither could they hope to be victorious without the affiftance of the Athenians, whose forces by Sea did equall all theirs together : the whole confifting of no more than three hundred and fourescore bottomes. Wherefore these Peloponnesians beginning to suspect their owne condition, which would have flood vpon desperate points, if the fleet of Athens had for faken them; were foone perswaded, by the greater feare of such a bad cuent, to forget the leffer, which they had conceived of the Persians: and laying a-fide their infolent brauerie, they yeelded to that most profitable counsaile of abiding at Salamis.

ò. V I.

How the Persians consulted about giving battaile: and how Themistocles by policie held the Greekes to their resolution; with the vidoric at Salamis therewoon ensuing.

N the meane sason the Persians had entred into consultation, whether it were consenient to offer battaile to the Greeker, or no. Therest of the Capatines gaining fisch adults as they thought would best please the King their Matter, had Soone agreed upon the fight: but Astemish, and Concens of Hallesmallis, who followed Xerxet to this warre in person, Queene of Halicarnaffus, who followed Xerxes to this warre in person, was of contrarie opinion. Her counfaile was, that the King himfelfe directly should march toward Peloponne (is, whereby it would come to passe that the Greeke Nauic, (vnable otherwise to continue long at salamis for want of proution) flould pre-ferrly be diffeuered, and cuery one seeking to preserve his owne Citie and goods, they should, being diuided, proue vnable to resist him, who had wonne so farre vpon them when they held together. And as the profit will bee great in forbearing to giue battaile; to on the other fide the danger will bee more (faid shee) which wee Thall under-goe, than any neede requireth vs to aduenture upon; and the loffe, in cafe it fall yoon vs.greater than the profit of the victorie which we delire. For if we compell the enemies to flie, it is no more than they would have done, wee fitting still: but if they, as better Sca-menthan ours, put vs to the worst, the journey to Pelapannefus is ytterly dasht, and many that now declare for vs, will soone renolt vnto the Greekes. Mardonius, whom Xerxes had fent for that purpose to the fleet, related vn-50 to his Master the common consent of the other Captaines, and withall this disagreeing opinion of Artemisia. The King well pleased with her aduise, yet resolued vpon following the more generall, but farre-worse counsaile of the rest; which would questionlesse have beene the same which Artemisia gave, had not feare and

they thought most conformable to their Princes determination. So it was indeede that Xerxes had entertained a vaine perswasion of much good, that his owne presence you the shore to behold the conside, would worke among the Souldiers. Therefore he incamped upon the Sea-fide, pitching his owne Tent on the mount Agaleus which is oppolite vito the Ile of Salamis, whence at case hee might safely view all which might happen in that action, having Scribes about him to write downe the a. Is and behaviour of every Captaine. The neare approch of the Barbarians, together with the newes of that timorous diligence, which their Countrimen shewed in fortifying the Ishmus, and of a Persian Armie marching a-pace thither, did now againe fo terrifie and amaze the Pelapennefians, that no intreatie, nor contestation 10 would fuffice to hold them together. For they thought it meère madneffe to fight for a Countrie alreadie loft, when they rather should endeauour to faue that which remained unconquered; propounding chiefly to themselves what miserie would befall them, if looling the victoric, they should be driven into Salamis, there to bee that vo. and belieged round in a poore defolate Hand.

Hereupon they resolved forth-with to set faile for Isthmus: which had presently beene done, if the wifedome of Themistocles had not preuented it. For he perceiuing what a violent feare had stopt vp their eares against all good counsaile, did practise another course, and forth-with labour to preuent the execution of this vnwholfome decree a not fuffering the very houre of performance to find him buffe in wrangling 20 altercation. As soone as the Councell brake vp, hee dispatched secretly a trustie Gentleman to the Persian Captaines, informing them truly of the intended flight. and exhorting them to fend part of their Nauie about the Iland, which incompaffing the Greekes might preuent their escape; giving them withall a salse hope of his assistance. The Persians no sooner heard than believed these good newes, well knowing that the victorie was their owne affured, if the Athenian fleet io yned with them; which they might easily hope, considering what abilitie their Master had to recompence for fo doing, both the Captaines with rich rewards, and the People with reflitution of their Citie, and Territories. By these meanes it fell out, that when the Greekes very early in the morning were about to waigh Anchor, they 30 found themselves inclosed round with Persians, who had laboured hard all night. fending many of their thips about the He of Salamis, to charge the enemic in reare. and landing many of their men in the Isle of Plyttalea, which lieth ouer against Salamis, to faue fuch of their owne, and kill fuch of the Gracian partie, as by any miffortune should be cast upon the shore. Thus did meere necessitie enforce the Grecians to undertake the battaile in the Straights of Salamis, where they obtained a memorable victorie, stemming the formost of their enemies, and chasing the rest, who falling foule one your another, could neither conveniently fight nor flie. I doe not finde any particular occurrences in this great battaile to be much remarkeable. Sure it is that the Scribes of Xerxes had a wearifome taske of writing downe many difa- 40 fters that befell the Perlian fleet, which ill acquited it felfe that day, doing no one peece of service worthie the presence of their King, or the registring of his Notaries. As for the Greekes, they might well feeme to have wrought out that victorie with cquall courage, were it not that the principall honour of that day was ascribed to those of Agina, and to the Athenians, of whom it is recorded. That when the Barbarians did flie towards Phalerus, where the Land-Armie of Xerxes lay, the ships of Ægins having poffessed the straights did sinke or take them, whilest the Athenians did valiantly give charge vpon those that kept the Sea, and made any countenance of relifting.

d. V I I. Of thinges following after the battaile of Salamis: and of the flight of XERXES.

Free this victorie, the Greekes intending, by way of ferutinie, to determine which of the Captaines had belt merited of them, in all this great service; cuery Captaine, being ambitious of that honour, did in the first place write downe his owne name, but in the second place, as best descruing next vnto himselfe, almost enery Suffrage did concurre

10 ypon Themistocles. Thus private affection yeelded vnto vertue, as soone as her owne turne was ferued. The Perfian King, as not amazed with this calamitic, beganne to make new preparation for continuance of warre; but in fuch falhion, that they which were best acquainted with his remper, might casily discerne his faint heart, through his painted lookes. Especially Mardonius, Author of the warre, began to caft a warie eie voon his Mafter, fearing leaft his counfaile should bee rewarded according to the euent. Wherefore purpoling rather to aduenture his life in purfuit of the victorie, than to cast it away by under going his Princes indignation; he aduised the King to leaue vnto him three hundred thousand men, with which forces he promifed to reduce all Greece under the subjection of the Persian Scepter. Here-20 withall he forgot not to footh Xerxes with many faire wordes; telling him that the cowardife of those Agyptians; Phanicians, and Cilicians, with others of the like mertall, nothing better than flaues, who had fo ill behaued themselues in the late Seaferuice, did not concerne his honour, who had alwaies beene victorious, and had alreadie subdued the better part of Greece, yea taken Athens it selfe, against which the Warre was principally intended. These wordes found very good acceptance in the Kings care, who presently betooke himselfe to his journey homewards, making the more haft, for that he vinderstood, how the Greekes had a purpose to faile to Hellesbont, and there to breake downe his bridge, and intercept his passage. True it was that the Greekes had no fuch intent, but rather wished his haffie departure. 20 knowing that he would leave his Armie not fo ftrong, as it should have beene, had he in person remained with it. And for this cause did Eurybiades give counsaile that by no meanes they should attempt the breaking of that bridge, least necessitie should inforce the Persians to take courage, and rather to fight like men, than die like beafts. Wherefore Themistocles did, under pretence of friendship, send a false advertisement to this timorous Prince, advising him to convay himselfe into Alia with all speede. Before his bridge were dissolved : which counsaile Xerxes tooke very kindly, and haftily followed, as before is shewed. Whether it were so that he found the bridge whole, and thereby repassed into Asia; or whether it were torne in sunder by tempests, and he thereby driven to imbarke himselfe in some obscure vessell. 40 it is not greatly materiall; though the Greekes did most willingly imbrace the later of these reports. Howsorer it were, this flight of his did well case the Countrie; that was thereby difburdened of that huge throng of people, which, as Locusts, had before ouer-whelmed it.

d. VIII.

The negotiations betweene MARDONIVS and the Athenians, as also betweene the Athenians and Lacedamonians; after the flight of XERXES.

ARDONIVS with his three hundred thouland had with-drawne himfelfe into Theffalie, whence he fent Aexander, the fonne of Amyntas King of Macedon, as Embassadour to the Athenians, with promise of large amends for all their loffes received, and of extending their Territories as farre as their owne delires; allowing them to retaine 70 their libertie and lawes, if they would make peace with Xerxes, and affift him in that

The Athenians had now reentred their Citie, but not as yet brought back their wines and children; for as much as they well perceived that the place could not be fecure, till the Armie of Mardonius were broken and defeated. Wherefore the Lacedemonians, understanding what faire conditions this Embaffadour would propound, were perplexed with very great feare, leaft hee should finde good and readic acceptance. Hercupon they likewife very speedily dispatched their Embassadours for Athens, who arriving, before the Atacedonian had audience, vied the best of their perswasion to retaine the Athenians firme. They alleaged that neither Xerxes 10 nor Darius had any pretence of Warre against the rest of Greece, but had only threatned the subuersion of Athens, till they and all their Confederates arming themselucs in defence of that Citie, were drawne into the quarrell, wherein the thenisms without much crueltic of injustice could not leaue them. Wee know, said they, that yee haue indured great calamities; loofing the fruit of the grounds, and being driven to for fake the Towne, the houses whereof bee ruined, and unfit for your habitation; in regard whereof, we undertake to maintaine as our owne, your wines and children among it vs, as long as the warre shall continue, hoping that yee, who have alwaics procured libertie to others, will not now goe about to bring all Greece into flaueric and bondage. As for the Barbarians, their promifes are large, 10 but their wordes and oathes are of no affurance. It was needleffe to vie many arguments to the Athenians, who gave answere to Alexander in presence of the Spartan Embassadours; That whilest the Sunne continued his course they would be Enemies to Nerxes, regarding neither gold nor any riches, with which he might feeke to make purchase of their libertie. Concerning the maintenance of their wives and children, it was a burden which they promifed to fustaine themselves, only defiring the Laced emonians, that with all speede they would cause their Armie to march, for as much as it was not likely, that Mardonius would long fit Rill in Theffalie, having once received fuch a peremptorie answere. In this their opinion of Mardonius his readinesse to inuade attica, they found themselves nothing deceived. For hee, as 20 foone as Alexander had returned their obstinate purpose of resistance, did forthwith leade his Armie towards them, and their Citie: they having now the fecond time quitted it, and conveyed themselves into places of more securitie abroad in the Countrie, where they expected the arrivall of their Confederates.

From Athens he fent his Agent vnto them with instructions, not only to perswade them to acceptance of the conditions before to them propounded, but with great promifes to allure the principall of them to his partie. His hope was that either the people, wearied with forfaking their houses so often, would bee desirous to preserve them from fire, and to have those which were alreadic laid wast, reedified at the Kings charges; Or if this affection tooke no place with them, but that needes they 40 would relie vpon their old Confederates, whose succours did very slowly advance forwards, yet perhaps the Leaders might bee wonne with great rewards, to draw them to his purpole; all which projects if they should faile, the destruction of Athens would be a good meane to please his Master King Xerxes, who must thereby needes understand, that Mardonius kept his ground, and feared not to confront the whole power of Greece, in the ftrongest part of their owne Countrie. But his expectation was beguiled in all these. For the Athenians so little regarded his offers. that when one Lycidus, or (as Demosthenes calls him) Cyrsilus, aduised the Senate to accept the conditions, and propound them to the people; all the Senators, and as many as abiding without the Counfaile-house heard what he had said, immediately fet vpon him, and stoned him to death; not examining whether it were feare or money, that had moudd him to vtter fuch a vile fentence. Yea the women of Athens in the Ile of Salamis, hearing of his bad counfaile, and bad end, affembling together, did enter his house there, and put his wife and children to the like execution.

All this braueric notwithstanding, when they perceived the slacknesse of the Peloponnelians in giving them aide, they were faine to betake themfelues to Salamis againe, the old place of their fecuritie. Remaining there, and feeing little forwardneffe in those whom it most concerned to affilt them, they sent very severe messages to Sparta, complaining of their flackneffe, and threatning with all, to take fuch course as might fland best with their owne good, seeing that the common estate of all was fo little regarded. These messengers were at the first entertained with dilatoric anfweres, which enery day grew colder, when as the Pelovonnelian Wall, builded athwart the Illimus, was almost finished. But as the Lacedamonians waxed carelesse and dull, fo the Athenians hotly preffed them to a quicke refolution, giving them plainely to understand, that if they should hold on in those dilatorie courses, it would not be long ere the Citic of Athens tooke a new course, that should little pleafe them. All this while the Persian fleet lay upon the coast of Alia, not daring to draw nearer vnto Greece, as being now too weake at Sea. Likewife the Greekills Nauie contained it felfe within the Harbours vpon Europe fide; both to doe feruice where neede should require at home; and withall to shunne the danger which might have befallen any part of it, that being distracted from the rest had adventured ouer farre. So mutuall feare preferued in quiet the Ilands lying in the middest of the Agan Scas. But it was well and feafonably observed by a Counsailor of 20 Sparta, that the wall vpon Isthmus would ferue to little purpose for the defence of Peloponnesus, if once the Athenians gaue eare to Mardonius : considering that many dores would be opened into that Demie-Iland, as foone as the Enemie should by winning the friendship of Athens, become the Master of the Seas about it. The Lacedamonians vpon this admonition, making better perviall of their owne dangers, were very carefull to give fatisfaction to the Athenian Embaffadours, who not brooking their delaies, were vpon point of taking leaue, yea as it feemed, of renouncing their alliance. Wherefore dispatching away fine thousand Spartans in the evening, vnder conduct of Paulanias; they gave audience the next day to the Embaffadors, whose complaints they answered with vehement protestations of their readinesse; 20 deeply fwearing that the Armie of Sparta was alreadie farre vpon the journey; and giuing them leaue to take vp other five thouland Lacedamonians, out of the Region adjoyning, to follow after them. The Athenians, though distasting such want of grauitie, in a matter so important, were neuerthelesse contented with the finall conclusion; and leaving the number appointed of Lacedamonian Souldiers, made what hast they could to incamp in Attica. The other Gracians were nothing flack in fending forth Companies, whose neare approch caused Mardonius to forsake Attica as a rough Countrie, and therefore of much disaduantage to Horse, wherein consisted the best of his power. Before his departure he burnt the Citie of Athens, beating downe the walls of it, and rui-40 ning all that had formerly escaped the furie of Warre.

The great battaile of Platae.

T were too long a rehearfall to shew all that happened in many skirmilhes betweene the Greekes and him, in the Countrie of Baotia, which Mardonius had chosen to bee the seate of that Warre. Much time was spent before the quarrell was decided by triall of one maine battaile: for both parties did stand vpon their guard, each expecting when the other should assaile them.

The Armie of Mardonius contained about three hundred thousand, which were by him chosen out of Xerxes his Armie ; to whom were adjoyned the forces of Thebes, Macedonie, Theffalie, and other parts of Greece, that now fiding with the Persian, furnished his Campe with fiftie thousand men. Against these the Lacedamonians, Athenians, and their Confederates, had leauied an Armie of one hundred and ten thousand, of which fortie thousand were waightily armed, the rest were only affiflants to these fortie thousand, being armed more flightly, as rather to make excurfions and give chafe, than to fullaine any flrong charges.

These two Armies having eleven daies confronted one the other, without performing any memorable peece of feruice; Wardonius, whose victualls beganne to faile, resolued to beginne the fray. The Greekes were promised victorie by an Oraele, if they fought in the Land of the Athenians, and in the plaine of Ceres and Proferpina, making praiers vnto certaine Gods, Demi-Gods, and Nymphs. But it was hard to finde the certaine place which the Orsele deligned. For the plaine of Ceres was indeede in the Territoric of Athens; but there was also an old Temple of Ceres and Proferpina, neare vnto the place where they lay, at that time encamped, as likewise the memorialls of those Nymphs, and Demi-Gods, were in the same place, vpon Mount Citheren, and the ground ferued well for foot-men against horse; only the Land belonged vnto the Plat.cans, and not vnto the Athenians.

Whileft the Greekes were perplexed about the interpretation of this doubtfull orade; the Placents, to make all cleare, did freely bestow their Land on that side the Towne vpon the Athenians.

This magnificence of the Plateans caused Alexander the Great, many ages after, 20 to readifie their Citie, which was ruined in the Peloponnesian warres.

All thinges being readie for battaile; the Lacedemonian Generall thought it most meere, that the Athenians should stand opposite that day to the Medes and Persians, whom they had formerly vanquished at Marathon; and that he, with his Spartans, should entertaine the Thebans and other Greekes which followed Mardonius, as better acquainted with their fight, and having beaten them often-times before. This being agreed upon, the Athenians changed place with the Lacedamonians; which Mardonius vnderstanding (whether searing the Athenians, of whose valour the Medes and Perfians had felt heavie proofe, or defiring to encounter the Spartans, as thinking them the brauest Souldiers of Greece) hee did also change the order of his 30 battaile, and oppose himselse to Pausanias. All the Greeker might well perceive how the Enemie did shift his wings, and Pausanias thereupon returned to his former Station; which Mardonius noting, did also the like. So one whole day was spent in changing to and fro. Some attempt the Persians made that day with their Archers on horse-back, who did so molest the Greekes at their watering place, that they were faine to enter into confultation of retiring; because they could not without much losse to themselves, and none to the enemie, lie neare to that Fountaine which did serue all the Camp. Having therefore concluded among themselves to dislodge; and part of the Armie being sent away before day-light: Mardonius perceived their departure in the morning, and thereupon being encouraged by their flight, (which 40 to him seemed to proceede out of meere cowardise) he charged them in reare with great violence. It may well be recorded as a notable example of patient valor, That the Lacedemonians being ouer-taken by the Enemies horse, and ouer-whelmed with great flights of Arrowes, did quietly lit still, not making any resistance or defence, till the Sacrifices for victorie were happily ended, though many of them were burt and flaine, and some of especiall marke lost, before any signe of good successe appeared in the entrailes.

But as soone as Pausanian had found in the Sacrifice those tokens, which the supershtion of that Age and Countrie accounted fortunate; hee gaue the Signall of battaile: and thereupon the Souldiers, who till then did fit vpon the ground, as was 10 their manner, arofe altogether, and with excellent courage received the charge of the Barbarians, that came thronging vponthem without any feare of fuch notable refishance. The rest of the Greeke Armie that was in march, being renoked by Paufaming, came in a-pace to fuccour the Lacedemonians: only that part of the Armie which was led by the Athenians, could not arrive vnto the place of the great battaile, because the Thebans, and other Greekes confederated with the Perlians. gaue them check by the way. Neuertheleffe, the Spartans with other their Afriitants, did so well acquite themselves, that the Persians were vanquished, and Mardonius with many thousands more flaine in the field; the rest fledde into the Campe, which they had fortified with woodden walls, and there defended themselues with such courage as desperate necessitie inforced them vnto, holding out the longer, because the Landamonians were not acquainted with the manner of affaulting Fortreffes, and Walls. In the meane feafon the Athenians. to having found ftrong opposition of the Thebans and Thessalians, did with much labourand courage obtaine victorie, which having not long purfued, they came to helpe the Lacedamonians, whom they found wearily bulled in affaulting the Campe, with more valour than skill. Wherefore they themselues under-tooke it. and in short space forced a passage through the Wall, at which breach first, and then on all fides, the Greekes entred, with fuch furie, and inft defire of vengeance. that of three hundred thousand they are said not to have left three thousand alive, excepting those who fled away with Artabazus, when the Persian Armie first fell to rout.

If the execution were so great, as is reported, an especiall cause of it was the foolish retrait, or rather flight into the Campe. For though it were fo. that the place was well fortified, and the number of those who cast themselues into it, greater than of the Assailants; yet they being of seuerall Nations and Languages, and having loft their Generall with other principall Commanders, it was vnpoffible that they in fuch a terrour and aftonishment should make good that peece of ground, lying in the heart of an Enemie Countrie, against an Armie of men, farre more valiant than themselues, and inflamed with present victorie. Therefore the same wall which for a few houres had preserved their lives, by holding out the Enemie, did now impale them. and leave them to the flaughtering furie of unpittifull Victors. Artabazius 20 fled into Thrace, telling the people of Theffalie, and other Countries in his way. That hee was fent by Mardonius vpon some peece of seruice : For hee well knew, that had they understood any thing of that great discomfiture, all places would have beene hostile vnto him, and sought with his ruine to purchase favour of the vanquilhers. Therefore making so large marches, that many of his Souldiers being feeble were left behinde and loft, hee came to Byzantium, whence hee shipped his men ouer into Asa. Such was the end of the vaine-glorious expedition, vnder-taken by Xerxes against the Greekes, vpon hope of honour: and great Conquest, though forting otherwise, accordingly as Artabazus had fore-scene, and rather worse, for as much as it beganne the quarrell, which 40 neuer ended, before the ruine of the Persian Empire was effected, by that Nation of the Greekes despised and fought to have beene brought into flauerie. Hereby it may seeme, that the vision appearing to Xerxes, was from God him-felse, who had formerly disposed of those thinges, ordaining the subucrfion of the Persian Monarchie by the Greekes, who, thus prouoked, entred into greater confideration of their owne strength, and the weakenesse of their Enemies.

The hattaile of Mycale, with a strange accident that fell out in the beginning of it: and examples of the

He fame day on which the battaile was fought at Platee, there was an other battaile fought at Myedle, a Promontoric, or Head-land in Alia, where the Persian fleet rode.

Leutychides the Spartan, with Xantippus the Athenian, Admiralls of 10 the Greeke Nauie, at the request of some Handers and Ionians did faile into those parts, to deliuer the Samians, and procure the Ionians to renolt from the Persian. Xerxes himselfe at this time lay at Sardis, a Citie in Lydia, not farre from the Sea-side, having left threescore thousand vnder the command of Tigranes, for defence of Ionia and the Sea-coast. Therefore when Artayntes and Ithramitres, Admiralls of the Persian fleet, understood that the Greekes bent their course towards them; they did forth-with draw their flips a ground, fortifying with Paliffadoes and otherwife, as much ground as did feeme needfull for the encamping of all their Land and Sca-forces. Leutychides at his arrivall, perceiving that they meant to keepe within their flrength, and resoluing to force them out of it, rowed with his Gallie 20 close aboard the thore, and called vpon the Ionians ( who more for feare than good will were encamped among the Perlians) exhorting them in the Greeke tongue to remember libertie, and vie the faire occasion which they now had to recouer it. Herein he did imitate Themistocles, who had done the like at Eubwa; trusting that either these perswasions would prevaile; or if the Persians did happen to vnderstand them, that it would breede some jelousie in them, causing them to fight in feare of their owne Companions. It neede not feeme strange, that this very same stratageme, which little or nothing auailed Themistocles, did now very happily succeede. For Xerves being in his full strength, it was a matter of much difficultie, to perswade those Inhabitants of Asia to revolt; who now, in his declining estate, gave a willing 20 eare to the fiveet found of libertie. The Perfians likewife, who in their former branerie, little a garded and leffe feared any treason, to be contriued by their Subiects, were now fo warie, that from the Samians, which were amongst them, they tooke away their armes; the Atilesians, whom they did suspect, but would not seeme to mistrust, they placed farre from them, as it were for defence of the straight passages of Myeale; pretending that these Milesians did best of all others know those places. But these devices little availed them. For the Samians perceiving that they were held as Traitors, tooke courage in the heat of the fight, and laying hold vpon fuch weapons as came to hand, affailed the Persians manfully within the Camp; which example the Jonans presently followed, being very glad to have found some that 40

Thelike report, of that great battaile, wherein Paulus Amylius ouerthrew Perfeut the last King of Oxizeedow, was brought to Rome in four edices, as Linie with others doe record. And Planeto hath many other examples of this kinde. As that of the battaile by the River Sagra in Italia, which was heard of the fame day in Pelopomerses: That of the battaile against the Tarquinium and the Latines, presently 50 noised at Rome: And (which is most treamstable) the videorie obtained against Latin Antonius, who was Rebell to Domitian the Emperour. This Lucius Antonius being Lieutenant of the higher Germanie, had corrupted his Armie with gift sand promises.

durst beginne. It is faid that while the Greekes were yet in march towards the Encmies campe, a rumour fuddenly ranne in the Armie that Mardonius was ouer-throwne in Greece, which (though perhaps it was given out by the Captaines to encourage the Souldiers) was very true. For the battaile of Plates was fought in the morning, and this of Mycale in the evening of the same day.

promifes, drawing the barbarous people to follow him, with greathope to make himfelf: Emperour; which newes much troubling the Citic of Rome, with feare of a dangerous Warre; it was fuddainely reported that Antonius was flaine, and his Armie defeated.

Hereupon many did offer facrifice to the Gods, and shew all manner of publique joy, as in such cases was accustomed. But when better inquirie was made, and the Author of these tidings could not bee found; the Emperour Domitical betooke himselfe to his journey against the Rebell; and being with his Armie in march, hee received aduertisement by Poste, of the Victorie obtayned, on the death of Antonias: whereupon remembring the rumour noised before in Rome., of the selfs sane victorie, hee found that the report and victorie were borne vpon one day, though twentie thousand furlongs (which make about sine and twentie hundred miles) a sunder. It is truly said of Palasach, that this last example gives credit vnto many the like. And indeede it were very strange, if among so many rumours, begotten by forgeric or mitakings, and softered by credulous imagination, there should not bee sound (as happens in dreames among many thousand vaine and friuolous) a few precisely true. Howbeit wee may sinde, that God himselfe doth sometimes we to territe those who pressure our presume you their ownessers, by these light meanes of tumultuous noises, as hee raised to see the second survey.

20 the fiege of Samaries, by cauling a found of Horfes and Chariots to affright the Amaries; and as hee threatned Senaberib, faying: Bebold, I will fend a blast Effective open him, and hee float beare a noife, and returns to his some Land. Wherefore it may well have been etrue, that God was pleafed by fich a meane as this, to animate the Greekes; who (as Herodotus notes) went towards the Enemies with heauic hearts, being in great feare, leaft their owne adventure fhould by no meanes fall out well; confidering in what danger they had left their Countrie of Greece, which was readie to bee fubbude by Endendous, which they went wandring to feeke out enemies a farre-off, upon the coast of Asia. But the same of the battaile fought at Platae being noised among them; every man defired that his owne 20 valour in the present fight, might bee form helpe to worke out the full deliuerance of Greeze. In this alacritic of fpirit, they diuided themselues into two Battaillions, whereof the Athenians led the one, by the way of the plaine, directly towards the enemies cample; the Lacedemonians coulded the other, by the Mountaines and straight passages, to winne the higher ground. The Athenians did first set vpon the Campe (ere the Lacedemonians could arrine on the other part) and being desirous to get all the honour of the day to themselues, did so forcibly assages this, that they brake way through the Palissadoes and Gabions, and made themselues Maßers of the place, slaying all that could no slave themselues by flight. In this sight the Samins did good service, as is formerly mentioned.

O. Burthe Milefams, who vponthelike jelousse, were placed by the Persians on the tops of Myeale, to defend the patisges, did now (as if they had beene see of purpose to keep them from running away) put as many to the fower as sell into their hands, letting none scape, except a very sew, that sed through by-pathes. The Lacedamonians that day did little fertice, for the bussessim as displatched ere they came in: Only they broke such Companies as retyred in whole troupes; making them slied dispersed in very much disorder, whereby the stillers were enabled to doe the greater execution vpon them. This was the last fight of that huge Armieleasuied against Greece, which was now vtterly broken, and had no meanes left to make offenssive Warre.

of the barbarous qualitie of XERXES: with a transition from the Ecrium affarrs, to matters of Greece, which from this time grew more worthin of regard.

Exxes lay at Sardis, not farre from the place of this battaile; but Little minde had hee to revenge either this or other his great loffes, 10 being wholly given over to the love of his Brothers Wife: with whom when hee could not preuaile by intreatie, nor would obtaine his defire by force, because hee respected much his Brother her husband, he thought it best to make a match betweene his owne Sonne Darius, and the Daughter of this Woman; hoping by that meanes to finde occasion of such familiaritie, as might worke out his defire. But whether it were fo, that the chafittle of the Mother did ftill reject him, or the beautic of her Daughter allure him : hee foone after fell in loue with his owne Sonnes wife, being a vitious Prince, and asili able to gouerne himfelfe in peace, as to guide his Armie in Warre. This yong Ladie hauing once defired the King to give her the Garment which hee 20 then wore, being wrought by his owne Wife; caused the Queene thereby to perceive her hulbands convertation with her, which flee imputed not fo much to the beautie of her Daughter-in-law, as to the cunning of the Mother, against whom thereupon thee conceined extreme hatred. Therefore at a Royall feaft, wherein the custome was that the King should grant enery request, thee craued that the Wife of Auffles, her hulbands Brother, the yong Ladies Mother. might bee given into her disposition. The barbarous King, who might either have reformed the abuse of such a custome, or have deluded the importunate crueltie of his Wife, by threatning her felfe with the like, to whatfocuer shee thould inflict upon the innocent Ladie, granted the request; and fending for 20 his brother perswaded him to put away the Wife which hee had, and take one of his Daughters in her figad. Hereby it feemes, that hee understood how vislainously that poore Ladie should bee intreated, whom hee knew to bee vertuous, and whom himselfe had loued. Mafilies refused to put her away; alleaging his owne lone, her deferuing, and their common Children, one of which was married to the Kings Sonne, as reasons important to more him to keepe her. But in most wicked manner Xerxes reuiled him; saying, That hee now should neither keepe the Wife which hee had, nor have his Daughter whome hee had promifed vito him. Massites was much grieued with these wordes, but much more, when returning home, hee found his Wife most but- 40 cherly mangled by the Queene Amestris, who had caused her Nose, Lips. Eares, and Tongue to bee cut off, and her Breafts in like manner, which were cast vito Dogs. Sitalifies enraged with this vilanie, tooke his way with his children, and some Friends, towards Bactria, of which Pronince hee was Gonernour, intending to rebell and auenge himfelfe. But Xerxes understanding his purpose, caused an Armie to bee leanied, which cut him off by the way, putting him and all his Companie to the fword. Such was the tyrannicall condition of the Persian Gouernement; and such are generally the effects of Luxurie. when it is joyned with absolute power.

Yet of Norwes it is noted, that he was a Prince of much vertue. And therefore 50 elevander the Great, finding an Image of his ouer-throwne, and lying vpon the ground, faid, T hat hee doubted, whether, in regard of his vertue, hee fhould againe creft it, or, for the milfchiefe done by him to Greece., should let it lie.

But furely what soeuer his other good qualities were, he was soolish, and was a coward, and consequently mercileste.

Therefore wee may firmely beleeue, that the vertue of Cyrus was very great; vpon which the foundation of the Person Engpire was 50 surely laid, that all the wickedness of Nexuses, and other workspinces, could not one other with the surely laid. The wind the surely laid of the surely laid of the surely laid of the surely laid of the surely laid. It was reseasing the English by the fortune of Karnes did continue, as at the first had beene, very good, but against the general elaste of Greece, neither hee, nor any of his posserite, did euer make offensiue warre, but receiued many losses and specially the Assertines, that the Person was no better Souldier at his owne dores, than in a forraine Countrie: whereof good triall was made forth-with, and much better proofe as soone as the affaires of Asserts were quietly seed and assured.

From this time forward I will therefore pursue the Historic of Greece, taking in the matters of Payla, as also the chate of other Countries, collaterally, when the order of time shall present them. True it is, that the Paylan chate continued in her greatnesse, many Ages following, in such wise that the knowne parts of the World had no other Kingdome, representing the Majestie of a great Empire.

But this greatnessed edge-neded only upon the riches and power that had formerly beene acquired, yeelding sew astions or none that were worthy of remembrance, excepting some Tragedies of the Court, and examples of that exceeding Luxurie, where-with both it, and all, or the most of Empires that euer were, haue beene energiated, made vanweldes, and (as it were) fattened for the hungrie fivoreds of poore and hardie Enemies. Hereby it came to, passe, that Xerxes and his Successionies were faince to defined their Crownes with money and base Policies; very following or neuer (vibellies were with great advantage) daring to aductive the trial of plaine battaile with that little Nation of Greece, which would soone have ruined the Sunday disons said by Course, had not printer make and selonse were query

CHAP. VII.

Of things that passed in Greece from the end of the Persian Warre to the beginning of the Peloponnesian.

How Athens was rebuilt and fortified.

TER that the Medes and Persians had received their last blow, and were etterly beaten at Mycale: Leotychides, who then commaunded the Gracian Armie, leaving the pursuit of the warre to the Athenians. affisted by the revolted Iones, returned with the Lacedamonians and other Peloponnesians to Sparta, and 0- 20 ther places, out of which they had beene leuied. The Athenians in the meane while befreged Seflos, a Citie on the strait of the Hellespont , betweene which and Abydus, Xerxes had lately fastned his Bridge of Boats:

where the inhabitants, desperate of succour, did not long dispute the defence thereof, but quitted it to the Greekes, who entertained themselues the Winter following on that side the Hellespont. In the Spring they drew homeward, and having left their wives and children, fince the invation of Attica, and the abandoning of Athens, in divers Islands, and at Treezen, they now found them out, and returned with them to their owne places.

And though the most part of all their houses in Athens were burnt and broken downe, and the walls of the Citie ouer-turned, yet they refolued first on their common defence, and to fortise their Citie, before they cared to couer themselves, their wines and children, with any prinate buildings: Whereof the Lacedamonians being aduertised, and misliking the fortifying of Athens, both in respect that their owne Citie of Sparta was vinwalled, as also because the Athenians were growne more powerfull by Sea, than either themselues, or any other State of Greece, they dispatched messengers to the Athenians to dissuade them; not acknowledging any privat millike or jealousie, but pretending, that if the Persians should returne to inuade Greece a third time, the Athenians being in no better flate to defend themselues than 40 heretofore, the same would serue to receiue their enemies, and to be made a Seat for the Warre, as Thebes had lately beene. To this the Athenians promised to give them farisfaction by their owne Embaffadors very speedily. But being resolved to goe on with their workes by the aduise of Themistocles, they held the Lacedamonians in hope of the contrarie, till they had rayled their wals to that height, as they cared not for their millikes, nor doubted their disturbance; and therefore (to gaine time) they dispatched Themistocles towards Lasedemon, giving him for excuse, that he could not deliuer the Athenians refolutions, till the arrivall of his fellow-Commissioners, who were of purpose retarded. But after a while, the Lacedamonians expectation being converted into jcaloufie (for by the arrivall of divers perfons out 10 of Atrica, they were told for certaine, That the wals of Athens were speedily growne vp beyond expectation) Themislades prayed them not to beleeue reports and vaine rumors, but that they would be pleased to send some of their own trustie Citizens to Athens, from whose relation they might resolue themselues, and determine accordingly. Which request being graunted, and Commissioners Sent, Themistocles dispatched one of his owne, by whome hee aduised the Athenians, first to entertaine the Lacedamonians with fome fuch discourse as might retaine them a few dayes, and in conclusion to hold them among them, till himselfe and the other Athenian Embaffadors, then at Sparta, had their libertie alfo to returne. Which done; and being also affured by his affociates and Ariftides, that Athens was alreadie defensible on all parts, Themistocles demaunding audience, made the Lacedamonians know. That it was true that the wals of Athens were now rayled to that height, as the Athenians doubted not the defence of their Citie; praying the Lacedamonians to to beleeue, That whenfocuer it pleafed them to treat with the Athenians, they would know them for fuch, as right well understood what appertained to a Commonweale and their owne fafetie, without direction and adulfe from any other: That they had in the warre of Xerxes abandoned their Citie, and committed themselves to the woodden wals of their shippes, from the resolution of their owne counsels and courage, and not thereto taught or perfuaded by others: and finally, in all that perillous warre against the Persians they found their owne judgements and the execution thereof in nothing inferior, or leffe fortunate, than that of any other Nation, State, or Commonweale among the Greekes; And therefore concluded, that they determined to be Mafters and Iudges of their owne affaires, and thought it good o reason, that either all the Cities confedered within Greece should be left open, or else that the wals of Athens should be finished and maintained.

The Lacedamonians finding the time vnfit for quarrell, diffembled their millike, both of the fortifying of Athens, and of the division, and so suffered the Athenians to depart, and received backe from them their owne Embassadors.

The wals of Athens finished, they also fortified the Port Pyreus, by which they might under couert imbarke themselves upon all occasions.

The beginning of the Athenian greatnesse, and prosperous warres made by that State upon the Persian.

He Athenians having settled things in good order at home, prepared thirtie Gallies for the pursuit of the warre against the Persians, to which the Lacedemonians added other twentie; and with this Fleet, firengthened by the rest of the Cities of Greece confederated, they set firengthened by the rest of the Chicago of Managarias the Lacedamonian; fayle for Cypres, vnder the conduct of Paufanias the Lacedamonian; where after their landing having possess themselves of many principall places, they imbarked the Armie againe, and tooke land in Thrace, recovering from the Persians AO by force the Citie Bizantium, now Constantinople: from whence Pausanias, behauing himselfe more like a Tyrant than a Captaine, especially towards the Ionians lately reuolted from Kerxes, was called backe by the Councell of Lacedamon, and not onely accused of many insolent behauiors, but of intelligence with the Medes, and Treafon against his Countrey. In his stead they imployed Docres, who either gaue the same cause of offence; or else the Athenians, who affected the first commaundement in that warre, practifed the fouldiors to complaine, though indeed the wife and vertuous behauior of Aristides, Generall of the Athenian forces, a man of rare and incomparable sinceritie, had beene able to make a good Commaunder seeme ill in comparison of himselfe; and therefore was much more availeable, in rendring those to detelted, whose vices affoorded little matter of excuse. Howsoever it were, the Lacedamonians being no leffe wearie of the warre, than the Athenians were eagre to purfue it, the one obtained their cafe and the other the execution and honor which they defired: for all the Greekes (those of Peloponne fus excepted) willingly subjected themselues to the commandement of the Athenians, which was both the beginning of their greatnesse in that present age, and of their ruine in the next succeeding. For the charge of the warre being now committed vnto them, they began to rate the confederated Cities, they appointed Receivers and Treasurers, and began to leuie money, according to their discretion, for the maintenance of the generall defence of Greece, and for the recovering of those places on Europe side, in Alia the leffe, and the Islands, from the Persians. This tribute (the first that was ever paved by the Greekes) amounted to foure hundred and threefcore Talents; which was rayled calily by the honest care of that just man Arifides, to whose discretion all the confederates referred themselves, and no one man found occasion to complaine of him. But as the vertue of Ariflides, and other worthic Citizens, brought vnto 10 the Athenians great commoditie; so the defire which they conceived of encreasing their commoditie, corrupted their vertue, and robbing them of the general! loue, which had made them powerfull, abandoned their Citie to the defence of her treafure, which with her in the next age perified. For it was not long ere these foure hundred and threefcore Talents were rayfed to fix hundred norlong after that ere their couetous T yrannie had connerted their followers into flaues, and extorted from them yearely thirteene hundred Talents. The Ille of Delos was at the first appointed for the Treasure house wherein these summes were layd vp; and where, at the generall allemblic, the Captaines of those forces, fent by the confederates. were for forme lake called to confultation. But the Athenians, who were stronger 20 by feathan all Greece belides, had lockt up the common treasure in an Island, under their owne protection, from whence they might transport it at their pleasure, as afterward they did.

The general Commaunder in this Warre was Cimon, the fonne of Williades. who first tooke Eiona, upon the River Strimon; then the Isle of Sciros, inhabited by the Dolopes: they mastered the Cariffy, and brought into seruitude the Waxii, contrarie to the forme of the confederacie; So did they other the inhabitants of Greece, if at any time they fayled of their contribution, or disobeyed their commaundements; taking your them and vsurping a kind of sourraigneauthoritie ouer the reft: which they exercised the more affuredly, because they were now become 30 Lords of the Sea, and could not be relifted. For many of the confederated Cities and Nations, wearie of the warre in their owne persons, and given vp altogether to their case, made choise rather to pay their parts in money, than either in men of warre, or in thippes; leaving the provition of both to the Athenians. Hereby the one grew weake in all their Sea-defences, and in the exercise of the Warres; the other greatly (trengthened their Nauie and their experiences, being alwayes armed and imployed in honourable Seruices, at the coft of those, who having lifted them into their Saddles, were now enforced to become their footmen. Yer was the Tribute-money, leuied vpon these their confederates, employed so well by the Athenians at the first (as ill proceedings are often founded upon good be- 40 ginnings) that no great cause of repining was given. For they rigged out a great Floet of Gallies, very well manned, wherewith Cimon the Admirall fcouring the Affaticke Seas, tooke in the Citie of Phafelis; which having formerly pretended neutralitie, and refused to relieue, or any way affait the Greekes, were enforced to pay tenne Talents for a fine, and so to become followers of the Athenians, paying yeare-

From thence he fet fayle for the Riner Eurymedon in Pembyllit, where the Pershan Fleer rode, being of fixehundred fayle, or (according to the most sparing report) three hundred and fittie, and hauing a great Land-Armie, encamped upon the shoate, all which forces hauing been promided for aduationing the Kings 50 adiatives in Greece, were vetterly defeated in one day, and two hundred hippes taken by the Athenians, the refi being broken to pieces, or funke, ere cuer they had swomme in the Greekish Sease. Commendating in one day obtained two great visitories, the one by the Sea, and the other by Land, was very foone presented with a third. For fourefcore fayle of Phamicians (who were the best of all Sca-men, vnder the Persan commanual) thinking to have joyned themschues with the Flect before destroyed, arrived you the fame Coast, ignorant of what had passed, and fearing nothing lesse than what ensued. Vpon the first notice of their approach Cimum weighed anchor, and meeting them at an head-Land, called Hydra, did so amaze them, that they only solgh to runne themsclues on ground; by which meane presenting five of their men, they lost all their shippes. These losses did so breake the courage of the Persan, that, omitting all hope of prenailing you Greeze, he condificended to what soeur Articles in pleased the Astherium to propound; graunting laboretie vnto all the Greekes inhabiting Asia; and further couenanting, That none of his shippes of Warre should sayle to the Westward of the Heles, called Crames and Cobellanise.

This was the most honourable peace that euer the Greekes made; neither did they in effect, after this time, make any warre that redounded to the profit or glorie of the whole Nation; till finch time as, ynder Alexander, they ouer threw the Impire of Perfix; in which Warre few, or perhaps none of them; had any place of great command, but Freued altogether valued the Offset debatism.

The death of XERXES by the treason of ARTABANVS.

Efides these losses, which could not easily have beene repaired, the troubles of the Empire were at this time such, as gaue just cause to the Persian of seeking peace vpon any tearmes not altogether into-lerable. For Actabasis, the vncle of Xerxes, perceiving, that the King his maister did easily take small occasions to thed the bloud of fuch, as in kindred or place were neere vinto him, began to recorde leffe hope of fafeite in remaining faithfull, than of obtaining the Soueraignetie, by defiroying a Prince that was lo hated for his crueltie, and defpifed for his cowardife and misfortunes. Hauing conceiued this Treafon, he found meanest to execute it by Antibridates an Eunuch, in fuch clofe manner, that (as if he himfelfe had beene innocent) he accufed Darius the fonne of Xioxes, and caufed him to fuffer death as a Particide. Whether it be true, that by this great wickedneffe he got the Kingdome, and held it feuen moneths, or whether intending the like cuill to Artiacerses the fonne of Xioxes, he was by him preuented and furprifed, it were hard to affirm any certainetic. But all Writers agree upon this, That taken he was, and with his whole familie put to death by extreame torments, according to the fentence, whereof the truth is more auncient than the Verfe.

RTAXERXES being established in his Kingdome, and having so compounded with the Athenians, as the present necessitie of his afcompounded with the Contentions, as the prefer necessite or insat-firers required, began to conceiue new hopes of better fortune against the Greekes, than he or his predeceffors had cuer hitherto found. For 10 the people of Athens, when the Persians were chased out of Greece, did fo highly value their owne merites in that feruice, that they not onely thought it fit for themselues to become the Commanders ouer many Townes and Islands of the Greekes, but, euen within their owne wals, they would admit none other forme of Gouernment than meerely Democraticall. Herein they were fo infolent, that no integritie nor good defert was able to preferue the effate of any fuch as had borne great office, longer than, by flattering the rafcall multitude, he was contented to frame all his words and deedes to their good liking.

This their intolerable demeanour much offended Themistocles; who, though in former times he had layed the foundations of his greatnesse vpon popularitie, yet 20 now prefuming vpon his good feruices done to the State, hee thought that with great reason they might graunt him the libertie to checke their inordinate proceedings. But contrariwife, they were so highly offended with his often rehearling the benefits which they had received from him, that they layed vpon him the punishment of Ostracisme, whereby he was banished for tenne yeares, as a man ouer-burthensome to the Commonwealth.

Before the tipic of his returne was halfe expired, a new accusation was brought against him by the Lacedemonians, who charged him of consulting with Paulanias, about betraying the whole Countrey of Greece vnto Xerxes. Hereupon Themiflocles finding no place of securitie against the malice of two such mightie Cities, 20 was driuen, after many troublesome flights, and dangerous remotings, to aduenture himselfe into Perfia; where he found Artaxerxes newly settled, and was by him very honourably entertained. But the great hope which Artaxerxes had conceiued of aduauncing his affaires by the counsell and affistance of Themislecles, proucd altogether fruitlesse. For when the Athenians, in fauour of Inarus the Lybian. (who intested £gypt, causing it to rebell against the Persian ) had sent a Fleet to Sea, landing an Armic in Agypt, and scowring those Easterne Seas, to the great hinderance of Artanernes, and (for ought that I can understand) to the manifest breach of that peace, which to their great honour they had concluded with Xerxes; then did the King fend his Letters to Themistocles, requiring him to make 40 good the hopes which he had given, of affiring the Perfian estate against the

But whether Themistocles perceived much vnlikelinesse of good successe, in Icading a great Armie of dastardly Persians against the warlike people of Greece; or else (as in fauor of his vertue it is more commonly reported) the loue of his Countrey would not permit him to seeke honour by the ruine of it: sure it is, that being appointed by Artaxerxes to vidertake the conduct of great forces against the Athenians, he decided the great conflict betweene thankfulneffe to his well-deferring Prince, and naturall affection to his owne ill-deferuing people, by finishing his life with a cup of poylon.

How the Athenians, breaking the peace, which to their great honour they had made with the Perfian, were shamefully beaten in Agypt.

Hen was Artaxerxes driven to vie the feruice of his owne Captaines in the . Egyptian warre, wherein it appeared well, That a just cause is a good defence against a strong enemic. An Athenian Fleet of two hundred fayle ftrong was fent forth vnder Cimon, to take in the Ific of Cyprus: which conquest seemed easie both to make and to maintaine, the Persian being vtterly broken at Sea, and thereby vnable to relieue the Island. Now although it were fo, that a peace had beene concluded, which was likely to have beene kept fincerely by the Persian, who had made so good proofe of the Grecian valour, that he was nothing defirous to build any shippes of Warre ( without which the Greekes could receive no harme from him) whereof if any one should be found fayling towards Greece, the peace was immediately broken, and if not, his whole effate; yet all the Sea-coast (no small part of his Dominions) exposed to the waste of an enemic too farre ouer-matching him. Yet whether the Athenians were 20 in doubt, lest the league which in his owne worser fortunes hee had made with them, he would breake in theirs; and therefore fought to get fuch affurance into their hands, as might veterly disable him from attempting aught against them; or whether the increase of their reuenues and power, by adding that rich and great Iland to their Empire, caused them to measure honour by profite; they thought it the wifest way, to take whilest they might, what socier they were able to get and hold, and he vnable to defend. The Ile of Cypres lying in the bottome of the straights betweene Cilicia, Syria and Egypt, is very fitly feated for any Prince of State, that being mightie at Sea, doth either feeke to enrich himfelfe by trade with those Countries, or to infest one or 30 more of them when they are hisenemies. And this being the purpose of the Athenians, their Ambition which had already denoured, in conceit, this Iland, was on the fodaine well-nigh choaked with a greater morfell, to fnatch at which, they let Cyprus alone, which they might easily have swallowed and digested. For Inarus King of the Lybians confining Leypt, having found how greatly the Country was exhausted by the late warres, and how weakely defended by very slender Persian garrifons, conceived rightly, that if fuch small forces as the Satrapa or Viceroy could make on the fodaine of his owne Gardes, or leuie out of the ordinarie Garrisons, were by him defeated; the naturalls of the Countrey, not long fince oppreffed by Cambr-(es, and after a renolt very lately subdued by Xerxes, would soone breake faith with 40 him who had no other title to that kingdome than a good fword. Further, he perfwaded bimfelfe that the people, vnable to defend themfelues against the Perstan without his affiltance; would eafily be drawne to accept him, the author of their deliuerance for king. Neither did this hope deceive him. For having taken and cruelly flaine Achemenes the Viceroy; divers Cities forthwith declared themselves for him, and proclayming him king, showed the most of their endeuour for profecution of the warre. But hee confidering his owne weakeneffe, and that the meanes of the Agyptians his adherents were not answerable to their desires, perceived wel, that to relift the power of Artisernes, farre greater forces than his and theirs were to be procured, at what price socuer he obtained them . Therefore hearing of the 50 great Athenian fleete, and knowing well the vertue of the fouldiers therein endeanqued; he inuited the Commaunders to share with him the kingdome of Activities a farregreater reward of their aduenture, than fuch an addition as that of Ciprus could be to their cltate. Whether hee or they (if things had wholy forted according to their expectation) would have beene contented with an equal! thare, and not have fallen out in the partition, were perhaps a dimination vinecessarie. Hee was possessed of the peoples love, they were of most power. But the iffue of those affaires was fuch as left them nothing to communicate but misfortunes, which they shared somewhat equally. Yet had the beginnings of their enterprise very good and hopefull successe: For they entred the Land as farre as to Memphis, the principall Citie; and of the Citie it selfethey tooke two parts: to the third part, which was called the White wall, they layd fuch hard fiege, that neither those forces of the Persians, which then were in Agypt, were strong enough to remove them; neither could Artanernes well denife what meanes to vie for the recourse of that which was loft, or for the preferuation of the remainder. The best of his hope was by 10 fetting the Laced emonians upon Athens, to enforce the Athenians to looke homewards to their owne defence. This was the first time that the Persian fought to procure affiftance of the Greekes one against the other, by stirring them vp with gold to the entertainement of private quarrels, for the good of their common enemie. To this purpose he sent Megabazus to Sparta with much Treasure; who, after great expence, finding that the Laced amonians were nothing forward in imploying their whole force against the Athenians, whome in many conflicts of great importance they had found to be their matches, notwithstanding the absence of their Armie in Egypt; he thought it his wifest way to imploy the rest of his money and means to their reliefe, who had now the space of fixe yeares defended his maisters right 20 in Agypt. Therefore he hashily dispatched another of his name, the sonne of Zopyrus, who arriving in Agypt, was first encountred by the revolted people; over whome he obtained a victorie, which made him maister of the Countrey, whilest the Athenians lay busied about Memphis the great Citie. It cannot be doubted, that long abode in a strange ayre, and want of supplie, had much enseebled the Athenia ans: fure it is, that when Megabazas, having reduced the Countrey to obedience, attempted the Citie it felfe, whether his former fucceffe had amended the courage of the Persians, or want of necessaries made the Athenians inferior to themselues, he chased them out of Memphis, and pursued them so neere, as they were forst to fortifie themselues in the Isle of Prosopites, where Megabazus, after eighteene 30 the Rivers of moneths flege, turning away one part of the River by divers Trenches, affaulted Taly and Phar- the Athenian without impediment of waters, tooke their Gallies, and put all to the of the out-lets fword, faue a few that faued themselues by flight into Lybia; the same entertainement had liftic other Gallies which they fent to the fuccour of the first two hundred. For those Athenians having heard nothing that their Fleet and Armie was confumed, entred by the branch of Nilus, called Mendelium, and fell vnawares among the Phanician Gallies and the Persian Armie; so as the Persians recovered all Agypt, but that part held by Amyrteus, and Inarus the King of Lybia, being by them the out-let cal- taken and hanged. This was the end of the Athenians fixe yeares warre in Agypt. and the reward of their vanitie and indifcretion to undertake many enterprises at 40 wards Alexandria.

Atendefias is an Island in led Busiritiens and Dioless. Burthe branch Office. of Wilus, called Mend fium, runneth into the Sea by the Citic Panaof other Warres made by the Athenians for the most part with good successes, about the same time, Otwithstanding these ouerthrowes in Agypt, yet the Athenians in their home-warres waded through many difficulties, and held the reputation of their forces against the Lacedamonians, Corinthians, and others, rather to their aduantage than otherwise. For as they were beaten neere vnto Halia by the Corinthians and Epidaurians, so they obtained two great victories foone after; the one over the Peloponnesians, neere vnto Cecryphalia; the other over the Eginets, neere vnto Egina; where they funke and carried carried away threefcore and ten Gallies of their Enemies. Burthermore, they landed their forces on the fuddaine, and belieged Egina, from whence they could not he moued not with landing that the Corinthians, to divert them, invaded Megara : where, after a great fight, with equal loffe, the Corinthans, when they returned againe to fet up their Trophic, as Victors in the former battaile, were viterly broken and flaughtered by the Athenian Garrisons, and Megarians to their great loffe

Againe, as the Ahenians were discomfitted peare to Tanagra by the Lacedamonians, who returned from the fuccour of the Dorians against the Phocians, ( at which to time the The Salian horse-men turned from their Allies the Athenians, and fought against them) so about threescore daies after, the Athemans entred Baotia under the conduct of Myronides, where beating that Nation; they wanne Phocus on the gulfe Octeus, and euened the walls of Tanagra to the ground. Finally, they inforced & ring to render upon most base conditions; as to beate downe the walls of their Citie. and to give them hoftages for Tribute ; the flege whereof they had continued, horwithflanding all their other brabbles and attempts elfewhere. Befides these victories they fackt and fpoiled many places upon the Sea-coast of Pelaponnesus, belonging to the Lacedamonians, wanne upon the Corinchians, and Overthrew the Sievenians that came to their fuccour. These were the vadertakings of the Athenians, and their Allies, during the time of those fixe yeares that a part of their forces made warre in . Egypt. In the end whereof they attempted The flatte, per fluided thereunto by Orestes, but were relisted by the King Phanfalus, who had chased Orestes out of his Dominions. They also landed in Sicyonia, and had victoric over those that resifled, after which they made truce with the Peloponnelians for five yeares, and fent Cimon into Cyprus with two hundred thips, but they were againe allured by Amyrteus one of the race of their former Kings, who held the Marilly and Wooddie parts of Levet from the Persians, to whom they sent lixtie of their ships. The rest of their Armie failing in their enterprise of Cyprus, and their fortunate and victorious Leader Gimondying there, as they coulted the Hand, incountred a fleet of the Phanitians and Cilicians, over both which Nations they returned victorious into Greece as also thosereturned fafe which were fent into Egypt. ili o nempraso idi.

Of ARTAXERXES LONGIMANYS, that he was AHASHVEROSH the husband of Queene HESTER.

Hele Egyptian troubles being ended, the raigne of Artaxerxes continued peaceable, whereof the length is by fonie restrained into twentie yeares, but the more and better Authors giue him fortie, some allow vnico him soure and sortie. The was a Prince of much humanitie, and noted for many examples of gentlenesse. His sauour was exceeding great to the Iewes, as appeareth by the Histories of Eldras and Nehemias, which fell in his time.

To proue that this was the King who gaue countenance and aide to that great worke of building the Temple, it were a needleffe trauaile; confidering that all the late Dinines have taken very much paine, to shew that those two Prophets were licenced by him, and fuccoured in that building, in fuch fore as ap-50 peares in their writings.

This was likewife that King Abalbuerolb who maried Hefter. Wherof if it be needfull to give proofe it may fuffice: That Abalbuerolh lived in Sula, raigning from India to Ethiopia, and therefore must have been a Persian; That hee lived in peace; as appeares by the circumstances of the Historie, and vsed the counsaile of the seuen Princes, the authoritie of which Princes beganne under Darius, the fonne of Hylta-(pes, wherefore he could be neither Cyrus nor Cambyles.

The continual Warres which exercised King Darius the sonne of Hystaspes, together with the certainetic of his marriages with fundrie wives, from none of whom he was dinorced, but left his first wife Atoffa, the daughter of Cyrus, aliue in great honour, thee being mother to Xexxes the fucceeding King; doe manifestly proue that Helter was not his. Whereunto is added by Philo the Jew, That at the perswafion of Mardochem; Joiachim the high Priest the sonne of Jefua, caused the feast of Purim to bee inflituted in memorie of that deliuerance. Now the time of Ioiachim was in the raigne of Artaxerxes, at the comming of Eldras, and Nehemias: Ielua his father dving about the end of Darius.

The same continuance of warres, with other his furious and tragical loues, wherewith Xerxes did confume fuch little time as hee had free from warre, are enough to proue, that the storie of Hester pertained not vnto the time of Xerses, who lived but one and twentic yeares, wheras the two and thirtith of Abaluerus or Artafallba is expressed by Nehemias. Againe it is well knowne that Nerves in the fenenth yeare of his raigne ( wherein this marriage must have beene celebrated ) came not neare to Sula. Of the Princes that succeeded Artaxerxes Longimanus, to proue that none of them could be Abafbuerofh, it is enough to fay, that Mardochess having been carried from Hierufalem captine, with Iechonia, by Nebuchadnezwar, was vnlike to 20 haue lived vnto their times.

But of this Artaxerxes it is true, that he lived in Sula, raigned from India to . Ethiopia, lived in peace, was contemporarie with Joiakim the high Priest; and further hee had happily by his Lieutenants reclaimed the rebellious Applians in that feuenth yeare of his raigne; which good fortune might well give occasion to such a Roiall feaft, as is described in the beginning of the booke of Hester. This is the fumme of the arguments, brought to proue the age of Hefters storic by the learned and diligent Krentzhemius, who addes the authorities of Iosephus, affirming the fame, and of Philo, giving to Mardochaus eighteene yeares more than Ilaac the Patriarch lived, namely one hundred fourescore and eighteene yeares in all, which ex- 20 pire in the fine and thirtieth yeare of this Artaxerxes, if wee fuppose him to have beene carried away captine, being a Boy of ten yeares old.

Of the troubles in Greece, foregoing the Peloponnesian Warre.

Wtit is fit that we now returne to the affaires of the Greekes, who from this time forward, more vehemently profecuting their civill warres, fuffered the Persians for many ages to reft in peace; this Agyptian ex- 40 pedition being come to nought. Soone after this the Laced smonians vndertooke the warre called, Sacred, recoursed the Temple and Ile of

Delphos, and delivered both to the Inhabitants; but the Athenians regained the fame, and gaue it in charge to the Phocians. In the meane while the banished Baotians reentred their owne Land, and mastred two of their owne Townes possess by the Athenians, which they soone recourred agains from them, but in their returne towards Athens the Baotians, Eubaans, and Locreans, (Nations opprest by the Athemians) fet vpon them with fuch resolution, as the Athenians were in that fight all flaine or taken, whereby the Baotians recoursed their former libertie, restoring to the Athenians their prisoners. The Handers of Eubara tooke such courage vpon this, 50 that they revolted wholly from the Athenians, whom when Pericles intended to reconquer, he was advertised that the Megarians ( who first left the Lacedamonians, and submitted themselves to Athens) being now wearie of their yoke, had slaine the Athenian Garrisons, and ioyned themselves with the Corinthians, Sicyonians, and Epidaurians. These newes hastened Pericles homeward with all possible speede; but ere he could recouer Attica, the Peloponnesians, led by Plistoanax, the sonne of Paulamias, had inuaded it, pillaged, and burnt many parts thereof; after whose returne Pericles went on with his first intent and recovered Eubara. Finally, the Athenians beganne to treate of peace with the Peloponnesians, and yeelded to deliuer vp all the places which they held in the Countrie of Peloponnefus; and this truce was made for thirtie yeares. After fixe of these yeares were expired, the Athenians (fauouring the Milelyans against the Samians) invaded Samos by Perioles, and after many repulses, and some great losses, both by Sea and Land, the citizens were forc't to yeeld them-To felues vpon most lamentable conditions; Namely, to deliuer vp all their ships, to breake downe their owne walls, to pay the charge of the warre, and to reftore whatfoeuer had beene taken by themselves, or by their practise, from the Athenians. In the neck of which followed that long and cruell Peloponnessan Warre, whereof I haue gathered this Briefe following: the same contention taking beginning fiftie veares after the flight of Xerxes out of Greece. But because there was no Citie thereof, which either in the beginning of this warre, or in the continuance of it, was not drawne into the quarrell: I hold it conuenient now at the first to shew briefly the eflate of the Countrie at that time, and especially the condition of those two great Cities, Albens and Sparta, vpon which all the rest had most dependance.

Of the Peloponnesian Warre.

Vpon what termes the two principall Cities of Greece, Athens and Sparta, flood, at the beginning of the Peloponnesian Warre.

REEGE was never whited under the government of any one Prince or Estate; vntill Philip of Macedon, and after him Alexander, brought them rather to a Vnion and League against the Persian, whereof they were Captaines, than into any absolute subjection. For euery Estate held their owne, and were gouerned by Lawes farre different, and by their owne Magistrates, notwithstanding the power of the Mucdonians, to whom they did yield obedience no otherwise than as to fuch, who were (perforce) their leaders in the Perfi-an warre(deemed the General quarrell of Greece) and tooke the profit and honor of the victoric, to their owne vse and increase of greatnesse. But the Kings which afterwards raigned in Macedonia, did so farre enlarge their authoritie, that all Greece was by them brought under fuch obedience, as differed little from feruitude; very 50 few excepted, who could hardly, fometimes with armes, and fometimes with gifts, preserve their libertie; of whom the Lacedamonians and Athenians were chiefe: which two people deserted best the plague of tyrannie, having first given occasion thereunto, by their great ambition, which wearied and weakened all the Countrie by perpetual Warre. Forvntill these two Cities of Athens and Sparts diffracted Hhhh 2

all Greece, drawing euery State into the quarrell, on the one or other fide, and so gaue beginning to the Pelapome/ian war (the effects whereof in true estimation ceaded not, before the time that Philip had ouer-mastired all, for assume as cuery conclusion of one warre afforded henceforth matter to some new distraction of the whole Countrie); the warres, commenced between one Citic of Greece and an other, were entitler great, nor of long continuance. All controucties were some decided, either by the authoritie of the Amphicianes, who were the generall Councell of Greece, 3 or by the power of the Lacedemonan, whose aide was commonly held as good as the allurance of victorie.

These Lacedamonians had lived about foure hundred yeares under one formeof 10 Gouernement, when the Peloponnesian warre beganne. Their education was only to practife feates of Armes; wherein they so excelled, that a very few of them were thought equall to very great numbers of any other people. They were poore, and cared not much for wealth; euery one had an equall portion of the common field, which sufficed to maintaine him in such manner of life as they vsed. For brauerie they had none, and curious building or apparell they regarded not. Their diet was simple, their feasts and ordinarie meales being in common Halls, where all fared alike. They vsed money of yron, whereof they could not be couctous nor great hoarders. Briefly, they lived Viopian-like, fave that they vied no other occupation than Warre, placing all their felicitie in the glorie of 20 their valour. Hereby it came to passe that in all enterprises, whereof they were partakers, the leading and high command was granted to them, and all Greece followed their conduct. But the Athenians were in all points contrarie to this. For they fought wealth, and measured the honours of their victories by the profit; they vsed mercenarie Souldiers in their warres, and exacted great tribute of their Subjects, which were for the most part llanders, compelled to obey them, because the Athenian fleet was great.

As in forme of policie, and in course of life, so in conditions naturall, the difference betweene these two people was very much. The Athenians were eager and violent, suddaine in their conclusions, and as hastic in the execution; The Lacede- 30 monians very flow in their deliberations, full of grauitie, but very refolute, and fuch as would in cold bloud performe what the Athenisms did viually in flaggant. Whereby it came to passe that the Lacedemonians had all the Estates of Greece depending vpon them, as on men firme and affured, that fought honour and not riches; whereas the Athenians were followed by fuch as obeyed them perforce, being held in ftraight subjection. But the Signoric of the Athenians was nothing large, vntill fuch time as the Persian Xerxes had inuaded Greece, pretending only a quarrell to Aihens: For then the Citizens perceiuing well, that the Towne of Athens could not beedefended against his great Armie of seuenteene hundred thousand men, bestowed all their wealth upon a Nauie, and (affished by the other Grecians) ouerthrew the fleet 40 of Xerxes, whose Land forces were soone after discomfitted by them, and the Greekes, who all served under conduct of the Spartans. After these victories, the Athenians being now very mightie in fleet, reduced all the Ilands of the Greekill Seas vnder their obedience; impoling vpon them a hard tribute, for maintenance (as they pretended) of warre against the Persian; though indeede they imploied their forces chiefly, to the conqueft of fuch Ilands, and hauen-Townes, of their owne Countrimen, as stood out against them. All which was easily suffered by the Lacedamonians, who were In-landers, and men that delighted not in expeditions to bee made farre from home. But afterwards perceiuing the power of the Athenians to grow great, they held them in much jelousie, and were very apt to quarrell with 50 them; but much more willing to breede contention betweene them and other Estates. Wherefore at such time as the Thebans would have oppressed the Plateans, when they of Platea repaired to Sparta for succour, they found there no other aide, than this aduise, That they should seeke helpe at Athens. Hereby it was was thought, that the Athenians should be intangled in a long and tedious Warre, with their Neighbours of Thebes. But it proued otherwise; for their force was now so great, that all such occasions did only serve to encrease their honour and puissance.

ð. I I.

How Sparta and Athens entred into Warre.

Euerthelesse many Estates of Greece were very ill affected to athers, because that Citie grew very insolent vpon suddaine prosperitie, and maintayning the weaker Townes against the stronger, in croched apace vpon their Neighbours, taking their dependants from them. Especially the Corinthians were much intaged, because the people of the lland Coreyra, their Colonie which had rebelled against them, and gluen them a greatouerthrow by Sea, was by the Athenians (who delired to increase their sleet by adioyning that of Coreyra vinto it) taken into protection, and the Corinthians thereby impeached of that reuenge which else they would haue 20 taken. Now how soer it were so, that these dealings of the Athenians were not directly against the conditions of peace agreed you among the Greekes, yet were the complaints made at Spars so to tennent, that (though with much a-doe) they concluded to redresse by warre the injuries done to their Allies.

First therefore feeking religious pretences, they required the *athenians* to expiate certaine offences committed against the Gods; whereto having for answere, That they themselves should expiate other the like offences, committed in *Sparts*; they beganne to dealth plainely, and required that the people of some Townes, oppressed by the Estate of *Ashens*, should be set at liberate; and that a decree made against those of *Congara*, whereby they were forbidden to enter any Port of the 30 *Athenians*; should be returned they for carnelly pressed they might obtaine it they promised to absist from their purpose of making, they might obtaine it they promised to absist from their purpose of making.

This they defired, not as a matter of any great importance (for it was a trifle) but only that by feeming to have obtained fomewhat; they might preferue their reputation without entring into a warre, which threatned them with greater difficulties apparent, than they were very willing to under-goe.

But the Athenians would yeeld to nothing; for it was their whole desire that all Greece should take notice, how farre they were from seare of any other Citic. Hereupon they prepared on both sides very strongly, all that was needfull to the Warre; wherein the Lacedamonian were Superiour, both in number and qualitic, being affisted by most of the Cities in Greece; and having the generall sauour, as menthat pretended to set as libertie such as were oppressed the man Athenian did as sarre exceede them in all prouisons, of Money; Shipping, Engines, and absolute power of command among their Subjects; which they held; and afterward found of greater viein such neede, than the willing readinesse of friends, who soone grow wearie, and are not callly assembled.

He first and second yeares expedition was very grienous to the Citie of Athens. For the Fields were wasted, the Trees cut downe; the Countrie people driven to flie, with their Wives, Children, and Cattaile, into the Towne; whereby a most furious pestilence grew in the Citic, fuch as before they had neither felt, nor heard of. Hercunto was added the renolt of the Mytilenians, in the Ile of Lesbos, and the fiege of Platea 10 their confederated Citie, which they durft not aductive to raife; belides fome fmall ouerthrowes received. The Lacedamonians affembling as great forces as they could raise out of Peloponnelus, did in the beginning of Summer enter the Countrie of Attics, and therein abide, vntill victualls beganne to faile, wasting and destroying all thinges round about : The Gouernours of the Athenians would not fuffer the people to iffue into the field against them; for they knew the valour of their Enemies; but vsed to send a fleet into Peroponnesus, which wasted as fast all the Seacoast of their Enemies, whilest they were making warre in Attica. So the Peloponnefians being the stronger by Land, wanne the Towne of Platea, which wanted rescue; the Athenians likewise being more mightie by Sea, did subdue Ostytilene 20 which had rebelled, but could not be succoured from Sparta. By these proceedings in that Warre, the Laced emonians beganne to perceive how vnfit they were to deale with fuch enemies. For after that Attica was throughly wasted, it lay not greatly in their power to doe any offence equall to such harme as they themselves might, and did receive. Their Confederates beganne to fet forward very flowly, in their expeditions into Atmes, perceiving well that Athens was plentifully relicued with all necessaries, which came by Sea from the Hands that were subject vnto that estate; and therefore these innaders tooke small pleasure in beholding the walls of that mightie Citie, or in wasting a for faken field, which was to them a patterne of the calamities, with which their owne Territoric was the whileft afflicted. 20 Wherefore they beganne to fet their care to build a firong Nauie, wherein they had little good fucceffe, being cafily vanquilhed by the Athenians, who both had more and better ships, and were so skillfull in Sca-fights, that a few Vessells of theirs durff undertake a great number of the Pelopomefians.

Mong other loffes which the Spartans had felt by Sen; they received 40 at Pylus a very fore blow, that compelled them to fue for peace. A fleet of Athenian thips bound for Coreyrs, wasting in that pallage, as their manner was, the coast of Laconia, and all the halfe Ile of Peloponness, wis by contrarie windes detained at Pylue, which is a ragged Promontorie, joyning to the maine; by a fraight necke of Land, Before it there lies a small barren Iland of lesse than two miles compasse, and within, that a creeke, which is a good harbour for ships, the force of weather being borne off by the head-Land and Ille. This Promontorie the Athenians fortified, as well as in hast they might; and what was wanting in their artificiall fortification, was supplied by the natural strength and site of the place: By holding this peece of ground, and haven, they reasonably expected many advantages against their enemies. For the Countrie adioyning was inhabited by the Meffenians, who in ancient time had held very firong and cruell warre with Sparta; and though quite subdued they were held in straight subjection, yet was not the old hatred so extinguished, that by the neare neighbourhood and affiftance of the Athenians, it might not bee reuiucd. Furthermore it was thought, that many ill-willers to the Lacedamonians, and as many of their bond-flaues as could escape from them, would repaire to Pylus, and from thence make daily excursions into Laconia, which was not farre off: Or if other hopes failed, yet would the benefit of this hauen, lying allmost in the midway betweene them and Coreyra, make them able to fur-round all Pelovonnelius, and wait it at their pleasure. The newes of these doings at Pylus, drew the Peloponnesians thither in all haft out of Attica, which they had entred a few daies before with their whole Armie: but now they brought not only their Land-forces, but all their Naue, to recouer this peece, which how bad a neighbour it might proue in time, they well forefaw, little fearing the grieuous loffe at hand, which they there in few daies received. For when they in vaine made a generall affault on all lides, both by Sca and Land; finding that fmall Garrison which the Athenians had left, very resolute in the defence: they occupied the hauen, placing foure hundred and twentie choice men all of them, Citizens of Sparta, in the Iland before mentioned, at each end whereof is a channell, that leades into the Port; but fo narrow, that only two ships in front could enter betweene the Isle and Pylus; likewise but seuen or eight ships could enter at once by the further channell, betweene the Iland and the Maine. Hauing thus taken order to flut vp this new Towne by Sca, they fent part of their fleet to fetch wood, and other stuffe, wherewith to fortific round about, and block vp the pecce on all fides. But in the meane leafon, the Athenian fleet, hearing of their danger that were left at Pylus, returned thither, and with great courage entring the haven, did breake and finke manie of their Enemies veffells; tooke fine, and inforced the refidue to runne themselves a ground.

Now was the Towne fecure, and the Spartans abiding in the Iland as good as loft. Wherefore the Magistrates were sent from Sparta to the camp (as was their custom in great dangers) to adule what were best for the publike safetie; who when they did perceiue that there was no other way to rescue their Citizens out of the He, then by composition with their enemies, they agreed to entreat with the Athenians about peace, taking truce in the meane while with the Captaines at Pylus. The conditions of the truce were, That the Lacedemonians should deliver up all the ships which were in the coast, and that they should attempt nothing against the Towne. nor the Athenium against the camp: That a certaine quantitie of Bread, Wine, and Flesh, should bee daily carried into the Isle, but that no ships should passe into the Iland fecretly: That the Athenians should carrie the Lacedemonian Embassadors to Athens, there to treat of peace, and should bring them back, at whose returne the truce shouldend, which if in the meane time it were broken in any one point, flould be held vtterly void in all: That when the truce was expired, the Athenians should restore the Peloponnesian ships, in as good case as they received them. The And Embassiadors comming to Athens, were in opinion, that as they themselves had begunne the warre, fo might they end it when they pleased. Wherefore they told the Athenians how great an honour it was that the Lacedemonians did fue to them for peace; admining them to make an end of warre, whilest with such reputation they might. But they found all contrarie to their expectation : For in stead of concluding upon euen termes, or defiring of meete recompence for loffe fuftained; the Athenians demanded certaine Cities to bee restored to them, which had beene taken from them by the Lacedemonians long before this warre beganne, refuling likewife to continue the treatie of peace, vnleffe the Spartans which were in the lle, were first rendred vnto them as prisoners. Thus were the Embassa-50 dours returned without effect; at which time the truce being ended, it was defited of the Athenian Captaines that they should, according to their couenant, restore the ships, which had beene put into their handes. Whereto answere was made that the condition of the truce was, That if any one article were broken, all should bee held void; now (faid the Athenians) yee have affaulted our Garrisons, and thereby are we acquited of our promife to reflore the flips. This and the like friuolous allegations which they made, were but meere flifts; yet profit fo farreouer-weighed honour, that better answere none could be got. Then were the Later-damonian driven to vie many hard meanes, for conveiance of victualls into the Ille; which finally was taken by force, and the men that were in it carried prisoners to Athems, where it was decreed, that when the Peloponnesian next invaded Athica, these prisoners should all be flaine. Whether fearing the death of these men, or with-lield by the troubles, which (according to the Athenium hope) fell vpon them; the Laterdamonium were now fo farre from wasting Atties, that they suffered their owne Countrie to be continually ower-runne, both by the Athenium, who landed to nall parts of their coat, and by those which issued out of Pylus; which became the Rendeuous of all that were ill-affected vnot them.

è. V.

How the Lacedemonians hardly, and to their great disadnantage, obtained a peace, that was not well kept.

Herefore they indeuoured greatly to obtaine peace; which the Athenians would not hearken vnto. For they were so puffed vp with the 10 continuance of good successe, that having sent a few bands of men into Sicilie, to hold vp a faction there, and make what profit they might to Statite, to noin up a raction there, and make what a probability of the Sicilians quarrells, when afterward they heard that the difference of the stations rences in that He were taken away, and their bands returned without either gaine or losse, they banished the Captaines, as if it had beene meerely through their default, that the Ile of Sicilie was not conquered; which (besides the longer distance) was in power to offend others, or defend it selfe, no whit inferiour vnto Peloponnefus. Yet was this their ouer-weening much abated shortly after, by some disasters received, especially in Thrace, where in a battaile which they lost at Amphipolis, Cleon, and Brasidas, Generalls of the Athenian and Lacedamonian forces, were both 20 flaine; which two had most beene aduerfaries to the peace. As the Athenians by their losses were taught moderation; so the Lacedamonians, who not only felt the like wounds, but through the great Nauie which they had received at Pylus, were faine to proceede lamely in the warre, against such as, through commoditie of their good fleet, had all advantage that could be found in expedition, were feruently defirous to conclude the businesse, ere Fortune by any new fauour should reuiue the insolence, which was at this time well mortified in their Enemies. Neither was it only a consideration of their present estate, that wrged them to bring the treatie of peace to good and speedie effect; but other dangers hanging ouer their heads, and readie to fall on them, which valeffe they compounded with the Athenians, they 40 knew not how to avoide. The effate of Argos, which had ancient enmitte with them, was now, after a truce of thirtie yeares well-nigh expired, readie to take the benefit of their present troubles, by ioyning with those who alone found them worke enough. Argos was a rich and strong Citie, which though inferiour to Sparia in valour, yet was not fo vnwarlike, nor held fuch ill correspondence with the neighbouring Estates, that the Lacedamonians could ever faire prevaile vponit, when they had little else to doe. This was a thing that in the beginning of this Warre had not been regarded. For it was then thought that by wasting the Territorie of Athens with sword and fire, the quarrell should easily and in short time haue beene ended, whereby not only the Athenians (hould have beene brought to 50 good order but the Corinthians and others, for whose sake the warre was under taken haue beene fo firmely knit to the Lacedamonians, that they should for love of them have abandoned the Argines, to their owne fortunes. But now the vanitie of those hopes appeared, in that the A. henians abounding in readie money, and meanes

to raife more, were able to fecure themfelues by a firong fleet, from any great harme, that the Pelapome/jans wanting wherewith to maintaine a Nauie, could do wroto them, yea as Maffers of the Sea, to wearie them out, as in effect alreadie they had done. As for the Confederates of $paris, they could now endure neither warre nor peace; their daily trauailes, and many lofles had fo wearied and incenfed them. Wherefore the Lacadamonism were glad to wice the occasion, which the inclination of their enemies did then afford, of making a finall peace, which with much a-doe they procured, as feemed equall and eafie; but were indeede impossible to be performed, and therefore all their trauaile was little effectuall.

formed, and therefore all their trauaile was little effectuall. The restitution of prisoners and places taken being agreed upon; it fell out by lot, that the Lacedamonians should restore first. These had won more townes upon the continent from the Athenians, than the Athenians had from them; but what they had wonne, they had not wonne absolutely. For they had restored some Townes to fuch of their Allies, from whom the State of Athens had taken them; fome, and those the most, they had set at libertie (as reason required) which had opened their gates vnto them, as to their friends and deliverers, and not compelled them to break in as Enemies. Now concerning the Townes which were not in their owne hands; but had been erendred vnto their Confederates, the Spartans found meanes to give fome fatisfaction, by permitting the Albenians to retain others, which they had got-20 ten in the warre; as for the rest, they promised more than afterwards they could performe. The Cities which they had taken into protection, could not endure to heare of being abandoned, neither would they by any meanes yeeld them felues into the handes of their old Lords the Athenians, whom they had offended by revolting, notwithstanding whatsoener articles were drawen, and concluded, for their fecuritie, and betterance in time to come. This dull performance of conditions on the side of the Spartans, made the Athemans become as backward in doing those thinges which on their part were required; fo that refloring only the prisoners which they had, they deferred the rest, vntill such time as they might receite the full fatisfaction, according to the agreement. But before such time as these diffi-30 culties brake out into matter of open quarrell, the Lacedemonians entred into a more straightfalliance with the Athenians; making a league offensive and defensive with them. Hereunto they were moued by the backwardnesse of the Argines, who being (as they thought) likely to have fued for peace at their hands, as foone as things were once compounded betweene Athens and Sparta; did shew themselues plainly vinwilling to give care to any fuch motion. Thinking therefore, that by cutting from A gas all hope of Athenian Succour, they should make fure worke, the Spartans regarded not the affections of other States, whom they had either bound vnto them by well-deferuing in the late warre, or found for rouble some, that their enmittee (if perhaps they durst let it appeare) were little worse than friendship. It bred great an jelousic in all the Cities of Greece, to perceive such a conjunction betweene two so powerfull Signories: especially one clause threatning enery one, that was any thing apt to feare, with a fecret intent that might be harboured in their proud conceipts: of fubduing the whole Countrie, and taking each what they could lay hold on. For besides the other articles, it was agreed, That they might by mutual consent adde new conditions, or alter the old at their owne pleasures. This impression wrought fo strongly in the Corinthians, Thebans, and other ancient Confederates of Sparta, that the hate which they had borne to the Athenians their professed Enemies, was violently throwne vpon the Lacedamonians their vnjust friends: whereby it came passe, that they who had lately borne chiefe sway in Greece, might have beene abandoned 50 to the discretion of their Enemies, as alreadie in effect they were, had the Enemies wisely vsed the advantage.

of the negotiations, and practifes, held betweene many States of Greece, by occasion of the peace that was concluded.

He admiration wherein all Greece held the valour of Sparta as virefiftable, and able to make way through all impediments, had beene fo excelline, that when by some timiler accidents, that Citie was compelled to take and feeke peace, vpon termes not founding very 10 compelled to take and reeke peace, vpos compelled to take and reeke peace, vpos honourable, this common opinion was not only abated, but (as hap-honourable, this common opinion was not only abated, but (as hap-honourable, this common opinion was not only abated, but (as hap-honourable, this common opinion was not only abated, but (as hap-honourable, this common opinion was not only abated, but (as hap-honourable, this common opinion was not only abated, but (as hap-honourable, this common opinion was not only abated, but (as hap-honourable, this common opinion was not only abated, but (as hap-honourable, this common opinion was not only abated, but (as hap-honourable, this common opinion was not only abated, but (as hap-honourable, this common opinion was not only abated, but (as hap-honourable, this common opinion was not only abated, but (as hap-honourable, this common opinion was not only abated, but (as hap-honourable, this common opinion was not only abated, but (as hap-honourable, this common opinion was not only abated, but (as hap-honourable, this common opinion was not only abated, but (as hap-honourable, this common opinion was not only abated, but (as hap-honourable, this common opinion was not only abated, but (as hap-honourable, this common opinion was not opinion opinion was not opinion was not opinion was not opinion opinion was not opinion opin pens viually in things extreme) was changed into much contempt. For it was neuer thought that any Lacedamonian would have endured to lay downe his weapons and yeeld himfelfe prisoner, nor that any misfortune could have beene so great, as should have drawne that Citie to releeue it selfe otherwise than by force of Armes. But when once it had appeared that many of their Citizens, among whom were fome of especiall marke, being ouer-laied by enemies, in the Iland before Pylus, had rather chosen to line in captimitie, than to die in fight; and that Pylus it selfe, sticking as a thorne in the foot of Laconia, had bred such anguilh in that Estate, as ytterly wearying the accustomed Spartan resolution, had made it sit downe, and 20 fecke to refresh it selfe by dishonourable ease: then did not only the Corinthians and Thebans beginne to conceiue basely of those men which were vertuous, though vnfortunate; but other lesser Cities joyning with these in the same opinion, did cast their cies you the rich and great Citie of Argos, of whose abilitie, to doe much, they conceined a strong beliefe, because of long time it had done nothing. Such is the base condition, which through foolish enuie is become almost naturall in the greater part of mankinde. We curiously search into their vices, in whom, had they kept fome diftance, we should have different only the vertues; and comparing injuriously our best parts with their worst, are justly plagued with a false opinion of that good in strangers which we know to be wanting to our selues.

The first that published their dislike of Sparts were the Corinthians, at whose venerance of the control of the hement entreaty (though moued rather by enuie at the greatneffe of Athens dayly encreasing) the Lacedamonians had entred into the present warre. But these Corinthians did only murmure at the peace, alleadging as grievances, that some townes of theirs were left in the Athenians hands. The Mantineans who during the time of warre, had procured some part of the Areasians to become their followers, and forfake their dependency upon the State of Sparta, did more freely and readily discouer themselves; seare of revenge to come working more effectually, than indignation at things already past. The Argines feeling the gale of prosperous Fortune that began to fill their failes, prepared themselues to take as much of it as they could stand vn- 40 der; giuing for that purpole vntotwelue of their citizens, a full and absolute commillion to make alliance betweene them and any free cities of Greece (Athens and Sparea excepted) without any further trouble of propounding euery particular bufinesse to the multitude. When the gates of Argos were set thus open to all commers ; the Mantineans began to lead the way, and many Cities of Peloponne fus following them entred into this new confederacy; some incited by private respects,others thinking it the wifest way to doe as the most did. What inconvenience might arise to them by these courses, the Lacedamonians easily discerned, and therefore sent Embassadors to stoppe the matter at Corinth, where they well perceived that the mischiefe had beene hatched. These Embassadors found in the Corinthians avery 10 rough disposition, with a gravity expressing the opinion which they had conceived of their present aduantage ouer Sparta. They had caused all Cities which had not entred yet into the alliance with Argos, to fend their P gents to them, in whose prefence they gaue audience to the Lacedamonians; the pur port of whose Embassie was this: That the Corinthians, without breach of their oath, could not for fake the alliance, which they had long fince made with Sparta, and that reason did as well binde them to holde themselves contented with the peace lately made, as religion enforced them to continue in their auncient confederacy, for a fmuch as it had been agreed betweene the Spartans and their affociates, that the confent of the greater part, (which had yeelded ynto peace with Athens) should binde the leffer number to performe what was concluded, if no Divine impediment withstood them. Heereunto the Corinthians made answere, that the Spartans had first begun to do them open wrong, in concluding the warre wherein they had loft many places, without prouision of rellitution; and that the very clause, alledged by the Embassadors, did acquite from any necessity of subscribing vnto the late peace, for a smuch as they had fworne vnto those people whom they perswaded to rebell against Athens that they would never abandon them, nor willingly fuffer them to fall againe into the tyrannous hands of the Athenians. Wherefore they held themselves bound both in reafon and religion to vse all meanes of vpholding those, whom by common consent they had taken into protection; for that an oth was no leffe to be accounted a Diuine impediment, than were peltilence, tempelt, or any the like accident, hindering the performance of things vindertaken. As for the alliance with Argos, they laid that they would doe as they should finde cause. Having dismissed the Embassadors 20 with this answere, they made all hast to joyne themselves with Argos, and caused other States to do the like ; fo that Sparta and Athens were in a manner left to themselues, the Thebans and Megarians being also vpon the point to have entred into this new confederacy. But as the affections were divers, which caused this hasty confluence of fudden friends to Arges, it forlike wife came to passe that the friendthip it felfe, such as it was, had much diversity both of sincerity and of continuance. For some there were that hated or seared the Lacedemonians: as the Mantineans and Eleans: these did firmly betake themselves to the Argines, in whom they knew the same affection to be inucterate; others did only hate the peace concluded; and these would rather have followed the Spartans than the Argines in warre, yet rather the 30 Argines in war than the Lacedamonians in peace. Of this number were the Corinthians, who knowing that the Thebans were affected like vnto themselues, dealt with them to enter into the focietie of the Argines, as they had done : but the different formes of gouernement, vied in Thebes and Argos, caused the Thehanes to hold rather with Sparta, that was ruled by the principall men, than to incurre the danger of innouation, by joyning with fuch as committed the whole rule to the multitude.

This bulinesse having ill succeeded, the Corinihans beganne to bethinke themfelues of their owne danger, who had not fo much as any truce with Athens, and yet were unprepared for warre. They fought therefore to come to some temporarie agreement with the Athenians, and hardly obtained it. For the Athenians, who had dealt with all Greece at one time, did not greatly care to come to any appointment, with one citie that shewed against them more stomach than force ; but gaue them to understand that they might be fafe enough from them, if they would claime the benefit of that alliance, which Aihens had lately made, with Sparta and her dependants; yet finally they granted vnto these Corinthians (which were loath to acknowledge themselves dependants of Sparta) the truce that they defired; but into private confederacie they would not admitthem, it being an article of the league between them and the Spartans, That the one should not make peace nor warre without the Heerein, as in many other passages, may clearely be seene the great aduantage 30 which absolute Lords have as well in peace as in warre, ouer such as are served by voluntaries. We shall hardly finde any one Signoric, that hath beene so constantly followed as Sparta was, by fo many States, and some of them litle inferior to it selfe; being all as free: whereas contrariwife, the Athenians had lately, and by compulfine meanes gotten their Dominion, wherein they demeaned themselies as Tyrants.

But in performance of conditions agreed upon; the **Libenians** were able to make their wordes good, by excluding any State our of their Confederacie, and gining up flich places as were agreed upon: of which the **Lacedate mains** could doe neither the one nor the other. For flich Towness as their old Allis is had gotten by their meanes in the late warrs, could not bee reflored without their :onfent, which had them in prefent polifetion; and particularly the Towne of **PaulaTe, which hed **Thebansheld, could by no meanes be obtained from them by the **Lacedamonians** (who earnefly defired it, that by reflictution thereof who the **Albenians*, as earnefly demanding it, themfelues might recouer **Pylua**) vinleffer they would agree to make a private alliance with **Thebas**, which thereupon they were faine to doe; though knowing it to bee 16 contrariet to the lalk agreement between them and **Albenians**.

The Lacedemonians having broken one article of the league made between them & the Athenians, that by fodoing they might enablethem felues to the performance of another, were finamefully disappointed of their he pes by the Thekans, who did not gue vp the Town of Panačie, till first they had vicely demolished it, and made it of no worth to the Athenians. This was fought to have beene excused by the Lacedemonian Embassisations, who comming to Athens (whither they had fent home all prisoners that had beene detained at Theles) hoped with gentle wordes to salue the matter; saying, That from beeceforth on enemic to Athens should nesslein Panačie, for it was destroicd. But these Embassisations and to to deale with tame 10 fooles. For the Athensas told them in plaine termes, That of three principal leon-ditions agreed you in their late League, they had no performed any one, but vsed such that she had seen as so as so as a so as a so as a so as a so as a solution as a food not with their honour: having made private alliance with the Thekans; hading destroicd a Towne that they should have restored; and not having forced their dependants by warre, to make good the coucnants of the late concluded peace. Hereupon they dismissed the Embassadors with rough words, meaning with as rough decelest oanger those that fer them.

There were at that time, both in Athens and Spar, a, many that were ill-contented with the peace : among whom were the Ephori, chosen for that yeare, in Sparta; and Alcibiades a powerfull yong Gentleman in Athers. But the Ephori, though de- 30 firing to renew the warre, yet wished that first they might get from the Athenians as much as was to bee rendred to them by couenant, especially Pylus that had so forely troubled them. Aleibiades whose Nobilitie, riches, and fauour, with the people, made him desire warre, as the meanes, whereby himselfe might procure some honourable emploiment, vied all meanes to fet the quarrell on foot, whileft the thenians had yet both advantage enough, as not having rendred ought faue their prisoners, and pretence enough to vie that advantage of breaking the peace, by reafon that the Lacedemonians (though indeede against their wills) had broken all couenants with them. Now the State of Athens had fully determined to retaine Pylus, and to performe nothing that the Lacedamonians should, and might require, vntill 49 they had first, without any longer halting, fulfilled al articles whereunto they were bound, euen to the vtmost point. This was enough to make them sweat, who hauing alreadie done the most that they could, had as yet got nothing in recompence, except the deliuerie of their Citizens, which were pr foners. But Alcibiades wishing a speedie beginning of open warre, sent privily to the Argines, and gave them to vnderstand how fitly the time served for them to afficiate themselves with Athens, which was enough to give them fecuritie against all Enemies.

The Argines vpon the first confluence of many I states vnto their societie, had embraced great hopes of working wonders, as if they should have had the conduct of all Greeze against the Aisbeams, robbing Sparts of that honour, as having ill veed to fall or the state of the stat

thians had fought feuritie from Athens, and when a falle rumour was noised abroad, that Athens, Thebes, and Sparta, were come to a full agreement upon all points of differences then beganne the Argines to let fall their creits, and fue for peace vnto the Lacedomenians, who needing it as much as they, or more, yet held their grauitie, and were not outer-halfute oaceptir. At this time, and in this perturbation, the mediage of Atabiasas came very welcome to the Argines, which were not now confulting how to become the chiefe of all others, but how to faue themelieus. Wherefore they fent away prefently to Athens, their owne Embaffadours, accompanied with the Amantaens and Eleans, to make a league offenitue, and defenfiue, between the themson.

Of this bulinefle the Lacedomonians knew not what to thinke: for well they faw, that fisch a combination tended to their great hurt, and therefore were delirous to preuntit; but to keep the loue of the Athenians, the new Ephani thought that more was alreadie done, than flood with their hosour, or profit; others held it the wisfeft way, having done so much, not to slick vpon a little more, but rather by giuing full latisfaction to retain the firendship of that State, which was more to bee valued than all the rest of Greece. This resolution prevailing, they sent away such of their Citizensas were betafficed to the peace, who comming to Athens with full comission to make an end of all controverses, styings, that their Confederacie with the Thebons had tended to none other end than the recoverie of Panasse concerning which Towne, or any other buliness, that it much grieved the Lacedomosium, to see things fall out in such wise as might gue to the Athenian cause of different plant in the vice of the such as a might gue to the Athenian cause of different plant in the vice of the such as a might gue to the Athenian cause of different plant in the vice of the such as a such as a such as a such as a such as a making to the control than the recoverie of promaking matters even between them; to which purpose they showed that themselves had absolute commission. Wherefore they desired that Pplan might be restored with cause they which promised amends, had power to make their wordes good. But all 30 this faire likelihood of good agreement was dashe on the suddaine, by the practise of Astibiades, who, forcetly dealing with the Lacedemonia Embassiladours, persivaded them well of his friendship towards their Citie, and admised them to take all care that their absolute power to conclude what they pleased in the name of Sparta, might not be knownet on the Communalities of Astiens, least the insolent multitude should thereupon grow peremptorie, and yeeld to nothing, whelfe they could draw them to wireasonable conditions. The Embassiadours beleeued him, and fashioned their tale in the assembly of the people, as shee had admised them. Herevypon the same Asiabades taking presently the advantage, which their double dealing afforded, inueighed openly against them, as men of no sincerite; that were come to Asbers for none other purpose, than to hinder the people from strength-

them, and especially for the present, that the negotiation with the Argines might be called a-fide. Fanourable audience was given to this proposition, the rather be-

40 ming themselnes with friends, meaning to draw the Argines and their Adherents to their owne alliance, as (contrarie to their oath) alreadic they had the Thehans. The people of Athens, whom a pleasing errand would hardly have satisfied, or brought into a good opinion of the Leecdannenus, (whose honest meanings had so ill beens elsconded with good performance) were now so incensed with the double dealing of the Embassadours, and the strong persivations of Acidinates, that little wanted of concluding the league with Argos. Yet for the present so faire did 26-cita, an honourable Citizen, and great friend to the peace, preuaile with them, that the bussinesses put off, till he himselfe with other Embassadours might fetch a 50 better answer from 25 parts.

It may seeme a great wonder, how so poore a tricke of Alabiades was able to carrie a matter of such importance, when the Spartan Embassadours might have cast the loade vpon his owne shoulders; by discoucing the truth.

But the granitie which was viually found in the Law demonians, hindred them (perharsafrom playing their game handformely against to nimble a wit; and they might well have been thought vitruity men, had they projeffed themfelues fuch as would fay and yn-fay for their most aduantage.

Description and his Companions had a fowremeffige to deliner at Sparta, being peremprorily to require performance of all conditions, and among the reft, that the Laced emonians should take the paines to rebuild Paracte, and should immediately renounce their alliance made with the Thebans; letting them understand that otherwife the Athenians, without further delay, would enter into confederacie with the Azines, and their Adherents. The Ephore at Sparia had no minde to forfake the Thebans, affured friends to their State; but wrought fo hard, that the anger of the A benians was fuffered to breake out what way it could, which to mitigate they would doe no more, than only (at the request of Nicias their honourable friend. who would not feeme to have effected nothing) fweare a-new to keepe the articles of the league betweene them and Athens. Immediately therefore vpon returne of the Embaffadours, a new league was made between the Athenians, Argines, Mantinasas, and Eleans, with very ample prouision for holding the same common friends and enemies; wherein, though the Lacedemonians were passed ouer with silence, yet was it manifest that the whole intent of this confederacie did bend it selfe chiefly against them, as in short while after was proued by effect.

At this time the Lacedamonians were in ill case, who having restored all that they could vnto the Athenians, and procured others to doe the like, had themselues reconcred nothing of their owne (prifoners excepted) for defalt of reftoring all that they should. But that which did most of all disable them, was the losse of reputation, which they had not more impaired in the late warre by misfortunes, than in fundrie passages betweene them and the Athenians: : o procure and keepe whose Amitie, they had left fundrie of their old friends to hift for themselves. Contrariwife the Athenians, by the treatie of peace, had recovered the most of that which they loft in warre; all their gettings they had retained; and were strengthened by the accesse of new Confederates.

How the peace betweene Athens and Sparta was ill kept, though not openly broken.

T was not long ere the Argines and their fellowes had found businesse, wherewith to let the Aineman, whom it concerned the State of Spar-40 to meddle with the Epidaurians, whom it concerned the State of Spar-40 to meddle with the Epidaurians, whom it concerned the State of Spar-40 to meddle with the Epidaurians, whom it concerned the State of Spar-40 to many afts of hoftlitte were committed, wherein Aineman collarerally. tato defend. So, many acts of hostilitie were committed, wherein Athens and Sparta did not (as principals) infeft each the other, but came in collaterally, as to the aide of their feuerall friends,

By these occasions the Cormthians, Baotians, Phocians, Locrians, and other people of Greece, begannen new to range themselves vnder the Lacedamonians, and follow their enlignes. One victorie which the Lacedamoni ins obtained by their meere valour in a fet battaile, neare to Mantinea, against the A gine-side, helped well to repaire their decaied reputation, though otherwife it yeelded them no great profit. The civil diffention arifing shortly after within A gos it selfe, betweene the principall Citizens and the Commons, had almost throwne downe the whole frame of 50 thenew combination. For the chiefe Citizens getting the upper hand, made a league with Sparta, wherein they proceeded fo farre as to renounce the amitie of the abbenians in expresse wordes, and forced the Mantineans to the like. But in short space of time the multitude prevailing, reversed all this, and having chased away their ambitious Nobilitie, applied themselves to the Athenians as closely

Belide these vprores in Pelaponnesis, many affaies were made to raise vp troubles in all parts of Greece, and likewile in Macedon, to the Athenians; whose forces and readinesse for execution, preuented some thinges, reuenged other, and requited all with fome prosperous attempts. Finally, the Athenians wanting matter of quarrell. and the Lacedamonians growing wearie, they beganne to be quiet, retaining till that enmitie in their hearts, which they had fufficiently discouered in effects, though not to as yet breaking out into termes of open warre.

VIII.

The Athenians fending two fleets to facke Siracufe, are put to flight and viterly discomsted.

Vring this intermission of open warre, the Athenians re intertained their hopes of fubduing Sieil, whither they fent a fleet fo mightie as neuer was fet forth by Greece in any Age before or after.

This fleet was very well manned, and unimode on ought; partly by ries to fogreat an expedition. All which came to nought; partly by the factions in Athens, whence Aicibiades Author of that wing, and one of the Gemeralls of their fleet, was druen to banish himselfe, for feare of such judgement, as elfe he was like to have under-gone, among the incenfed people; partly by the inuafion which the Lacedemonians made upon Attica, whileft the forces of that State were fo farre from home. Hereunto was added the aide of the King of Perlia, who Supplied the Peloponnesians with money.

Neither was the fuccesse of thinges in Sicilia such, as without helpe from Athens, could give any likelihood of a good end in that warre. For although in the begin-30 ning, the enterprise had so well succeeded, that they besieged Siracule, the chiefe Citic of the Iland, and one of the fairest Townes which the Greekes inhabited, obtayning the better in fundrie battailes by Land and Sea; yet when the Towne was relieucd with strong aide from Peloponness, it came to passe that the Athenians were put to the worfe on all fides, in fuch wife that their fleet was thut vp into the hauen of Siracule, and could not iffue out.

As the Athenian affaires went very ill in Sicil, so did they at home stand upon hard termes, for that the Lacedemonians, who had beene formerly accustomed to make wearifome yearely journies into Attica, which having pilled and foraged, they returned home; did now by counfell of Alcibiades, who feeking renenge vpon his 40 owne Citizens was fled vnto them, fortific the Towne of Decelea, which was neare to Athens, whence they ceased not with daily excursions to harrie all the Countrie round about, and fometimes give alarme vnto the Citie it felfe.

In these extremities, the peruorse oblinacie of the Athenians was very strange; who leaving at their backs, and at their owne dores, an enemie little leffe mightie than themselves, did yet send forth an other fleet into Sicil, to inuade a people no leffe puiffant, which neuer had offended them.

It often happens that prosperous event makes foolish counsaile seeme wiser than it was, which came to passe many times among the Athenians, whose vaine conceipts Pallas was faid to turne vnto the best. But where vnfound adulfe finding bad proofe, 50 is obstinately pursued, neither Pallas nor Fortune can be justly blamed for a miserable iffue. This fecond fleet of the Athenians, which better might have ferued to conucy home the former, that was defeated; after some attempts made to small purpole against the Siraculans, was finally (together with the other part of the Nanie, which was there before) quite vanquished, and bard vp into the hauen of Siracute, whereby the campe of the Athenians, ytterly deprined of all benefit by Sca, either for fuccour or departure, was driven to breake v1 and fite away by Land, in which flight they were ouer-taken, routed, and quite ou rthrownein fuch wife that fearce any man of cined.

This michiefe well de Gruedly fell vpon the Atlenians, who had wickedly condemned into exile Suphales and Picholorus Generalls, Tormerly lent into that lle, prec, nding that they had taken money for making peace in Sieil, whereas indeede there was not any meanes or polifibilitie to have made warre. Hereby it came to palific, har Ziein, who had the chiefe command in this via happienterprife, did rather choose to hazard the ruine of his Countrie by the lesse of that Armie, wherein to condified little lesse than all the power of Atlens; than to advanture his owneed thate, his life, and his bonour, you the tongues of than telefle accusers, and the sentence of ludges before his trail resolved to condemne hm, by retiring from Sineagh, when witedome and necessities required it. For said help they shall give sentence upon vs., who know not the research of our doings, nor will give our to any that would speake in one behalfe, but allogether head one is of suphituse and vanue unnears that shall be brought against vs., exclusive one will be sentenced to since to since the lesser of the level and insolent multitude vs.

This refolution of Niciae, though it cannot be commended (for it is the part of 29 an honest and valiant man to doe what reason willeth, not what opinion expecteth. and to measure honour or dishonour by the affurance of his well-informed confeience, rather than by the malicious report and confure of others) yet it may be excufed; tince he had before his cies the injustice of his people; and had well underflood that a wicked fentence is infinitely worfe than a wicked fact, as being held a prefident and patterne, whereby oppreffion beginning upon one, is extended as warrantable vpon all. Therefore his feare of wrongfull condemnation was fuch, as a constant man could not casily have over-mastered; but when afterwards the Armie, hauing no other expediation of fafetie than the faint hope of a fecret flight he was fo terrified with an Eclipse of the Moone, happening when they were a Loue to 30 diflodge, that he would not confent to have the camp breake up till feuen and twentie daies were past. His timorousnesse was euen as foolish and ridiculous, as the iffue of it was lamentable. For he should not have thought that the power of the Heauens, and the course of Nature would be as vajult as his Athericas, or might pretend leffe cuill to the flouthfull, than to fuch as did their best. Neither doe I thinke that any Aftrologer can alleage this Eclipfe, as either a caufe or prognoffication of that Armies destruction, otherwise than as the follie of men did, by application, turne it to their owne confusion. Had C. Cassius: the Roman, he, who slew Iulius Casar, imitated this superstition of 2\(\text{ieias}\), he had surely found the same fortune in a case very like. But when, he retyring, the broken remainder of Craffus his Armie defeated by 40 the Parthan Archers was aduled, upon such an accident as this, to continue where he then was, till the Sunne were past the figne of Scorpio; he made answere that he flood not in such feare of Scorpio, as of Sagittarius. So adventuring rather to abide the frowning of the Heauens, than the nearer danger of Enemies vpon earth, hee made such a safe and honourable retrait, as did both shew his noble resolution, and giue a faire example to that good rule,

Thus we fee that God, who ordinarily workes by a concatenation of meanes, deprives the Godernours of vinderstanding, when becintends cuill to the multitude; and that the wickedness of winder than its the readic meane to weaken the vertue of 50 those who might have done them good.

ð. I 2

Of the troubles where into the State of Athens fell, after the great loffe of the Fleet, and Armie, in Sicilia.

He loss of this Armie was the ruine of the Athenian Dominion , and may be well accompted a very little less cannitie to that Edute; than was the subuersion of the walls, when the Citie about seven yeares after was taken by Lysander. For now beganne the Subjects of the Athenian Estate to rebell, of whom, some they reduced under their obdience; others held out; some for feare of greater inconnenience were set at libertie, promising only to be their good friends, as formerly they had beene their Subjects; others hauing a kind of libertie offered by the Athenians, were not therewith contented, but obtained a true and perfect libertie by force. Among these with contented, but obtained as true and perfect libertie by force.

troubles it fell out very vnscasonably, that the principall men of Athen being wearied with the peoples insolence, tooke vpon them to change the forme of that Eflate, and bring the gouernement into the handes of a few. I o which purpose confipring with the Captaines which were abroad, they caused them to fet up the forme 20 of an Arithocratic in the Townes of their Consederates; and in the meane time, some that were most likely to withsland this innovation, being slaine at Athens, the Commonaltie were so dismaid that none durst speake against the Conspirators, whose mumber they knew not, but curey man was affaid of bis Neighbour, least the should be a member of the league. In this general search the Anjestic of Athens was vsurped by soure hundred men, who observating in shew the ancient forme of proceeding, did cause all matters to be propounded wnto the people, and concluded vpp on by the greater part of voices: but the thinges propounded were only such as were first allowed in private among themselves, neither had she Commontalitie any other libertie, than only to approve and give consent, for whosever prefunction any other libertie, than only to approve and give consent, for whosever prefunction any other libertie, than only to approve and give consents.

30 further, was quickly dispatched out of the way, and no inquirie made of the murder. By these meanes were many decrees made, all tending to the establishment of this new Authoritie, which neuerthesels induced to long. For the Fleet and Armie which then was at the Ile of Samos, did altogether detest these dealings of the foure hundred vsurpers, and held them as Enemies, whereuponshey reucked. Aleibades out of banishment, and by his affistance procured that the supplies which the Persian King had promised vinco the Lacedonium, were by Tisphernes his Lieurenant, made unprofitable, through the slow and bad performance. Activities had at the first beene very well entertained in Sparts, whilest his fetuice done to that State was not growne to be the object of somie. But when it appeared that in count of sile and good performance he so farre excelled all the Lacedonniums, that all their

40 faile and good performance he fo faire excelled all the Lacetamonians, that all their good fuecefile was aferibed to his wit and valour; then were all the principal Crimitons wearie of his vertue; effecially Agis one of their Kings, whose wife had fo fair yeelded her felfe to the loue of this Athenian, that aimong her itiward friends shee could not forbeare to call the ryong child by his name. Hereupon order was taken that Alcibiades should be killed out of the way. But he discovering the spartan trecheric, conucighed himselfe vnto Tissephernes, whom he so bewitched with his great beautie, fivet conucifation, and sound wit, that he some became the Matter of that barbarous Vice-roies affections, who had free power to dispose the great Kings trefitives and forces in those parts. Then begannehe to adulte Tissephernes, not so stare 50 forth to affeit the Lacetamonians, that they should quite ouer throw the State of A-

Souldiers to the Gouernors; or at least to dinert their heat an other way, and turne it you the common Enemie. Some of the foure hundred approved his motion, as being wearie of the tyrannie whereof they were partakers, partly because they faw ming that they were fitter to bee trufted than the wavering multitude; especially considering that the Citie of Sparta was gouerned by an Ariffocratic, to which forme

they had now reduced Athens. All these passages between the source hundred (or the most and chiefe of them) and the Lacedamonians, were kept as fecret as might be.

For the Citie of Athens, hoping, without any great cause, to repaire their losses, was abroad) might yeeld some faire opportunitie to the destruction of it selfe, which in effect (though not then prefently) came to paffe. And vpon this hope King Acis did sometimes bring his forces from Deceleato Athem, where doing no good, hee received some small losses. Likewise the Nauic of Pelopomessus made show of ar-

tempting the Citie, but feeing no likelihood of fuccesse, they bent their course from thence to other places, where they obtained victories, which in the better Fortune of the Athenians might more lightly have beene regarded, than in this their decaied estate. Yet it seemes, without any disparagement to their wisedome, they should rather have forborne to present vnto the Citie, or to the Countries neare adjoyning 20 any terrour of the warre. For the diffention within the walls might foone haue done more hurt than could be received from the Fleet or Armie without, which indeede gaue occasion to set the Citizens at vnitie, though it lasted not very long.

The foure hundred, by meanes of these troubles, were faine to resigne their authoforraine enemies, would not lay them downe, till they had freed themselves from

How ALCIBIADES wanne many important victories for the Athenians; was recalled from exile; made their Generall, and againe deposed.

His establishment of thinges in the Citie, was accompanied with some good fuccessein the warres. For the Lacedamonians were about the fame time ouerthrowne at Sea, in a great battaile, by the Athenian fleet which had remained at Samos, to which Alcibiades afterwards joyning fuch forces as he could raife, obtained many victories, Before the Towne of Abydee, his arrivall with eighteene ships gaue the honour of a great battaile to the Athenians; hee overthrew and viterly destroicd the sleet of the Lacedamonians, commanded by Mindarus, tooke the Townes of Cyzicus, and Perinthus, made the Selymbrians ranfome their Citie, and fortified Chryfopolis. Hereupon letters were sent to Sparta, which the Athenians, intercepting, found to containe the distresse of the Armie in these few wordes: Allis lost; MINDARVS is slaine; the Souldiers want victualls; we know not what to doe.

Shortly after this, Alcibia des ouerthrew the Lacedemonians in fight by Land at 20 Chalcedon, tooke Selymbria, belieged and wanne Byzantium, now called Constantinople, which even in those daies was a goodly, rich, and very strong Citie. Hereuppon hereturned home with very great welcome, and was made high Admirall of

But this his honour continued not long; for it was taken from him, and hee driuen to banish himselse againe; only because his Lieutenant, contrarie to the expreffe command of Alcibiales, fighting with the enemies in his absence, had lost a great part of the fleet.

The fecond banishment of Alcibiades was to the Athenians more harmefull than the first; and the losse which thereupon they received, was (though more heavie 20 to them, yet) leffe to be pittied of others, than that which enfued ypon his former exile. For whereas at the first, he had fought reuenge vpon his owne Citie; now, as inured to aduerlitic, he rather pittied their furie, who in time of fuch danger had cast out him that should have repaired their weake estate, than sought by procuring or beholding the calamitie of his people, to comfort himselfe after injurie received. Before they, who were instituted in the place of Alcibiades, arrived at the fleet, hee presented battaile to Lylander the Laced emonian Admirall, who was not so confident vpon his former victorie, as to vndertake A'cibiades himselfe, bringing ships more in number (notwithstanding the former losse of fifteene) than his enemies had, and better ordered than they had beene under his Lieutenant. But when the decree of the people was published in the Nauie, then did Aleibiades with-draw himselfe to a Towne vpon Hellespont, called Bizanthe, where hee had built a

The battaile at Arginnse, and condemnation of the victorious Athenian Captaines by the people.

Fter this time the Athenians, receiving many loffes and discomfitures, were driven to flie into the Hauen of Mytelene, where they were straightly belieged both by Land and Sca. For the railing of this liege neceffitie inforced them to man all their Vessells, and to put the vttermost of their forces into the hazzard of one battaile. This battaile was fought at Arginula, where Callieratidas, Admirall of the Lacedemonians, looling the honor of the day, preferued his owne reputation by dying valiantly in the fight, It might well have beene expected, that the ten Captaines, who jointly had command in chiefe over the Athenian fleet, should for that good daies service, and so happie a victorie, haue receiued great honour of their Citizens. But contrariwife they were forth-with called home, and accused, as if willfully they had suffered many of the Citizens, whose ships were broken and sunke, to be cast away, when by appointing some Vessells to take them vp, they might have faued them from being drowned. Hereto the Captaines readily made a very just answere; That they purfuing the victorie, had left part of the fleet, under fufficient men, to faue those that 10 were wrackt; which if it were not well accomplished, it was, because a tempest arifing about the end of the fight, had hindred the performance of that, and other their intendments. This excuse anailed not: For a lewd fellow was brought forth, who faid, That he him felfe escaping in a meale-tubbe, had beene intreated by those who were in perill of drowning, to defire of the people reuenge of their deaths upon the Captaines. It was very strange that, upon such an acculation maintained with so flender enidence, men that had well deserved of their Countrie should bee overthrowne. But their enemies had so incensed the rascall multitude, that no man durst abfolue them, faue only Socrates the wife and vertuous Philosopher, whose voice in this judgement was not regarded. Sixe of them were put to death, of whom one 20 had hardly escaped drowning, and was with much a-doe relected by other vessells in the storme; but the Captaines which were absent escaped; for when the furie of the people was ouer-past, this judgement was reversed, and the accusers called into question for having deceived and percerted the Citizens. Thus the Athenians went about to free themselves from the infamie of injustice; but the divine justice was not a-fleepe, nor would be fo deluded.

The battaile at Agos-Potamos, wherein the whole State of Athens was ruined; with the end of the Peloponnesian Warre.

He Peloponnelian fleet under Lyfander, the yeare next following, hauing scoured the Agean Seas, entred Hellespont, where (landing Souldiers) it belieged and tooke the Town of Lampfacus. Hereup-pon all the Nauic of Athens, being an hundred and four effore faile, made thither in hafte, but finding Lampfacus taken before their com-ming, they put in at $2560s, where having refreshed themselves, they sailed to the River called, Agos-Potamos, which is (as we might name it) Goutes-brooke, or the 40 River of the Goste; being on the Continent, opposite to Lampfacus; and there they cast Anchors, not one whole league off from Lyfander, who rode at Lampfacus in the harbour. The next day after their arrivall they presented fight vnto the Peloponnefians, who refused it, whereupon the Athenians returned againe to Agos-Patomos, and thus they continued five daies, braving every day the Enemie, and returning to their owne harbour when it drew towards evening.

The Castle of Alcibiades was not furre from the Nauie, and his power in those places was fuch as might have greatly availed his Countrimen, if they could have made vse of it. For he had waged Mercinaries, and making warre in his owne name voon some people of the Thracians, had gathered much wealth, and obtained much 50 reputation among them. He perceiuing the disorderly course of the Athenian Commanders, repaired vnto them, and shewed what great inconvenience might grow, if they did not soone fore-see and prevent it. For they lay in a roade subject to euc-

ry weather, neither neare enough to any Towne where they might furnish them-Letues with necessaries, nor so farre off as had beene more expedient. Septim was the next Market- Towne; thither both Souldiers and Marriners reforted, flocking away from the Nauic enery day, as foone as they were returned from brauing the Enemie. Therefore Acibiades willed them either to lie at Sestus, which was not farre off, or at the leaft to confider better how neare their enemie was, whose feare proceeded rather from obedience to his Generall, than from any cowardife. This admonition was so farre despised, that some of the Commanders willed him to meddle with his owne matters, and to remember that his authoritie was out of date. Had it not beene for these opprobrious wordes, hee could (as hee told his familiars) have compelled the Lacedemonians, either to fight vpon vnequail termes, or vtterly to quit their Fleet. And like enough it was that hee might fo have done, by transporting the light-armed Thracians his Confederates, and others his Followers ouer the Straights, who affaulting the Peloponne lians by Land, would either have compelled them to put to Sea, or elfe to leave their ships to the mercie of the Achenians. But finding their acceptance of his good counfaile no better than both beene rehearfed, hee left them to their fortune, which how entil it would bee

Lyfanger all this while defending himfelfe by the advantage of his Hauen, was no not careleffe in looking into the demeanour of the Athenians. When they canarted his manner was to fend forth fome of his fwifteft Veffells after them, who are ferning their doings, related ynto him what they had feene. Therefore ynderhanding in what carejeffe fallion they romed up and downe the Countrie; her kept all his men a-boord after their departure, and the fift day gave of pecal charge to his Scouts, That when they perceiued the Athenians difembarking, as their cuflome was, and walking towards Sellos, they flould forthwith returne, and hang vp a brazen shield in the Prow, as a token for him to weigh Anchor.

The Scouts performed their charge, and Lyfander being in a readinesse, made all speede that strength of Oares could give, to Egos-Potamos, where he found ve-20 ry few of his enemies a-boord their ships, not many neare the mand all in great confulion voon the newes of his approch.

In fo much that the greatest industrie which the Athenians then shewed, was in the escape of eight or nine ships, which knowing how much that losse imported, gaue ouer Ations as desperate, and made a long flight vnto the He of Cyprus, all the rest were taken, and such of the Souldiers as came in to the rescue cut in pecces. Thus was the Warre which had lasted senen and twentic yeares, with variable fucceffe, concluded in one houre, and the glorie of Athens in fuch wife Eclipfed, that thee neuer afterward thone againe in her perfect light.

Immediately vponthis victorie, Lylander, having taken in fuch Townes as readily did yeeld vpon the first fame of his exploit, fet faile for Athens, and ioyning his forces with those of Agis and Paulanias, Kings of Sparia, summoned the Citie, which finding too stubborne to yeeld, and too strong to bee wonne on the suddaine, hee put forth againe to Sea, and rather by terrour than violence, compelling all the Hands, and fuch Townes of the Ionians, as had formerly held of the Athemians, to submit themselves to Sparta, hee did thereby cut off all provision of vi-Aualls, and other necessaries, from the Citie, and inforced the people by mecre famine to yeeld to these conditions. That the long walls, leading from the Towne to the Port, should be thrownedowne; That all Cities subject to their Estate, should bee set at libertie; That the Athenians should bee Masters only of so their owne Territories, and the fields adjoyning to their Towne; And that they should keepe no more than twelue ships; That they should hold as Friends or Enemies, the same, whom the Lacedamonians did, and follow the Lacedamonians as Leaders in the Warres.

Thefe

These articles being agreed vpon, the walls were throwne downe with great rejoying of those who had borne displeasure to them; and not without some consultation of destroying the Citie, and laying waste the Land about it. Which adults, although it was not entertained, yet were thirtie Gouernours, or rather cruel I yrants, appointed ouer the people, who recompensed their former instend and injustice ouer their Captaines, by oppressing them with all base and intolerable slauerie.

The only small hope then remaining to the Aleman, was, that Aleibiades might perhaps repaire what their owne folly had ruined. But the thirtie Tyrants p-reciung this, aduertifed the Lacedomonius thereof, who contriued, to and (as nowe dominecring in cuerie quarter) soone effected his suddaine death

Such end had the Pelopannelan Warre. After which the Lucedamonians abufing the reputation, and great power, which therein they had obtained, grew weric odious to all Greece, and by Combination of manie Cities against them, were dispossed to their high authoritie, cuen in that very Age, in which they had fubbused Libens. The greatest foile that they tooke was of the Thebans, led by Epumnoulus, vnder whom Philip of Alaccion, Father to Acamder the Great, had the best of his education. By these Thebans, the Citie of Sporta (besides other 19 cite attempts of the Thebans came finally to nothing; for the several Estates and Signories of Greece, were growne fo jealous one of another spectates (that the Laccedemonians, Argius, and Thebans, which were the mightiest, affociating themselines, the substitute of the Thebans of the Citie of Sporta (the strong the Citie could extend the limits of her jurisdiction so far reas might make her terrible to her Neighbours. And thus all parts of the Countrie remained rather evenly ballanced, than well agreeing, till such time as Philip, and after him Acamder.

Kings of Macedon, (whole forefathers had beene dependants, and followers, yealmost meere Vaffalls to the Estates of Athens and Sparta) found meanes, by making vse of their factions, to bring them all into feruitude, from which they neuer could be free, till the Remarks prefenting them with a sliew of libertie, did themselues indeed become their

How the affaires of Persia slood in these times.

Vaine the times of this Pelopomefian Warre, and those other leffe expeditions foregoing it, Astacowas, Longimum, hauing peaceably injoyed a long raigne ouer the Persons, left it by his death either to Datus, who was called Datus Nothus, or the Bassland, whom the Greeke Hiltorians (lightly passing ouer Xorwest the second, and sogdisous, as V furpers, and for their short raigne little to be regarded) place next who him, or to Xorwest the second, who, and his brother Sogdismus after him (Seeming to haue beene the sonnes of Hessian Charles) held the Kingdome but no evere betweenen them, the vonger fucceeding his elder brother. It is not my purpose (as I have said before) to purfue the Historie of the Persians from henceforth, by rehearfall of all the particulars, otherwise then as they shall be eincident to the affaires of Greece. It may therefore suffice to say, That Xerxes the second, being a vitious Prince, did perilhafter a moneth or two, if not by furfeit, then by treacheric of his as riotous bro-30 ther Sogdianus. Likewise of Sogdianus it is found, that being as ill as his brother, and more cruell, he flew vnjuftly Bagorazus a principall Eunuch, and would have done as much to his brother Darius the Baffard, had not hee forescene it, and by raising a fironger Armie than this hated King Sagdianus could leavie, feized at once vpon the King and Kingdome. Darius having flaine his brother, held the Empire nineteene yeares. Amyrtaus of Sais an Egyptian rebelled against him, and having partly flaine, partly chased out of the Land the Persian Garrisons, allied himselfe so firmely with the Greekes, that by their aide he maintained the Kingdome', and deliuered it ouer to his posteritie, who (notwithstanding the furie of their civill Warres) maintained it against the Persian, all the daies of this Darius, and of his sonne Artaxerxes 40 Mnemon. Likewise Amorges, a subject of his owne and of the Roiall bloud, being Lieutenant of Caria, rebelled against him; confederating himselfe with the Ather nians. But the great calamitie, before spoken of, which fell vpon the Athenians in Sicil, having put new life into the Spartans, and given courage to the Handers and others, subject to the State of Athens, to shake off the yoke of their long continued bondage: It fell out well for Davius, that the Lacedemonians being destitute of money, wherewith to defray the charge of a great Nauic, without which it was imposfible to advance the warre against the State of Athens, that remained powerfull by Sea, were driven to crave his affiftance, which he granted vnto them, first vpon what conditions best pleased himselfe, though afterwards the articles of the league 50 betweene him and them were fet downe in more precise termes, wherein it was concluded, That he and they should make warre joyntly vpointhe Athenians, and vpon all that should rebell from either of them, and (which was highly to the Kings honour and profit) that all the Cities of Asia, which had formerly beene his ; or his Predeceffours, should returne to his obedience. By this Treatie, and the warre en108

fuing (of which I have alreadie spoken) he recovered all that his Grand-father and Father had loft in Alia. Likewise by affistance of the Lacedamonians he got Amorges a-line into his handes, who was taken in the Citic of Iafus; the Athenians wanting either force or courage to fuccour him. Neuertheleffe Agypt ftill held out againit him: the cause whereof cannot bee the emploiment of the Persian forces on the parts of Greece, for he abounded in men, of whom he had enough for all occasions, but they wanted manhood, which caused him to fight with gold, which effected for him by Souldiers of other Nations, and his naturall enemies, what the valour of his owne Subjects was infufficient to performe. Darius had in marriage Paryfatis his owne fifter, who bare vnto him (belides other children) Artaxerxes called Ame- 1m mon, that is to fay, the Mindfull, or the Rememberer, who fucceeded him in the Kingdome; and Cyrus the yonger, a Prince of fingular vertue, and accounted by all that knew him, the most excellent man that ever Perlia bred after Gress the Great. But the old King Darius, intending to leave vnto his elder some Artaxerxes the inheritance of that great Empire, did cast a jealous eie vpon the doings of yong Cyrus, who being Lieutenant of the lower Ala, tooke more vpon him than befitted a Subtect : for which cause his father sent for him, with intent to haue taken some very tharpe courfe with him, had not his owne death preuented the comming of his vonger sonne, and placed the elder in his Throne. Of the warre betweene these bretheren, and fummarily of Artaxerxes, wee shall have occasion to speake some- 29 what in more convenient place.

ð. I I.

How the thirtie Tyrants got their Dominion in Athens.

Hold it in this place most convenient to shew the proceedings of the Greekes, after the subversion of the walls of Athens, which gaue end to that warre called the Pelapumesian warre, but could not free the vnhappie Countrie of Greece from civil Broiles. The thirtic Gouer-30

nours, commonly called the thirtie T yrants of Athens, were chosen at the first by the people to compile a bodie of their Law, and make a collection of fuch ancient Statutes, as were meeted to be put in practice; the condition of the Ciric flanding as it did in that 6 fodaine alteration. To this charge was annexed the fupremeauthoritic, either as a recompence of their labours, or because the needlitie of the times did for requireit, wherein the Law being vncertaine, it was fit that fuch men should give judgement in particular causes, to whose judgement the Lawes themselleus, by which the Citie was to be ordered, were become fubiced. But these thirtie hauing so great power in their handes, were more carefull to hold it, than to deferue it by faithfull execution of that which was committed to them 40 in trust.

Therefore apprehending fuch troublefome fellowes, as were odious to the citie, though not puniliable therefore by law, they condemned them to death, which proceeding was by all men highly approued, who confidered their lewd conditions, but did not with all bethinke them felues, how cafe a thing it would be evento the fethirtie men, to take away the lines of Innocents, by calling them perturbers of the peace, or what elfe they lifted, when condemnation without due triall and proofe had beene once well allowed. Hauing thus plaufibly entred into a wicked courfe of gouernment, they thought it beft to fortifie them fellows with a fure guard, ere they brake out into those diforders, which they must needes commit for the class of billihing of their authoritie. Wherefore dispatching two of their owne companie to Sparsa, they informed the Lucedamonium, that it was the full intent of the thirties, to keepe the Citie free from all rebellious motions, to which purpose it behough them to cout off find as were feditives, and therefore defired the Lucedamonium to fend them a Garrison, which they promifed at their owne coft to maintaine. This motion was well approudd, and a guard fent, the Captaine of which was fo well entertained by the thirtie, that none of their misdeedes could want his high commendations at Sparta. Hereupon the Tyrants beganne to take heart, and looking no more after base and detested persons, inuaded the principall men of the Citie, sending armed men from House to House, who drew out such as were of great reputation. and likely, or able, to make any head against this wicked forme of government: whereby there was fuch effusion of bloud, as to Theramenes (one of the thirtie) fecmed very horrible, and vnable to escape vengeance. His diflike of their proceedings being openly discouered, caused his fellowes to bethinke themselues, and prouide for their owne fecuritie, and his destruction, least he should make himselfe a Captain of the discontented (which were almost the whole Citie) and redeeme his owner peace with their ruine. Wherefore they felected three thousand of the Citizens, whom they thought meetelt, and gaue vnto them some part of publique authoritie. the refethey difarmed; and having thus increased their owne strength, and weakened their oppolites, they begain a a-fresh to shed the bloud, not only of their private enemies, but of such whose money, or goods, might inrich them, and enable them for the paiment of their guard. And to this purpose they concluded, that every one of them should name one man your whose goods he should seize, putting the owoner to death. But when Theramenes vttered his detestation of so wicked intent; then did Critias, who of all the thirtie was most tyrannicall, accuse him to the Councell, as a treacherous man, and (whereas one maine priviledge of the three thousand was, that none of them should suffer death at the appointment of the thirtie, but haue the accustomed triall) he tooke voon him to strike out of that number the name of Theramenes, and fo reduced him under the trial and fentence of that order. It was well alleaged by Theramenes, that his name was not more easie to be blotted out of the Catalogue, than any other mans, upon which confideration hee adulfed them all to conceiue no otherwife of his cafe, than as of their owne, who were liable to the fame forme of proceeding : but ( every man choosing rather to preserve his owne 20 life by filence, than prefently to draw upon himfelfe the danger, which as yet concerned him little, and perhaps would never come neare him) the T yrants interpreting filence as confent, condemned him forthwith, and compelled him to drinke

Fter the death of Theramenes, the thirtie beganne to vie fuch outrage, as excelled their former villanies. For having three thouland (as they thought) firme vinto them, they robbed all others without feare or financy-defpoiling them of lands and goods, and cauling them to flie into banillament, for fafeguard of their lines. This flight of the Citizens procured their libertie, and this generall good of the Citic. For the banished Citizens, who were fled to Thebes, entred into confultation, and refolued to hazard their luses in fetting free the Citic of Athens: The very thought of such a practife had been treason at home, which had no other danger abroad, than might be found in the execution. Seunchie mein; or the reasons, were the first valertakers, who with their Captaine The Affeldula took a Phyla, a place of strength in the Territoric of 50 Athens. No sooner did the thirtie heart of their exploit, than seeke meanes to preunt further danger; assembling the three thousand, and their Leaecdenomian guard, with which force they attempted Phyla, but were with some losse of their men repelled. Finding the place too strong to be taken by assumble, they intended to be stepe jet, it miding the place too strong to be taken by assumble, they intended to be strong it; which purpose came to nought by meanes of snow that sell, and other storage it; which purpose came to nought by meanes of snow that sell, and other somether.

weather, against which they had not made prouision. Retiring therefore to the Citie, which aboue all they were to make good, they left the most of their guard, and two companies of Horse, to wearse out them which lay in Phyla, with a flying siege.

But it was not long ere the followers of Thrafybulus were encreased from seuentie to fenen hundred, which aduentured to give charge vpon those guards, of whom they cut off aboue an hundred & twentie. These small, but prosperous beginnings, added more to the number of those in Phyla, who now with a thousand men got entrance into Piraus, the fuburbe of Athens, Lying on the Port. Before their comming, the thirtie had refolued to fortifie the Towne of Eleusine, to their owne vse, whereinto they might make an eatic retrait, and faue themselves from any suddaine perill. It may well feeme strange, that whereas their barbarous manner of government had brought them into fuch danger, they were so farre from seeking to obtaine mens good will, that contrariwife, to affure themselves of Eleusine, they got all of the place who could beare armes into their handes by a traine, and wickedly (though vnder forme of inflice) murthered them all, But, Sceleribus tutum per scelera est iter, the mischiefs which they had alreadie done were such, as left them no hope of going backward, nor any other apparant likelihood of fafetic, than by extending their crueltie vnto all, feeing few or none were left, whom they could truft. When Thrafybulus and his fellowes, who as yet were termed conspirators, had taken the Piraus, it; but in this enterprise Thrasphulus had the better, and repelled his enemies, of whom although there were flaine to the number of feuentie, only yet the victorie feemed the greater, because Critics, & one other of the thirtie, perished in that fight,

The death of Critical, and the flout defence of Pirans, together with some exhortations vsed by Thrasphulus to the Citizens, wrought such effect that the thirtie were deposed. Neuerthelesse there were so many of the three thousand, who having communicated with the thirtie in their misseedes, seared to be called to a sharpeac-count, that no peace, nor quiet forme of gouernement could be established. For Embassadors were sent to Sparta, who craving aide against Thrasphulus, and his fol-and Sea, under the conduct of Lyfander, and his Brother; whom Paufanias the Spartan King did follow, raifing an Armie of the Cities confederate with the Lacedemonians. And here appeared first the jealousie, wherein some people held the State of Sparta. The Baotians, and Corinthians, who in the late warres had beene the most bitter enemies to Athens, refused to follow Paulanius in this expedition; alleaging that it flood not with their oathes, to make warre against that people, who had not hitherto broken any one article of the league ; but fearing, indeede, leaft the Lacedamonians should annexe the Territoric of Athens to their owne Demaines. It is not to bee doubted that Paufanias tooke this answere in good part. For it was not his of Lylander, whom he enuied. Therefore having in some small skirmishes against them of Thrafybulus his partie, made a flew of warre, he finally wrought fuch meanes that all things were compounded quietly: the thirtie men, and fuch others, as were like to give cause of tumult, being sent to Sparta. The remainder of that tyrannicall faction, having with-drawne themselves to Eleusine, were shortly after found to attempt some innouation, whereupon the whole Citie rising against them, tooke their

Captaines, as they were comming to Parlie, and flew them: which done, to avoide further inconvenience, a law was made that all injuries past should be forgotten, and no man called into question for wrongs committed. By which order, wifely made,

CHAP. X. Of the expedition of Cyrvs the yonger.

The grounds of CYRVS his attempt against his brother.

HE matters of Greece now standing vpon such terme. that no one Estate durst oppose it selfe against that of Lacedemon; yong Cyrus, brother to Artaxerxes, King of Persia, having in his fathers life time very carefully profecuted the warre against Athens, did fend his meffengers to Sparta, requeiting that their love might appeare no leffe to him, than that which he had lhewed towards them in their dangerons warre against the Athenians. To this request, being generall, the Lacedemonians gaue a futable answere, commanding their

Admirall to performe vnto Cyrus all service that hee should require of him. If Cyrus had plainely discovered himselfe, and the Lacedemonians bent their whole power to his affiftance, very like it is; that either the Kingdome of Perfia should have been the recompence of his deserts, or that he perishing in battaile, as after he did, the subuersion of that Empire had forthwith ensued. But it pleased God, rather to shew vnto the Greekes the waies, which under the Macedonian Enlignes, the victorious foot-steps of their posteritie should measure; and ope-30 ming vnto their the riches, and with all the weakenesse of the Persian, to kindle in them both defire and hope of that conquest, which he reserved to another generation; than to give into their hands that mightie Kingdome, whose houre was not yet come. The lone which Pary fatis the Queene-Mother of Persia bare vnto Cyrus her yonger fonne, being feconded by the earnest fauour of the people, and readie defires of many principali men, had moued this yong Prince, in his fathers old age to aspire after the succession. But being sent for by his Father (as hath before beene shewed) whose meaning was to curbe this ambitious youth; hee found his elder brother Artaserses established so furely by the old Kings sauour, that it were not fafe to attempt any meanes of displanting him, by whose disfauour himselfe might 40 calily loofe the place of a Viceroy, which he held in Afa the leffe, and hardly bee able to maintaine his ownelife. The nearest neighbour to Gyrus of all the Kings Deputies in the lower Asia, was Tissaphernes, a man compounded of cowardise, trecherie, craft, and all vices which accustomably branch out of these. This man accompanied Cyrus to his Father, vling by the way all faire shewes of friendship, as to a Prince, for whom it might well bee thought that Queene Pary fatis had obtained the inheritance of that mightie Empire. And it was very true that Pary fatis had vfed the best of her endeuour to that purpose, alleaging that ( which in former ages had beene much availeable to Xerxes, in the like difceptation with his elder brother) Artaxerxes was borne whilest his father was a private man, but Cyrus, when he was 50 acrowned King. All which not fufficing; when the most that could bee obtained for Cyrue, was the pardon of some prefumptuous demeanour, and confirmation of his place in Lydia, and the parts adjoyning : then did this Tiffaphernes discouer his nature, and accuse his friend Cyrus to the new King Artaxerxes, of a dangerous treason intended against his person. Vpon this accusation, whether true or falle, very eatily belowed, Cyrus was arrested, and by the most vehement intreatie of his Mother very hardly delinered, and fent back into his owne Pronince.

The preparations of CYRVS, and his full entrie into the Warre.

4 He forme of governement which the Perstan Lieutenants vsed in their feneral! Provinces, was in many points almost Regall. For they made Warre and Peace, as they thought it meete, not only for the Kings behoofe, but for their owne reputation; viually indeede with the Kines enemics, yet fometimes one with an other : which was the more cally tolerated, because their owne heads were held only at the Kings pleafure, which caused them to frame all their doings, to his will, whatsoeuer it were, or they could conjecture it to be. Cyrus therefore being fetled in Lydia, began to confider with himfelfe, the interest that he had in the Kingdome; the small assurance of his brothers loue, held only by his Mothers intercellion; the difference endured by his late imprisonment; and the meanes which he had by loue of his owne people, and that good neighbourhood of the Lacedamonians, whom he had bound vnto him, to obtaine the Crowne for himfelfe. Neither was it expedient that he should 20 long it idle, as waighting till occasion should present it selfe; but rather enterprise fomewhat whilest yet his Mother lined, who could procure a good interpretation to all his actions, if they were no worfe than only questionable. Hercupen hee first beganne to quarrell with Tiffaphernes, and feized vpon many Townes of his jurifdiction, annexing them to his owne Prouince; which displeased not Artaxernes at all, who (belides that hee was of condition fomewhat timple) being truely paid by Gyms the accultomable Tributes out of those places, was well contented to see his brothers hot spirit exercised in prinate quarrells. But Tissaphernes, whose base conditions were hated, and cowardife despited, although he durft not aduenture to take armes against Cyrus, yet perceiving that the Milesians were about to give vp them- 30 felues into the hands of that yong Prince, as many other Townes of the lonions had done, thought by terrour to preferue his reputation, and keepe the Towne in his ownehandes. Wherefore he flew many, and many he banifhed, who flying to Cyrus, were gently entertained, as bringing faire occasion to take armes, which was no fmail part of his defire. In leaving Souldiers he vsed great policie; for he took enot only the men of his owne Pronince, or of the Countries adjoyning, whose lines were readie at his will; but fecretly he furnished some Gracian Captaines with money, who being very good men of warre, entertained Souldiers therewith, fome of them warring in Thrace, others in Theffalie, others elsewhere in Greece; but all of them readie to croffe the Seas, at the first call of Cyrus, till which time they had se- 40 cret inftructions to prolong their fenerall warres, that the Souldiers might bee held in continual exercise, and readic in armes upon the sodaine. Come having fent a power of men to beliege Alleres, forthwith fummoned these bands of the Greekes, who very readily came ouer to his affiftance, being thirteen thousand very firme Souldiers, and able to make head (which is almost incredible) against the whole power of Artaxerxer. With this Armie, and that which he had leuied before, he could very calily have forced Miletus, and chased away Tiffaphernes out of Afriche leffe: but his purpose was not so to loofe time in small matters, that was to bee imploied in the accomplishment of higher defignes. Pretending therefore that the Pilidians, a people of Alfa the leffe, not subject to the Persian, had inuaded his Terri- 50 torie, he raifed the fiege of Miletus, and with all speede marched Eastward, leuing Tiffsphe nes much amased, who had no leasure to rejoyce that Cyrus had left him to bimfelfe, when he confidered that fo great an Armie, and fo strong, was neuer leuied against the Rouers of Polidia, but rather against the great King his Master. For which cause taking a band of fine hundred horse, hee posted away to carrie tidings to the Court, of this great preparation.

ð. I I I.

How CYRVs tooke his journey into the higher Asia, and came up close to his Brother.

He tumult which his comming brought was very great, and great the exclamations of the Queene Statira, against Pary atis, the Queene-Mother, whom shee called the Author and occasioner of the warre. But whilest the King in great feare was arming the high Countries in his defence, the danger haltened vpon him very fast. For Cyrus made ereat marches, having his numbers much increased, by the repaire of his Countrimen. though most strengthned by the accesse of seuen hundred Greekes, and of other four hundred of the same Nation, who revolted vnto him from the King. How terrible the Greekes were to the Barbarians, he found by triall in a Muster, which (to please the Queene of Cilicia, who had brought him aide) hee made in Phrygia; where the Greekes by his direction making offer of a charge vpon the rest of his Armie, which 20 contained a hundred thousand men, the whole Campe (not perceiuing that this was but a braucrie) fled a-maine, the victuallers and baggagers for faking their cabbins, and running all away for very feare. This was to Cyrus a joyfull spectacle. who knew very well, that his brother was followed by men of the fame temper. and the more vnlikely to make relistance, because they were prest to the warre against their will and dispositions, whereas his Armie was drawne a-long by meere affection and good will. Neuertheleffe he found it a very hard matter to perfwade the Greekes to passe the River of Euphrates. For the very length of the way which they had troden, wearied them with conceit of the tedious returne. Therefore he was driven, being yet in Cilicia, to seeke excuses, telling them that Abrocomas one of 30 the Kings principall Captaines, and his owne great enemie, lay by the River, against whom he requested them to affift him. By such devices, and exceffine promise of reward, he brought them to Euphrates, where some of the Greekes confidering, That who so passed the River first, should have the most thankes, and might sately returne if the rest should refuse to follow them, they entred the Foords, whereby were all finally perfwaded to doe as some had begunne, and being allured by great hopes, they resolued to seeke out Artaxerxes, wheresoeuer he was to be found. The King in the meane time having raifed an Armic of nine hundred thousand men, was not so confident vpon this huge multitude, as to adventure them in triall of a plaine battaile. Abrocomas, who with three hundred thousand men had under-taken to and make good the Straights of Syria, which were very narrow, and fortified with a strong wall, and other defences of nature, and art, which made the place to seeme impregnable, had quitted the paffage, and retired himselfe toward the Kings forces. not daring to looke Cyrus in the face, who despairing to finde any way by Land, had procured the Lacedamonian fleete, by the benefit whereof to have transported his Armic. I doe not finde that this cowardise of Abrocomas, or of his Souldiers, who arrived not at the Campe till five daies were past after the battaile, received either punishment, or disgrace; for they, toward whom he with-drew himselfe, were all made of the same mettall. Therefore Artaxerxes was upon the point of retiring to the vttermost bounds of

50 his Kingdome, vntill by Teribazus, one of his Captaines, he was perswaded not to abandon fo many goodly Provinces to the Enemie, who would thereby have gathered addition of strength, and (which in the sharpe disputation of Title to a Kingdome is most auaileable) would have growne superior in reputation. By such adnice the King resolued vpon meeting with his brother, who now beganne to be secure, being fully perfwaded that Artaxerxes would neuer dare to abide him in the field. For the King having cast vp a Trench of almost fortie miles in length, about thirtie foot broade, and eighteene foot deepe, intended there to have encamped: but his courage failing him, he abandoned that place, thinking nothing to fafe as to be farre diftant from his enemics.

ð. IIII. The battaile betweene CYRVS and ARTAXERXES.

He Armie of Cyrus having over-come many difficulties of eaill waies, and scarcitie of victualls, was much encouraged by perceiving this great feare of Artaxerxes, and being past this trench, marched carelessy in great diforder, having bestowed their Armesin Carts, and vpon Beafts of carriage; when on the sodaine one of their Vaunt-currors, brought newes of the Kings approch. Hereupon with great tumult they armed themselues, and had ranged their battailes in good order vpon the side of the River Euphrates, where they waited for the comming of their enemies, whom they faw not till it was after-noone. But when they faw the clowd of dust raised by the feet of that huge multitude, which the King drew after him, and perceived by their neare approach how well they were marthalled, comming on very orderly, in filence, whereas it had beene expected, that rulhing violently with lowd clamours, they should have spent all their force you the first brunt; and when it appeared that the fronts of the two Armies were so vnequall in diftent, being all embattailed in one bodie and fquare, that Cyrus taking his place (as was the Persian manner) in the middeft of his owne, did not with the corner and vtmost point thereof, reach to the halfe breadth of Artaxerxes his battaile, who carried a front proportionable to his number, exceeding nine times that of Cyrus: then did the Greeks beginne to distrust their owne manhood, which was not accustomed to make proofe of it selfe, upon such exceffine oddes. It was all most incredible, that so great an Armie should bee so easily 30 chafed. Neuerthelesse, it quickly appeared, that these Persians, having learned (contrarie to their custome) to give charge vpon their enemies with silence; had not learned (for it was contrarie to their nature) to receive a strong charge with courage. Vpon the very first offer of on-set, made by the Greekes, all that beastly rabble of cowards fled amaine, without abiding the stroke, or staying till they were within reach of a Dart. The Chariots armed with hookes and fithes (whereof Artanerxes had two hundred, and Cyrus not twentie) did fmall hurt that day, because the driuers of them leaping downe, fled away on foot. This base demeanour of his enemiesgaue so much confidence to Cyrus, and his Followers, that such as were about him forth-with adored him as King. And certainely, the Title had beene affured 40 unto him that day, had not be fought how to declare himselfe worthy of it, ere yet he had obtained it. For, perceiuing that Artaxerxes, who found that part of the field which lay before him void, was about to encompaffe the Greekes, and to let vppon them in the reare, he advanced with fixe hundred Horse, and gaue so valiant a charge upon a foundron of fixe thousand which lay before the King, that hee brake it, flaying the Captaine thereof, Artager (es, with his owne hands, and putting all the reft to flight. Hereupon his whole companie of fixe hundred, very few excepted, beganne to follow the chase, leaving Cyrus too ill attended, who perceiving where the King flood in troupe, vncertaine whether to fight, or leave the field, could not containe himselfe, but said; I fee the man, and presently with a small handfull of 50 men about him ranne vpon his brother, whom he strake through the Curace, and wounded in the brest. Hauing given this stroke, which was his last, he received immediately the stall blow, which gave period at once to his ambition and life, being wounded under the eye with a dart, throwne by a base-fellow, wherewith assonied, hee fell dead from his horse, or so hurt, that it was unpossible to have recovered him, though all which were with him, did their belt for his fatetie; not caring afterwards for their owne lines, when once they perceined that Cyrus their Matter was flaine. Artaxerxes caused the head and right hand of his brother to bee forthwith stricken off, and shewed to his people, who now pursuing them fled apace, calling vpon the name of Cyrus, and deliring him to pardon them. But when this great accident had breathed new courage into the Kings troupes, and vtterly difmated fuch Persian Captaines, as were now, euen in their owne eies, no better than rebells; it was not long ere the Campe of Cyrus was taken, being quite abandoned, from whence Artaxerxes, making all speede, arrived quickly at the quarter of the Greekes, which was about three miles from the place where Cyrus fell. There hee met with Tiffaphernes, who having made way through the battaile of the Greekes, was readie now to joyne with his Master in spoiling their Tents. Had not the newes, which Artaxerxes brought with him of his brothers death, beene sufficient to counteruaile all disasters received; the exploit of Tissaphernes in breaking through the Greekes would have veelded little comfort. For Tillayhernes had not flaine any one man of the Greekes, but contrariwife, when he gaue you them, they opening their battaile, draue him with great flaughter through them, in such wise that hee rather escaped as out of an hard passage, than forced his way through the squadron of the 30 Greekes. Hereof the King being informed by him, and that the Greekes, as Masters of the field, gaue chase to all that came in their fight; they ranged their Companies into good order, and followed after these Greekes, intending to set upon them in reare. But the fegood Souldiers perceiving the Kings approch, turned their faces, and made head against him; who not intending to seeke honour with danger of his life, wheeled about and fled, being purfued vnto a certaine Village, that lay vnder a Hill, on the top whereof he made a stand, rather in a brauerie, than with purpose to attempt your these bold-fellowes any further. For he knew well that his brothers death had secured his estate, whom hee would seeme to have slaine with his owne hand, thinking that fact alone fufficient to give reputation to his valour; and this jo reputation he thought that he might now preferue well enough by shewing a manly looke, halfe a mile off. On the top of this Hill therefore hee advanced his Standard, a golden Eagle displaied on the top of a Speare. This ensigne might have encouraged his people, had not some of the Greekes espied it, who not meaning that he should abide so neare them, with all their power marched toward him. The King discourring their approach, fled upon the spurre; so that none remained in the place of battaile, faue only the Greekes, who had loft that day not one man, nor taken any other harme, than that one of them was hurt with an arrow. Much they wondred that they heard no newes of Cyrus, but thinking that hee was pursuing the Armie, they thought it was fittest for them, having that day done enough, to returne to their quarter, and take their Supper, to which they had good appetite, because the expectation of the Kings comming had given them no leifure to Dine.

The bard effate of the Greekes after the fight; and how ARTAXERXES in vaine sought to have made them yeeld vnto him.

T was now about the fetting of the Sunne, and they bringing home darke night with them, found their Campe spoiled, little, or nothing being left, that might ferue for foode: fo that wanting victualls to fabeing left, that might ferue for toode: to that waiting rectains of the tisfie their hunger, they refirehed their wearie bodies with fleepe. In the meane feafon Artaxers returning to his Camp, which he entired the meane feafon Artaxers returning to his camp of the meane feafon artaxers. The meaner feature the require he cause he meaner feature the require he cause he meaner feature the mean by Torch-light, could not enjoy the pleasure of his good fortune entire, because he perceived that the basenesse of his people, and weakenesse of his Empire, was now plainely discourred to the Greekes: which gaue him affurance, that if any of these who had beheld the thamefull demeanor of his Armie, thould live to carrie tidings home, it would not be long, ere with greater forces they disputed with him for his whole Signorie. Wherefore hee refolued, to trie all meanes, whereby hee might bring them to destruction, and not let one escape to carrie tidings of that which hee had feene; to which purpose hee sent them a braue message the next morning. Charging them to deliuer up their Armes, and come to his Gate, to awaite there vpon his Mercie. It seemes that he was in good hope to have found their high courages broken, vpon report of his brothers death; but he was greatly deceived in that thought. For the Greekes being advertised that morning from Arieus, a principall Commander under Creus, that his Mafter being flaine he had retired himfelfe to the place of their last encamping, about eight miles from them, whence intending to returne into Ionia, his meaning was to diflodge the next day, awaiting for them io long if they would joyne with him, but resoluing to stay no longer : they sent anfivere back to Arisus, that having beaten the King out of the field, and finding none that durit relift them, they would place Arises himselfe in the Kings Throne, if he would joyne with them, and purfue the victorie. Before they received any reply to this answere, the Messengers of Artaxerxes arrived at the Campe, whose errand feemed to the Captaines very infolent : One told them that it was not for the 29 Vanquithers to yeeld their Weapons; another, that hee would die ere hee yeelded to fuch a motion; a third asked, whether the King, as having the victorie, required their Weapons; if fo, why did he not fetch them? or, whether he defired them in way of friendship; for then would they first know, with what courtesie hee meant to requite their kindnesse. To this question Phalinus a Gracian, waiting vpoin Tiffaphernes, answered; That the King having flaine Cyrus, knew no man that could pretend any Title to his Kingdome, in the middeft whereof hee held them faft enclosed with great Rivers, being able to bring against them such numbers of men, as they wanted strength to kill if they would hold up their throats, for which cause he accounted them his prisoners. These wordes, to them, who knew themselves to 20 be free, were nothing pleafant. Therefore, one told Phalinus, that having nothing left, but their Armes and Valour, whileft they kept their Armes, their Valour would be seruiceable, but should they yeeld them, it was to be doubted, that their bodies would not long remaine their owne. Hereat Phalinus laughed, faying; This yongman did feeme a Philosopher, and made a pretie speech; but that his deepe speculation shewed his wits to be very shallow, if he thought with his Armes, and his Valour, to preuaile against the great King. It seemes that Phalinus being a Courtier, and imploied in a bulineffe of importance, thought himfelfe too profound a Statesman, to be checkt in his Embaffage by a bookish discourser. But his wisdome herein failed him. For what focuer he himselfe was ( of whom no more is knowne than 40 that he brought an vnhonest message to his owne Countrimen, perswading them basely to surrender their Weapons, and Liues, to the mercilesse Barbarians this yong Scholler by him despised, was that great xenophon, who, when all the principall Commanders were furprifed by treacherie of the Persians, being a private Gentleman, and having neuer seene the warres before, under-tooke the conduct of the Armie, which he brought safe into Greece, freeing it from all those, and from greater dangers than Phalinus could propound. Some there were who promifed to be faithfull to the King, as they had beene to Cyrus, offering their feruice in £gypt, where they thought Artaxerxes might have vsc of them. But the finall answere was, That without Weapons they could neither doe the King good as Friends, nordefend 50 themselues from him as Enemies. Hereupon Phalinus deliuered the Kings further pleasure, which was to grant them Truce, whilest they abode where they then were, denouncing Warreif they stirred thence; Whereunto hee required their answere. Clearchus the Generall told him, they liked it. How (faith Phalinus) must I vnderftand you?as choofing peaceif we ftay, otherwife warre, faid Clearchus. But whether warre or peace? quoth this politique Embassadour. To whom Clearchus (not willing to acquaint him with their purpose.) Let our doings tell you; and so dismiffed him, no wifer than he came. All that day the Greekes were faine to feede vppontheir Horses, Asses, and other Beasts, which they rosted with arrowes, darts, and woodden targets, throwne away by the Enemies.

How the Greekes beganne to returne home-wards.

T night they tooke their way towards Ariaus, to whom they came at mid-night; being for faken by foure hundred foote, and fortie horfe, ail Thracians, who fled ouer to the King, by whom how they were entertained, I doe not finde. Like enough it is that they were cut in pec-ces, for had they been kindly vsed, it may well be thought that some of them should have accompanied Tissaphernes, and served as Stales to draw in the reft. Arisus being of too base a temper, and birth, to thinke vpon seeking the Kingdome for himfelfe, with fuch affiftance as might have given it vnto Cyrus, was very well pleafed to make couenant with them for mutuall affifiance vnto the laft: Whereunto both parts having fworne, he aduifed them to take another way bome ward, which should bee somewhat longer, yet safer and fitter to relecue them with victualls, than that by which they came. The next day, having made a wearifome march, and tired the Souldiers, they found the Kings Armie which had coalted them, lodged in certaine Villages, where they purposed themselues to haue encamped: towards which Clearchus made directly, because hee would not feeme by declining them to show feare, or weakenesse. That the Kings men were contented to remone, and give place to their betters, it cannot be strange to any that hath confidered their former behauiour; Nor strange, that the Gracians being wearie and hungrie, and lying among enemies in an vnknowne Countrie, should be very searcfull: but it is all most past beleefe, that the noise which was heard of these poore men, calling one to another tumultuously, as the present condition inforced them to doe, should make the Persians slic out of their Campe, and so affright the great

King, that in stead of demanding their Armes, he should craue peace of them. The next day very early, came Meffengers from Artexerxes, desiring free accesse for Embaffadours, to entreat of peace. Were it not that fuch particulars doe best open the qualitie of the persons, by whom thinges were managed, I should hold it fitter, to runne ouer the generall paffages of those times, than to dwell among circumstances. 40 But furely it is a point very remarkeable, That when Clearchus had willed the Mcffengers to bid the King prepare for battaile, because the Greekes (as he faid) wanting whereupon to dine, could not endure to heare of truce till their bellies were full; Artaxerxes diffembling the indignitie, was contented fweetly to swallow downe this pill, fending them guides who conducted them to a place where was plentic of victualls to releeue them.

Itherto the Greekes, relying vpon their owne vertue, had rather aduanced their affaires, than brought them selues into any straights or termes of disaduantage. But now came vnto them the subule Fox Tiffaphenes, who circumuenting the chiefe Commanders by fine sleights, did mischieuously entrapthem, to the extreme danger of the Armie.

He told them, that his Prouince, lying neare vnto Greece, had caused him greatly to defire, that their deliuerance might be wrought by his procurement; knowing well that in time to come, both they, and their Countrimen at home, would not bee vnthankefull for fuch a benefit. Herewithall hee forgot not to rehearse the great seruice that he had done to his Master, being the first that aduertised him of Crus his intent, and having not only brought him a good strength of men, but in the day of battasle shewed his face to the Greekes, when all others turned their backs: that hee, together with the King, did enter their Campe, and gaue chase to the Barbarians that food on the part of Cyrus. All this (quoth hee) did I alleage to the King, entreating that he would give me leave to conduct you fafe into Greece; in which fuite 20 I have good hope to speede, if you will fend a mildeanswere to him, who bath willed me to aske you, for what cause yee haue borne Armes against him. The Captaines hearing this, were contented to give gentle words, which Tiffaphernes relating to the King, procured (though very hardly as he faid) that peace should be granted : the conditions whereof were; That they should passe freely through all the Kings Dominions, paying for what they tooke, and committing no spoile: yet that it should be lawfull for them to take victualls by force, in any place that refused to affoord them an open Market. Hercunto both parties having fworne, the League was concluded, and Tiffaphernes returning to the King to take leaue, and end all bufinesse, came vnto them againe after twentie daies, and then they set forward. This 30 interim of twentie daics, which Tiffaphernes did spend at the Court, ministred ereat occasion of mistrust to his new Confederates. For besides his long absence, which alone sufficed to breede doubt; the Brethren, and Kindred of Arieus, repairing daily to him, and other Persians to his Souldiers, did worke him and them so with affurance of pardon, and other allurements, that hee daily grew more strange to the Greekes, than formerly he had beene. This caufed many to aduife Clearchus, rather to palle forward as well as he might, than to relie youn covenants, and fit still whileft the King laied finares to entrap them. But he on the contrarie perswaded them, to reit contented whilest they were well, and not to cast themselves againe into those difficulties, out of which they were newly freed by the late Treatie; reciting 40 withall their owne wants, and the Kings meanes, but especially the Oathes mutually giuen and taken, wherewith hee faw no reason why the enemic should haue clogged himselfe if he meant mischiese, having power enough to doe them havne by a faire and open Warre.

Tiliphernes was a very honourable Man (if honour may bee valued by greatneffeand place in Court) which caufed his Oath to bee the more effected; for as much as no inforcement, or bafe refpect, was like to base drawne it from himBut his fallhood was fuch, both in fublance and in fucceffe, as may fifty expound that faying, which proceeded from the fountaine of Truth, I have a rich man alyar.

A lye may finde excufe when it growes our of feare: for that paffion hath his originall from weakeneffe. But when Power, which is a Charafter of the Aimsplatehall be made the fupporter of writtuth, the fallhood is most abhominable; for the offender, like proud Luafer, advancing his owne firength against the durine fuffice, doth commit that finne with an high hand, which commonly produceth lamentable effects, and is followed with fure vengeance. It was not long ere Tiffaphernes found meanes to destroy all the Captaines, whom hee subtilly got into his power by a traine; making the Generall Clearchus himselfe the meane to draw in all the reft. The bulinesse was contriued thus: Hauing trauailed some daies together, in fuch wife, that the Persians did not encampe with the Greekes, who were very jealoufe of the great familiaritie, appearing betweene Tiffaphernes, and Arians: Clearchus thought it convenient to roote out of Tisaphernes his braines all causes of distrust, whereof many had growne in that fhort time. To which purpose obtaining private conference with him, heerehearfed the oath of Confederacie, which had palt beto tweene them, shewing how religiously he meant to keepe it, and repeating the benefits, which the Greekes did receive by the helpe of Tiffaphernes, hee promifed that their love should appeare to him not unfruitfull, if he would make vie of their service against the Mysians or Pisidians, who were accustomed to infest his Province, or against the Aeyptians, who were then Rebels to the great King. For which cause he defired him, that whereas all divine and humane respects had linked them together, he would not give place to any close accusation or suspition, whereby might grow fuddaine inconvenience to either of them, you no just ground. The faithlesse Perfian was very much delighted with this speech, which ministred faire occasion to the execution of his purpose. Therefore he told Clearchus, that all this was by him 20 wifely confidered, wifhing him further to call to minde how many waies hee could haue vsed to bring them to confusion, without perill to himselfe, especially by burning the Countrie, through which they were to passe, whereby they must needes haue perished by meere famine. For which cause hee said that it had beene great folly, to fecke by perjurie, odious to God and Man, the destruction of such as were alreadie in his handes; But the truth was, that his owneloue to them had moued him to worke their fafetie, not only for those ends which Clearchus had recounted, of pleafures that might redound to himfelfe, and the King, by their affiftance; but for that he might by their friendship, hope to obtaine what Cyrus had mist. Finally, he inuited the credulous Gentleman to Supper, and fent him away to well afforced of his good will, that he promifed to bring all the Captaines with him to the fame place, where, in presence of them all, Tillaphernes likewise promised to tell openly, which of them had by fecret information fought to raife diffention between them. Clearchus himselfe being thus deceived, with great importunitie drew all the chiefe Commanders, and many of the inferiour Leaders, to repaire with him to the camp of Tisaphernes, whither followed them about two hundred of the common Souldiers, as it had beene to fome common Faire. But being there arrived, Clearchus with other the fine principall Coronels, were called into the Tent, the rest staying without, where they had not waited long ere a figne was given, vpon which they within were apprehended, and the relidue flaine. Forthwith certaine bands of Perfan Horse men scoured the field, killing as many Greekes as they met, and riding vp to the very Campe of the Gracians, who wondred much at the tumult, whereof they knew not the cause, till one, escaping forely wounded, informed them of all that had beene done. Hereupon the Greekes tooke Armes in hast, thinking that the enemie would forthwith have affailed their Campe. Anon they might perceive the Embassadours of Tisaphernes, among whom were his owne brother, and Arisus, followed with three hundred Horse, who called for the principall men in the Armic, faying, That they brought a meffage from the King, which Ariess delivered to this effect. That Clearchus having broken his faith, and the league made; was justly rewarded with death; that Menon and Proxenus, two other of the five Co-70 ronels, for detecting his treacherie, were highly honoured; and finally, that the King required them to furrender their Armes, which were due to him, as having belonged vnto his seruant Cyrus. When some altercation had followed vpon this message, Xenophon told the Embassadours, that if Clearchus had in such fort offended, it was well that he was in such fort punished; but he willed them to fend backe

Menon and Proxense, whom they had so greatly honoured, that by them, as by common friends to both Nations, the Greekes might be aduited how to answere the Persian. Hereunto the Embassadours knew not how to frame any reply, and therefore departed without speaking one word more. Clearchus, and the other foure were fent to Artaxerxes, by whose commandement their heads were stricken off. I hold it not amiffe to preuent the order of time, annexing to this perfidiousnesse of Tissubernes, the reward which he afterward received. He saw his Province wasted by the Greekes, against whom receiving from his Master convenient aide of men and money, hee did so ill manage his affaires, that neither subtiltie, nor perjurie (to which he failed not to haue recourse) auailing him; finally, the King was jealous 10 of his cunning head, and fent a new Licutennant into those parts, who tooke it from his shoulders. Such was the recompence of his treacherie, which made him so mistrufted at home, that the feruice which he could not doe, he was thought your priuate ends to neglect; and so hated abroad, that he knew not which way to flie from the ftroke, all the world being flut against him. But now let vs returne to the prosperitie, wherein hee triumphed without great cause, having betraied brauer men than himselfe, and intending to bring the like mischiese vpon the whole Armie.

Q. VIII.

How X ENOTHON heartened the Greekes, and in defigiht of Tissa
PHERNIS went off fafely.

Reat was the heavineffe of the Souldiers, being now destitute of Leaders, and no leffe their feare of the cuill hanging ouer their heads. which they knew not how to avoide. Among the rest, Xenophon, whose learning supplied his want of experience, finding the deepe fadnesse of the whole Armic to be such, as hindred them from taking any course of preuenting the danger at hand, beganne to adule the vnder-Officers of Proxenus his companies, whose familiar friend he had beene, to bethinke them- 20 felues of fome meane, whereby their fafetie might be wrought, and the Souldiers encouraged: fetting before their eyes whatfoeuer might ferue to give them hope. and about all perswading them in no wise to yeeld to the mercie of their barbarous enemies.

Hereupon they defired him to take vpon him the charge of that Regiment; and fo together with him, the same night calling up such as were remaining of any account, they made choice of the fittest men to succeede in the places of those who were flaine, or taken. This being done, and order fet downe for difburdening the Armie of all superfluous impediments, they easily comforted themselves for the loffe of Tisaphernes his affiftance, hoping to take victuals by force better cheape than 40 he had beene wont to fell them; To which purpose they intended to take up their lodging two or three miles further, among some plentifull Villages, and so to proeccde, marching towards the heads of those great Rivers, which lay in their way. and to passe them where they were footdable. Many attempts were made voon them by Tisaphernes, whom they, seruing all on foot, were not able to requite for the harme which they received by the Persian Archers, who shot at a farther distance than the Greekes could reach. For this cause did Xenophon provide slings, wherewith he ouer-reached the enemie; and finding some Horses fit for service, that were imploied among the carriages he fet men your them; training likewife his Archers, to shoote compasse, who had beene accustomed to the point blancke. By these 50 meanes did hee beare off the Persians who affailed him; and sometimes gaue them chace with that band of fiftie Horfe, which being well backt, with a firme bodie of footmen, and feconded with troupes of the light-armed-fhot and flingers, compelled the enemie to lie a-loofe. Tisaphernes not during to come to handie-gripes with these resolute men, did possesses the tops of Mountaines, and places of advantage, by which they were to paffe. But finally, when their valour made way through ail fuch difficulties, he betooke himfelfe to that courfe, which was indeede the fureft. or burning the Countrie. With great forrow did the Greekes behold the Villages on fire, and thereby all hope of victualls cut off. Some adulfed to defend the Countrie, as granted by the enemic himfelfe to be theirs; others to make more fires, if fo perhaps the Perfians might be assumed to doe that which were the desire of such as made paffage in hostile manner; But these were faint comforts. The best counsaile was. That being neare vnto the Carduchi, a people enemie to the Persian, they should o enter into their Countrie, passing over some high Mountaines which lay betweene them. This course they followed, which could not have availed them if Tillaphernes had begunne fooner to cut off their victuals, rather then to feeke to force, or to circumuent them by his fine wit.

I X.

The difficulties which the Greeke Armie found in passing through the Land of the Carduchi.

Ntring upon the Land of the Carduchi, they were encountred with many difficulties of waies, but much more afflicted by the fierce Inhabitants, who, accustomed by force to defend themselves against the huge Armies of the Persian, were no way inferiour to the Greekes in daring, but only in the Art of warre. They were very light of foot, skilfull Archers; and vied the Sling well; which weapons in that mountainous Countrie, were of much vse against these poore trauailers, afflicting them in seven daies, which they spent in that passage, farre more than all the power of the great King had done. Betweene the Territoric of these Carduchi, and the parts of Armemis confining them, ranne Centrites a great River, upon which the Greekes refreshed 20 themselves one day, rejoycing that they had so well escaped these dangers, and hoping that the remainder would proue easie. But the next morning they saw certaine troupes of Horse, that lay to forbid their passage. These were leavied by the Kings Deputies in those parts; Tissaphernes and his Companies having taken their way towards Ionia. The River was broade and deepe, fo that it was not possible for fuch as would enter it, to make reliftance against those which kept the opposite bankes. To increase these dangers the Carduchi following vpon them, lay on the fide of a Mountaine, within leffe than a mile of the water. But it was their good hap to discouer a Foord, by which the greater number of them passing ouer, did easily chase away the Subjects of the Persian, and then sending backe the most expedite 40 men, gaue fuccour to the Reare ward, against which the Carduchi being slightly armed, could not on plaine ground make reliftance hand to hand. These Carduchi sceme to haue inhabited the Mountaines of Wiphates, which are not farre from the Spring of Tigris; though Ptolomie place them farre more to the East upon the River of Cyrus in Media, wherein hee differs much from Xenophon, whose relation being grounded vpon his owne knowledge, doth best in this case descrue credit. Of the Riuer Centrites (as of many other Riuers, Townes, and Places, mentioned by Xenophon) I will not labour to make a conjecture, which may indure the feueritie of a Critick. For Ptolomie, and the whole Nation of Geographers adde small light to this expedition; only of this last, I thinke it the same which falleth into Tigris, not much 50 aboue Artaligarta springing out of Wiphates, and running by the Towne of Sardeua in Gordene, a Province of Armenia the Great, wherein the Greekes having paffed Centrites did arriue.

CHAP. 10. S.12. of the Hillorie of the World.

How TERIBARYS Governour of Armenia, feeking to entrap the Greekes with termes of fained peace, was difappointed and Ibameiuila beaten 27 He Armie finding in Armenia good prouifion, marched without any diffurbance about fiftie or threescore miles to the heads of the River Tigris, and passing over them, travailed as farrefurther without reliftance, till they were encountred by Teribazas at the River Telebon, 10 which Xenophon commends as a goodly water, though fmall; but Ptolonie and others omit it. Teribanus governed that Countrie for the Perlian, and was in great fauour with Artaxerxes, whose Court may seeme to have beene a Schoole where the Art of fallhood was taught as wildome. He defired peace of the Greekes. which was made upon this condition, that they should take what they pleased, but not burne downe the Townes and Villages in their way. As foone as he had made this league, he leaused an Armie, and befetting the straights of certaine Mountaines which they were to paffe, hoped wel to make fuch benefit of their fecuritie, as might giue him the commendations of being no lesse craftily dishonest than Tillaphernes. Yet his cunning failed of fucceffe. For a great fnow fell, which caused the Greekes 20 to make many fires, and featter themselves abroad in the Villages. Teribazau also made many fires, and fome of his men wandred about feeking reliefe. By the fires he was discourred, and by a Souldier of his that was taken prisoner, the whole plot was reuealed. Hereupon the Greekes, taking this captine with them for a guide, fought him out: and comming you his Campe, did so affright him, that before the whole Armie could arrive there, the shout which was raised by the Vaunt-currors. chafed him away. They tooke his Paulion, wherein (belides many flanes, that were Artificers of voluptuousnesse) very rich furniture was left by the treacherons coward, who returned no more to challenge it. From hence the Armie went northward, and passing Euphrates, not far below the springs thereof, trauailed with much 20 difficultie through deepe fnow, being followed aloofe by the enemic, who durft not approch them, but did out off fuch as they found firaging behinde. The inhabitants of the Countrie, through which they marched, but their wintering houses vnder ground, wherein was found great plentie of victuals, and of cattaile, which likewife did winter in the same Cellars with the owners. Hauing refreshed them selues in those parts, and taken sufficient ease after the miserable journey, which had confumed many of them with extreme cold; they departed, leading with them many bond-flaues, and taking away (befides other Horses and Cattaile) fome Colts that were bred up for the great King.

The passage of the Armie to Trabizonde, through the Countries bordering room the River of Phasis, and other ob-

O without impediment they came to the Riner Phalis, neare wherevnto the people called Phaliani Taochi and Chalybes were feated. These Nations joyned together, and occupying the tops of a ledge of Mountaines, which the Greekes were to passe, made countenance of warre: 50 but some companies being sent by night to seize upon a place of equall height to that whereon the enemies lay, making good the peece of ground which they had taken, secured the ascent of the rest; which caused these people to flie, every one retyring to the defence of his owne. The first upon whose Countrie

the Greekes did enter were the Taochi, who convaying all their provision of victualls into frong holds, brought the Armie into much want, vntill with hard labour one place was forced, wherein great store of cattaile were taken; the people, to avoide captinitie, threw themselves head-long downe the rocks, the very women throwing downe first their owne children, and then casting themselves your them. Here was taken a great bootie of Cattaile, which ferued to feed them, transiling through the land of the Chalybes, of whom they got nothing but strokes. The Chalybes were a very fout Nation, well armed at all points, and exceeding fierce. They encountred the Greekes hand to hand, killing as many as they tooke prifoners, and cutting off their heads, which they carried away, finging and dancing, to the great griefe of their companions living; who were glad, when after feuen daies journey they e-feaped from those continuall skirmilhes, wherewith they had been vexed by these Burbarians. Hence travailing through a good corne-Countrie, inhabited by an obfeure Nation called the Scythini, they came to a rich Towne, the Lord whereof, and of the Region adjoyning, vsed them friendly, and promised to guide them to a Mountaine, whence they might discouer the Euxine-Sea. From Gymnias ( which was the name of his Towne) hee led them through the Territorie of his enemies, defiring them to wastit with sword and fire. After fine daies march, they came to a Mountaine called Teches, being (as I thinke) a part of the Mountaines called Mo-20 Jehia, whence their guide shewed them the Sea; towards which they bent their course, and passing friendly through the Region of the Was: ones, ( with whom by meanes of an interpreter, found among themselves, who borne in that place had beene fold into Greece, they made a good peace) they arrived in the land of Colches, wherein stands the Citie of * Trabifond, called then Trapezus, a Colonic of the . Trabifond a Species. The College intertaining them with holilities, were required with the like; Colonie of the for the Armie, having now good leifure to repose themselves among their friends in the bottome. the Trapezuntians, did spoile the Countrie thirtie daies together, for bearing only the of the English Borderers vpon Trabizonde, at the Citizens request.

How the Armie beganne at Trabizond to prouide a Fleet, wherewith to returne home by Sea : how it came into the Territorie of Sinope, and there prosequated the same purpose to effect.

Auing now found an Hauen Towne, the Souldiers were defirous to take lhipping, and change their tedious Land journies into an eafie Nauigation. To which purpose Cherisophus a Lacedamonian, one of the principall Commanders, promifed by meanes of Anaxibius the Lacedemonian Admirall, who was his friend, that hee would prouide Veffells to embarke them. Hauing thus concluded, they likewise tooke order for the staying of such ships as should passe that way, meaning to yet them for their nauigation. Least all this prouision should be found insufficient for the transportation of the whole Armie, Xenophon perswaded the Cities adjoyning to cleare the waies, and make an easie passage for them by Land; whereunto the Souldiers were vtterly vnwilling to give care, being defirous to returne by Sca : but the Countrie fearing what inconvenience might grow by their long flay, did readily condescend to Xenophons request. Two ships they borrowed of the Trapezuntians, which they manned and fent to Sea : the one of them failed directly into Greece, for faking their 50 Compatitions, who had put them in trust to bring ships into the Port of Trabifonde: the other tooke Merchants and Paffengers, whose goods were safely kept for the owners, but the Veffells were flaied to increase the fleet. After long abode, when victuals beganne to faile, by reason that all the Land of the colchi, neare vnto the Campe, was alreadic quite wasted, they were faine to embarke their sick-men, with the women, children, and fuch of the baggage as might belt be spared, in those few thips which they had alreadic prouided. I he rest of the Armie tooke their way by Land to Cerafus, a Greeke Towne, where the fleet likewise arrived. Herethe Armie being muftered was found to confift of eight thousand and fixe hundred men. From a Mofineria hence they passed through the Countrie of the a Mofinaci, who were divided into Nation of Pan- factions. The ftronger partie, despising their friendship, caused them to joyne with the weaker, whom they left Masters of all.

The next place of their abode was b Cotyona, a Greeke Towne likewise, and a Colonie of the Sinopians, as Trapezus and Cerafus were; but the entertainement which here they found was very churlish, having neither an open Market affoorded to 10 them, nor the fick-men that were among them admitted into any house. Hereupon the Souldiers entred the Towne by force, and (committing no outrage) bestowed those which were sicke in convenient lodgings, taking into their owne handes the cuitodic of the Gates. Prouision for the Armie they made by strong hand, partly out of the Territoric of the Paphlagonians, partly out of the Lands belonging to the Towne. These newes were vnwelcome to & Sinope, whence Embassadours were fent to the Camp, who complaining of these dealings, and threatning to joyne with the Paphlagonians, if redreffe could not otherwife be had, were roundly answered by Xenophon, That meere necessitie had enforced the Armie to teach those of Cotyora good manners in fo bad a methode : letting them know, that he feared not to deale 10 with them and the Paphlagonian at once; though perhaps the Paphlagonian would be glad to take Sinope it felfe, to which, if cause were given, they would lend affishance. Vpon this answere the Embassadors grew better adulted, promising all friendship that the State of Sinope could flew, and commanding the Towne of Cotyora to releeue the Souldiers as well as they might. Further, they promifed to affift them with shipping, letting them understand how difficult the passage by Land would proue, in regard of the manie and great Rivers, as Thermodon, Iris, Halys, and Parthenius, which croffed their way. This good counfaile, and the faire promifes accompanying it, were kindly accepted by the Armie, which well perceived that the Citie of Sinope would foare for no cost, to be freed from such a neighbourhood. It 30 was therefore decreed that they would paffe the reft of the way by Sea; prouided, that if there should want such number of Vessels as might serue to embarke energy one man of them, then would they not put from the shore.

ò. XIII.

Of diffention which arose in the Armie; and how it was embarked,

Itherto the danger of enemies, and mileries of weather and wants, had kept the companie in firme vnitie; which now beganne to diffolue 40 and to thaw, by the neighbouring aire of Greece, warming their heads with prinate respects to their seuerall ends and purposes. Whilest they, who were fent as Agents from the Campe, remained at Sinope:

Xenophon confidering the strength and valour of his men, and the opportunitie of the coast whereon they lay, thought it would be an honorable worke to build a Citie in those parts, which were soone like to proue great and wealthie, in regard both of their owne puissance, and of the great repaire of the Greekes into that quarter. For this cause he made sacrifice, according to the superstition of his time and Countrie, divining of his successe by the entrailes of beasts. The Sooth-sayer, whom he imploied, had received a great reward of Cyrus, for conjecturing aright, that Ar- 50 taxerxes would not give battaile in ten daies : hee therefore, having preferred his money carefully, was defirous to be foon at home, that he might freely enjoy his gettings. By him the purpole of Xenophon was disulged, which was interpreted according to the diucrlitic of mens opinions; fome approuing the motion, but the greater part rejecting it. They of Sinope and Heracles, being informed of this con-Jultation, were fore afraide, leaft the pourtie of the Souldiers, who had not wherewith to maintaine themselves at home, should give successe to the project. Which to preuent, they promifed to supply the Armie with a sufficient fleet, and likewise offered money to some of the Captaines, who thereupon under-tooke to give the Souldiers pay, if they would prefently fet faile for Greece. One of these Captaines being a banished man, defired them to follow him into Trees, an other offered to leade them into Cherrone(us. Aenophon who delired only the common good, was pleased greatly with these propositions, and professed openly that hee would have them to fet forward, and hold together in any case, punishing him as a Traitor that should for fake the Armie, before such time as they were arrived at their journies end. Silanus the Sooth-fayer, who had vttered Xenophons purpose, was hereby flaied from out-running his fellowes, and driven to abide with his wealth among poore men, longer than stood with his good liking. Also the other Captaines were much troubled and afraid, when they perceived, that thips were prepared fufficient for their Nauigation, but that the money promifed to them, and by them to the Souldiers, came not. For the people of Sinope, and Heraeles, knowing that the Armie was now resoluted for the voiage, and that Xenophon, whom they seared had perswaded them to this resolution; thought it the wisest way to furnish them with a Nauie whileft they were in good readineffe to depart, but to keepe the money to themfelues. The Captaines therefore who being disappointed by these Townes, found themselves in great danger of their men, whom they had deceived with faire hopes, repented much of their hastic offers, and signifying as much to Xenophon, praised him to make proposition to the Armie, of taking the ships, and failing to Phases, where they might feize upon Lands, and plant themselves in such wise as should stand best with their good liking. But finding him cold in the bufineffe, they began to worke the principall of their owne followers, hoping by them to draw in all the reft. These newes becomming publike, bred a suspition of Xenophon, as if he had wonne the rest of the Captaines to his purpose, and meant now to carrie the Armie quite an other 20 way from their owne home. Wherefore affembling the Companies, he gaue them fatisfaction and withall complained of some disorders, which he caused them to redreffe. A generall inquilition was likewise made of offences committed since the death of Cyrue; which being punished, all things were in quiet. Shortly after came Embaffadours from Corylas, Lord of the Paphlagonians, who fending prefents defired peace of the Greekes: the Embaffadours were friendly entertained, and peace concluded, which needed not to have beene fought, for that the Greekes having now their Fleet in a readinesse, did soone weigh Anchors, and set saile for Harmon the Port of Sinope, whether Cherisophus came, bringing with him a few Gallies from the Admirall Anaxibius, who promifed to give the Armic pay as soone as they came into the parts of Greece.

Another great diffention and distraction of the Armie. How the mutiners were beaten by the Barbarians, and rescued by

He nearer that they approched to Greece, the greater was their defire to make prouision for themselues, that they might not returne home emptie-handed. Wherefore trufting well that if the charge of the Armie were absolutely committed to one sufficient man, hee might the more conveniently procure the good of them all, they determi126

ned to make Xenophon fole Commander of all; in whose fauour as well the Captains as the common Souldiers were very earnest and violent. But he, either fearing to displicate the Lacedamonians, who were jealous of him alreadic (being incensed by that fugitiue who for looke the Armie at Trabizond, flying with one of their two thips) or moved by fome tokens appearing to him in the entrailes, that threatned ill fucceile to his government, procured with vehement contention, that this honour was laied upon Cherifophus a Lacedamonian. It feemes that Xenophon, confidering the vexations incident to the conduct of avoluntarie Armie, wanting pay, did wifely in yeelding to fuch tokens as forbad him to accept it : especially, knowing so well their defire, which was, by right or by wrong to get wealth wherefoeuer it might bee 10 found, without all regard of Friend or of Foe. Cherslophus had beene Generall but fixe or feuen daies, when hee was deposed, for having beene vn willing to robbe the Towne of Heraclea, which had fent presents to the Campe, and beene very beneficiall vnto them in lending ships for their transportation. Two daies they had failed by the coast of Asia, when being past those great Rivers, which would have given impediment to their journey by Land, they touched at Heraclea, where confulting how to take their way onwards, whether by Land or Sea, one seditious man began to put them in minde of feeking to get fomewhat for themselves; telling them that all their provision would bee spent in three daies, and that being now come out of the enemies Countrie, victuals, and other necessaries, could not bee had without 20 money; for which cause he gaue aduice to send messengers into the Towne of Heracles, giving the Citizensto vnderstand what their wants were, and demanding of them three thousand precess of money, called Cyzicens, which summe amounteth to two thousand and fine hundred pound starling, or thereabout. This motion was greatly applauded, and the fumme raifed to ten thousand Cyzicens at least: which to require, they thought Chersfophus, as being Generall, the fittest man; others had more defire to fend Xenophon: but in vaine, for they both refused it, and renounced the action as dishonest. Least therefore either of these should faile in managing the businesse which agreed not with his disposition, others of more impudencie and lesse discretion were sent, who in such wise deliuered their insolent mesfage; that the Citizens taking time to deliberate vpon their request, brought what they could out of the fields into the Towne, and thutting the Gates, did forthwith man the walls. When the Souldiers perceived themselves to bee disappointed of their rauenous purpose, they fell to mutinic, saying, That their Leaders had betraied them: and being for the more part of them Arcadians, and Achaens, they for fooke immediately Cherisophus and Xenophon, choosing new Leaders out of their owner number. Aboue foure thousand and fine hundred they were, all heavily armed, who electing ten Captaines, failed vnto the Port of Calpas, which is in the mid-way betweene Heraelea and Bizantium, with purpose to affaile the Bythinians on the suddaine. With Cherisophus there abode two thousand and one hundred, of whom one 40 thousand and four hundred were armed weightily: Xenophon had two thousand foot, three hundred whereof were lightly armed, and fortie horse, which small band had done good service alreadie, and could not have beene spared now. Cherisophus had agreed with Cleander Gouernour of Bizantium, to meete him at the mouth of the River Calpas, whither Cleander promised to bring some Gallies to conveigh him ouer into Greece; for which cause hee tooke his way thither by Land, leaving to Xenophon fuch shipping as he had, who paffing some part of the way by Sea, landed vpon the Confines of Heracles, and Thracia Affatica, intending to make a cut through the mid-land-Countrie to the Propont. The Mutiners who had landed at Calpas by night, with purpose to take spoiles in Bythinia, divided themselves into ten Compa- 50 nies, euery Captaine leading his owne Regiment into some Village, fiue or fixe miles from the Sea; in the greater Townes were two Regiments quartered; and so was that part of the countrie surprised on the suddaine, and sacked all at one time.

CHAP.10. S.15. of the Historie of the World. The place of Rendeuous was an high peece of ground, where some of them arrived, finding no disturbance; others, not without much trouble and danger; two Companies were broken and defeated, only eight men escaping, the reit were all put to the fword. For the Thracians which had flipt at first out of the Souldiers hands, did raise the Countrie, and finding the Greekes loden with bootie, tooke the advantage, of their disorder, cutting in peeces those two Regiments: which done, they attempted the reft, encompaffing the hill whereon they encamped. One great advantage the Thracians had, that being all light armed, they could at pleasure make retrait from these Arcadians, and Achaens: who wanting the affistance of horse, and having to neither Archers nor Slingers among them, were driven to fland meerely vpon their defence, bearing off with great danger, and many wounds received, the Darts and Arrowes of the Barbarians, till finally they were driven from their watering place, and enforced to craue parlie. What focuer the articles of composition were, the Thracians yeelded to all; but pledges for affurance they would give none, without which the Greekes well knew, that all promifes of fuch people, especially so incensed, were nothing worth. In the meane time Xenophon holding his way quietly through the In-land Region, did enquire of some Travailers, whether they knew ought of any Gracian Armie, paffing along those parts: and receiuing by them true information of the desperate case into which these Gallants had foolishly throwne to themselves, hee marched directly towards the place where they lay, taking with him for guides them who gaue him the intelligence. His horse-men he sent before to discouer, and to scoure the waies; the light armed foot-men tooke the hill-tops on either hand; all of them fetting fire on whatfoeuer they found combustible, whereby the whole Countrie feemed to bee on a light-flame, to the great terrour of the enemies, who thought that some huge Armie had approched. That night he encamped on a Hill, within five mile of the Arcadians, encreasing still the number of his fires, which he caused hastily to bee quenched soone after Supper. The enemies perceiving this, thought certainely that hee would have fallen vpon them in the darke, which caused them in all hast to dislodge. Early the next morning 30 Xenophon comming thither in very good order, to have given battaile, found that his deuice, to affright the Thracians, had taken full effect; but hee maruailed that the Greekes were also departed, concerning whom he learned by enquirie, that they remoued at breake of day, and perceived by fignes that they had taken the way to the Port of Calpat, in which journey hee ouer tooke them. They embraced Him, and His, with great joy: Confessing that they themselves had thought the same which the enemies did, looking that hee should have come by night, wherein finding themselves deceived, they were affraid least he had forsaken them, and therefore hastened away, to ouertake him, and joyne with him. So they arrived at the Hauen of Calpus, where it was decreed, That who focuer from thenceforth made a-40 ny motion to distoyne the Armie, should suffer death.

Of divers peeces of feruice done by XENOPHON; and how the Armie returned into Greece. The occasions of the Warre betweene the Lacedamonians and the Persian.

The

He Hauen of Calpas lay vnder a goodly head-land, that was very strong, and abounding with all kinde of Graine and Fruits, except Oliues. There was also Timber for building and shipping, and a very conuenient seate for a great Citie. All which commodities, that might have allured the Souldiers to stay there, and to plant, caused them to hastaway, fearing least Xenophon should finde some device to have fetled himfelfe and them in that place. For the greater part of them had good meanes to line at home, neither did they so much for hope of gaine follow Cyrus in that Warre, as in regard of his Honour, and the lone which they have york him . the poorer fort were such as left their Parents, Wines, and Children, to whom ( though failing of the riches which they had hoped to purchase ) they were now defirous to returne. But whether it were so that Xenophon found aduantage by their owne superstition, to make them stay, which they greatly suspected; or whether the fignes appearing in the entrailes, did indeede forbid their departure: fo long they were inforced to abide in the place till victualls failed, neither would the Captaines leade them forth to forrage the Countrie, vntill the Sacrifices should promile good fuccesse. Cherisophus was dead of an Ague, and his ships were gone, being returned to the Heracleans, of whom they were borrowed. His followers were joyned to the reft of the Armie, which the greater it was, the more prouision it needed, and the sooner felt want. For which cause, he that was chosen Coronell into the place of Cherisophus, would needes adventure to gratific the Souldiers with the spoile of some Villages that stood neare at hand; in which enterprise he found ill successe, the whole Countrie lying in wait to entrap him, and an Armie of Horse being sent by Pharnabazus the Satrapa, or Vice-roy of Phrygia, to the affillance of thefe Bythinian Thracians, which troupes falling upon the Greekes that were feat- 20 tered abroade in feeking bootie, flew five hundred of them, and chafed the reft to a certaine Mountaine thereby. The newes of this ouerthrow comming to Xenophon. he led forth a part of the Armie to the rescue of those that survived, and brought them fafe to the Campe; vpon which the Bythinians made an offer that night, and breaking a Corps du garde, flew some, pursuing the rest to the very Tents. This new courage of the enemie, together with the present condition of the Armie, fo disheartened and wnfurnished of necessaries, caused the Greekes to remove their Campe to a place of more firength; which having intrenched, and committed to the defence of such as were least able to indure travaile, Xenophon with the firmest and best able men went forth, both to burie those which were lately slaine, and to 20 abate the pride of the Thracians, and their Affiliants. In this journey his demeanour was very Honourable. For having given buriall to the dead, the Enemie was discouered, lying on the tops of the Hills adjoyning, to whom (notwithstanding that the way was very rough, and trouble some, so that some thought it a matter of too great danger, to leaue at their backs a wood scarce passeable) he marched directly, telling his men plainely, that hee had rather follow the enemie with halfe the number, than turne his back to them with twice as many, and letting them further know, that if they did not charge the Barbarian, hee would not faile with the greater resolution to pursue them; from whom if they could fafely retire to the campe, yet what should they doe there, wanting victualis to fulfaine 40 them in the place, and thips to carrie them away? wherefore hee willed them rather to fight well that day, having eaten their dinners, than an other day fasting; and not to regard the vncasie returne, which might serue to stay Cowards from running away, but to with vnto the Enemie a faire and easie way, by which hee might flie from them. These perswalions were followed with so valiant execution, that both Persians and Bythinians being chased out of the field, abandoned the Countrie forthwith, remouing their Families, and leaving all that could not fodainely bee conneighed away, to the discretion of the Greekes, who at good leifure gathered the haruest of these bad Neighbours fields. This was the last fight which they had on the fide of Afia. For they were not only suffered quietly 50 to enjoy the spoile of the Countrie, but when the opinion grew common in those parts, that it was the intent of xenophon to plant a Colonie on the Port of Calpas, Embaffadours were fent from the Neighbour people, to delire friendship, and make offer of their best assistance. But the Souldiers had no minde to raiv-Wherefore entring further into Bythinia, they tooke a great bootie, which they carried away to Chryjopolis, a Citie neare vinto Chalcedon, where they fold it. Pharnabazus, Licutenant in Phrygiato Artaxerxes, did greatly feare least their long flay in that Countrie-might breede in them a defire to visite his Prouince, where they might have found great wealth, and little power to guard it. Therefore hee fent to the Lacedamonian Admirall, entreating him with much inflance and large promiles to wast them oner into Europe; to whom Anaxibius the Admirall condescending, promised to give the Souldiers pay, as soone as they arrived at Bizanto tium. So were they carried out of Asia at the intreatie of the Persian, who in the heigth of his pride had thought them so surely imprisoned with mightie Rivers. that he not only denied to permit their quiet departure, but willed them to furrender their Armes into his handes, and so to yeeld their lines to his discretion. How discourteously they were intreated by Anaxibius, and how to requite his injurious dealings, they seized upon Bizantium, which by Xenophons perswalion they forbare to fack. I hold it superfluous to relate. For the residue of their doings appertaine little to the generall course of thinges. But this expedition, as in all ages it was glorious, so did it both discouer the secrets of Asia, and stirre vp the Greekes to thinke vpon greater enterprises, than euer their forefathers had vndertaken. Likewise it 20 was the only remarkable action which the time affoorded. For the Roman warres. did hitherto extend no further than to the next neighbouring Townes of Italie; and in Greece all things were quiet, the Laced amonians ruling infolently, but without disturbance. True it is, that the feedes of the Warre shortly following, which the Lacedemonians made upon Artaxerxes, were alreadie fowne, before these companies returned out of the high Countries of Asia. For the Townes of Ionia, which had fided with yong Crrus against Tillaphernes, if not against the great King, prepared to rebell, which they thought fafer, than to fall into the handes of Tiffaphernes, who was now appointed Lieutenant, both of his old Prouince, and of all who was now appointed Lieutenant, both of his old Prouince, and of all that had belonged to Gyrus. Wherefore the ionium belought the Lacedemonium to fend them aide, whereby to recour their liberties and obtained their

Of the affaires of Greece, whileft they were menaged by the Lacedæmonians.

How the Lacedamonians tooke courage by example of XENOPHONS Armie, to make Warre upon ARTAXERXES.

I feemes that the Lacedamonians did well perceive in how ill part Artaxerxes tooke their fayour thewed vnto his brother, and yet were timorous in beginning an open warre against him, thinking it sufficient 20 to take all care that no advantage might flip, which could ferue to firengthen their effate, by finding the Persian worke beyond the Sea. But when Xenophons Armie had reucaled the basenesse of those effeminate Aliatiques, and rehearfed the many victories which they themselves had gotten, vpon termes of extreme disaduantage; then was all Greece filled with desire of undertaking upon this huge unweldie Empire, thinking it no hard matter for the joynt-forces of that whole Nation, to hew out the way to Su/a, whereof one handfull had opened the passage to Babylon, and further, finding no power that was able 20 to give them relistance, it all that long journey of foure and thirtie thousand two hundred and fiftie five furlongs, spentin going and returning, which make of English miles about four thousand two hundred soure score and one, a very painefull march of one yeare and three moneths. Neuertheleffe the civill diffraction wherewith Greece was miferably torne, and especially that hot fire of the Theban Warre. which, kindled with Persian gold, brake forth sodainly into a great flame, drew back out of Afia the power of the Lacedamonians, to the defence of their owne estate ; leauing it questionable whether Agestlaus, having both the same, and farre greater forces, could have wrought proportionable effects. Sure it is, that in the whole space of two yeares, which he spent in Asia, his deedes procured more commenda- 40 tion of magnanimitie and faire behaujour, than of flout courage, and great, or profitable atchieuements. For how highly fo cuer it pleafed Xenophon, who was his friend. and follower in this, and in other warres, to extoll his vertue; his exploits being only a few incursions into the Countries lying neare the Sea, carrie no proportion to Xenophons owne journey, which I know not whether any Age hath paralleled : the famous retrait of Conon the Briton with fix thousand men from Aguileia, to his owne Countrie, through all the breadth of Italie, and length of France, in despite of the Emperor Theodofius, being rather like it than equall. But of Agefilaus and his warres in Afia and Greece, we shall speake more in due place.

ð. II.

The proferous beginnings of the warre in Alia.

HIMBR o receiving Xenophons men, beganne to take in Townes, and to entertaine all fuch as were willing to renolt from the Perjun, who were many, and some of them such, as had beene highly beholding to the King; who feeme to have had no other cause of discontent, than that they were to live vnder the government of Tiffaphernes, whom all others did as vehemently hate as the King his Mafter did loue him. The managing of the warre begunne by Thimbro, was for his oppressions taken out of his bandes, and committed to Dercyllidas a Spartan, who behaued himfelfe as a good man of Warre, and a wife Commander. For whereas the rule of the low-Countries of Alia was divided betweene Pharnabazase and Tiffaphernes, who did ill agree, Phar nabazus being the worthier man, but the other by his Princes fauour the greater, and having the chiefe command in those warres against the Greekes, Dercylidas who did beare a prinate hatred to Pharnabazus (knowing well that Tiffephernes was of a mischieuous nature, and would not be forrie to see his Corriuall throughly beaten, though to the Kings loffe) made an appointment with Tiffaphernes, and forth-20 withentred Lolis, which was under the jurisdiction of Pharnabazaus, which Pronince, in few daies, he brought into his owne power.

That Countrie of £olis had about the same time suffered a violent alteration, which gaue casie successe to the attempts of Dereylladas. Zenis a Dardanian had been Deputie to Phurnshazasi in those parts; after whose death his wife Mania procured his Office, wherein shee behaued herselfe so well, that shee not only was beloued of the people under her gouernement: but enlarged her Territorie, by the conquest of certaine Townes adjoyning; and fundrictimes gaue affiftance to Pharnabazus in his warres against the Mystans and Pissains. For shee had in pay some Companies of Greekes, whose valour by her good vsage did her great service. But somewhat be-20 fore the arrivall of Dereyllidas in those parts, a Sonne-in-law of hers, called Midias, whom thee trufted and loued much, being blinded with ambition, found meanes to stifle her, and kill her sonne of senenteene yeares old; which done, he seized vppon two of her principall Townes, wherein her treasure lay, hoping to have beene admitted into possession of her whole estate. Being denied entrance by her Souldiers, that lay in Garrison, he sent Messengers with presents to Pharmabazans, desiring him to make him Gouernour in the place of Mania. His presents were not only rejected by Pharnabazus, but retienge of his fowle treason threatned, whereby the wicked villaine was driven into tearmes of almost otter desperation. In the meane time came Described as, to whom the Townes of Mania, that held against Midia, 40 did quickly open their Gates. One only Towne stood out source daies (against the will of the Citizens, who were couctous of libertie) the Gouernour striuing in vaine to haue kept it to the vse of Pharnabazass. Now remained only two Cities Gergethe and Sceplis, which the Traitour held, who fearing all men, as being loued of none, fent Embaffadours to Dercylladas, defiring leaue to speake with him, and pledges for his fecuritie : vpon the deliuerie of which hee issued out of Sceplis , and comming into the Campe, made offer to joyne with the Greekes vpon fuch conditions, as might feeme reasonable. But he was plainely told by Described us, that other condition there was none, than to fet the Citizens freely at libertie. And prefently vpon these wordes they marched toward Seeplis. When Addiding perceived that it 50 was in vaine to strive against the Armie, and the Townes-men, who were all of one minde; he quietly went along with Dercyllidas; who remaining but a few houres in the Citie, did a facrifice to Minerus, and then leading away the Garrison of Midias, he left the Citic free, and departed toward Gergeihe. Midias did not forfake his Companie, but followed him, earneftly intreating that hee might bee fullered to re-

taine Gargeshe: but comming to the Gates he was bidden to command his Souldiers that they should be opened, for (quoth Dercylledas) I must here likewise doe a facrifice to Namerua. The Traitor, not daring to make deniall, caused his Mercinaries to open the Gates, whereby Descellidas, taking possession of the place, tendred pay to the Garrison, who did not refuse to serue vinder his Ensignes. This done, all the goods of Mania were leized upon, as belonging to one that had beene subject to

Pharmabagus who was enemie to the Greekes; and fo the murderous wretch was fent away naked, not knowing in what part of the World hee might finde any place to hide his detelled head. Describedas, having in eight daies taken nine Cities, purpo-

Truce with Pharnabazon, who had not any defire of Warre. That Winter, and the Sommer enfuing, the Trice being recontinued held; in which time, besides the wasting of Bythima, the neck of Land joyning Cherronea to the Maine, was fortified, being foure or fine miles in breadth, by which meanes eleuen Townes with much good Land belonging to them, were freed from the incursions of the wild Thracians, and made fit and able to vistuall the Campe. Likewife the Citie of Atarne was taken, which was of great fireneth, and very well flored with prouifion. After this,

Dercyllidas had command from Sparta, to divert the warreinto Caria, where was the feate of Tillaphernes; for that hereby it was thought not vneafic to recouer all the being appointed to joyne with him. Though it was than ifelt that Tiffaphernes had neglected Pharnabaz us in time of necessitie, yet was he not in his owne danger requited with the like. For Pharnahazus having respect to the Kings service, came to asfift his private enemie Tiffaphernes, and fo paffing into Caria, they thrust Garrisons into all places of strength; which done, they marched towards Ionia, hoping to finde the Townes ill manned for relistance. As these Persians were desirous to keepe the warre from their owne dores, fo was Dercyllidas willing to free his Confederates the Jonians from the fpoile and danger of the warre, by transferring it into Caria. For which cause he passed the River of Meander, and not looking to have been so soone the whole Armie of Taffaphernes and Pharnabazus was discouered, confisting of Per-fians, Carians, and fome Mercinarie Greekes, who were all marshalled in very good order to prefent battaile. The oddes was too apparent, both in numbers of men, and in readinesse, as also in advantage of ground; for the Persian had a great multitude of Horse, the Greeke very sew and seeble, being to fight in an open plaine.

Therefore all the Ionians, together with the llanders and others, of fuch places as bordered upon the Kings Dominions, did either betake themselues to present flight; or abiding a while for flame, did plainely discouer by their lookes, that they meant not to be more bold than wife. Only Dercylindas with his Peloponnesians re-them to destruction, if the counsaile of Pharnabazus had beene followed, who per-ceiuing the opportunitie of so great a victorie, was not willing to let it slip. But

Tiffaphernes, who naturally was a coward, feeing that countenance of reliftance was made, beganne to confider what strange defence the Souldiers of Xenophon had showed, and thinking that all the Greekes were of the like resolution, held it the wi-fest way to craue parlie; the conclusion of which was, That a truce should be made, to last vntill Tisaphernes might receive answere from the King, and Dercyllidas from Sparts, concerning the demands propounded in the Treatic, which were on the one part, that all the Greekes in Asia might enjoy their owne libertie and lawes, but contrariwise on the other side, that the Lacedemonians should depart Asia, and leave the Townes to the Kings pleafure. This Treatie was of none effect; only it ferued to free the Greekes from the prefent danger, and to gaine time vnto Tiffaphernes, who defired to avoide the warre by prograftination, which he durft not adventure to finish by triall of a battaile.

How the Lacedamonians tooke reucinge upon the Eleans for old diffleafure. The discontents of the Corinthians and Thebans, conceived against the State of Sparta.

N the meane feafon the Lacedamonians, who found none able to withfland them in Greece, beganne to call the Eleans to accompt for fome difgraces received by them during the late warres, when leifure was wanting to the requitall of fuch pettie injuries. These Elean's being Prefidents of the Olympiaque games, had fet a fine vpon the Citic of Sparta, for Non-paiment of which, they forbade them to come to the folemnitie: and publiquely whipt one of them, that was a man of note, for prefuming to contend against their decree. Likewise they hindred Agis King of Sparta, from doing facrifice to Infiter; and in all points vied great contempt toward the Spartage, who now had no bufineffe that could hinder them from taking reuenge; and therefore fent a peremptoric meffage to the Eleans, commanding them to fet at libertie the Cities which they held in Subjection. This was the visual pretence which they made the ground of all their warres: though little they cared for the libertie of fuch 20 Townes, which they caused afterwards to become followers, and little better than meere Vassals to themselues. In their late warres with athens, the strong oppolition which they found caused this goodly Title of libertie to worke very flowly : but having now to doe with a State of great spirit and small force, it gave present successe to their desires. Two yeares together they sent an Armie into the Countrie of the Eleans : the first years an earthquake ( held in those times a prodigious figne, and which did alwaies forbid the profecution of any enterprise in hand) caused them to retire: the second yeare, all the Townes of the Eleans did hastily reuolt, and the Citie it selfe was driven to submission; consenting both to suffer their old fubicets freely to enjoy their libertie, and to have her owne walls throwne 30 downe. Only the Presidentilip of the Olympian games was left vnto them, which, it was not to be doubted that they would, in time comming, vie modefuly, finding themselves to stand at the mercie of Sparta. In this expedition all the Greekes were affiftant to the Lacedemonians, excepting the Corinthians and Baotians, whose aide hauing beene of as much importance in the late Peloponnesian Warre, as the force of Sparta it felfe, they could not smoother their dislike of their vnequal division following the victorie; which gaue to Sparta the command of all Greece; to Thebes, and Corinth, only fecuritie against Athens, but such a securitie as was worse than the danger. For when the equall greatnesse of two mightic Estates did counterpoise each the other, it was in the power of these Neutrall Common-weales to adhere to 40 cither, as the condition of their affaires required; but when to reuenge injuries, they had by mortall hatred profecuted the warre to extremitie, leauing the one Citie naked of power and friends, the other mightily encreased in both, it was then (if not necessarie to obay the greatnesse which themselves had made yet; foolish and dangerous to prouoke it. Neuertheleffe, it was not the purpose of the Spartans to take occasion of any quarrell, which they could not finish at pleasure, till such time as they had by victorie or composition made some good end with the Persian, toward whom they bent all their care and forces.

The passing of Agesilans into Asia. His warre with Tissaphernes.

How Tissaphernes was put to death, and the warre discreted into an other Promune, through personal and agift of Tithanstes his successor. How carelesse the Personal Lieutemants were of the Kings good.

GESILAVS newly made King of Sparta, was defirous to haue the honour of the victoric, which, not without caufe, he expected upon those to false; and therefore procuring a great Armie to joyne, with that of Dereysludus, he tooke his way in great pompe to Aulis in Baoria, a Hauen, lying opposite to the lland of Eubea, in which place Agamemon

(leading the power of all Greece to the warre against Troy, many Ages before) had embarked his men. In imitation of Agamemnon hee meant also to doe facrifice in Aulis, which the Thebans, Lords of that Countrie, would not permit, but faying that the performance of fuch ceremonies in that place, belonged vnto their Officers, they were so vnable to conceale their malice, that sending some Companies of horse, they threw downe his facrifice from the Altar. It was not then convenient time for Agefilant to entangle himfelfe and his Countrie in any new warre; there- 20 fore, waiting better opportunitie of reuenge, he quietly swallowed the contumelie, and followed his maine intendment. Having landed his men at Ephelus, he was entertained by Tillaphernes with a Treatic of peace, wherein Agefilaus peremptorily requiring that the Persian should restore to libertic all the Greeke Townes in Asia, was promifed that the King, being first informed of his demand, should fend arriwere to his good liking, if he would in the meane while make truce. Truce was therefore made, which Tillaphernes had fought only to winne time of making prouision for the warre, and getting supply of men and money from Artaxerxes; whilest Agestlaus was busic in setling the Estates of his Confederate Cities on that side of the Sea. The end of this long vacation from warre was at the comming downe of these for- 20 ces which Artaxernes had fent; at what time Agefilaus received a plaine meffage from Tiffsphernes, that either hee mult forth-with depart out of Ala, or make good his aboade by firong hand. Ageflaus returning word that he was glad to heare that his enemies had by perjurie deserved vengeance from Heaven, prepared to inuade them; and fending word to all the Townes which lay betweene him, and Caria, that they should provide vistualls, and other necessaries for his Armie, did easily make Tiffsphernes belocue, that his intent was to inuade that Prouince wherein Tiffaphernes dwelt, and which was vnfit for Horse, in which part of his forces the Perfian had most considence. Therefore Tissaphernes bestowing all his Companies of foot in Caria, entred with his horse into the plaines of Mander, hoping thereby to 40 floppe the passage of a heavie foot-Armie, not suffering them to passe into that Countrie which was fittest for their feruice. But the Greekes left him waiting there in vaine, and marched directly into Phrygia, where they tooke great spoile without refistance, till such time as the Horse-men of Pharnabazus met him, who in a small skirmifa having the batter of the Greekes, were the occasion that Agefilaus returned to Esheliss. Although in this last fight only twelve men were lost, yet Agefilaus perceiving by that triall how hard it would be to prevaile, and hold the masterie of the field, without a greater frength of Horfe, tooke all possible care to encrease that part of his forces. By which meanes having enabled himfelfe, whileft winter lasted, hee entred you the Countrie of Tiffaphernes, as soone as the season of so the yeare would permit, and not only tooke a great bootie, but finding the Horse-men of Tiffaphernes in the plaine of Meander, without assistance of their infanterie, hee gaue them battaile, and had a great victorie, taking their Campe in which hee found great riches. The blame of this loffe fell heavie vpon Tiffaphernes

Tillaphernes, who either upon cowardife had absented himselfe from the battaile, or following some other bulinesse, was then at Sardes. For which cause his Master hauing him in diffrust, and thinking that peace might be the sooner had, which hee much defired, if the man, fo odious to the whole Nation of the Greekes, were taken out of the way, he fent into those parts Tithrausles a Persian, to cut off the head of Tillaphernes, and succeede him in the gouernement. Such was the end of this base and cowardly Politician, who little caring to offend Heauen, when by perjurie hee could advance his purposes on Earth, failed at the last through too much ouer-weening of his owne wifedome, even in that part of cunning wherein he thought himto felfe most perfect. For supposing, that by his great skill in subtile negotiation hee should one way or other circumuent the Greekes, and make them wearie of Aia; he did not feeke to finish the warre, and, according to his Masters with, bring all things freedily to quiet; but rather to emporife till he might finde fome opportunitie of making fuchend as best might stand with the Kings honour and his owne. Wherein it feemes that he much miltooke his Princes disposition, who though he had highly rewarded him for the aide which he did bring in his time of danger, yet would hee much more gladly haue taken it, if he could haue found fuch meanes whereby the danger it felfe might have beene avoided: as not louing to have warre whileft by any conditions (honourable or not) he might obtaine peace. And this appeared well 30 by the course which Tithraustes tooke at his first possession of the low-Countries. For he sent Embassadours to Agesslaw, in very friendly fort, letting him know, that the man who had beene Author of the warre, was now taken out of the way; and that it was the Kings pleafure to let the Greekes enjoy their owne lawes and libertie, ypon condition, that they should pay him the tribute accustomed, and the Armie be forthwith dismissed. The answere to this proposition, was by Agefilaus referred to the Councell of Sparta; in the meane scason he was content to transferre the warre into the Prouince of Pharnabazus, at the request of Tithraustes, who bought his departure with thirtie Talents.

This was a ftrange manner of Warre, both on the offensitue and on the defen30 fine part. For _Aegillaue having entertained great hopes of vanquishing the great King, was contented to forbearch is seurcall Provinces, at the entreatic of the Lieutenants; and thost Lieutenants being emploied by the King to maintaine his Estates against all enemies (wherein if they failed they knew that their heads might easily be taken from their shoulders) were little offended at any losse that tiell on their next Neighbour-Provinces, which were fibited likewise to the same Crowne of Perssa, o long as their owne gouernement could be preferred free from wast and danger. The cause of this disorder on the Perssa side I can aferibe to nothing to deferuedly, as to the corrupted estate of the Court, wherein Emmeshes, Consultans, and Mmisters of pleasure, were able by partiall construction to countenance, or disstatement of the Kings (which was for visual that it might be called a rule) to reward or punish the Provincial Gouernour, according to the benefit or losse, which have constructed united the time of his sult.

ward or punish the Prouinciall Gouernour, according to the benefit or loste, which the Countrie given in charge vnto each of them received, during the time of his rule. Whereby it came to passe, that as every one was desirous to make his owne Territorie yeeld a large increase to the Kings treassure; so no man was carefull to assist borderers, if losse or adanger might thereby grow to himselfe and his; but sate shill as antidle beholder, when perhaps by joyning their forces it had not beene uncasse to recompence the spoil of one Countrie, by conquering another, or defending a third from stare greater miseries.

The Warre and Treatie betweene AGESILAVS and PHARNABAZVS.

GESILAVS having thus compounded with Tithrauftes, entred Phrygia, burning and walling the Countrie without reliftance. Hec tooke the Palace of Pharnabasan, and by his Lieutenant draue him out of his Campe. The cactions, together with his honourable behauiour, which added much to their luftre, were more glorious than profitable. For he did not winne Cities and Places of strength, which might have encreafed his power, and given affurance to the rest of his proceedings: but purchased fame and high reputation, by which he drew vnto him some that were discontented and stood upon bad termes with the great King, whom hec loft againe as eafily, by meanes of some slight injurie done to them by his vnder-Captaines. Pharnabagus did not enclose himselfe in any Towne for feare of being belieged, but kept the field, lying as neare as he could fafely to the enemies, with whomit was not his purpose to fight, but to make some good end by composition, which hee found not vncalie to doe. For the pleasures, by him formerly done to the State of Sparta, in the times of their most necessitie, had beene so great, that when hee (obtaining parlie) 20 did set before their eies his bountie towards them, and his loue (which had been fuch, that besides many other hazards of his person, hee had for the rescue of their fleet, when it was driven to runne a shore at Mordus, adventured to ride into the Sea as farre as he could finde any ground, and fight on horse-back against the Athemians) together with his faith which had neuer beene violated in word or deede; they knew not how to excuse their ingratitude, otherwise then by telling him, That hauing warre with his Master, they were inforced, against their will, to offend him. Agefilans did make a faire offer to him, that if hee would revolt from the King to them; they would maintaine him against the Persian, and establish him free Prince of the Countrie wherein hee was at that time only Deputie to Artaxerxes. But 20 Pharnabazus told him plainely, That if the King his Master did put him in trust to make warre against them, he would not faile to doe the best that he could as their cnemie; if the charge were taken out of his hand, and hee commanded to obay an other, hee would then shift side, and betake himselfe to their alliance. The issue of this parlie was, That the Armie should no longer abide in Phrygia, nor againe returne into it, whilest emploiment could be found elsewhere. The excuse made by Azefilans, and the with-drawing of his forces out of those parts, were not sufficient to appeale Pharnabazas, whom he had not inuaded for want of more necessarie businesse elsewhere; but because his Countrie would yeeld great bootic; and for the hire of thirtie Talents. By this meanes the Lacedamonians changed an honourable 40 Friend into a hot Enemie, who afterwards requited their vathankefulnesse with full reuenge.

The great commotions raised in Greece by the Thebans and others, that were hired with gold from the Persian.

N the meane while Tithrausles, perceiving that Agesilaus meant nothing leffe than to returne into Greece, and let Artaxorses reft quietly in Afra, tooke a wife courfe whereby the Citie of Sparta was not only driuen to looke to her owne, and give over her great hopes of subverting the Empire, but was beaten out of all that had been gotten by many late victories, and faw her Dominion restrained vnto the narrow bounds of her owne Territorie. He sent into Greece fiftie talents of filuer, to bee implosed in raifing warre against the Lacedamonians; which treasure was, by the subtile practise of him that was put in trust with it, in such wife dispersed, among the principall men of the Thebans, Argines, and Corinthians, that all those Estates having formerly borne fecret hate to that of Sparta, were now defirous of nothing fo much as of open war. And least this great heate of the incensed multitude should, for want of present exercife, beginne to faint, and vanish away in idle wordes, occasion was found out to thrust the Lacedamonians into Armes, that they themselves might seeme Authours of the quarrell. Some land there was in the tenure of the Locrians, to which the Thebans had in former time laid claime; but the Phocians either having the better title, or finding the greater fauour, had it adjudged vnto them, and received yearly money for it. This money the Locrians were either hired or perfwaded to pay now to the Thebans, who readily accepted it. The Phocians not meaning fo to loofe their Rent, made a distresse by strong hand, recouring a great deale more than their owne; which the Thebans (as in protection of their new Tennants) requited with an inualion made upon Phocis, walting that Countrie in the manner of open warre. Such were the beginnings of professed hostilitie betweene Thebes and Sparta, and the first breaking out of their close enmitie, that had long time, though hardly, been concealed. For when the Phocian Embassadours came to Sparta, complaining of the violence done by the Thebans, and requesting succour, they had very fauourable audience, and readie confent to their fuite; it being the manner of the Lacedamonians, to deferre the acknowledgment of injuries received, untilloccasion of revenge were offered, and then to discouer their indignation in cold bloud. At this time they had very good opportunitie to worke their owne wills, having no other war to disturbe them in Greece, and hearing out of Alia no newes, that could offend or trouble them. Wherefore they fent Lylander to raise all the Countries about Phocis, and with such forcesas he could leavie, to attend the comming of Paufanias King of Sparta (for Sparta, as hath beene shewed before, had two Kings) who should follow him with the strength of Peloponnesius. Lylander did as he was appointed, and being of great 20 reputation in those parts, he drew the Orchomenians to revolt from Thebes. Paulanias likewise raised all Peloponness, except the Corinthians, (who refused to affist him in that enterprise) meaning to joyne with Lylander, and make a speedie end of the war. The confideration of so great a danger, approching so swiftly, caused the Thebans to feeke what helpe they could abroade, for a fmuch as their owne ftrength was farre too little to make relistance against such mightie preparations. It was not vnknowne to them, that many followers of the Lacedamonians were otherwise affected in heart than they durft ytter in countenance; but the good wishes of such people were litle auaileable, confidering that the most which could be expected from them, was, that they should doe as little hurtas they could by which manner of tergiuersation, the AO Corinthians did at that present cast themselves into the displeasure of the Spartans, to the no great benefit of Thebes. Wherefore it was thought the fafest course to procure the affiftance of same Estate that might presently declare it selfe on their lide, which would cause many others to follow the example, & make their partie strong. To this end they fent Embassadours to Athens, excusing old offences, as either not committed by publike allowance, or done in time of the generall warre, and recompenced with friendship lately shewen in their refusall of affishing Pausanias, when he came in behalfe of the thirtie Tyrants, against the good Citizens of Athens. In regard of which, and for their owne Honours fake, they requested them of aide in the present warre, offering to doe the best that they could for the restoring of Athens to 50 her former Estate and Dignitie. Thrasphulus and his Friends, who persecuted by the thirtie, had beene well entertained at Thebes, procured now the Citie to make a large requitall of the courtesie which they had received. For it was decreed, that the State of Athens should not only refuse to aide the Lacedemonians in this Warre; but that it should affift the Thebans, and engage it selfe in their cause. Whilest Pausanias lay ftill, waiting the arrivall of his Confederates; Ly/ander being desirous to doe somewhat that might advance the businesse in hand, came to Haliartus, where, though Paulanias did not meete him, as had beene appointed, yet he attempted the Towne. and was flaine in fight by the Thebans, who came hastily to the rescue. As this victorie did encourage the Thebans, fo the comming of Paulanias with his great Armie did againe amaze them, with prefentation of extreme danger; but their spirits were foonercuiued by the strong succour which was brought from Athens, in consideration of which, and of the late battaile, Paulanias durst not hazard a new fight with them, but receiving the bodies of those that were slaine, by composition, departed out of their Territorie, for which, either cowardife or indifcretion, he was at his re- 10 turne to Sparta condemned as a Traitour, and driven to flie into Tegea, where hee ended his daies in banishment.

How AGESILAVS was called out of Asiato helpehis Countrie. A victorie of the Spartans. CONON the Athenian, assisted by PHARNABAZUS. ouercomes the Lacedamonian fleet; recouers the mastrie of the Seas ; and rebuilds the walls of Athens. His good successe, and the confederacie made with Athens, gaue such reputation to the Thebans, that the Argines, Corinthians, Eubwans, Locrians, and Acarnanes, did forthwith fide with them, and raifing a strong Armic, determined to giue battaile to the Lacedemonians, as neare as they might, to their owne dores; Confidering that the force of Spartait felfe was not great, but grew more and more by the adjunction of their Confederates. The Magistrates of Sparts perceiuing the danger, sent for Agesilaus, who readily obcied them, and promifing his friends in Asia to returne speedily to their affillance, passed the straights of Hellejpont into Europe. In the meane time the Cities of the new league had given battaile to the Lacedomonians, and the remainder of their Affociates, but with ill fuccesse. For when the right-wing of each part had gotten the better hand, the A gines and Thebans returning from the chase in some diforder. were broken and defeated by the Lacedamonians, who meeting them in good order, wonne from them the Honour which they had gotten by forcing the left wing of the Lacedamonians, and made the victoric of that day entirely their owne. The report of this battaile meeting Agefilaus at Amphipolis, were by him fent ouer into Ala, where it is not likely that they brought much comfort vnto his friend, who had fince his departure seene the Spartan fleet beaten, and Lifander the Admirall flaine. The same man, whose endeauour had brought the Athenians into order, by advancing the Sea-forces of the Lacedamonians with money, and all manner of 40 fundlies, was now the occasion that the power of Athens grew strong at Sea, when the Citie was despoiled of her old reputation, and scars y able to maintaine an Armie by Land for her owne defence. Pharnabazus confidering how much it imported the King his Master, to have the Greekes divided into such factions, as might vtterly disable them from undertaking abroade, thought it the safest way for himselfe. during these broiles, to take such order, that he should not neede any more, to seeke peace by entreatie and commemoration of old benefits, at their hands, who vn-prouoked had fold his loue for thirtie Talents. To which purpose he furnished Conon the Athenian with eight ships, who had escaped, when the fleet of Athens was surprifed by Lylander at £gos-Potamos; giving him the command of a great Nauie, 10 wherewith he requited the loffe received at Agos-Potamos, by repaying the Lacedemonians with the like destruction of their fleet at Cnidus. After this victorie Conon failed to Athens, bringing with him, partly as the liberalitie of Pharnabazus, partly as the fruit of his victorie, so strong a Nauie, and so much gold, as encouraged the Athenians to rebuild their walls, and thinke more hopefully ypon recouring the Signorie which they had loft,

Of fundrie small victories gotten on each part. The Lacedamonians loofe all in Afia; The Athenians recouer some part of their old Dominion.

Euerthelesse the Lacedamonians, by many victories at Land, maintained for fome yeares the honour of their estate, endangered very greatly by this loffe at Sea. For Agefilaus obtained the better with his horse-men, from the Thessalians, who were accounted the best riders in Greece: He walted Baotia, and fought a great battaile at Coronea against the Thebans, and their Allies, whom hee ouerthrew; and by his Marshall

Gylis forraged the Countrie of Locris: which done, he returned home. The gaine of these victories was not great, & the reputation of them was, by many losses, much defaced. For the Thebans did in the battailes of Coronea vanquish the Orchomenians, who stood opposite vnto them, and retired vnbroken to Mount 20 Helicon, opening way perforce when Agessiaus charged them in their returns from the pursuit. Likewise Gylis was slaine with a great part of his Armie by the Locrians; and some other exploits by the Lacedamonians performed against the Corinthians, were repaied with equall damage received in the parts adjoyning; many Townes being eafily taken, and as eafily recourred. The varietie of which enter-feats was fuch, that the Thebans themselves were drawne, by the losse of the Hauen of Corinth, to fue for peace, but could not get audience, till fuch time as the newes came of a great victoric obtained by Iphicrates, Generall of the Athenian-forces at Lechaum; whereupon the Theban Embaffadours being fent for, and willed to doe their meffage, required only in scorne, to have a safe conduct given them, that they might enter into Corinth. From this time forward the Warre was made for a while only by incursions, wherein the Acheans, confederates of Sparta, felt most losse, their whole state being endangered by the Acarnanians, who held with the contrarie side, vntill Agefilaus repaied these inuaders with equall, or greater calamities, brought vpon their owne Lands, which did fo afflict the Acarnanes that they were driven to fue for peace. But the affaires at Sea were of most consequence, vpon which the succeffe of all depended. For when the Townes of Alia perceived, that the Lacedamomians were not only intangled in an hard warre at home, but almost disabled to passe the Seas, having loft their fleet at Cnidus; they soone gave care to Pharnabazus, who promifed to allow that they should vie their owne lawes, if they would expell 40 the Spartan Gouernours. Only the Citie of Abidus did stand firme, wherein Dercyllidas lay, who did his best to containe all the Townes about Hellespont, in the alliance of the Lacedamonians; which he could not doe, because the Athenian fleet vnder Thrasphulus tooke in Byzantium, Chalcedon, and other places thereabout, reducing the Ile of Lesbes to their ancient acknowledgement of Athens.

> Q. IX.
> The base conditions offered unto the Persian by the Lacedamonians. Of fundrie fights and other passages in the warre. The peace of ANTALCIDAS.

Bout this time the Spartans beganne to perceive, how vneasie a thing it would bee, to maintaine the warre against men as good as themselues, affifted with the treasures of Persia: wherefore they craued peace of Artaxerxes, most basely offering, not only to renounce the Greekes inhabiting Alia, and to leave them to the Kings disposition, but withall to set the Ilanders, and enery Towne in Greece, as well the little as the great, at full and absolute libertie, whereby they faid that all the principall Estates of their Countrie would so be weakened, that no one, nor all of them should becable to stirre against the great King. And fure it was, that the power of the Countrie being so broken, and rent into many fmall peeces, could neither have disquieted the Persian, by an offensive warre, nor haue made any good defence against him, but would have left it easie for him in continuance of time, to have taken the Cities one after an other, till hee had made himselfe Master of all. The Spartans were not ignorant of this, but were so carried with enuie, that perceiuing how the Dominion of the Seas was like to returne to Athens, they chose rather to give all from themselves and others, and make all a-like weake; than to permit that any of their owne Nation should grow stronger than themselves, who so lately had commanded all. Yet this great offer was not at the first accepted, both in regard that the other Estates of Greece, who had in the Kings behalfe joyned together against the Lacedemonians, did by their seuerall Embaffadours oppose themselves vnto it, and for that it was thought safest for Artaxerxes, rather to weaken the Lacedamonians yet more, than by interpoling himfelfe to bring friends and foes on the fuddaine to an equalitie. Especially Struthes, whom Artaxerxes did fend as his Lieutenant into the low-Countries, did feeke to repay the harme done by Agefilaus in those parts; which his intent appearing plaine, and 29 all hope of the peace being thereby cut off: Thimbro was fent into Alla to make war vpon Struthas; and others were appointed to other places, whereby the warre, being feattered about, all the Iles and Townes on the firme Land grew almost to the manner of piracie and robberie, affording many skirmillies, but few great actions worthie of remembrance. Thimbro was flaine by Struthas, and in his place Diphridas was sent, who demeaned himselfe more warily. Dercyllidas was removed from his charge at Abydus, because hee had not impeached Thrasybulus in his enterprises about Hellespont; Anaxibius, who succeeded him, was surprised and slaine in a skirmish by Iphicrates the Athenian. Thrasybulus, departing from Lesbos toward Rhodes, was flaine by the way at Alpendus; the Citie of Rhodes having long before joyned 20 with the Lucdamonians, who crefted there (as was their manner) an Ariflocratic, or the Gouernement of a few the principall Citizens, where as contrariwise the Athemians were accustomed to put the Soueraignetic into the handes of the people, each of them feeking to affure themselues, by erecting in the Townes of their Confederates a Gouernment like vnto their owne: which doing (where more especiall cause did not hinder) caused the Nobilitie to fauour Sparta, and the Commons to encline to Athens. The people of Egina roued vpon the coast of Attica, which caused the Athenians to land an Armie in £gina, and beliege their Towne : but this liege being raifed by the affiftance of the Lacedamonian fleet, the Handers beganne a-new to molest Attica, which caused the Athenians to man their ships againe, that returned 40 beaten, having loft foure of thirteene. The loffe of these ships was soone recompensed by a victoric which Chabrias the Athenian Generall had in Agina, whereuppon the Handers were faine to keepe home, and leaue to the Athenians the Seas free. It may well feeme strange that the Citie of Athens, having but newly raised her walls; having not by any fortunate and important battaile fecured her estate from dangers by land; but only depending upon the affiftance of fuch Confederates, as carried vnto different ends, had often discouered themselves irresolute in the common cause; would fend a fleet and an Armie to Cyprus, in defence of Euagoras, when the mastric of the Seas was foill affored, that an Iland lying in the eie of Piraeus, had abilitie to vexe the coast of Attica. But as the ouer-weening of that Citiedid cause so it viually to embrace more than it could compaffe; fo the infolencie and shameleffe injustice of the people, had now bred in the chiefe Commanders, a desire to keepe themselues farre out of fight, and to seeke emploiments at such distance as might secure them from the eies of the enuious, and from publike judgements, out of which few or none escaped. For which cause Timotheus did passe away much part of his time in the slile of Leibus; I photates in Thrace; and chabrius now did carrie away in coffund to the property of the state of the sta

Io as it lay in Pir.ans, thinking a-right that it was an harder matter to encounter with ten flips prepared for the fight, than with twentic lying in harbour, whole Marriners were all fleepe in their Cabbins, or drinking in Tauernes. Wherefore hee failed by night vinto the mouth of the Port, which entring at the breake of day, he found (according to his expectation) most of the men on thore, & few or none left aboord to make reitlance: by which meanes hee tooke many ships laden with marchandizes, many filher-men, passenger, and other Vesselb, as many of the rest as the time would sinter. About this time Pharnabazas, the Lieutenant of Phrygia, had one of the Kings Daughters given to him in marriage, with whom hee lived about the 20 Court; and many Officers that fauoured the Lacedamonians were placed in the lower Afa; by whofe affiftance, the fleet of Spartagrew victorious about Hellefpont; in fuch wife, that perhaps they should not have needed the peace, which they themfelues procured by Anideidas, from the great King, the conditions whereof were such as are mentioned before, guiung freedome to all the Cities of Greece, and duiding the Countrie into as many seuerall States as there were pettie Boroughs in it. Thus Artaerxes having bought his owne peace with money, did likewise by his money become arbitrator and decider of Controuersics between the Greekes, disposing of their businesses in the wise as stood best with his owne good. The tenor of Artaxerxes his decree was, That all Asand Cyprus flouid be his owne; the lles of

30 Lemnos, Imbrus, and Seirus be fubject to Athens; all other Greeke Townes, as well the little as the great, bee fet at libertie; and that who focuer should refuse this peace, upon them the approuers of it should make warre, the King assisting them by Land and Sea, with men, and ships, and treasure. The Athenians were so discouraged by their loss as Sea; the Lecedamonians by renole of their Consederates, and the necessities of maintaining many Garrisons, for which they wanted money; and other States by the miseries of the warre, whereof they saw no end; that all (excepting the Thebans) sid consent vnto these Articles. This was called the peace of Antalei-dass whereof the Lacedamonians taking upon themselues the execution, did not only compell the Argiues to depart out of Corints (which under pretence of descending 40 they held by Garrifons, lately thrush into it, not as Patrons, but as Lords) and the Thebans to leave Baestia five, of which Province Thebans had alwaies held the government the Thebans them like being allo comprehended under the name of Baestins, but caused the "Mantineans to throw downet heir owne Citie, and to dwell in Villages: alleaging that they had formerly been accustomed for odoe, though purposing indeede to chaltife them, as having been eill affected to Sparta in the late war. By these courses the Lacadamoniums did hope that all the small. Townes in Greec—would, when occasion should require it, willingly follow them in their warres, as Authors of their libertie; and that the great Cities having loft all their dependants, would be vanable to make opposition.

The warre which the Lacedemonians made upon Olynthus. They take Thebes by treason; and Olynthus by famine.

Hilest these warres, which ended without either victorie or profit, confumed the riches and power of Greece, the Citic of Olynthus in Thrace was growne so mightie, that shee did not only command her Neighbour-Townes, but was become terrible to places farre remoued, and to Sparta it selte. Great part of Mucedonia, together with 10

Pella, the principall Citie of that Kingdome, was taken by the Olynthians, who fol-Jowing the viual pretence of the Lacedamonians, to fet at libertie the places ouer which King Amputas did tyrannize, had almost now driven him out of his Dominions, and taken all to themselves. The Citizens of Acanthus and of Apollonia, being nearest vnto the danger of these incrocking neighbours, acquainted the Lacedamonians with their feare, affirming that this Dominion of the Olynthians would bee too throng for all Greece, if some continuance of time should give it reputation, which only it wanted, wherefore they requested affishance, but in such termes as did found of compuliion; protesting that either they must warre upon Olynthus, or become fub ect vnto her, and fight in her defence. Hereupon was made a hastic leauic of 20 men, two thousand being presently sent away with promise to bee seconded by a greater Armie. Whilest these two thousand gaue such beginning to the warre, as agreed with their small number, the bodie of the Armie following them surprised the Cittadell of Thebes, which was betrajed into the handes of Pherbidas the Lacedemonian, by fome of the Magistrates, who fought to strengthen their faction by the flauerie of their Countrie. The Thebans were ill affected to Sparta, but had not in any one point violated the peace lately made betweene them; which caused the Lacedamonians to doubt whether this act of Phabidas were more worthie of reward or of punishment; In conclusion, profit to farre ouer-weighed honestie, that the deede was approued, many principall Citizens of Thebes condemned to death, ma- 20 niedriuen into banishment, and the Traitors rewarded with the government of the Citie: by whose authoritie, and the force of the Garrison, the Thebans were compelled to ferue the Lacedamonians, in all, and more than all that they could require. This accesse of power having strengthned the Lacedemonians, caused them to entertaine the greater forces about Olynthus, which (notwith flanding the loffe of one great battaile, and some other disasters) they compelled at length by famine to render it selfe to their obedience.

X I.

How the Thebans recoursed their libertie, drining out the Lacedemonian Garrison, a Fter this Olynthian Warre, which endured almost three yeares, it seemed that no Estate in Greece was able to make head against that of Sparta: but it was not long ere the Thebans found meanes to shake off their voke, and gaue both example and meanes to others to doe the like. One of the banished men found by conference with a Scribe of the Theban Magistrates, comming to Athens, that the tyrannie wherewith his Countrie was oppressed, pleased him no better than it did those who for seare of it were fled from home. Whereupon a plot was laied betweene these two, that soone found very good fucceffe, being managed thus. Seuen of the banished men for sooke Albens privily, and entred by night into the fields of Thebes; where spending the next day fecretly, they came late in the euening to the Gates like hulband-men returned from worke, and so passed vndiscouered vnto the house of Charon, whom Phyllidas the Scribe had drawne into the confpiracie. The day following, a folemne fealt being then held in the Citic, Phyllidas promifed the Gouernours, who were infolent and luftfull men, that hee would conucigh vnto them that night the most beautifull Lames of the Towne, with whom they should take their pleasure. Haning cheared them with fuch hope, and plentic of good wine, hee told them when the time of performance (which they vrged) came, that hee could not make good his promife, vnleffe they would difmiffe their followers; because the Gentlewomen, who attended without in a chamber, would not endure, that any of the feruants to should see their faces. Vpon this occasion the attendants were dismissed, and the Conspirators, attired like Ladies and their Maides, brought into the place; who taking advantage of the Gouernours loofe behaviour, flew them all voon the fodaine with Daggers, which they brought hidden under their garments. Then prefently casting off their disguise, they went to other places, where faining themselves to come to the Gouernours vpon bufinesse, they got admittance, and slew those which were of the Lacedemonian faction. By the like deuice they brake into the prifon; flew the Gaoler; and fet at libertie fuch as they thought meete, and being followed by these desperate men, proclaimed libertie, making the death of the Tyrants knowne. The Captaine of the Castle hearing the proclamation, thought the Rebells to bee 20 stronger than indeede they were: the Citizens contrariwise mistrusted, that it was a practife to discouer such, as would be forward vpon occasion of revolting. But as foone as day-light reuealed the plaine truth, all the people tooke armes and befieged the Caftle, fending hastily to Athens for succour. The Garrison also sent for aide vnto the Townes adjoyning, whence a few broken troupes comming to the refeue, were defeated on the way by the horse-men of Thebes. On the other side the banished Thebans did not only make speede to affish their Countrimen, but procured fome Athenians to joyne with them, and thereby came fo strong into the Citie, that the Castle was yeelded, more through feare than any necessitie, youn condition that the Souldiers might quietly depart with their Armes; for which composition the 20 Captaine at his returne to Sparta was put to death. When the newes of the doings at Thebes, and the successe arrived at Sparta, an Armie was raised forth-with, and all thinges prepared as carneftly for the recovering of that Citie, as if some part of their ancient inheritance had beene taken from the Lacedamonians, and not a Towne perfidioufly vsurped by them, restored to her owne libertie. Cleombrotus, one of the Kings, was fent on this expedition, who having wearied his followers, with a voilefome Winters journey, returned home without any good or harmedone; leaning Sphodriss, with part of his Armie, at Thespies, to inself the Thebans; who doing them fome displeasures, made large amends by a foolish attempt upon the Hauen of Athens, which failing to take, hee wasted the Countrie adjoyning, and draue away Cattaile, cauling by this outrage the Athenians to enter with all their power into the Warre, out of which they were before very carefully feeking how to with-draw themfelues.

CHAP. XII.

Of the flourishing estate of Thebes, from the battaile of Leustra to the battaile of Mantinæa.

How Theles and Athens is yned together against Sparta. How the Athenians made peace for themselves, and others, out of which the Thebans were excluded. The battaile of Leuctra, and beginning of the Theban oreatnelle.

HE Lacedomonians were men of great refolution, and of much gravitic in all their proceedings, but one difhonorable rule they held, That all respects withflanding the commoditie of Sparta were to be negicated; the practife of which doctrine, euen by the best and wifelt of them, did greatly blemith that Effate, but when it was put in execution by infufficient ouerweening men, it feldome failed to bring ypon them in 10 itead of profit vnjuftly expected, both thame and loffe. And so it befell them in these enterprises of Phabicas, vpon the Caftle of Thebes, and Sphodrias vpon the Pireus. For howfocuer Agelilaus did spoile the Countrie about Thebes, in which hee spent two Sommers, yet the diligence of the Thebans repaired all, who by the good successe of some attempts, grew stronger than they were at the first.

The Athenians likewise beganne to looke abroade, sailing to the Ile of Coreyra, where they ordered thinges at their pleasure, and having in some fights at Sea prevailed, began as in the Peloponnesian warre, to furround Peloponnesia with a Nauie; afflicting fo the Lacedamonians, that had not the Thebans by their infolencie wearied their friends, and caused them to seeke for peace, it had beene very likely that the course of this war, should have soone come to a good end, which neverthelesse, being profequented by the Thebans (who opposed at once both these two great Estates) left the Citie of Sparta as much dejected as the beginning found it proud and tyrannous. But the Athenians perceiving how Thebes encroched energyday upon her weake Neighbours, not sparing such as had beene dependants upon Athens, and finding themselues, whilest engaged in such a warre, viable to relieue their complaining friends, resoluted to settle the affaires of Greece, by renewing that forme of peace which Antaleidas had brought from the Persian. Wherefore they sent Messengers which purpose they willed the Thebans to fund Embassadours along with them to Sparta; who readily condefeended, fearing otherwise that they should be left out of the Treatie of peace, which came to passe being so wrought by the couragious wise-dome of Epaminoud, i, who understood farre better than his Countrimen, what was to be feared or hoped. In this Treatie the Lacedemonians and Atherians did foone agree; but when the Thebans offered to sweare to the Articles in the name of the Barotians; Agefilaus required them to sweare in their owne name, and to leave the Business free, whom they had lately reduced under their obedience. Whereunto Eparainondus made answere, That the Citie of Sparta should give example to Thebes by fetting the Laconians free; for that the Signorie of Baotis did by as good right appertaine to the Thebans, as that of Laconia to the Spartans. This was well and truly Spoken; but was heard with no patience : For Agesslaus bearing a vehement hatred vnto those of Thebes, by whom he was drawne back out of Alainto Greece, and disappointed of all the glorie which he had hoped to atchieue by the Perfian Warre, did now very paffionately vrge that point of fetting the Bastians at libertie, and finding it as oblinately refuled, he dash thename of the Thebans out of the league. At the fame time Cleombrotus the other King of Sparta lay in Phocis, who received command from the Gouernours of Sparta forthwith to enter vpon the Land of the Thebans with all his power, which he did, and was there flaine at Leuctra, and with him the flowre of his Armic. This battaile of Leuctra being one of the most famous that cuer were fought betweene the Greekes, was not fo notable for any circumftance foregoing it, or for the managing of the fight it selfe, as for the death of the King, and many Citizens of Sparta, but especially, for that after this battaile (betweene 10 which and the conclusion of the generall peacethere passed but twentie daies) the Lacedamonians were neuer able to recouer the firength and reputation which had formerly made them redoubted farre and neare; whereas contrariwise the Thebans, whose greatest ambition had in former times confined it selfe vnto the little Region of Buoria, did now beginne to vndertake the leading and command of many People and Estates, in such wise that soone after they brought an Armie of threescore and ten thousand strong vnto the Gates of Sparta. So much doe the afflictions of an hard warre, valiantly indured, advance the affaires of the diftreffed, and guide them into the way of Conquest, by stiffening that resolution with a manly temper, which wealth and case had through luxurie, rechlessenesse, and many other vices or vani-20 ties, made ruftie and effeminate:

How the Athenians tooke upon them to maintaine the peace of Greece. New troubles hence arising. Epaminon das inadeth and wastein the Territorie of Lacedamon.

He Athenians, refuling to take advantage of this overthrow fallen vppon their old Enemies, and new Confederates the Lacedamonians; did neuertheleffe finely give them to vider fland, that their Dominion was expired, and therefore their pride might well be laid away. For taking vpon themselves the maintenance of the peace lately concluded. which Agefilan (perhaps of purpose to make benefit of quarrels that might arise) had left upperfect, they affembled the Deputies of all the Estates confederated at Athens where the generall libertie of all Townes, as well finall as great, was ratified, vnder the stile Of the Athenians, and their Associates. Hereupon beganne fresh garboiles. The Mantingans, claiming power by this decree to order their affaires at their owne pleasure, did (as it were) in despight of the Spartans, who had enforced them to raze their towne, reedifie it, and alliethemselues with such of the Areadians as stood worst affected to Sparta. The Areadians, a strong Nation, consisting of many Cities, were 40 distracted with factions; some desiring to hold good correspondencie with the Lacedemonians; some to weaken and keep them low; yet all pretending other ends. The Lacedamonians durst not give impeachment to the Mantimeans; not take upon them to correct their ill-willers among the Areadians, till such time as the factions brake out into violence, and each part called in forraine helpe. Then was an Armie fent from Sparta, as it were in defence of the people of Teges, against the Mantineans, but indeed against them both. Agefilaus had the leading of it, but effected nothing. The Thebans had by this time fubdued the Phocians, & were become head of the Locrians, Acarnanians, Eubwans, and many others; with the power of which Countries they entred Pelaponne fus in fauor of the Areadians, who had vpon expectation of their com-50 ming, abstained from giving battaile to Agesilans. The Armic of the Spartans being dismissed, and Epaminondas joyned with the Areadians; the Region of Laconia was inuaded and spoiled: a thing so strange, that no Oracle could have found beliefe if any had foretold it. Almost sixe hundred yeares were spent, since the Dorians, under the posteritie of Hercules, had seized upon Laconia, in all which time the found of an encounters trumpet was not heard in that Countrie: Ten yeares were not fully past fince all Greece was at the denotion of the Spartans : but now the Region which neither Agree with his huge Armic could once looke vpon, nor the mightic forces of and other Enemie States had dared to fet loot on, faning by ftealth, was all on a light fire, the very fmoke whereof the women of Sparta were albamed to behold. All which indignitie notwithstanding, the Laced amonians did not iffue out of Sparta to fight, but fought how to preferue the Towne, setting at libertie as many of their Heiloges or Slaues, as were willing to beare Armes in defence of the State, and formwhite pitrifully entreated the Athenians to give them fuccour. From Corinth and fonce Townes of Pelapannefus they received speedie affiftance, the Athenians came 10 forward more flowly, so that Epaminondas returned without battaile, having rebuilded the Citic of Messene, and peopled it a-new by calling home the ancient Inhabitants, whom the Lacedemonians many Ages before had chased away into other Countries, possessing their Territories themselues.

ò. III.

The composition betweene Athens and Sparta for command in warre against the Thebans; who againe inuade and spoile Peloponnesus. The unfortunate presumption of the Arcadians.

His journie therefore vtterly defaced the reputation of the Spartans, 20 in fuch wife, that they did no longer demand the conduct of the Army, which was to be raifed, nor any maner of precedence; but fending Embaffadors from Sparta, and from all the Cities which held league with it, vnto Athens, they offered to yeeld the Admiraltie to the Athenians, requesting that they themselves might bee Generalls by Land. This had beene a composition well agreeing with the situation and qualitie of those two Citics; but it was rejected, because the Marriners and others that were to be imploied at Sea, were men of no marke or estimation, in regard of those companies of horse and foot whereof the Land-Armie was compounded, who being all Gentlemen or Citizens of Athens, were to have ferued under the Lecedemonians. Wherefore it was 20 acreed that the authoritie should be divided by time, the Athenians ruling flue daies, the Lacedomonians other five & fo fuccessively that each of them should have command of all, both by Land and by Sea. It is manifest, that in this conclusion vaine ambition was more regarded than the common profit, which must of necessitie be very flowly advanced, where confultation, refolution, and performance are fo often to change hands. This appeared by a fecond inualion of Pcioponnefus, wherein the The lans found their enemies so vanable to impeach them, that having fortified If homes from Sea to Sea, as in former times they had done against xerves, they were driuen out of their strength by Epaminondas, who forraged the Countrie without refiflance. But as the Articles of this league betweene Athens and Sparta did, by dini- 40 ding the conduct in fuch manner, difable the focietie, and make it infufficient to those ends for which it was concluded; so the example of it wrought their good, by filling the enemies heads with the like vanitie. For the Arcadians confidering their owne numbers which they brought into the field, and having found by many trials that their people were not inferiour to others in strength of bodie, in courage, or in good Souldierthip, thought it good reason that they should in like manner share the government, with their friends the Thebans; and not alwaies continue followers of others, by encreasing whose greatnest hey should strengthen their owne voke. Hereupon they began to demeane themselves very insolently, whereby they grew hatefull to their Neighbours, and fulpected of the Thebans in an ill time. For a motion of generall peace having been made (which tooke not effect, because the Citie of Mef-Tone was not abandoned to the Lacedemonians) the next enterprise of the Spartans and their friends was vpon these Areadians, who relying too much vpon their owne worth, were querthrowne in a great battaile, their calamitic being as pleafing to their Confederates as to their Enemies. d. #### ò. IIII.

The great growth of the Theban Estate. Embassages of the Greekes to the Perfian; with the reasons why he most favoured the Thebans. Troubles in the Persian Empire. The fruitlesse issue of the Embassages.

He Thebans especially rejoyced at the Areadians misfortune, consider ring, that, without their aide, the forceffe of all enterprifes proved for ill; whereas they themselves had by their owne power accomplished very well what focuer they tooke in hand, and were become not only ictorious ouer the Lacedamonians, but Patrons over the Theisdians, and a rations of the great quarrells that had rifen in Macedonia, where compounding the differences about that Kingdome, as pleafed them best, they carried Philip the Some of Amyntas, and Father of Alexander the Great, as an Holtage vnto Shopes. Having therefore obtained fuch reputation that little feemed wanting to make them absolute Commanders of all Greece, they fought meanes of alliance with the Perfan King, to whom they fent Embaffadour the great and famous Captaine Pelapidas, who foreputation drew Artaxerxes to grant vnto the Thebans all that they 20 defired; whereof two especiall points were, That Messen should remaine free from the Lacedamonians, and that the Athenians should forbeare to fend their ships of Warre to Seasonly the later of these two was somewhat qualified with reference to further aduice. The other States of Greece did also fend their Embassiadours at the fame time, of whom few or none received much contentment. For the King having found by long experience, how farre it concerned him to maintaine a fure partie in Greece, did vpon many waightie confiderations refolue, to binde the Thebans firmely ento him; justly expecting, that their greatnesse should bee on that fide his owne fecuritie. The Athenians had been ancient enemies to his Crowne; and, having turned the profit of their victories upon the Persian to the purchase of a 20 great Effate in Greece, maintained their Signorie in fuch pur ffant manner, that (fundrie grieuous misfortunes notwithstanding) they had endured a terrib'e warre, wherein the Lacedamonians being followed by most of the Greeks, and supplied with treasure, and all forts of aide by Darius Nothus, were not able to vanquish them, till their owne indifcretion brought them on their knees. The Lacedamonians being victorious oner Athens, had no fooner established their Dominion at home, than they undertooke the conquest of Asia, from which though, by the commotion raifed in Greece with Person gold, they were called backe, yet having renewed their power, and fetled thinges in Greece, it was not vnlikely, that they flould vpon the next aduantage have purfued the fame enterprise, had not they been empeached 40 by this Theban Warre. But the Thehans contrariwife had alwaies discourred a good affection to the Crowne of Persia. They had sided with Xerxes in his inuation of Greece; with Darius and the Lacedamonians against Athens; And finally having offered much contumely to Azeillaus when he put to Sea, they drew him home by making warre on the Confederates of Sparta. Besides all these their good deservings. they were no Sea-men, and therefore vnlikely to looke abroade, whereunto if perchance they should have any delire, yet were they disabled by the want of good hauen townes, which they could not feize upon without open breach of that peace; whereof they intended to become the Executors, giving libertie to all Cities that had at any time been free. Wherefore Artaxerxes did wholly condescend vnto the 50 requests of Pelapidas, as farre forth as hee might without giving open defiance to the rest of Greece; and by that meane he purchased his owne quiet, being neuer afterward molested by that Nation in the lower Asia. The ill meanes which the Greeks had to diffurbe Artaxerxes, was very beneficiall to the Estate of Persia shortly after these times, in that great rebellion of all the Maritime Provinces. For had then the affaires of Greece beene fo composed, that any one Citie might without empeach-ment of the rest have transported an Armie, to affish the revolting Satrape, or Vice-roses of Caria, Phrygia, Lydia, Myfia, Lycia, Pifidia, Pamphilia, Cilicia, Syria, and Phanicia, humane reason can hardly finde the meanes, by which the Empire could have been preferred from that ruine, which the dinine Councell had deterred vnto the daies of Alexander. But this great conspiracie of so many large and wealthic Prouinces, wanting a firme bodie of good and hardie Souldiers, was in short space discussed and yanithed like a mift, without effect; thefe effeminate Afatiques wearied quickly with the trauailes and dangers incident to warre, for faking the common cause, and each man former treason to his Prince, & purchase with all his owne promotion with encrease of riches. Of this commotion, which in course of time followed some actions not as yet related, I have rather chosen to make short mention in this place, than hereafter to interrupt the Narration of things more important: both for that it was like a fuddaine from, rafhly commenced, idlely followed, and foolithly laied downe, having made a great noise without effect, and having finall reference to any other action regardable; as also because in the whole raigne of Artaxerxes, from the warre of Cyrus, to the inuation of Agypt, I finde nothing (this infurrection, and a fruit leffe journey against the Cadusans excepted) worthy of any mention, much lesse of digresway fo quietly, that he enjoyed the pleafure; which an Empire fo great and wealthy could affoord vnto fo absolute a Lord, with little diffurbance. The troubles which he found were only or chiefly Domesticall; growing out of the hatred which Pary-fatis the Queen-Mother bare vnto his wife Statira, and to fuch as had been the greatest enemies to her sonne Cyrus, or gloried in his death : vpon whom, when by poifon and mischieuous practises shee had satisfied her feminine appetite of reuenge, thenceforth the wholly applied her felfe to the Kings disposition, cherishing in him the leud desire of marrying his owne Daughter, and filling him with the perswasson, which Princes, not endued with an especiall grace doe readily entertaine, That his lopidas, and the other Emballadours of Greece, both found and left him, but left him by fo much more affored than they found him, by how much the conclusion of his

Treatie with them, being altogether to his owne aduantage, did feeme to promife, if not the perpetuitie, a long endurance of the same felicitie to him and his, or (at the leaft) a full fecuritie of danger from Greece, whence only could any danger be feared.

But fuch foundations of eternitic laied by mortall men in this transitorie world like the Tower of Babel, are either shaken from heaven, or made vaine and ynprofitable.

ere the frame can be raifed to full heighth, by confusion of tongues among the builthat had fent Embassadours to the Persian. For whereas it had been concluded, that all Townes, as well the little as the great, should bee fet at libertic, and the Thebans made Protectors of this common peace, who thereby should become the Judges of all controuerfies that might arife, and Leaders in warre of all that would enter into this Confederacies the Kings letters being folemnely published at Thebes in the prefence of Embassadours, drawne thither from all parts of Greece; when an oath was required for observation of the forme of peace therein set downe, a dilatoric an-fwere was made by the Embaffadours, who faid that they were fent to heare the articles; not to sweare vnto them. Hereby the Thebans were driven to send vnto each ly refused it, saying, That they did not neede it; others tooke courage by their example to doe the like, disappointing the Thebans of their glorious hopes, to whom

CHAP. 12. S. 5. of the Historie of the World.

How all Greece was distiled, between the Athenians and Lacedemonians, on the one fide, and Thebans on the other. Of the great tunnilis rifing in Arcadia.

He condition of thinges in Greece at that time did stand thus. Athens and Sparta, which in former times had commanded all that Nation, and each vpon enuie of the others greatnesse drawne all her followers into a cruell intelline warre, by which the whole Countrie, and especially the Effate of these two Cities, was brought very low, did now conjoyne their forces against the Thebans, who sought to make themselves Lords of all. The Eleans, Corinthians, and Achaians, followed the partie of thele ancient gouerning Cities; either for the old reputation of them, and benefits received, or in diflike of those who by strong hand were readic to become Rulers, to which authoritie they could not fodainely aspire without some injurie and much enuie. The Citie of Thebes abounding with men whom necessitie had made warlike, and many vi-Stories in few yeares had filled with great spirits, & being so mightie in dependants, that shee had reduced all the continent of Greece without Peloponness (the Region of Attica and very little part befide excepted) under fuch acknowledgement, as wan-20 ted not much of meere Vassallage, did hope to bring all Peloponnejus to the like obedience, wherein alreadie shee had set good footing by her conjunction with the States of Argos, and of Arcadia. The Argines had beene alwaies bad Neighbours to the Spartans, to whom they thought themselues in ancient Nobilitic Superiours. but were farre under them in valour, having beene often beaten out of the field by them, and put in danger of looling all: which caused them to suspect and enuic nothing more than the greatnesse and honor of Sparta, taking truce with her when shee was at rest and had leisure to bend her whole force against them, but firmely joyning with her enemies whenfoeuer they found her entangled in a difficult Warre. As the Argines were, in hatred of Sparta, fure friends of Thebes, so the Arcidians, trans-30 ported with a great opinion of their owne worthinesse, had formerly renounced and prouoked against them their old Confederates and Leaders, the Lacedamonians, and were now become very doubtfull adherents to the Thebans. In which regard it was thought conucnient by Epaminondas, and the State of Thebes, to fend an Armie into Pelsponnesus, before such time as these wavering friends should fall further off, and become either Neutrall, or, which was to be feared, open enemies. And furely great cause there was to suspect the worst of them, considering that without consent of the Thebans, they had made peace with Athens, which was very strange, and seemed no leffe to the Athenians themselves, who holding a firme league with Sparta at the fame time when the Arcadians treated with them, did neuertheleffe accept this new 40 Confederacie, not relinquishing the old, because they found that, how socuer these Areadians were enemies to the Lacedamonians, they should hereby be drawne somewhat further from their alliance with Thebes, which without them was vnlikely to inuade Peloponnesus with a strong Armic. But this did rather hasten, than by any meanes stay, the comming of Epaminondas; who finding the way somewhat more cleare for him (because the Citie of Corinth, which lay vpon the 1sthmus, and had beene aduerse to Thebes, was now, by miseries of this grieuous warre, driuen to become Neutrall) tooke occasion hereby, and by some disorders among the Arcadians, to visit Peloponnesus with an Armic, confishing of all the power of Thebes. A great tumult had rifen in Arcadia about confecrated money, which many principall men 50 among them had laied hands on, under pretence of imploying it to publique vses. In compounding the differences growne ypon this occasion, such, as had least will to render account of the money which had come into their handes, procured the Captaine of some Theban Souldiers, lying in Tegea, to take prisoners many of their Countrimen, as people desirous of innouation. This was done: but the vp-roare

thereby caused was so great, that the prisoners were forth-with enlarged, and the Areadians, who had in great numbers taken Armes, with much a-doe fearfe pacified. When complaint of the Captaines proceedings came to Thebes, Evaminondas turned all the blame upon them who had made the peace with Athens, letting them know, that he would be shortly among them, to judge of their sidelitie, by the affistance which they should give him, in that warre, which he intended to make in Pelapannefue. These Lordly wordes did greatly amaze the Arcadians; who needing not the aide of so mightic a power as he drew a-long with him, did vehemently suspect that great preparation to bee made against themselves. Hereupon such of them as had before fought meanes to settle the affaires of their Countrie, by drawing thinges to 10 some good conclusion of peace, did now forth-with send to Athens for helpe, and withall dispatched some of the principal among them as Embassadours to Sparta. by whom they offered themselves to the common defence of Peloponne (wo, now readic to be inuaded. This Embaffage brought much comfort to the Laced amonians, who feared nothing more than the comming of Epaminondas, against whom they well knew that all their forces, and best prouisions, would bee no more than very hardly fufficient. Forbearing therefore to dispute about prerogatines, they (who had been accustomed vnto such a supremacie, as they would in no wife communicate with the powerfull Citic of Athens, till other hope of fecuring their owne Eflate could not be thought vpon) did now verie gently yeeld to the Arcadians, that 20 the command of the Armie in chiefe, should be given, for the time, to that Citic, in whose Territoric it lay.

V I. Aterrible inualion of Peloponnesus by EPAMINONDAS.

ince the generote channel of the other parts of the strength to joyne with Epanismondar, who having lien a while at Nemea, to intercept the Atheniams, received there intelligence, that the Armie comming from Athens would passe by Sea, whereupon he dislodged, and came to Tegea, which Citie, and the most of all Arcadia belides, forth-with declared themselves his. The common opinion was, that the first attempt of the Thebans, would be you fuch of the Arcadians as had revolted; which caused the Lacedemonian Captaines to fortific Mantinea with all diligence, and to fend for Agefilaus to Sparta, that he bringing with him all that finall force of able men, which remained in the Towne, they might be strong enough to abide Epaminondas there. But Epaminondas held fo good espiall vpon his Enemies, 40 that had not an vnknowne fellow brought hastic aduertisement of his purpose to Agefiland, who was then well onward in the way to Mantinga, the Citie of Strarta had fodainely beene taken. For thither with all speede and secrecie did the Thebans march, who had furely carried the Citie, notwithstanding anie defence that could haue beene made by that handfull of men remaining within it; but that Agelilaus in all flying hast got into it with his Companies, whom the Armie of his Confederates followed thither to the rescue as fast as it was able. The arrivall of the Lacedemonians and their friends, as it cut off all hope from Epaminondas of taking Sparta, fo it presented him with a faire aduantage vpon Mantinea. It was the time of Haruest, which made it very likely that the Mantineans, finding the warre to be carried 50 from their walls into an other quarter, would vie the commoditie of that vacation. by fetching in their corne, and turning out their cattaile into their fields, whilest no enemic was neare that might empeach them. Wherefore hee turned away from Sparta to Mantinea, sending his horse-men before him, to seize vponall that might be found without the Citie. The Mantineans (according to the expectation of Enaminondas) were scattered abroade in the Countrie; farre more intent vpon their haruest-bulinesse, than vpon the warre, whereof they were secure, as thinking them-Chies out of distance. By which prefumption it fell out, that great numbers of them, and all their Cattaile, being vnable to recouer the Towne, were in a desperate case; and the Towne it selfe in no great likelihood of helding out, when the enemie should have taken all their provision of victuals with so many of the people, as had not ouer-dearely beene redeemed, by that Cities returning to focietic with Thebes. But at the same time, the Athenians comming to the succour of their Confederates, whom they thought to have found at Mantines, were very earneftly entreated by the Citizens to rescue their goods, and people, from the danger whereinto they were fallen, if it were possible by any couragious aduenture to deliuer those who otherwise were given as lost. The Thebans were knowne at that time to bee the best Souldiers of all the Greekes, and the commendation of good horsemanship had alwaies beene giuen to the Thessalians, as excelling in that qualitie all other Nations; yet the regard of honour so wrought vpon the Athenians, that for the reputation of their Citie, which had entred into this warre, vpon no necessitie of her owne, but only in defire of relicuing her distressed friends, they issued forth of Mantinea, not abiding folong as to refresh themselves, or their horses with meat, and giving a lu-20 stie charge vpon the enemie, who as brauely received them, after a long and hot fight they remained masters of the field, giving by this victoric a safe and easie re-trait to all that were without the walls. The whole power of the Becations arrived in the place soone after this battaile, whom the Lacedamonians and their Affistants were not farre behinde.

PAMINONDAS, confidering that his Commission was almost now expired, and that his attempts of furprifing Sparta and Mantinea hauing failed, the impression of terrour which his name had wrought in the Peloponnesians, would soone vanish, valesse by some notable act he should abate their courage in their first grouth, and leave some memorable character of his expedition; refolued to give them battaile, whereby he reasonably hoped both to settle the doubtfull affections of his owne Associates, and to leave the Spartans as weake in spirit and abilitie, as he found them, if not wholly to bring them into subjection. Hauing therefore warned his men to prepare for 40 that battaile, wherein victorie should be rewarded with Lordship of all Greece; and finding the alacritic of his Souldiers to be fuch, as promifed the accomplishment of his owne defire; he made shew of declining the enemie, and intrenching himselfe in a place of more advantage, that so by taking from them all expectation of fighting that day, he might allay the heate of their valour, and afterward strike their fenses with amazement, when hee should come vpon them vnexpected. This opinion deceiued him not. For with verie much tumult, as in fo great and sodaine a danger, the enemie ranne to Armes, necessitie enforcing their resolution, and the confequence of that daies service vrging them to doe as well as they might. The Theban Armie confisted of thirtie thousand foot, and three thousand horse; the La-50 cedamonians and their friends were short of this number, both in horse and in foot, by a third part. The Mantineans (because the warre was in their Countrie) stood in the right wing , and with them the Lacedemonians : the Athenians had the left wing, the Acheans, Eleans, and others of lesseaccount, filled the bodie of the Ar-

mic. The Thebans flood in the left wing of their owne battaile, opposite to the La-

cedemonians, having by them the Arcadians , the Eubwans, Locrians, Sievonians, Melsemians, and Thesialians with others, compounding the maine battaile; the Argines held the right wing; the horse-men on each part were placed in the flancks, only a troupe of the Eleans were in reare. Before the footmen could joyne, the encounter of the horse on both tides was very rough, wherein finally the Thebans prenailed, not withit and ing the valiant relitance of the Athenians; who not yeelding to the enemie either in courage or skill, were ouer-laied with numbers, and so beaten vpon by The failing things, that they were driven to for lake the place, and leave their infanterie naked. But this retrait was the leffe difgracefull, because they kept themfelues together, and did not fall backe upon their owne foot-men; but finding the Theban horse to have given them over, and withall discovering some Companies of foot, which had beene fent about by Epaminondas, to charge their battaile in the reare, they brake vpon them, routed them, and hewed them all in peeces. In the meane feafon the battaile of the Athenians had not only to doe with the Argines. but was hardly proffed by the Theban Horfe-men, in such wise that it beganne to open, and was readic to turne back, when the Elean Squadron of Horse came up to the reliefe of it, and restored all on that part. With farre greater violence did the Lacedamonians and Thebans meete, these contending for Dominion, the other for the maintenance of their ancient honour, fo that equall courage and equall loffe on both fides made the hope and appearance of victorie to either equally doubtfull: 20 unlesse perhaps the Lacedamonians being very firme abiders, might seeme the more likely to preuaile, as having borne the first brunt, and furse of the on-fet, which was not hitherto remitted; and being framed by Discipline, as it were by Nature, to excell in patience, whereof the Thebans, by practife of a few yeares, cannot bee thought to have gotten a habite fo fure and generall. But Epaminondas perceiuing the obstinate stiffenesse of the Enemies to bee such, as neither the badde successe of their owne horse, nor all the force of the Baotian Armie, could abate so farre, as to make them give one foote of ground; taking a choise Companie of the most able men, whom he cast into the forme of a Wedge, or Diamond, by the aduantage of that figure against a squadron, and by his owne exceeding vertue, accompanied 20 with the great strength and resolution of them which followed him, did open their rancks, and cleave the whole battaile in despight of all resistance. Thus was the honour of that day wonne by the Thebans, who may justly bee said to have carried the victorie, feeing that they remained Masters of the ground whereon the battaile was fought, having driven the Enemie to lodge farther off. For that which was alleaged by the Athemans, as a token that the victoric was partly theirs, the flaughter of those Mercenaries vpon whom they lighted by chance in their owne flight, finding them behinde their Armie, and the recayning of their dead bodies; it was a Ceremonic regardable only among the Greekes, and ferued meerely for oftentation, flewing that by the fight they had obtayned formewhat, which the 40 Enemie could not get from them otherwise than by request. But the Thebans arriued at the generall immediate end of battaile; none daring to abide them in the field: whereof a manifest confession is expressed from them, who for sake the place which they had chosen or accepted, as indifferent for triall of their abilitie and proweffe. This was the last worke of the incomparable vertue of Epaminondas, who being in the head of that Warlike troupe of men, which broke the Lacedemoman esquadron, and forced it to give back in difaray, was furiously charged on the fodaine, by a desperate Companie of the Spartans, who all at once threw their Darts at him alone; whereby receiving many wounds, hee nevertheleffe with a fingular courage maintayned the fight, vfing against the Enemies many of their 50 Darts, which hee drew out of his owne bodie; till at length by a Spartsn, called Anticrates, hee received so violent a stroke with a Dart . that the wood of it brake, leauing the yron and a peece of the tronchion in his breft. Hereupon hee funke downe, and was foone conneighed out of the fight by his friends; having by his tall somewhat animated the Spartans (who faine would have got his bodie) but much more inflamed with reuengefull indignation, the Thebans, who raging at this heauie mischance did with great slaughter compell their disordered enemies to leaue the field; though long they followed not the chase, being wearied more with the sadnesse of this disaster, than with all the trauaile of the day. Epaminondas being brought into his Tent, was told by the Philitians, That when the head of the Lart should bee drawne out of his bodie, hee must needes die. Hearing this, hee called for his shield, which to haue lost was held a great dishonour: It was brought unto him. Hee bad them tell him which part had the victorie; answere was made, to that the Baotians had wonne the field. Then faid hee, it is faire time for mee to die, and withall fent for Iolidas, and Diophantes, two principall men of Warre, that were both flaine; which being told him, He aduifed the Thebans to make Peace, whileft with advantage they might, for that they had none left that was able to discharge the office of a Generall. Herewithall he willed that the head of the weapon should be drawne out of his bodie; comforting his friends that lamented his death, and want of iffue, by telling them that the victories of Leuctra and Mantines were two faire Daughters, in whom his memorie should liue.

So died Epaminondas, the worthiest man that euer was bred in that Nation of Greece, and hardly to bee matched in any Age or Countrie : for hee equalled all o-20 thers in the feuerall vertues, which in each of them were fingular. His Iustice, and Sinceritie, his Temperance, Wifedome, and high Magnanimitie, were no way inferiour to his Militarie vertue; in euery part whereof hee so excelled, That hee could not properly bee called a Warie, a Valiant, a Politique, a Bountifull, or an Industrious, and a Prouident Captaine; all these Titles, and many other, being due vnto him, which with his notable Discipline, and good Conduct, made a perfect composition of an Heroique Generall. Neither was his private Conversation vnanswerable to those high parts, which gaue him praise abroade. For hee was Graue, and yet very Affable and Curteous; resolute in publique bufinesse, but in his owne particular easie, and of much mildnesse; a louer of his People, bearing 30 with mens infirmities, wittie and pleasant in speech, farre from insolence, Master of his owne affections, and furnished with all qualities that might winne and keepe loue. To these Graces were added great abilitie of bodie, much Eloquence, and very deepe knowledge in all parts of Philosophie and Learning, wherewith his minde being enlightened, rested not in the sweetnesse of Contemplation, but brake forth into such estects as gaue vnto Thebes, which had euer-more beene an vnderling, a dreadfull reputation among all people adjoyning, and the highest command in Grecce.

Of the peace concluded in Greece after the battaile of Mantinaa. The voiage of AGESILAVS into Egypt. His death, and qualities; with an examination of the comparison made betweene him and POMPEY the Roman.

His battaile of Mantinea was the greatest that had euer beene fought in that Countrie betweene the Naturals; and the last. For at Marathon, and Platea, the populous Armies of the barbarous Nations gaue rather a great fame, than a hard triall to the Grecian valour; neither rather a great tame, than a narrottanto the operfect in the begin-were the practife of Armes and Art Militarie fo perfect in the beginnings of the Peloponnessan Warre, as long continuance and daily exercise had now made them. The times following produced no actions of worth or moment, those excepted which were vndertaken against forraine enemies, prouing for the most part vnfortunate. But in this laft fight all Greece was interefied, which neuer had more able Souldiers, and braue Commanders, nor euer contended for victorie with preater care of the fuccesse, or more obstinate resolution. All which not with standing, the iffue being fuch as hath beene related, it was found best for every particular Effate, that a generali peace should be established, every one retayning what hee presently had, and none being forced to depend upon an other. The Messenians were by name comprised in this new league; which caused the Lacedamonians not to enter into it. Their franding out hindred not the rest from proceeding to conclution: confidering that Sparta was now too weake to offend her Neighbours, and 10 therefore might well bee allowed to show that anger in ceremonies, which had no power to declare it felfe in execution. This peace, as it gaue some breath and refreshing to all the Countrie, so to the Cities of Athensand Sparta it associated leisure to seeke after wealth by forraine emploiment in Egypt, whither Agesslaus was fent with some small forces to allith, or indeede, as a Mercenarie, to serue vider Taches King of Egypt in his warre vpon spria. Chabrias the Athenian, who had before commanded under Acoris King of Egypt, went now as a voluntarie, with fuch forces as he could raife, by entreatic, and oner of good pay, to the same service. These Agyptian Kings descended from Ampricus of Sais, who rebelled against Larius Nothus, having retained the Countrie not with flanding all intestine differences, and 20 forraine inuations, during three Generations of their owne race, were fo well acquainted with the valour of the Greekes, that by their helpe (calily procured with gold) they conceived great hope, not only to affure themselves, but to become Lords of the Prouinces adjoyning, which were held by the Perfian. What the iffue of this great enterprise might have been, had it not fallen by Domesticall rebellion, it is vncertaine. But very likely it is that the rebellion it felfe had soone come to nothing, if Agellaus had not proued a talle Traitor, joyning with Neel anebus who rose against his Prince, and helping the Rebell with that Armie which the money foreignments rince, and neigning the resonant man runa window money of Taches had waged. This fallhood Agelhac exculded, as tending to the good of his owne Countries though it feeme rather, that hee grudged because the King 30 tooke vpon himselfe the Conduct of the Armie, vsing his service only as Lieutenant, who had made full accompt of being appointed the Generall. Howfocuerit came to passe, Tachos being shamefully betraied by them, in whom he had reposed his chiefe confidence, fled vnto the Perfian, who vpon his fubmillion gaue him gentle entertainement; and Nectarehus (who feemes to have beene the Nephew of Tachos) raigned in his flead. At the fame time the Citizens of Mendes had fet vp another King, to whomall, or most of the Aeyptians yeelded their obedience. But Azeflano fighting with him in places of advantage, prevailed fo faire, that hee left Nectanebus in quiet possession of the Kingdome; who in recompense of histreason to the former King Tachos, and good service done to himselfe, rewarded him with 40 two hundred and thirtie Talents of filter, with which bootie failing homewards, he died by the way. He was a Prince very temperate, and valiant and a good Leader in warre, free from couetoufnesse, and not reproched with any blemish of lust; which praises are the leffe admirable in him, for that the discipline of Sparia was fuch as did enduceueric one of the Citizens (not caried away by the violent flreame of an ill nature) with all, or the chiefe, of these good qualities. Hee was nevertheleffe very arrogant, peruerfe, vnjust, and vaine-glorious, measuring all things by his owne will, and obflinately profecuting those courses whose ends were beyond hope. The expedition of Xenophon had filled him with an opinion; that by his hand the Empire of Persia should be overthrowne; with which conceipt being transfeorted, and finding his proceedings interrupted by the Thebans, and their Allies, hee did euer after beare such hatred vnto Thebes, as compelled that Estate by meere neceffitie to grow warlike, and able, to the vtter dishonour of Sparla, and the irreparable loffe of all her former greatnesse. The commendations given to him by **Renophon** his good friend, haue caufed **Plutareb** to lay his name in the ballance against **Pompey** the Great ; whole actions (the folemine grauitie of carriage excepted) are very differoportionable. Herein alfo they are very like; 10 Each of them was the laft great Captaine which his Nation brought forth in time of libertie, and cach of them ruined the libertie of his Countrie by his owne Lordly willfulnefle. We may therefore well flay, **Similla magic omnia quam **paria**, Therefore** blance was nearer than the equalitie.** Indeede the freedome of **Rome**, was lot with **Pompey**, falling into the handes of **Cess**, whom he had enforced to take Armes **Yetthe **Roman** Empire** flood, the forme of Gouernement only being chan-

Of Philip, the Father of Alexander the Great, King of Macedon.

ð. I

What Kings raigned in Macedon before PHILIP.

H E Greeks, of whom wee have alreadic made large difcourfe, not as yet wearied with intefine Warre, nor made wife by their vain econtention for fuperioritie, doe till, as in former times, continue the invalion and valtation of each other.

Againt Xerxes, the greatest Monarch of that part of the World, they defended their liberate, with as happie (uccells, as ouer Nation had, and with no lessed honour, than hath euer beene acquired by deeds of Armes. And hauing had a triall, and experience, more than fortunate, a gamit those Nations, they so little regarded what might come from them, who had 50 fo often forfeited the reputation of their forces, as what so energound be spared from their owned illradion at home, they transported oner the Hellesson, as sufficient, to entertaine and busic them withall.

But, as it commonly falleth out with enery man of marke in the world, that they ynder-fall, and perish, by the hands and harmes, which they least feare; so fared it at this

this time with the Greeks. For of Philip of Macedon (of whom we are now to speake) they had so little regard, as they grew even then more violent in devouring each other, when the falt-growing greatnesse of such a Neighbour-King, should, in regard of their owne fafeties, have ferued them for a strong argument of vnion and accord. But the glorie of their Persian victories, wherewith they were pampred and made proud, taught them to neglect all Nations but themselves, and the rather to value at little the power and purposes of the Macedonians, because those Kings and States, which fate nearer them than they did, had in the time of Amyntas, the Father of Philip, so much weakned them, and wonne vpon them, that they were not (as the Gracians perswaded themselues) in any one age, likely to recour their owne, much 10 lesse to worke any wonders against their borderers. And, indeede, it was not in their Philosophie to consider, That all great alterations are storme-like, suddaine, and violent; and that it is then ouer-late to repaire the decaied and broken banks, when great Rivers are once swollen, fast-running, and inraged. No, the Greeks did rather imploy themsclues, in breaking downe those defences, which stood between them and this inundation: than feeke to rampare and re-enforce their owne fields, which by the Leuell of reason they might have found to have lien under it. It was there-

Orofinilizacia- fore well concluded by OROSIVS: Gracia Cinitates dum imperare singula supiunt, imperium omnes perdiderunt; The Cities of Greece lost their command, by strining each of them to command all.

The Kingdome of Macedon, fo called of Macedon, the Sonne of Ofiris, or, as other Authors affirme, of Jupiter and Athra, is the next Region towards the North which bordereth Greece; It hath to the East, the Agean Sea; it is bounded on the North and North-well by the Thracians and Illyrians; and on the South and Southwest, by The laise and Epirus.

Their Kings were of the familie of Temenus, of the race of Hercules, and by nation Argines; who are lifted as followeth. About some fixe yeares after the translation of the Affyrian Empire, Arbaces then governing Media; Caranus of Argos, commanded by an Oracle, to lead a Colonie into Macedon, departed thence with many people, and as he was marching through that Countrie, the weather being raynie 30 and tempelluous, he espied a great heard of Goats, which fled the storme as fast as they could hasting them to their knowne place of couert. Whereupon Caransus, calling to minde, that he had also by an other Oracle beene directed, to follow the first troupe of those beasts, that should either lead him, or slie before him; He pursued these Goats to the Gates of Edessa, and being vndiscouered by the Inhabitants, by reason of the darknesse of the aire, he entred their Citie without resistance, and pos-Enfish in Chron. Philip the first, his successor, raigned eight and twentie yeares.

Europus tollowed Philip, and governed fixe and twentie yeares: in whose infancie the Illyrians inuaded Macedon, and having obtained a great victorie, they purfued the fame to the great danger of that State. Whereupon the Macedonians, gathering new forces, and resoluing either to recouer their former losse, or to loose at once both their Kingdome and their King, they carried him with them in his Cradle into the field, and returned victorious; for they were either confident that their Nation could not bee beaten (their King present;) or rather they perswaded themselues that there was no man fo voide of honour and compassion, as to abandon their natu- Eufeb. Alzetas fucceeded Fropus, and ruled nine and twentic yeares.

Amyntas the first succeeded Alcetas, and raigned fiftie yeares; Hee lived at such to time as Darius Hystaspes, after his vnprosperous returne out of Seythia, sent Megabazus with an Armie into Europe, who in Kernes name required Amyntas to acknowledge him for his Supreame Lord, by yeelding vnto him Earth and Water. But his Embaffadours, as you have heard before, were, for their infolent behaviour towards the Macedonian Ladies, flaine by the direction of Alexander, who was the fonne of Her, Enfluitions Amyntas, and his Successour.

Alexander, furnamed the rich, the forme of Amyntas, gouerned Macedon three and fortic yeares. He did not only appeale the wrath of Megabazus, for the flaughter of the Persian Embassadours, by giving Gygea his Sister, to Bubares of the bloud of Perlia, but by that match he grew fo great in Xernes grace, as he obtained all that 20 Region betweene the Mountaines of Olympus and Hemus, to bee vnited to the Kingdome of Micedon. them. He had three Sonnes, Perdiceas, Alcetas, and Philip. Perdicess the fecond, the fonne of Alexander, lined in the time of the Peloponnelian

Warre, and raigned in all eight and twentie yeares. The Warres which hee made were not much remarkeable: the Storie of them is found here and there by peeces, in Thursdides his first fixe bookes. He left behinde him two fonnes; Perdices; who was very yong, and Archelaus who was base borne.

Perdiceas the third, being deliuered to the custodie and care of Archelaus, was at feuen yeares of age cast into a Well and drowned by his false guardian : who excufing this fact to Cleopatra the Mother of the yong King, faid, That the child in fol- Platin Gorg lowing a Goose hastily fell thereinto by misaduenture. This Archelaus, of whom both Plato and Ariftotle make mention, though hee made himselfe King by wicked murder, yet he performed many thinges greatly to the profit of his Nation. It is faid, That hee fought by all meanes to draw Socrates 40 vnto him, and that he greatly loued and honoured Eurypides the Tragedian. He had two fonnes, Archelaus and Orestes.

Archelaus the second succeeded his Father, and having raighed seven yeares, hee was flaine in hunting, either by chance or of purpofe, by Crateus.

Orestes his yonger some was committed to the education of Aropus, of the rotall bloud of Macedon, and had the same measure which Archelaus had measured to his Pupill: for Eropus murdered him and vsurped the Kingdome, which he held some fixe yeares: the same who denied passage to Agestlaus King of Sparta, who desired after his returne from the Asian expedition, to passe by the way of Macedon into

Amyrics the fecond had by his Wife Emydiae, the Illyrian, three Sonnes; Alexander the Coond, Ferdiacs the third, and Philip the fecond, Father of Alexander the Creat: and one Daughter called Emyone or Exine: He had allo by his fecond wife Organ three Sonnes; Archidans, Argan, and Alemelaus, afterward flaine by their brother Philip, He had more by a Concubine, Prolome_funnamed_Alories, of the 10-

Aexander the second raigned not much about one yeare, in which time he was inuaded by Paufinia, the sonne of Aropus, but defended by Iphicrates the Athenian, while he was at that time about Amplipolis. He was also constrained (for the payment of a great fumme of money) to leave his yongest brother Philip in Hostage with the illy isms, who had subjected his Father Amyntus to the paiment of tribute. After this, Alexan ler, being inuited by the Alexande against Alexander the Tyrant of Phres in The salie, having redeemed his brother Philip; to draw the Thebans to his affiliance entred into confederacie with Pelapidas, being at that time in the fame Countrie, with whom be also left Philip with diners other principall persons for the gage of his promifes to Pelopidas. But Eurydice his Mother falling in loue with her Sonne-in-law, who had married her Daughter Euryone or Extene, practized the death of Alexander her fonne, with a purpose to conferre the Kingdome on her Paramour, which Prolomie Alorites did put in execution : by meanes whereof hee held Olizaedon for three yeares, but was soone after slaine by Perdicas the brother of Diod. 15. 6-16 Alexander. Perdians the third, after he had flaine Alorite his bafe brother, gouerned Materials the third, after he had flaine in a battaile againft the Idyrians, according to Triodoms; but intime affirmeth, that he perilhed by the practife of Encycles his Mother, as Alexander did.

Here the fecond, the yongest sonne of Amyntas by Eurydiee, having be the instructed in all knowledge requisite who the gouernment of beater instructed in all knowledge requisite who the gouernment of a Kingdome, in that excellent education which bee had wider Epaminands, making an escape from Thehese returned into Masedom, in the building of Rome three hundred and fifth Olymptas, which was after the building of Rome three hundred sources and the temperature of the state of and finding the many enemies and dangers wherewith the Kingdome was intuitioned, hee tooks on han, not as King (for Parkieses left a sonne, though but an Instant) but as the Protector of his Nephew, and Commander of the men of Varre. Yet his fruitfull ambition some our grew his modelfic, and he was cally persuaded by the people to go accept both the Title of King, and withall the absolute Rule of the Kingdome, and to say the truth, The necessities of the State of Masedom at that time required a King-both prudent and actine. For, besides the incurrions of the Elyrians and Pamsaman, the King of Theme did set up in opposition Pauglanias ; the Athanan, Are was fonnes of the late V furper Eropus: each of these labouring to place in Macedon a King of their owne Election. These heavie burdens when Philip could not well beare, he bought off the waightieft by money, and by faire promifes vnloded himfelfe of fo many of the reft, as he ranne under the remainder happily enough. For, notwithstanding that his brother Perdicess had his death accompanied with foure shouland Macedonians, befide these that were wounded and taken prisoners; and that the Pannonians were delitroying all before them in Macedon; and that the Athenians with a fleet by Sea, and three thousand Souldiers by Land under Mantias, did beate you him on all fides and quarters of his Countrie: Yet after he had practifed to the men of warre of Pannonia; and corrupted them with gifts; and had also bought the King of Thrace from Paulanias, he forthwith made head against the A henians his fliffest enemies : and, for the first, he preuented their recourse of Amphipolis, a Citie on the frontier of Micedon : and did then purfue Argieus the fonne of Fropus, fet against him by the Athenians, and followed him so hard at the heeles, in his retrait from Ages, that he forced him to abide the battaile: which Argans loft, having the oreatest part of his Armie slaine in the place. Those of the Athenians, and others which remained ynbroken, tooke the advantage of a strong peece of ground at hand, which though they could not long defend, yet avoiding thereby the prefent furie of the Souldiers, they obtained of the vanquilhers life and libertie to returne into 20 Attics. Whereupon a peace was concluded betweene him and the Athenians for that prefent, and for this elemencie hee was greatly renowned and honoured by all the Greekes.

ð. III.

The good successe which PHILIP had in many enterprises.

Ow had Philip leifure to looke Northward, and to attend the Illyrians and Pagnians, his irreconciliable enemies and borderers: both which he inuaded with 60 profperous fuccesses, as hee flew Bardillis, King of the Illyrians, with seen chousand of his Nation, and thereby reconcerded all those places which the Illyrians held in Macedon; and withall, vpon the dear's of the King of Pannonia, hee pierst that Countrie, and after a maine victorie obtained, heccaforithem to pay him tribute. This was no fooner done. than (without thaying to take longer breath) he hasted speedily towards Lariffa, vppon the River Parens in Thestalie, of which Towns he soone made himselfe master; and thereby he gorgood footing in that Countrie, whereof he made vie in time following. Now although hee resolued either to subdue the Thessalians, or to make them his owne against all others, because the horse-men of that Countrie were the 40 best, and most feared in that part of Europe; yet he thought it most for his safetie to close up the entrances out of Thrace, least while hee inuaded Thessale and Greece towards the South, those ample Nations, lying towards the North, should either with draw him, or ouer-runne Macedon as in former times. He therefore attempted Amphipolis, feated on the famous River of Strimon, which parteth Thrace from Macedon, and wonne it. He alfo recovered Prana; and (to the North of Amphipolis) the Citie of Crenides ( fometime Datus ) and called it after his owne name Philippi : to the people whereof St. Paul afterward directed one of his Epiflles. This place, wherein Philippi flood, is very rich in Mines of gold, out of which, greatly to the advancement of Philips affaires, he drew yearely a thousand talents, which make fixe hunto dred thouland French Crownes.

And that hee might with the more ease disburden the Thratian-shores of the Athenian Garrisons, to which he had given a great blow by the taking in of Amphipolis, he entred into league with his Fathers malicious enemies the Olymbians; whom the better to fasten vnto him, he gaue them the Citie of Pydna with the Territoric, meaning

ning nothing leffe than that they should enjoy it, or their owne Estate, manie

Now that he might by degrees winne ground vpon the Greekes, he tooke the faire occasion to deliner the Citie of Pheres in The Salie, from the tyrannie of Lreothron and Tiliphonus. Who, after they had conspired with Thebe the Wife of Alexander, who vfurped vpo the libertie of that State, they themselues (Alexander being murdered) held it also by the same strong hand and oppression that Alexander did, till by the affiftance of Philip they were beaten out, and Pheres restored to her former libertie. Which act of Philip did for-cuerafter falten the Theffalians vnto him, and, to his exceeding great aduantage, binde them to his feruice.

d. IIII.

Of the Phocian Warre which first drew PHILIP into Greece.

Bout this time, to wit, in the second years of the hundred and fixth Olympiad, eight yeares after the battaile of Mantinea, and about the eighth yeare of Artaxernes Ochus, beganne that Warre, called Sacred. Now, as all occasions concurre towards the execution of eternall prouidence, and of curry great alteration in the World there is some 20

preceeding preparation, though not at the first easily discerned; so did this reuengefull hatred by the Thebans, Theffalians, and Locrians, conceived against the Phocians, not only teach Philip how he might with halfe a hand wrest the sword out of their fingers; but the Greekes themselves beating downe their owne defences, to give him an casse passage, and beating themselves, to give him victorie without perill, left nothing unperformed towards their owne flauerie, fauing the title and imposition. Of this Warre the Thebans (made over-proude by their victorie at Leuctres) were the inflamers. For at the Councell of the Amphyétiones, or of the generall Estates of Greece, in which, at that time, they swaied most, they caused both the Lacedamonians and Phocians to bee condemned in greater fummes of money than they could well beare; the one for furprifing the Castle of Cadmeain the time of peace, the other for ploughing vp a peece of ground belonging to the Temple of Delphos. The Phocians being resolued not to obay this Edict, were secretly set on and incouraged by the Lacedanionians: and for refufail were exposed as Sacrilegers, and accurfed, to all their Neighbour-Nations, for whom it was then lawfull to inuade, and destroy them at their pleafures.

The Phocians perfuaded thereunto by Philomelus, a Captaine of their owne, caft the same dice of hazard that Cafar after many Ages following did; but had not the fame chance. Yet they dealt well enough with all the enemies of their owne Nation. And the better to beare out an vngratious quarrell, of which there was left no 40 hope of composition, they resolued to sack the Temple it selfe. For seeing that for the ploughing of a peece of Apollo's ground, they had so much offended their neighbour-God, and their neighbour-Nations, as worse could not befall them than alreadie was intended; they resolued to take the gold with the ground, and either to perish for all, or to prevaile against all that had commission to call them to accompt. The treasure which they tooke out of the Temple in the beginning of the warre was ten thousand talents, which in those daies served them to wage a great many men, and fuch was their fucceffe in the beginning of the warre, as they wonne three great battailes against the Thebans, Theplains, and Lorinas, but being beaten in the fourth, their Leader Philomelus cast himselfe head long ouer the Rocks.

In the meane while the Cities of Chersonesus, both to defend themselues against their bad-Neighbour Philip, who encroched vpon them, and to draw others into their quarrell, rendred themselues to the Athensans. Philip prepareth to get them into his handes, and at the fiege of Methone loft one of his eies. It is faid, That hee that that him did purposely direct his Arrow towards him, and that it was written on the shaft thereof: After PHILIPPO; After to PHILIP; for so he was called plus Vibian. that gaue him the wound. This Citie he euened with the foile.

The Tyrant Lycophron before mentioned, while Philip was busied on the border of Thrace, and the Thesalians ingaged in the holy Warre, entred Thessalie with new forces, being affifted by Onomarchus, Commander of the Phocian Armie, in place of 1-hilamelus. For hereby the Phocians hoped to entertaine the Thesialians at home, as they should not finde leifure to inuade them. Hercupon was Philip the second time called into Thessalie, but both the Thessalians, and Macedonians, ( Philip being present) were veterly ouerthrowne by Onomarchus; and great numbers of both Nations loft. From The lalie, Onomarchus drew speedily towards Baetia, and with the . fame victorious Armie brake the forces of the Bactians, and tooke from them their Citie of Coronea. But Philip impatient of his late miladuenture, after hee hadre-enforced his Armic, returned with all speede into The salie, there to finde against he honour which he lately loft; and was the second time incountred by Onomarchus, who brought into the field twentie thousand foote, and fine hundred horse. All this great preparation sufficed not; for Onomarchus was by Philip surmounted, both in numbers and in good fortune, his Armic ouerturned, fixe thousand slaine, and three thousand taken; of which number himselfe being one, was among others hanged 20 by Philip. Those that fled were in part received by the Athenian Gallies, which failed along fithe coast, commanded by Chares, but the greatest number of those that tooke the Sea, were therein denoured ere they reconcred them. Lycophron was now againe driven out of The Salie, and Pheres made free as before.

of the Olynthian Warre. The ambitious practifes of PHILIP.

R om hence Philip resoluted to inuade Phoeis it selfe, but the Athénians did not fauour his entrance into those parts, and therefore with the Thermopphis. Wherevpon hee returned into Mucedon, and after the taking of Micherne, Torone, and other Townes, hee quarrelled with the Olynthians, whom not long before he had wooed to his alliance, and bought his peace of them. For the Olynthians were very strong, and had euermore both braued and beaten the Macedonians. It is faid that Philip having put to death Archelaus his halfe brother (for Amentas had three fonnes by Eurydice the Mother of Philip, and three other fonnes by Gyges: but Philips elder brothers by the fame Mother being dead, he determined to rid himfelfe also of the rest) the two yonger held themselues 40 within Olynthus; and that the receiping of them by the Olynthians was the cause of the warre, Instine affirmeth. But just quarrels are ballanced by just Princes, forto full.18: this King all thinges were lawfull that might any way ferue his turne; all his affections and paffions, how-divers foeuer in other men, were in his ambition swallowed vp. and thereinto converted. For hee neither forbare the murder of his owne brothers, the breach of faith, the buying of other mens fidelitie, hee esteemed no place ftrong where his Affe loaden with gold might enter, Nor any Citie or State vnconquerable, where a few of the greatest, to be made greater, could loose the sense of other mens forrow and subjection. And because hee thought it vaine to practise the winning of Olynthus, till hee had inclosed all the power they had within their owne 50 walls, he entred their Territorie, and by the aduantage of a well-compounded and trained Armie, he gaue them two ouerthrowes ere hee fate downe before the Citie it felfe: which done, he bought Enthierates and Lasthenes from their people, and from the service of their Countrie and Common weale, by whose treason hee entred the Towne, flew his brothers therein, fackt it, and fold the Inhabitants for flaues by the drum. By the spoile of this place he greatly inriched himselfe, and had treasure sufficient to buy in other Cities withall, which he daily did. For so was hee admised by the Oraclein the beginning of his vndertaking, That hee should make his assaults with siluer speares: Whereupon Horace well and truly said.

Hor.Carm.3. Od. 16. ———Diffidit Vrbium Portas vir Macedo, & Subruit amulos, Reges muneribus.———

By gifts the Macedon claue Gates a-funder, And Kings enuying his effate brought under. 10

And it is true that he wonne more by corruption and fraude than he did by force. For as he had in all the principall Cities of Greech is ferret workers (which way of Conqueff was well followed by Philip the fecond of Spaine:) So when in the contention between the Competitors for the Kingdome of Thrace, he was chosen the Arbitrator, he came not to the Councell accompanied with Pietie, and Justice, but with a powerfull Armie, and hauing beaten and flaine both Kings, gaue sentence for himselfie, and made the Kingdome his owne.

ģ. VI.

How PHILIP ended the Phocian Warre.

He warre ftill continuing betweene the Photisms, and the Affociates of the holy Warre, the Beotians, finding them felues vnable to fubfift without some present adia, sent vnto Philip for fuccour, who willingly yeelded to their necessities and sent them fuch a proportion of men as were neither sufficient to master their enemies, nor to affore them.

as were neither fufficient to mafter their enemies, nor to affure themfeliues, but yet to inable them to continue the warre, and to wafte the fitnegth of 30 Greece. They also fent to Attacesce colus for supply of treasure, who lent them there it is the supplies they had full the worst in all their attempts against the Photoms, who held from them three of their strongest Cities within Bestias selfs. They then besought Philip of Antecodo that hee would affish them in person, to whom they would give an entrance into their Territorie, and in all things obay his commandements in that Warre.

Now had Philip what he longed for ; for he knew himselfe in state to give the law to both, and so quitting all his other purposes towards the North, he marched with a speedic pace towards Barotia, where being arrived, Phalleeus who commanded the 40 Phocian Armie, fearing to shock with this victorious King, made his owne peace, and with-drew himselfe with a Regiment of eight thousand Souldiers into Peloponnesus, leauing the Phocians to the mercie of the Conquerour, and for conclusion he had the glorie of that Warre called Sacred, which the Gracians with fo many mutuall flaughters had continued for ten yeares, and, belides the gloric, he polleft himselfe of orchomene, Coronea, and Corfia, in the Countrie of the Ba otions, who invited him to be victorious over themselves. Hee brought the Phocians into servitude, and wasted their Cities, and gaue them but their Villages to inhabite, referuing to himfelfe the yearely tribute of threefcore talents, which make fixe and thirtie thousand French Crownes. He also hereby (besides the same of pietie for service of the Gods) obtained the same double voice in the Councell of the Amphyétiones, which the Phocians had, with the superintendencie of the Pythian games, forfeited by the Corinthians, by being partakers in the Photian facriledge.

How PHILLE with ill faccesse attempted upon Perinthus, Byzantium,

HILLI after his triumphant returne into C. Macedon, by the Licutenant of his Armie Parmenio, flaughtered many thousands of the Myrians, and Dardanians, and brought the Thracians to pay him the tenth part of all their retenances. But his next enterprise against the Perindian: stated his furic. Perinthus was a Citic of Thrace, seared upon Propontis, in the mid-way betweene Seitos and Byzantium, a place of reat trength, and a people resolved to defend their libertie against Philip, where incouraged and affilted them. Philip fate downe before it with a puif-Last Armie, made many faire breaches, gaue many furious affaults, built many oner-topping and commanding Towers about it. But hee was repel'd with equall violence. For whereas Philip thought by his continuall affaults to wearie them, and walts both their men and munition, they were supplied, not only from the Perlina with men and money, and fuccoured from Byzantium which flood upon the fame Sea-coast, but they were relieved from Athens, Chio, and Rhoges, by the conduction 20 of Photion, with whatfocuer was wanting to their necessitie. But because those of Byzantium, by reason of their Neighbourhood, and the casse passage by water, gaute them often and reactic helpe; Philip removed with the one halfe of his Armic and belieged it, leaving lifteene thouland foot before Perinthus, to force it if they could; but to be flort, hee failed in both attempts, (as all Princes commonly doe that viider-take divers enterprises at one time) and returned into Mucedon with no leffe dithonour than loffe: whereupon he made an Ouerture of peace with the Athenians, and greatly defired it, to which though Phocion perfwaded them in all he could, and that by the occasion offered they might greatly advantage their conditions; Yet Demographenes with his eloquence prevailed in the refusall. In the meane while, Philip 30 hauing digested his late affront, and supplied his expence by the taking of an hundred and threefcore and ten Marchants ships, he gathered new forces, and being accompanied with his sonne A'exander, lead them into Scythia; but he was also vnprosperous in this enterprise: For the Triballi, a people of Aufia, set on him in his returne, wounded him, and tooke from him the greatest part of the spoiles, which he had gathered.

How PHILLT overthrowing the Greekes in the battaile of Cheronia, was chosen Captaine-Generall of Greece. The death of PHILLT.

Mong these Northren Nations (part of which hee suppress, and part quieted) hee spent some eight yeares; and in the ninth yeare, after the end of the holy Warre, he waste o his great aduantage inuited againe by the Gracians to their affishance. For the Citizens of Amplus's bauing disobated the decree of the Amplus's manifestations gauc countenance and aide to the Amplifications, the rest were not of themselutes able to constraine them, they be songht to come in person to their affishance. Now you must thinke that Philip was not long in resoluting you this enterprise; hee needed no drawing on, whom nothing could keepe back; nor other distrassion than a mastring power could hold thence. Het therefore commanded his Armie forthwish to march; the sime being compounded of thirtie thousand soote, and two thousand horse; and with as much expedition as could be made, he entred Phocis, wanne Plataa, and brought into fubiection all that Region.

The reft, and especially the Athenians, although they had good cause to feare that a great part of this fforme would fall on themselves, yet were they diffwaded by Demosthenes from accepting such reasonable conditions of peace as Philip offered, and rather made choise (haning drawne the Thebans to joyne with them) to leaue the injoying of their estates and their freedome to the chance of one battaile, than to hold it either by composition, or by the grace of Philip. But this their Orators eloquence coff them deare. It is true that he could farre more casily minde them of the vertue of their Ancestors, then make them to be such as they were. Hee might to repeate vnto them (with wordes mouing passion) the wonders they wrought at Marathon, but hee could not transforme the Macedonians into Perlians, nordraw from the dead, a Miltiades, an ArsHides, a Themistocles, or a Cimon, or any of those famous Commanders, whose great vertues they had paied with the greatest ingratitude that ever Nation did. A Phocion they had, but by the strength of a contrarie faction hee was at this time in differee, and not imploited: in so much as when the Armies of Philip and the Confederates incountred, although some thousand of the Athenians abid the killing, and the like number well neare of the Thebans died with them; yet the want of worthie men on that fide to hold up the rest, and to draw them on, and the many choise Captaines of the Macedonians, incouraged by a King 20 of a growing fortune, as it gaue to Philip to thining a victoric that Alexander by the light thereof found his way (in despisht of all the Nations interjacent) into Persia. India, and Agypt; foit cut to the ground, and gave end and date to all the Gracian glorie : Yea their libertie (faith Curtius) with their large Dominion wonne with fo many difficulties, continued for so many Ages, and so often defended against the greatest Kings, was now lost in a moment and for ever lost.

Now this aduised King (neuer passionate to his disadvantage) to the end hee might obtaine the Soueraignetie ouer all Greece, and be acknowledged for their Captaine-Generall against the Persians, without any further hazard or trouble, was content to let goe those Athenians that were taken at this battaile of Cheronaa, as he also 20 forbare to attempt any thing against their Citie : but in Thebes (which lately by the vertue of Epaminondas triumphed ouer the rest) heelodged a Garrison of Macedomians. And being fooneafter (according vnto the long defire which he had nourished of this Soueraignetie) by the generall States at Corinth, stiled The first Commander of all the Gracians, and contribution of men and money granted him, hee compounded an Armie of great strength, and under the commandement of Attalus and Parmenio, transported the same over the Hellespont into Asa, to beginne the Warre. Of his enterprise against Perlia hee sought the successe from the Oracle at Delphos, from whence he received such an other convertible riddle, as Crafus did when hee attempted Cyrus, and was in like fort mistaken in the exposition.

But as it is hard to discerne and withstand the flatteries of our owne appetites, fo did Philips ambitious defire to inuade Perfia abuse his judgement, so farre, that the death, wherewith himfelfe was threatned, he understood to be deliuered of his enemic, whom he intended prefently to inuade. Before his purposed departure into Asia, hee prepared for the marriage of his Daughter Cleopatra with Alexander King of Epirus, to which feast and pastimes thereat appointed hee inuited all his Friends, and Allies, with the principall persons of the Gracian Cities, from whom he received much honour and many rich presents: but this was indeede the feast of his Funerall. For bauing refused to doe justice to one Paufanias, a Gentleman of his Guard, whom Attalus (greatly fauoured by Philip) had first made drunke, and then 50 left to be carnally abused by divers base persons, This Paulanias grew into sogreat detestation of the Kings partialitie in so fowle a fact, as when Philip was passing towards the Theater, he drew a fword from under his long garment and wounded him to death, when hee had lined fixe and fortic yeares, and raigned five and twentie.

Justine reports it, that Olympias incouraged Paulanias to murder the King her huf- 128/19. band, which after his death shee boldly anowed, by the honour shee did vnto Paufanias in crowning his dead bodie, in confectating his fword vnto Apollo, by building for him a Monument, and other like Graces.

What good foundations of ALEXANDERS greatnesse were laied by PHILIP. Of his landable qualities, and iffue.

Ow although he were then taken from the World, when he had mafred all opposition on that side the Sea, and had scene the fruits of his hopes and labours, changing colour towards ripenesse, and perfecti-on, yet he was herein happie that he liued to see his some Alexander at mans estate, and had himselfe been an eie-witnesse of his resolution, and fingular valour in this last battaile.

The foundation of whose future greatnesse he had laied so foundly for him, with fo plaine a patterne of the buildings which himselfe meant to erect, as the performance and finishing was farre more casie to Alexander, though more glorious than 20 the beginnings were vnto Philip, though leffe famous. For belides the recourse of Maceion it felfe, in competition betweene him and the sonnes of Aropus, the one affifted by the Thracians, the other by the Athenians, and besides the regaining of many places posses by the Illyrians, the crushing of all those Northren Kings his Neighbours, the ouerthrow of Olynthus, a State that dispised the power of his Father, the many Maritimate Cities taken, of great strength and ancient freedome, and the subjection of that famous Nation of Greece, which for so many Ages had defended it selfe against the greatest Kings of the World, and wonne vpon them; Hee left vnto his sonne, and had bred vp for him, so many choise Commanders, as the most of them both for their valour and judgement in the Warre were no lesse wor-20 thie of Crownes, than himselfe was that ware a Crowne: For it was said of Parmenio (whom Alexander, vngtatefull to fo great vertue, impioufly murdered) That Parmenio had performed many thinges challenging eternall fame, without the King, but the King, without Parmenio, neuer did any thing worthie of renowne; as for the rest of his Captaines, though content to obay the Sonne of fuch a Father, yet did they not after Alexanders death endure to acknowledge any man Superiour to themselues.

Of this Prince it is hard to judge, whether his ambition had taught him the exercise of more vices, than Nature, and his excellent Education had inriched him with vertues. For besides that He was Valiant, Wife, Learned, and Master of his 40 Affections, he had this favour of Pietic, that he rather laboured to fatisfie those that were grieued, than to suppresse them, Whereof (among many other) wee finde a good example in his dealing with Arcadion , and Nicanor ; whom, when for their euill speech of Philip, his familiars perswaded him to put to death; Hee answered them, That first it ought to bee considered, whether the fault were in them that gaue him ill language, or in himselse : Secondly, that it was in enery mans owne power to bee well spoken off; and this was shortly proued, for after Philip had relieued their necessities, there were none within his Kingdome that did him more honour than they did. Whereupon hee told those that had perswaded him to vse violence, that hee was a better Philition for cuill speech than they were.

His Epistles to Alexander his sonne are remembred by Cicero, and Gellius; and Cic.Off.2. by Dion: and Chryfostome exceedingly commended. His Stratagems are gathered Diane, define by Polyenus and Frontinus, his wife fayings by Plutarch, And albeit hee held Macedon as in his owne right, all the time of his raigne, yet was he not the true and next Heirethereof: for Amyntas the sonne of his Brother Perdicens (of whom he had the protection during his infancie) had the right. This Amputas hee married to his Daughter Cyna, who had by him a Daughter called Eurydiee, who was married to Philips hafe some Aridaus, her Vnde by the mothers-side: both which Olympias, Philips hirl Wife, and Mother to Alexander the Great, put to death; Aridaus by extreme torments: Eurydiet thee strangled.

Philip had by this Olympias the Daughter of Neoptolemus, King of the Malojians, (of the race of Ashiles) Assessment the Great, and Cleopatra. Cleopatra was married to her Vnele Alexander, King of Epirus, and was after her Brother Alexanders death flaine at Sardis, by the commandement of Antieonus.

By Andata, an Illyrian, his second wise, hee had Cyna, married as is shewed 10 before.

By Acteshpolis, the Sifter of Infan, Tyrant of Pheres, hee had Thesialonica, whom Cassandra, after he had taken Pidnas, married, but shee was afterward by her Fatherin-law Antipater put to death.

By Cleopara, the Necce of Attalus, he had Caranus, whom others call Philip: him, athen 1.324. Olympias, the Mother of Alexander the Great, caufed to be rofted to death in a copial. The Pram. Others lay this murder on Alexander himfelfe. By the filter-flower's been had likewife a Daughter, called Europa, whom Olympias allo murdered at the Mothers breath.

By Phila and Meda he had no iffue.

Hee had also two Concubines, Assime, whom, after he had gotten with child, hee married to an obscure man, called Lagus, who bare Ptolomie, King of Agypt, called the sonne of Lagus, but effected the sonne of Philip: by Philinna, his second Concubine, a publike Dancer, he had Aridans, of whom wee shall have much occasion to speake hereafter.

CHAP. II. Of ALEXANDER the Great.

A briefe rehearfall of ALEXANDERS doings, before hee inuaded Asia.

LEXANDER, afterward called the Great, fucceeded vnto Philip his Father; being a Prince no lefte valiant by Nature, than by Education, well infructed, and inriched in all forts of Learning and good Arts. He began his raigne ouer the Maedonium four chundred and feuenteene yeares after Rome built, and after his owne birth twentie yeares. The firange dreames of Philip his Father; and that one of the Gods, in the finape of a Snake, begat him on objection his Mother, 50 I omit as foolifit tales; but that the Temple of Dimae (a worke the moft magnificent of the World) was burnt you the day of his birth, and that fo firange an accident was accompanied with the newes of three feuerall victories, obtained by the Mstedonians, it was very remarkeable.

remarkeable, and might with the reafon of those times be interpreted for ominous, and foreshewing the great thinges by Accander afterward performed. Vpon the change of the King, the Neighbour-Nations, whom Philip had opprest, beganne to consultabout the recourse of their former libertie, and to aduenture it by sorce of Armes. Alexanders young-years sque them hope of preualing, and his suspected seuerite increased courage in those, who could better resolute to die, than to live slawishly. But Alexander gaue no time to those swelling humours, which might speedily have endangered the health of his estate. For after reuenge taken you the Conspirators against his Father, whom he slew you his Tombe; and the celebration of this Puneralls, hee first fushed with on him his owne Nation, by freeing them

10 tion of his Funerails, dee Initiatiened vinto him his owne Nation, by freeing them from all exactions, and bodily flauerie, other than their feruice in his warres, and uch fed fuch Kingly aufteritie towards those that contemned his yong yeares, and such clemencie to the rest that perswaded themselues of the cruedite of his disposition, as all affections being pacified at home, I he made a prefent journey into Pelaponnes, and so well exercised his spirits among them, as by the Counsell of the States of Greece, he was according to the great delire of his heart, elected Captaine-Generall against the Persons, you which warre Phissip his Father had not only resoluted, (who had obtained the same title of Generall Commander) but had transported vinder the leading of Parmenia, and Attalus, a part of his Armie, to recouser some places on Assis-side, for the fast descent of the rest.

This enterprife against the Perfum occupied all Alexanders affections; those faire markes of riches, Honour, and large Dominion, hee now shot at both sleeping and waking; all other thoughes and imaginations were either gireuous or hardfull. But a contrarie winde articleth; for hee receiveth advertisement that the Albeniaus, 7 bebans, and Lucechemoniaus, had vnited themseliues against him, and, by affishance from the Persun, hoped for the recourse of their former freedome. Hereto they were persuaded by Dempshanes, himselfe being thereto persuaded by the gold of Persus, the desults he view was stained as more substituted that the desults he view was stained as the desults and brought into the affermance was stained as the stained against the Triballes, and brought into the affermance was stained as the stained against the Triballes, and brought into the affermance was stained as the stained against the Triballes, and brought into the affermance of the stained against the Triballes, and brought into the affermance of the stained against the Triballes, and brought into the affermance of the stained against the Triballes, and brought into the affermance of the stained against the Triballes, and brought into the affermance of the stained against the Triballes, and brought into the affermance of the stained as t

30 bly a Companion whom hee had corrupted to affirme, That himfelfe was prefent and wounded in the battaile. There is indeed a certaine Dostrine of Policie (as Policie is now a-daics defined by fallhood and knaueric) that deutifed rumours and lies; if they ferue the turne, but for a day or two, are greatly atualicable. It is true that common people are fometime mock by them, as Souldiers are by falfe alarums in the Wairres; but in all that I haue obferued, I haue found the fucceffe as ridiculous as the inuention. For as those that finde themselues at one time abused by such like brutes, doe at other times neglect their duties, when they are vopon true reports, and in occasions perilous, fummoned to affemble; so doe all men in generall condemne the Venters of fught rumperic, and for them seare opponences faire occasions to ended the Venters of fught rumperic, and for them seare opponences faire occasions to ended the search of 40 tertaine the truth it felfe. This labour vnlooked for, and loss of time, was not only very grieuous to Alexander, but by turning his fiword from the legnoble and effentinate Persians, against which he had directed it, towards the manly and simous Grecians, of whose affishance he thought himselfe assured his present vndertaking was greatly disordered. But he that cannot indure to striue against the winde, shall hardy attaine the Port which hee purposeth to recourer: and it no less becomment the worthich men to oppose missortunes, than it doth the weakest children to bewaile them.

Hetherefore made fuch expedition towards these Revolters, as that himselse, with the Armietha followed him, brought them the first twews of his preparation. 50 Hercupon all stagger, and the Astherium, as they were the first that moved, so were they the first that sainted, seeking by their Embassis downs to pacific the King, and to be received agains into his pace. Askeander was not long in resolving; for the Persons personal days in the special series. Wise men are not cassly drawn from great purposes by such occasions as may easily be taken off, neither hath any King Pppp Ppp.

cuer brought to effect any great affaire; who hath intangled himfelfe in many enterprifes at once, not tending to one and the fame certaine end.

And having now quieted his borderers towards the South, he refolued to assure those Nations which ay on the North-side of Macedon, to wit, the Thracians, Trihalles, Peones, Geies, Agrians, and other faluage people, which had greatly vexed with incurtions, not only other of his Predeceffours, but euen Philip his Father: with all which after divers overthrowes given them, hee made peace, or elfe brought them into subjection. Notwithstanding this good successe, he could not yet find the way out of Europe. There is nothing more naturall to man than libertie; the Greekes had enjoyed it ouer-long, and loll it too late to forget it; they therefore shake off the 10 voke once againe. I he Thebans, who had in their Citadell a Garrison of a thousand Masedons, attempt to force it; Alexander hafteth to their fuccour, and prefents himferfe with thertic thousand foot, all old Souldiers, and three thousand horse, before the Citie, and gaue the Inhabitants some daies to resolue, being euen heart-sicke with the delire of passing into Asia. So vnwilling, indeede, he was to draw bloud of the Gracians, by whom tice hoped to serve himselfe elsewhere, that hee offered the Thebans remission, if they would only deliver into his hands Phanix and Prothytes, the firrers up of the Rebellion. But they, oppoling the mounting fortune of Alexender, (which bare all retistance before it, like the breaking in of the Ocean-Sea) in fleed of fuch an answere, as men besieged and abandoned should have made, deman- 20 ded Philotas and Antipater to bee delinered vnto them; as if Thebes alone, then laied in the ballance of Fortune with the Kingdome of Macedon, and many other Provinces, could either have evened the scale or swaied it. Therefore in the end they perished in their obstinacie. For while the Thebans oppose the Armie assailant, they are charged at the back by the Macedonian Garrison, their Citie taken and razed to the ground, fixe thousand flaine, and thirtie thousand sold for flaues, at the price of four hundred and fortie talents. This the King did to the terrour of the other Gr.e-

Many Arguments were vield by Cleedas one of the prisoners, to perswade Alexander to forbeare the destruction of Thebes. He prised the King to beleeue that they go were rather mile-led by guing halficeredit to faller perstahan any way malicious; for being perswaded of Alexanders death, they rebelled but against his Successor. Hee a' obelought the King to remember, that his father Philip had his education in that Citie, yet that his Ancestor Hierasch was borne therein: but all perswassions were fruitless, the times wherein offences are committed, doe greatly aggrauate them. Yet for the honour he bare to learning, he parsoned all of therace of Pindarst the Poet, and spared, and fet at libertie Timoelea, the sister of Theagenes, who died in defence of the libertie of Greece against his Father Philip. This Noble-woman being taken by a Theasin, and by him raussished, he exthreatend totack her life whesself the would consess the treasure, she cled the Thracian to a Well, and told him that 40 sheet head therein cash it, and when the Thracian shooped to looke into the Well, shee sheddainly thrust him into the mouth thereof, and shored him to death.

Now because the Athenians had received into their Citie so many of the Thelann, as had escaped and fled vnto them for succour, Alexander would not grant them peace, but you condition to deliuer into his hands both their Orators which perfivaded this second revolt, and their Captaines; yet in the end it being a torment vnto him to retard the enterprise of Persia, he was content that the Orators should remaine, and accepted of the banishment of the Captaines, wherein he was exceeding ill aduised, had not his fortune, or rather the providence of God, made all the resistance against him vaprositable: if or these good Leaders of the Greeians becook 50 themselves to the service of the Persian, whom after a few daies he invadeth.

δ. I

How ALEXANDER passing into Asia, fought with the Persians upon the River of Granicus.

Hen all was now quieted at home, Alexander, committing to the first trust of Anipater both Greece and Macedon, in the first of the Spring and did palle the Helds from, and being readie to dilimbarke, hee threw a Dart towards the Anim shore, as a token of desiance, commanding his Souldiers not to make any walt in their owne Territorie, or to burne, or defice those buildings which themselues were presently, and in the future to possels. He landed his Armic, constituing of two and thirtie thousand horse, all old Souldiers, neare wnto 7709, where he offered a solemne sacrifice you of Abullet Tombe, his maternall Ancellor.

But before he left his owne coult, he put to death, without any offence given him, all his Mother-in-lawes Kinfmen, whom Philip his Father had greatly advanced, not fparing fach of his owne as he fingleded, Hecalio tooke with him many of his tributarie Princes, of whose fidelitie he doubted; thinking by vnjuft crueltie to affure all things, both in the present and future. Yet the end of all fell out contrarie to 20 the policie which his Ambition had commended vnto him, though agreeing verie well with the justice of God; for all that he had planted, was soone after withered, and rooted vp.; thofe, whom he most trusted, were the most traiterous; his mother, friends, and children, fell by such another mercilesse fword as his owne, and all manner of constudion followed his dead bodie to the graue, and left him there.

When the knowledge of Alexanders landing on Also-side was brought to Darsins, he so much scorned the Armie of Meedon, and had so contemptible an opinion of the surface him skip of the surface had been as the surface had been surface had been as the surface had been of discussion bim feife, as having filled him his feruant on a letter which her wrote vinto him, reprehending his diffositie and audacite (for Dains inititled him file King of Kings, and the Kinfman of the Gods) her gaue order with all to his Licute 30 mans of the leffer Afia, that they fhould take Alexandor a-live, whip him with rods, and then convey him to his prefence: that they fhould finke his fhips, and fand the Macedom taken prifoners beyond the Red-Sea, belike into Allbings, or form oother

In this fort did this glorious King, confident in the glittering, but heartleffe, multitude which he commanded, difpose of the alreadie-vanquilified Macedonians; But the ill definies of men beare them to the ground, by what throng confidence focuer armed: The great numbers which he gathered together, and brought in one heape into the field, gauerather an exceeding advantage to his enemies, than any diffourangement at all. For befides that they were men vtterly vnacquainted with dangers, men who by the name and countenance of their King were wont to premie against those of less courage than themselues, men that tooke more care how to embroder with gold and filter their vpper garments, as if they attended the innation but of the bunnel-beames, than they did to arme themselues with yron and steele against the sharpe-pikes, swords, and darts of the bardie Macchotians; I say be sides all these, euen the opinion they had of their owne numbers, of which euery one in particular hoped that it would not fall to his turne to fight, a filled enery of them with the care of their owne safetie, without any intent at all to hazardany thing but their owne breath, and that of their horses in running away. The Macchoniums as they came to fight, and thereby to inrich themselues with the gold and 50 jewells of Perlia, both which they needed, fo the Perlians who expected nothing in that Warre but blowes and wounds, which they needed not, obaied the King, who had power to confiraine them in affembling themfelues for his feruice; but their owne feares and cowardice, which in time of danger had most power our them, they only then obaied, when their rebellion against fo seruile a passion did justly and violently require it. For faith V EGETIVS: Quemadmodum bene exercitatus miles prelium cupit, ita formidat indoctus; nam feiendum est in pugna vfum amplius prodesse quam vives; As the well-practifed Souldier defires to come to battaile, so the raw one feares it for we muit an levitand, that in fight it more quaites to have been eaccultomed anto the like then only to have rude livength. What manner of men the Perlians were, Alexander discougred in the first encounter, before which time it is faid, by those that writhis Storie. That it was hard to judge, whether his during to undertake the Conquest of an Empire fo well peopled, with a handfull of men, or the fucceffe he had, were more to be wondred at. For at the River of Granick, which feuereth the Territorie of Trey from Propontis, the Perlians fought to flop his paffage, taking the higher ground and 10 banck of the riner to defend, which Alexander was forced (as it were) to clime vp vnto and feale from the Levell of the water; Great reliftance (faith Curtius) was made by the Perfishs, yet in the end Alexander prenailed. But it feemes to mee, that the victorie then gotten was exceeding cafe, and that the twentie thousand Perlian foot-men, faid to be flaine, were rather kil'd in the back, in running away, than hurt in the bofomes by relitting. For had those twentie thousand foot, and two hundred and fiftie horfe-men, or, after Flutarah, two thousand and fine hundred horse-men. died with their faces towards the Alexander, Alexander could not have bought their lines at fo fmall a rate, as with the loffe of foure and thirtie of all forts of his owne. And if it were also true, that Plutarch doth report, how Alexander encoun- 20 tred two of the Persian Commanders, Spinbridates and Rhafaces, and that the Persian horse-men sought with great furie, though in the end scattered; and lastly how those Greeiums in Davius his pay holding themselves in one bodie your a peece of ground of advantage, did (after mercie was refused them) fight it out to the laft. how doth it then refemble truth, that fuch reliffance having beene made, yet of Alexanders Armie there fell but twelue Foote-men, and two and twentie Horfe-men.

). III.

He winning of this paffage did greatly encourage the Macedonians, and brought fuch terrour vpon all those of the lesser Asia, as hee obtained all the Kingdomes thereof without a blow, some one or two Townes excepted. For in all inualions, where the Nations inuaded baue once beene beaten vpon a great aduantage of the place, as in defence of Riuers, Streights, and Mountaines, they will foone have perfivaded themselves, that fuch an enemic, vpon equal termes and even ground, can hardly be relifted. It was 40 therefore Atschiauels counfell, that he which refolueth to defend a paffage, should with his ablest force oppose the Affailant. And to fav truth, few Regions of any great circuit are fo well fenced, that Armies, of fuch force as may be thought fufficient to conquer them, can be debarred all entrance, by the naturall difficultie of the waies. One paffage or other is commonly left vnguarded : if all be defended, then must the forces of the Countrie be distracted, and yet lightly, some one place will be found that is defended very weakely. How often have the Alpes given way to Armics, breaking into Italie? Yea, where shall we finde that ever they kept out an inuadour? Yet are they fuch, as (to speake briefly) affiled with all difficulties those that trauaile ouer them; but they give no fecuritie to those that lie behinde them; for 50 they are of too large extent. The Townes of Lumbardie perswaded themselues that they might enjoy their quiet, when the Warlike Nation of the Smitzers had vndertaken to hinder Francis the French King from descending into the Duchie of Milan: but whileft these Patrons of Milan, whom their owne dwelling in those Mountaines

Mountaines had made fittest of all other for such a service, were busied in custodic of the Alpes; Francis appeared in Lumbardie, to so much the greater terrour of the Inhabitants, by how much the leffe they had expected his arrivall. What shall we fay of those Mountaines, which locke vp whole Regions in such fort, as they leave but one Gate open? The Streights, or (as they were called) the Gates of Taurus in Cilicia, and those of Thermopyla, have seldome beene attempted, perhaps because they were thought impregnable: but how feldome (if euer) haue they been attempted in vaine? Xerxes, and long after him, the Romans, forced the entrance of Thermanyle; Cyrus the yonger, and after him Alexander, found the Gates of Cilicia wide to open; how strongly socuer they had beene locked and barred, yet were those countries open enough to a fleet that should enter on the back-side. The defence of Riuers how hard a thing it is, wee finde examples in all histories that beare good witneffe. The deepelt have many Foords, the fwiftelt and broadeft may bee paffed by Boates, in case it be found a matter of difficultie to make a Bridge. He that hath men enough to defend all the length of his owne banke, hath also enough to beate his enemie; and may therefore doe better to let him come ouer, to his loffe, than by friging in vaine to hinder the pailage, as a matter tending to his owne disaduanrase, fill the heads of his Souldiers with an opinion, that they are in ill case, having their meanes of fafeguard taken from them, by the skill or valour of fuch as are too 20 good for them. Certainely if a River were sufficient desence against an Armie, the Ifle of Mons, now called Anglefer, which is divided from North-Wales by an arme of the Sea; had beene fafe enough against the Romans, inuading it vnder conduct of Idius Agricola. But he wanting, and not meaning to spend the time in making vefscills to transport his forces, did affay the foords. Whereby hee so amazed the enemies attending for ships and such like provision by Sea, that surely beleeving nothing could bee hard or inuincible to men, which came fo minded to Warre, they humbly intreated for peace, and yeelded the Iland. Yet the Britaines were men frout enough; the Persians verie dashards.

It was therefore wifely done of Accounter, to passe the R nier of Granick in face of the enemie; not marching higher to seeke an easier way, nor labouring to conucy his menouer it by some faster meanes. For having beaten them vpon their owne ground, hee did thereby cut off no lesse of their reputation, than of their strength, leaving no hope of succour to the partakers and followers of such vnable Pro-

Soone after this victorie he recoucred Sardis, Ephefus, the Cities of the Trallisms and Adagnesia, which were rendred vnto him. The Inhabitants of which, with the people of the Countrie, he received with great grace, fully firing them to be gouerned by their owne lawes. For hee obferued it well s, Nounn Imperium inchoantibus vitils elements fams, It is commodants with the slay the landations of a new Soncraignetic 40 ishaue the fame of being mereifull. Hee then by Parmenia wanne Addeus, and by force maltired Halicarnallyis, which, because it relifted obtlinately, hee razed to the ground. From thence hee entred into Caria, where Adathe Queene, who had beene cast out of all that thee held (except the Citic of Alinda) by Darius his Leutenants, prefered her felfe-wito him, and adopted him her fonne and fuccessor in the Alexander accepted in so gracious part as hee left the whole Kingdome to her disposing. Hee then entred into Systa, and Pamphilis, and obtained all the Sea-coasts, and stubjecting wito him Pridia, he directed himselfte towards Darius (who was faid to be advanced towards him with a martualous Armie) by the way of Parigia. For all the Prouince of Min the lefts, bordering won the Sea, his first victoric laied under his feet.

50 While he gaue order for the gouernement and fetling of Lycis, and Pamphilia, he fent Cleander to raile some new Companies in Peloponnesus, and marching towards the North, he entred Celenas, seated on the River Meander, which was abandoned with o him, the Castle only bolding out, which also after fortie daies was guent vyto for so long time he gaue them to attend succour from Darius. From Celenas he passive them to the property of the cast o through Pinzgu towards the Exime Sea, till he came to a Citie called Gordium, the Regall-Gate, in former times, of King Oddas. In this Citie it was that he found the Gordium-knot, which when he knew not how to vindee, he ce cut it a funder with his fword. For there was an ancient prophecie did promife to him that could vnite it, the Lordthip of all Afa; whereupon Alexander, not respecting the manner how, fo it were done, assumed to himselfe the fulfilling of the prophese, by hewing it in peeces.

But before he turned from this part of Affa the leffe towards the Eaft, hee tooke care to cleare the Sea-coatt on his backe, and to thruft the Perfamout of the Ilands of Leslon, Sua, and Ceas, the charge where othe conitred vinto two of his Captaines, to guing them fuch order as he thought to be most conucinient for that ferrue; and deliuering vinto them fittle talents to defray the charge; and withall out of his first fpoilegotren, he fent threefeore talents more to Antipate his Lieutenant in Greece, and Ascedon. From Celenas he remoued to Antina, now called Anguart, flanding on the fame River of Sangarins, which runneth through Gorduns: there hee multired his Armie, and then entred Paphlagenia, whose people full buttered them felieus vitto him, and obtained fire dome of tribute: where hee left Catus Gouernour with one Reg: ment of Asseconium Stately arrived.

Here he understood of the death of Memnon, Darius Lieutenant, which heartned him greatly to paffe on towards him, for of this only Captaine hee had morere- 20 spect than of all the multitude by Davius affembled, and of all the Commanders bee had besides. For so much bath the spirit of some one man excelled, as it bath vndertaken and effected the alteration of the greatest States and Common-weales. the erection of Monarchies, the conquest of Kingdomes and Empires guided handfuls of men against multitudes of equall bodily strength, contriued victories beyond all hope and discourse of reason, connerted the fearefull passions of his owne followers into magnanimitie, and the valour of his enemics into cowardize; such spirits haue beene flirred vp in fundrie Ages of the world, and in diuers parts thereof, to erect and cast downe againe, to establish and to destroy, and to bring all things, Perfons and States; to the same certaine ends, which the infinite spirit of the Vniner fall, 30 piercing, mouing, and gouerning all thinges hath ordained. Certainely the things that this King did were marnailous, and would hardly haue beene undertaken by any man elfe : and though his Father had determined to have invaded the leffer Afia, it is like enough that he would have contented him@lfe with some part thereof. and not have discovered the River of Indus, as this mandid. The fivift course of victoric, wherewith he ranne over folargea portion of the World, in fo short a space, may justly be imputed vnto this, That he was neuer encountred by an equal spirit, concurring with equall power against him. Hereby it came to passe that his actions being limited by no greater oppolition, than Defert places, and the meere length of tedious journies could make, were like the Colofius of Rhodes, not so much to bee ad-40 mired for the workemanship, though therein also praise-worthie, as for the huge bulke. For certainely the things performed by xenophon, discouer as braue a spirit as Alexanders, and working no leffe exquifitely, though the effects were leffe materiall, as were also the forces and power of command, by which it wrought. But he that would finde the exact patterne of a noble Commander, must looke upon fuch as Epaninandas, that encountring worthie Captains, and those better followed than themselnes, haue by their singular vertue ouer-topped their valiant enemies, and still prenailed ouer those, that would not have yeelded one foot to any other. Such as these are doe seldome live to obtaine great Empires. For it is a worke of more labour and longer time, to master the equall forces of one hardie and well-ordered 59 State, than to tread downe and otterly fubdue a multitude of feruile Nations, compounding the bodie of a groffe vnweldie Empire. Wherefore these Paruo Potentes, men that with little haue done much vpon enemies of like abilitie, are to be regarded as choife examples of worth; but great Conquerors, to bee rather admired for the Inditance of their actions, than the exquilite menaging: exactneffe and great neffection or their actions, that I can finde no initiance of both in one, fauc only that brance kern Cefer.

Haining thus farre digreffed, it is now time that we creturne vnto our Eafterne Conqueror; who strauading hathly towards chian, with a defire to recouer the Streights thereof before Lawiss floud arrive there. But first making a dispatch into Greece, he fent to those Cities, in which he reposed most trust, tome of the Persian Targets which he had recovered in his first battaile; your which, by certaine inferiptions, he made them partakers of his victorie. Herein hee well aduited himselfe; to for he that doth not as well impart of the honour which he gaineth in the Warres, as hee doth of the spoiles, shall never beelong followed by those of the better fort. For men which are either well borne or well bred, and have more of wealth than of reputation, doe as often satisfies themselves with the purchase of slorie; as the weake in fortune, and strong in courage, doe with the gaine of gold and siluer. The Gouernour of Cilicia hearing of Alexander comming on, left some Companies to keepe the Streights, which were indeede very defencible; and withall, as Curtim noteth, hee beganne ouer-late to prife and put in execution the Counfell of Ottomnon: who in the beginning of the Warres aduised him to wast all the prouitions for Men and Horse, that could not bee lodged in strong places, and alwaies to 20 give ground to the Inuader, till hee found some such notableaduantage as might affuredly promife him the obtaining of victorie. For the furie of an inuading Armie is best broken, by delaies, change of diet, and want, eating sometimes too little, and fometimes too much, fometimes repoling themselues in beds, and more oftner on the cold ground. These and the like suddaine alterations bring many diseases vpon all Nations out of their owne Countries. Therefore if Darius had kept the Macedonians but a while from meat and fleepe, and refusing to give or take battaile, had wearied them with his light horse, as the Parthians afterward did the Romans; hee might perchance have faued his owne life, and his effate: For it was one of the greatest incouragements given by Alexander to the Macedonians, in the third and last fa-30 tall battaile, that they were to fight with all the strength of Persia at once.

Aerxes when he inuaded Greece and fought abroade, in being beaten, loft only his men, but Darius being munded by the Greekes, and fighting at home, by being beaten, loft his Kingdome, Perdiet, though the Leadedmenius. Durtallin Afficies to the Gates of Atlens, yet could not bee drawne to hazard a battaile: for the inuaded ought euermore to fight you the adunatage of time and place. Because we reade Histories to informe our understanding by the examples therein found, we will gime fome instances of those that have perished by aduenturing in their owne Countries, to charge an inuading Armic. The Romans, by fighting with Hanibal, were brought to the brinke of their destruction.

40 Pompey was well aduifed for a while, when hee gaue Cafar ground, but when by the importunitie of his Captaines he aduentured to fight at Pharfalia, he lost the battaile, lost the freedome of Rome, and his owne life.

Ferdinand, in the Conquest of Naples, would needs fight a battaile with the French to his confusion, though it was told him by a man of found judgement, that those Counsels which promise sureties all things, are honourable enough.

The Constable of France made frustrate the mightic preparation of Charles the Fift, when he inuaded Prosence by wasting the Countrie, and forbearing to fight; fodid the Duke of Alsa wearie the French in Majles, and distolute the boisterous Armic of the Prince of Orenze in the low-Countries.

The Leigners, contrarie to the adulfe of their Generall, would needes fight a battaile with the Bongonians, inuading their Countrie, and could not be perfeaded to linger the time, and thay their aduantage; but they loft eight and twentie thou fand you of the place. Public of Pauls fet you King Edward at Crefie, and King Iobn (when the English were well neare tired out, and would in fhort time by an orderly pursuit of the commutike Armie leavied by DARIVS agains! ALEXANDER.

The variadified confer which DARIVS took in this expedition. He is examplified at Iffur, where his Nothers, Wife, and Children are made prifoners. Of fome thinges following the buttaile of Iffur.

N the meane feafon Darini approched; who (as Cartinis reports) had compounded an Armic of more than two hundred and ninette thouse fand Souldiers, our of diuers Nations; Infine muffers them at three hundred thoufand Foot, and a hundred thoufand Horfe; Pinearch at fixe hundred thoufand.

The manner of his comming on, as Curtius describes it, was rather like a masker than a man of Warre, and like one that tooke more care to let out his glorie and riches, than to prouide for his owne fafetic, perfwading himfelfe, as it feemed, to beat Alexander with pompe and fumptuous Pageants. For before the Armie there was carried the holy fire which the Persians worthipped, attended by their Priesis, and after them three hundred and threefcore and fine yong-men, answering the num-20 ber of the daies of the yeare, couered with Scarlet; then the Chariot of Jupiter drawne with white Horses, with their Riders cloathed in the same colour, with rods of gold in their hands; And after it, the Horse of the Sunne: Next after these followed ten fumptuous Chariots, inlaied and garnisht with filter and gold, and then the Vanguard of their horse, compounded of twelve severall Nations, which the better to avoidé confusion, did hardly understand each others language, and these marshalled in the head of the rest, being beaten, might serue very fitly to disorder all that followed them: in the taile of these Horses the Regiment of soote marched, with the Perfians called immortall, because if any died the number was prefently supplied; and these were armed with chaines of gold, and their coates 30 with the same mettali imbrodered, whereof the sleenes were garnished with pearle, baites, either to catch the hungrie Macedonians withall, or to perswade them that it were great incimitite to cut and to deface such glorious garments. But it was well laid : Semptuose incluceus miles, le virtute superiorem alijs non existimet, cum in prelijs oportest fortituline animi, & non vestimentis muniri, quaniam hastes vestibus non debellaneur; Let no men thinke that he exceedeth those in valour, whom hee exceedeth in any garments, for it is by men armed with fortitude of minde, an Inot by the apparell they on! on. that enemies are beaten. And it was perchance from the Roman Papyrine that this aduice was borrowed, who when he fought against the Sammites in that fatall battaile, wherein they all fware either to preuaile or die, thirtie thouland of them having ap-40 parelled themselves in white garments, with high crests and great plumes of sea-

King held his refolution to forbeare blowes, and followed his adulte which told him, That the English could never get his inheritance by smoake; and it is reported by Bellarus and Hersuli, that King Edward was wont to say of this Charles, that hee wanne from him the Duchie of Gueta without core putting on his Armout.

or know not how to put in execution any found adulie. The course which Memmon had propounded, mut in all appearance of reason have brought the OMacedonian to a great perplexitie, and made him sland still a while at the Streights of Ceileia, doubting whether it were more shamefull to returne; or dangerous to proceede. For had Cappadonia and Paphlagonia beene wasted whilest Alexandre was farre off; and the Streights of Chiesia beene desended by Arsenes, Gouernor of that Prouince, with the best of his forces; hunger would not have suffered the enemie, to stay the triall of all meanes that might be thought yoon, of forcing that passings; or if the place could not have beene maintained, yet might cliesa as the tetre lesser have beene seenes.

throughly spoiled, that the heart of his Armie should have beene broken, by see- 20 king out miseries with painefull trauaile.

But arfenes leaving a small number to defend the Streights, tooke the best of his Armic with him, to walt, and spoile the Countrie; or rather, as may seeme, to find himselfe some worke, by pretence of which hee might honestly runne further away from alexander. Hee should rather have adventured his person in custodie of the Streights, whereby hee might perhaps have faued the Province; and in the meane time, all that was in the fields, would have beene conveighed into strong Townes. So should his Armie, if it were driven from the place of advantage, have found good entertainement within walled Cities, and himselfe with his horse-men haue had the leffe worke in destroying that little which was left abroade. Handling the mat- 30 ter as he did, he gaue the Cilicians cause to wish for Alexanders comming, and as great cause to the Keepers of the passage not to hinder it. For cowards are wise in apprehending all formes of danger. These Guardians of the Streights, hearing that Arfenes made all hast to joyne himselfe with Darius, burning downe all as he went, like one despairing of the desence, beganne to grow circumspect, and to thinke that furely their Generall, who gaue as lost the Countrie behinde their backs, had exposed themselues vnto certaine death, as men that were good for nothing else, but to dull the Macedonian Swords: Wherefore, not affecting to die for their Prince and Countrie (which honour they faw that Arfenes himselfe could well forbeare) they speedily followed the foote-steps of their Generall, gleaning after his Haruest. Thus 40 Alexander without labour got both the entrance of Cilicia, abandoned by the cowardise of his Enemies, and the whole Prouince that had been alienated from the heads guilt; which they meant not to imbrew in the Macedonian bloud, for feare of marring their beautic. He had for the proper Guard of his person two hundred of the bloud Royall, bloud too Royall and pretious to be spilt by any valorous aduenture, (I am of opinion that two hundred flurdic fellowes, like the Switzers, would haue done him more feruice) and these were backt with thirtie thousand foot-men, after whom againe were led foure hundred spare horses for the King, which if hee had meant to have vied he would have marthalled fomewhat nearer him.

Now followed the Reareward, the same being led by Sifygambis the Kings Mother, and by his Wife, drawne in glorious Chariots, followed by a great traine of Ladies their attendants on horle-back, with liftcene Wagons of the Kings children, 10 and the wives of the Nobilitie, waited on by two hundred and fiftie Concubines, and a world of Nurses, and Eunuelis, most sumptuously apparelled, By which it should seeme that Darius thought that the Macedonians had beene Comedians or Tumblers; for this troupe was farre fitter to behold those sports than to bee present at battailes. Betweene these & a companie of slight-armed slaues, with a world of Vallets, was the Kings treasure, charged on fixe hundred Mules, and three hundred Camels, brought, as it proued, to pay the Aluedonians. In this fort came this Mareame-King into the field, incombred with a most unnecessarie traine of Strumpets, attended with troupes of diuers Nations, speaking diuers languages, and for their numbers impossible to be marshalled, and for the most part so eleminate, and sorich 20 in gold and in garments, as the same could not but have incouraged the nakeddest Nation of the world against them. We finde it in daily experience that all discourse of magnanimitie, of Nationall Vertue, of Religion, of Libertie, and what source else hath beene wont to moue and incourage vertuous men, hath no force at all with the common-Souldier, in comparison of spoile and riches, The rich ships are boorded upon all disaduantages, the rich Townes are furiously assaulted, and the plentifull Countries willingly invaded. Our English Nations have attempted many places in the Indies, and runne vpon the Spaniards head-long, in hope of their Royalls of plate, and Pistolets, which had they beene put to it vpon the like disaduantages in Ireland, or in any poore Countrie, they would have turned their Peeces and Pikes against 30 their Commanders, contesting that they had beene brought without reason to the Butcherie and flaughter. It is true that the warre is made willingly, and for the most part with good successe, that is ordained against the richest Nations; for as the needie are alwaies aduenturous, so plentie is wont to shunne perill, and men that have well to line, doe rather fludie how to line well, I meane wealthily, than care to die (as they call it) honourably. Careuilny, a rien a gargner, que descenps volontiers ilny, 211 pas ; Noman makes hajt to the market, where there is nothing to be bought but blowes.

Now if Alexander had beheld this preparation before his confultation with his Southfaiers, hee would have fatisfied himfelfe by the out-fides of the Perfians, and neuer haue looked into the intrailes of Beafts for fuccesse. For leaning the descrip- 40 tion of this fecond battaile (which is indeede no-where well described, neither for the confusion and hastic running away of the Asians could it be) we have enough by the flaughter that was made of them, and by the few that fell of the Macedonians, to informe vs what manner of reliffance was made. For if it be true that three fcore thousand Persian foot-men were slaine in this battaile, with ten thousand of their horsemen, Or (as Curtius faith) an hundred thousand footmen, with the same number of horse-men, and besides this slaughter, fortie thousand taken prisoners, while of Alexanders Armie there miscarried but two bundred and sourcescore of all forts, of which numbers Arianss and other Historians cut off almost the one halfe: I doe verily beleeue that this finall number rather died with the over-transile and painestaking in killing their enemies, than by any strokes received from them. And furely if the Perfun Nation (at this time degenerate and the basest of the World) had had any fauour remaining of the ancient valour of their forefathers; they would neuer haue fold fo good cheape, and at fo vilea price, the Mother, the Wife, the Daughters, and other the Kings children; had their owne honor beene valued by them at nothing, and the Kings latetie and his estate at lesse! Darius by this time found it true that Charidenus a banished Gracian of Athens had told him, when hee made a view of his Armic about Babylon, to wit, That the multitude which hee had affembled of diners Nations, richly attired, but poorely armed, would bee found more terrible to the Inhabitants of the countrie, whom in passing by they would denour, than to the Macedonians; whom they meant to affaile; who being all old and obedient Souldiers, imbattailed in groffe squadrons, which they call their Phallanx, well coursed with Armour for desence, and surnished with weapons for offence of great 10 aduantage, would make solittle accompt of his delicate Persians, louing their ease and their palat, being withall ill armed and worse disciplined, as except it would please him to entertaine (hauing so great aboundance of treasure to doe it withall) a sufficient number of the same Gracians, and so to encounter the Macedonians with men of equal courage, hee would repent him ouer-late, as taught by the miserable fucceffe like to follow. But this difcourfe was fo unpleasing to Darius (who had beene accustomed to nothing so much as to his owne praises, and to nothing so little as to heare truth;) as he commanded that this poore Grecian should bee presently slaine: who while hee was a fundring in the Tormentors hand, vied this speech to the King, That Alexan-20 der, against whom hee had given this good counfell, should assured y revenge his death, and lay descrued punishment vpon Darius for despising his adusse.

It was the faying of a Wife man. Desperata eius Principis salus est, cuius aures ita formata (unt, vt appera qua vtilia, necquiequam nisi iucundum accipiat; That Princes safetie is in a desperate case, whose eares indge all that is profitable to bee too sharpe, and will entertame nothing that is unpleasant.

For libertie in counsell is the life and essence of counsell; Libertas consilis esteius vita, &

essentia, qua erepta consilium enanescit.

Darius did likewise value at nothing the Aduise given him by the Greeian Souldiers that served him, who intreated him not to fight in the Streights: but had they beene Counsellers and directors in that Warre, as they were viderlings and commanded by others, they had with the helpe of a good troupe of horse-men beene able to have opposed the furie of Alexander, without any affistance of the Persian foot-men. For when Darius was ouerthrowne with all his cowardly and confused rabble, those Gracians, under their Captaine Amyntas, held firme, and marched away in order in despight of the vanquishers. Old Souldiers are not casily dismaica: we reade in Histories ancient and moderne, what braue retraits haue beene made by them, though the rest of the Armie in which they have serued, bath beene broken.

At the battaile of Rauenne where the Imperialls were beaten by the French, a 40 Squadron of Spaniards, old Souldiers, came off vnbroken and vndismaied; whom when Galion de Foix, Duke of Nemures, and Nephew to Lewis the twelfth, charged, as holding the victoric not intire by their escape, hee was ouer-turned and flaine in the place. For it is truely faid of those men, who, by being acquainted with dangers feare them not, That, Neglecto periculo imminent is mali opus ip fum quantumuis difficile aggrediuntur; They goe about the businesse it selfe, how hard socuer it be, not standing to consider of the danger, which the missihiefe hanging over their heads may bring and as trucky of those that know the warres but by heare-say. Qued valentes funt of preuslentes ante pericula, in ipfis tamen periculis discedunt ; They have abilitie enough, and to spare. till dangers appeare; but when perill indeede comes they get them gone.

These Gracians also that made the retract, adulfed Darius to retire his Armie into the plaine of Mesopotamia, to the end that Alexander being entredinto those large fields and great Champions, he might have invironed the Macedonians on all sides with his multitude; and withall they counselled him to divide that his huge Armie into parts, not committing the whole to one froke of Fortune, whereby he might haue fought many battailes, and haue brought no greater numbers at once then might have beene well marihalled and conducted. But this counfell was fo contrarie to the cowardly affections of the Perfians, as they perfuaded Darius to inuirone the Gracians which gaue the aduise, and to cut them in peeces as Traitors. The infinite wisedome of God dorh not worke alwaies by one and the same way, but very often in the alteration of Kingdomes and Estates, by taking understanding from the Gouernours, so as they can neither give nor discerne of Counsels. For Darius that would needes fight with Alexander upon a straightned prece of ground, neare vnto the Citic of isia, where he could bring no more hands to fight than Alexander could, (who by the aduise of Parmenio stated there, as in a place of best aduantage) was vtterly ouerthrowne, his Treasure lost, his Wife, Mother, and Children (whom the Gracians his followers had perswaded him to leaue in Babylon, or elsewhere) taken prisoners, and all their traine of Ladies spoiled of their rich Garments, Iewels, and Honour, It is true, that both the Queene, with her Daughters, who had the good hap to be brought to Alexanders presence, were entertained with all respect due vnto their birth, their Honours preserved, and their Iewels and rich Garments restored vnto them; and though Darius Wife was a most beautifull Ladie, and his Daughters of excellent forme, Yet Alexander mastred his affections towards them all: only it is reported out of Ariflobulus the Historian, That he imbraced the Wife of the valiant Memnon, her Husband lately dead, who was taken flying from 20 Damafeus by Parmenie, at which time the Daughters of Ochus, who raigned before Darius, and the Wives and Children of all the Nobilitie of Persia in effect, fell into captinitie; At which timealfo Darius Treasure (not lost at Issus) was seized, amounting to fixe thousand and two hundred talents of coine, and of Bullion five hundred talents, with a world of riches belides.

Darius himselfe leaving his brother dead, with diversother of his chiefe Captaines (casting the Crowne from his head) hardly escaped.

After this ouerthrow given vnto Darins, all Phanicis (the Citie of Tyre excepted) was yeelded to Alexander, of which Parmenie was made Gouernour.

Aradus, Zidon, and Biblos, Maritimate Cities of great importance, of which one 20 Strate was King (but hated of the people) acknowledged Alexander. Good fortune followed him so fast that it troade on his heeles, for Intigonus, Alexanders Lieutenant in Afia the leffe, ouerthrew the Cappadocians, Paphlagonians, and others lately revolted; Aristodemus, Darius Admirall, had his Fleet partly taken, and in part drowned by the Macedonians newly leavied; the Lacedamonians that warred against Antipaser were beaten; foure thouland of those Greeks which made the retrait at the last battaile, for faking both the partie of Darius and of Alexander, and led by Amyntas into Agypt, to hold it for themselues, were buried there; for the time was not vet come to dinide Kingdomes.

Siexander, to honour Ephestion, whom hee loued most, gaue him power to dif- 40 pose of the Kingdome of Ziden. A man of a most poore estate, that laboured to suftaine his life, being of the Royall bloud, was commended by the people viito him, who changed his Spade into a Scepter, so as he was beheld both a Beggar and a King in one and the fame houre.

It was a good defire of this new King, when speaking to Alexander, he wisht that hee could beare his prosperitie with the same moderation, and quietnesse of heart, that he had done his aductifitie; but ill done of Alexander, in that he would not performe in himselfe that which hee commended in an other mans desire: for it was a figne that he did but accompanie, and could not gouerne, his felicitie.

While he made some stay in those parts, he received a letter from Darius, impor- 50 ting the ranfome of his Wife, his Mother, and his Children, with some other conditions of peace, but such as rather became a Conqueror, than one that had now been twice sharmefully beaten, not vouchsasting, in his direction, to stile Alexander King. It is true, that the Romans, after that they had received an overthrow by Pyrrhus, returned him a more scornefull answere vpon the offer of peace, than they did betore the triall of his force. But as their fortunes were then in the Spring, fo that of Darius had alreadie cast leafe, the one a resoluted well armed and disciplined Nation. the other cowardly and effeminate. Alexander disdained the offers of Darius, and fent him word that he not only directed his letter to a King, but to the King of Darius himfelfe.

How ALEXANDER believed and wanne the Citie of Twee

LEXANDER comming neare to the Citie of Tyre, received from them the present of a golden Crowne, with great store of victualls, and other prefents, which hee tooke very thankefully, returning them answere That he defired to offer a facrifice to Hercules, the Protector of their Ci-tie, from whom hee was descended. But the Tyrians like not his companie within their Walls, but tell him that the Temple of Hercules was feated in the old Citie adjoyning, now abandoned and defolate: To bee short, Alexander resolved to enter it by force, and though it were a place in all mens opinion impregnable, because the 20 Iland whereon it was built, was eight hundred furlongs from the Maine, yet with the labour of many hands, having great store of stone from the old Tyre, and timber fufficient from Lybanus, hee filled the paffage of the Sea betweene the Iland and the Maine, which being more than once carried away by the strength of the Sea vpon a florme of winde, fornetime by the Tyrians fired, and fornetime torne a-funder, vet with the helpe of his Nauie which arrived (during the fiege) from Cyprus, he ouercame all difficulties and prevailed, after he had front feven Moneths in that attempt: The Tyrians in the beginning of the fiege had barbaroufly drowned the meffengers fent by Alexander, perswading them to render the Citie, in respect whereof, and of the great losse of time and men, he put eight thousand to the sword, and caused 20 two thousand of those, that escaped the first furie, to bee hanged on Croffes on the

him againe. It is true, that it was a notable enterprise and a difficult, but great things are made greater. For Nabuchadanafor had taken it before, and filled up the channell, that lay 40 betweene the Hand and the Maine.

The gouernement of this Territorie he gaue to Philotas, the Sonne of Parmenio: Cilicia, he committed to Socrates, and Andromachus Lieutenant under Parmenio; Ephestion had the charge of the Fleet, and was directed to finde Alexander at Gaza towards Egypt.

How DARIVS offered conditions of peace to ALEXANDER. ALEXANDER winnes Gaza; and deales graciously with the Iewes.

N the meane while Darius fends againe to Alexander, fets before him all the difficulties of passing on towards the East, and laieth the losse of the last battaile to the straightnesse of the place; he hoped to terrifie him, by threatning to incompasse him in the plaine Countries, he bids him consider, how impossible it was to passe the Riners of Euphrates,

Tigris, Araxes, and the relt, with all fuch other fearefull thinges : for, hee that was now filled with nothing but feare, had arguments enough of that nature to prefent vnto another. All the Kingdomes betweene the Riucr of Alys, and the Hellestont, he offered him in Dower with his beloued daughter. But Alexander unswered, That he offered him nothing but his owne, and that which victoric and his owne vertue had poffest him of. That he was to give conditions, and not to receive any; and that he having paffed the Sea it felfe, difdained to thinke of reliflance in transporting himfelfe ouer Rivers. It is faid that Parmenio, who was now old and full of honour and riches, told the King, that were he Alexander hee would accept of Darius his offers, to which Alexander answered, That so would be if he were Parmenia.

nate resolution, at the siege whereof Alexander received a wound in the shoulder, which was dangerous, and a blow on his legge with a stone; Hee found better men in this place than he did at the former battailes, for he left fo many of his Macedonians buried in the fands of Gaza, that he was forft to fend for a new fupply into Greece. Here it was that Alexander first beganne to change condition, and to exercise cruelto Coph. Ant.Liz. tie. For after that he had entred Gaza by affault, and taken Belis, (whom Iolephus calleth Babeme(es) that was weakened with many wounds, and who neuer gaue ground to the Affailants; he bored holes through his feete, and caused him to bee 20 drawne about the streets, whilest he was as yet aliue; who being as valiant a man as himfelfe, difdained to aske him either life or remiffion of his torments. And what had hee to countenance this his tyrannie, but the imitation of his ancestor Achilles, who did the like to Hector? It is true, that crueltie hath alwaies fomewhat to couer

From Gaza (faith Infephus) he led his Armie towards Ierufalem, a Citie, for the antiquitie and great fame thereof, well knowne vnto him while he lay before Tyre; He had fent for some supply thither, which Inddies the high Priest, being subject and fworne to Darius, had refused him. The tewes therefore fearing his revenge, and vnable to relift committed the care of their estates and safetie to laddus, who, being taught by God, iffued out of the Citic couered with his Pontificall-Robes, to wit, an upper garment of purple, embrodered with gold, with his Miter, and the plate of gold wherein the name of God was written the Priefts & Leuites in their rich ornaments, and the people in white garments, in a maner fo vnufuall, flately, and graue, as Alexander greatly admired it. Infephus reports it, that he fell to the ground before the high Prieft, as reverencing the name of God, and that Parmenio reprehended him for it; Howfoeuer it was, I am of opinion, That he became fo confident in his enterprife, and so assured of the successe after the prophecie of Daniel had been read vnto him, wherein he faw himselfe, and the conquest of Persia so directly pointed at, as nothing thence-forth could discourage him or feare him. He confessed to Parmenio 40 (faith Iofephus) That in Dio a Citie of Macedon, when his mind laboured the conquest of Alia, hee faw in his fleepe fuch a person as Inddus, and so apparailed, profesfing one and the same God, by whom he was incouraged to pursue the purpose hee had in hand with affurance of victorie. This apparition, formerly apprehended only by the light of his phantafic, he now beheld with his bodily eies; where with he was fo exceedingly pleased and imboldened, as contrarie to the practice of the Phamicians, (who hoped to have fackt and destroicd Ierufalem) he gave the Iewes all, and more than they defired, both of libertie and immunitie, with permiffion to line vnder their owne lawes, and to exercise and enjoy their owne Religion.

ALEXANDER winnes Agypt: and makes a journie to the Temple of normal Rom serufalem Alexander turned againe towards Agypt, and entred ic, where Darius his Lieutenant, Allages, received him and delivered The bis hand the Citie of Memphis, with eight hundred talents of treature, and all other the Kings riches. By this wee fee that the Kings of Perfia, who had more of affection than of judgement, gaue to the valiantest man hee had but the command of one Citie, and to the veriest co-10 ward the gouernement of all Agypt. When he had fet thinges in order in Agypt, he beganne to trauaile after God bend, towards inputer Hammon, fo foolish had profperitic made him. He was to paffe oner the dangerous and drie fands, where when the water which he brought on his Camels-back was foont, hee could not but have perified, had not a maruailous shower of raine fallen upon him, when his Armie was in extreme despaire, All men that know segget, and have written thereof, affirme, That it neuer raines there; but the purpofes of the Almightie God are feeret, and he bringeth to paffe what it pleafeth him; for it is also said. That when he had loft his way in those vast desarts that a flight of Crowes flew before the Armiewho making falter wing when they were followed, and fluttering flowly when the 20 Armie was cast back, guided them ouer those pathlesse lands to Inputers Temple.

Arrianus from the report of Ptolomie, the sonne of Lague, faires, That hee was led Anian. 13. by two Dragons, both which reports may be a-like true; But many of these wonders and thinges prodigious, are fained by those that have written the Storie of A. lexander, as that an Eagle lay houering directly oner his head at the battaile of this : That a Swallow flew about his head when hee flept, and could not be feared from him, till it had wakened him, at Halicarnaffeus, fore-fliewing the treaton of Aeropus, practifed by Darius to have flaine him; That from the yron barres of which the Tyrians made their defensive ingines, when Alexander belieged them, there fell drops of bloud: and that the like drops were found in a loafe of bread, broken by a Citizen-

20 donish Souldier, at the fame time; That a Turfe of earth fell on his shoulder, when he lay before Gaza, out of which there flew a Bird into the aire. The Spaniards in the conquest of the West-Indies have many such pretic tales; telling how they have been affilted in battaile, by the presence of our Ladie, and by Angels riding on white horses, with the like Romifb miracles, which I thinke themselves doe hardly believe. The ftrangest things that I have read of in this kind being certainely true was. That the night before the battaile at Nounra, all the Dogges which followed the French Armie, ranne from them to the Switzers, leaping and fawning vpon them, as if they had beene bred and fed by them all their lines, and in the morning following, Trinulzi and Tremouille, Generals for Lewis the twelfth, were by these Imperiall Switzers 40 vtterly broken and put to ruine.

The place of this Idoll of Jupiter Hammon is ill described by Curtius, for he bounds it by the Arabian Trogledites on the fouth, between whom and the territorie of Hammen, the Region Thebais, or the Superiour Egypt, with the Mountaines of Lybia, and the River of Wiles, are interjacent, and on the North he joynes it to a Nation, called Nationnes, who bordering the Sca-shore, line (faith hee) vpon the spoiles of shipwrack, whereas the Temple or Groue of this Idoll bath no Sea nearesit by two hundred miles and more, being found on the South part of Lybia; these Mafitmones be- Fold ITalia. ing due Well from it, in the South part of Marmarica.

When Alexander came neare the place, he fent some of his Paralites before him 50 to practife the Priests attending the Oracle, That their answere might be eginen in all thinges, agreeable to his maddeambition, who affected the title of tapiters fonne. And so hee was saluted Sonne of Jupiter by the Deuils Prophet, whether prepared before to flatter him, or rather (as fome thinke) defective in the Greeke tongue; For whereas he meant to fay Opaidion, he faid Opaidios, that is ; O forme of Ingiter, in flead of O aeare jonne: for which Gramaticall error he was richly rewarded, and a rumor presently spread, that the great supster had acknowledged Alexander for his owne.

He had heard that Perfeus and Hereules had formerly confulted with this Oracle, The one, when he was imploied against Gorgon, The other, against Anteus and Busins, and seeing these men had derived themselves from the Gods, why might not hee? By this it feemes, that he hoped to make his followers and the world fooles, though indeede he made himselfe one, by thinking to coner from the Worlds knowledge his vanities and vices; and the better to confirme his followers in the beliefe of his Deitie, hee had practized the Priefts to give answere to such as consulted with the Oracle, that it should be pleasing to Inpiter to honour Alexander as his Sonne.

Who this Ammon was, and how represented, either by a boffe carried in a Boate, or by a Ramme, or a Rammes-head; I fee that many wife-men haue troubled themfelues to finde out; but, as Arrianus speakes of Dienysius, or Liber Pater (who lived faith St. Augustine in Ottofes time,) Ea que de dijs veteres fabulis suis conscripsere non funt nimitum curiose per neftiganda; Wemuft not ouer-curioufly fearch into the fables which the Ancients have written of their Gods.

But this is certaine and notable, that after the Gospell beganne to be preached in the World, the Deuill in this and in all other Idols became speechlesse. For that this Hammon was neglected in the time of Tiberius Cafar, and in the time of Traian altogether forgotten, Strabe and Plutarch witnesse.

There is found neare his Temple a Fountaine called Fons folis (though Ptolomie in his third African Table fets it farther off) that at mid-night is as hot as boiling water, and at Noone as cold as any yee, to which I cannot but gine credit, because I have heard of some other Wells of like nature, and because it is reported by Saint Augustine, by Diodore, Herodotus, Plinie, Mela, Solinus, Arianus, Curtius, and others. and indeede our Bathes in England are much warmer in the night, than in the day.

d. VIII.

How ALEXANDER marching against DARIVS, was opposed very unskillully by the Enemie.

Rom the Temple of Hammon he returned to Mamphis, where among many other learned men he heard the Philosopher Pfammones, who, belike widerstanding that he aftected the title of Impirer Sonne, told him that God was the Father-King of all men in generally and rething the pride of this haughtic King, brought him to fay, That God was the Father of all mortall men, but that hee acknowledged none for his children faue

He gaue the charge of the feuerall Provinces of Agypt to feuerall Gouernours, 40 following the rule of his Master Aristotle, That a great Dominion should not bee continued in the hands of any one: whom therein the Roman Emperours also followed, not daring to commit the gouernement of Agypt to any of their Senators, but to men of meaner ranck and degree. He then gaue order for the founding of Alexandria vpon the Wester-most branch of Nilus. And having now setled (as he could) the estate of Egypt, with the Kingdomes of the leffer Ma, Phanicia, and Syria, (which being but the pawnes of Darius his ill fortune, one happie victorie would readily haue redeemed;) he led his Armie towards Euphrates, which passage though the same was committed to Mazeus to defend, yet was it abandoned, and Alexander without refiftance past it. From thence he marched towards Tigris, a Riner for the swiftnesse 50 thereof called by the Persians The Arrow. Here, as Curtius, and Reason it selfe tells vs, might Darius cafily have repelled the invading Macedonian: for the violent course of the streame was such, as it draue before it many waightie stones, and those that

moued not but lay in the bottome, were foround and well polifhed by continuall rolling, that no man was able to fight on fo slipperie a footing; nor the Macedonian foot-men to wade the Riuer, otherwise than by joyning their handes and enterlacing their Armes together, making one waightie and entire bodie to relift the fwift paffage and furious race of the streame. Besides this notable helpe, the Channell was so deepe towards the Easterne shore, where Darius should have made head, as the foot-men were inforst to lift their Bowes and Arrowes and Darts ouer their heads, to keepe them from being moistned, and made vnseruiceable by the Waters. But it was truely and understandingly faid of Homer.

> Talis est hominum terrestrium mens, Qualis quotidie ducit pater virorumg, Deorumg,

The mindes of men are ever so affected, As by Gods will they daily are directed.

And it cannot be denied, that as all Estates of the World by the surfeit of milgouernement haue beene subject to many grieuous, and sometimes mortall diseases, So had the Empire of Persia at this time brought, it selfe into a burning and consuming Feuer, and thereby become frantick and without understanding, toreshewing 10 manifestly the dissolution and death thereof.

But Alexander hath now recoursed the Easterne shores of Tigris, without any other difficultie, than that of the nature of the place, where Mazeus (who had charge to defend the passage both of Euphrates and it) presented himselfe to the Macedonians, followed with certaine companies of Horse-men, as if with vneuen forces hee durst have charged them on even ground, when as with a multitude farre exceeding them hee forfooke the aduantage which no valour of his enemies could easily haue ouer come. But it is commonly seene, that searefull and cowardly men doe cuer follow those waies, and counsells, whereof the opportunitie is alreadie lost.

It is true that he fet all prouisions a fire wherewith the Macedonians might ferue 20 themselues ouer Tigris, thinking thereby greatly to have distressed them; but the execution of good counfell is fruitlesse when vnscasonable. For now was Alexander fo well furnished with carriages, as nothing was wanting to the competencie of the Armie which he conducted, Those thinges also which he fought to wast, Alexander being now in fight, were by his Horse men saued and recoursed. This, Mazeus might have done some daies before at good leisure; or at this time with so great a strength of horse-men, as the Macedonians durst not have pursued them, leaving the strength of their foote out of fight, and farre behinde.

ARIVS, vpon Alexanders first returne out of Ægypt, had assembled all the forces, which those Regions next him could furnish, and now also were the Arians, Scythians, Indians, and other Nations arrived; Nations (faith Curtius) that rather ferued to make vp the names of men, than to make relistance. Arianus hath numbred them with their Leaders; and finds of foot-men of all forts ten hundred thousand, and of horse 50 foure hundred thousand, besides armed Chariots, and some few Elephants. Cartius who musters the Armie of Darius at two hundred thousand foote, and neare fiftie thousand horse, comes (I thinke) nearer to the true number; and yet seeing he had more confidence in the multitude than in the valour of his Vasfalls, it is like enough that hee had gathered together of all forts fome three or foure hundred thousand, with which hee hoped in those faire plaines of Asyria to have oner-borne the few numbers of the inuading Armic. But it is a Rule in the Philosophie of the Warre.

In omni prelso non tam multitudo, & virtus indocta, quamars & exercitium (olent prastare victoriam; In cuerie battaile skill and practife doe more towards the victorie, than multitude and rude audacitie.

While Alexander gaue rest to his Armie after their passage ouer Tigris, there happened an Eclipse of the Moone, of which the Macedonians, not knowing the cause and reason, were greatly affrighted. All that were ignorant, (as the multitude alwaies are) tooke it for a certaine prefage of their ouerthrow and destruction, in so much as they began not only to murmur, but to speake it boldly, That for the ambition of one man, a man that difdained Philip for his Father, and would needes bee called the Sonne of Impiter, they should all perish; For hee not only infors them to make warre against Worlds of enemies, but against Rivers, Mountaines, and the Heavens themselves.

Hereupon Alexander being readie to march forward made a halt, and to quiet the mindes of the multitude, he called before him the Agyptian Aftrologers, which followed him thence, that by them the Souldiers might bee affured that this defe-Ction of the Moone was a certaine prefage of good successe; for that it was naturall they neuer imparted to the common people, but referred the knowledge to themfelues, fo as a forrie Almanack-maker had beene no small foole in those daies.

Of this kinde of superstitious observation Cesar made good vse, when he sought against Ariouistus and the Germans: for they being persuaded by the casting of lots, that if they fought before the change of the Moone, they should certainely loose the battaile, Cafar forst them to abide it, though they durst not give it, wherein hauing their mindes alreadie beaten by their owne superstition, and being resolutely charged by the Romans, the whole Armie in effect perifhed.

Thele Agyptians gaue no other reason than this, That the Gracians were vnder the aspect of the Sunne, the Persians of the Moone; and therefore the Moone failing and being darkened, the state of Persia was now in danger of falling, and their glorie ot being obscured. This judgement of the Agyptian Pricts being noised through 30 all the Armic, all were fatisfied, and their courage redoubled. It is a principle in the Warre, which, though denifed fince, was well observed then. Exercitum terrore plenum Dux ad pugnam non ducat; Let not a Captaineleade his Armie to the fight, when it is poffesed with matter of terrour,

It is truely observed by Curtius, that the people are led by nothing so much as by fuperstition; yea, we finde it in all Stories, and often in our owne, that by fuch inuentions, deuised tales, dreames, and prophesies, the people of this Land haue beene carried head-long into many dangerous tumults and infurrections, and still to their owne loffe and ruine.

As Alexander drew neare the Persian Armie, certaine letters were surprized writ- 40 ten by Darius to the Gracians, perswading them for great summes of money, either to kill or betray Alexander. But these by the aduice of Parmenio he suppressed.

At this time also Darius his faire Wife, opprest with forrow, and wearied with trauell, died. Which accident Alexander feemed no leffe to bewaile than Darius, who vpon the first brute suspected that some dishonourable violence had beene offered her, but being satisfied by an Eunuch of his owne that attended her, of Alexanders Kingly respect towards her, from the day of her being taken, he desired the immortall Gods, That if they had decreed to make a new Master of the Persian Empire, then it would please them to conferre it on so just and continent an enemie as Alexander, to whom he once againe before the last triall by battaile offered these condi-

That with his Daughter in marriage he would deliuer vp and refigne all Affa the leffe, and with Agypt, all those Kingdomes betweene the Phanician Sea, and the River of Emphrates; That he would pay him for the ransome of his Mother, and his other Daughter thirtie thousand talents, and that for the performance thereof, hee would leave his Sonne Occhus in hostage : To this they fought to perswade Alexancer by fuch arguments as they had. Alexander cauting the Embaffadours to be remoued, adulfed with his Counfell, but heard no man speake but Parmenio, the very meht hand of his good fortune; who perfuaded him to accept of these faire condirions. Hee told him, that the Empire betweene Euphrates and Helleftont was a faire addition to Macedon; that the retayning of the Persian prisoners was a great cumber, and the treasure offered for them of farre better vse than their persons, with divers other arguments; all which Alexander rejected. And yet it is probable to that if he had followed his aduife, and bounded his ambition within thole limits, he might have lived as famous for vertue as for fortune, and left himselfe a Successor of able age to have enjoyed his estate, which afterward, indeed, he much inlarged, rather to the greatning of others than himselfe; who to affure themselus of what they had vsurped you his iffues, left not one of them to draw breath in the world within a few yeares after. The truth is, That Alexander in going fo farre into the Falt, left behinde him the reputation which he brought out of Macedon; the reputation of a just and prudent Prince, a Prince temperate admised and gratefull; and being taught new leffons by aboundance of prosperitie, became a louer of wine, of his owne flatterie, and of extreame crueltie. Yea, as Seneca hath observed, the taint of one vnjust 20 flaughter, amongst many, defaced and withered the flourishing beautie of all his great acts and glorious victories obtained. But the Persian Embassadors stay bis anfwere, which was to this effect, That what soener he had bestowed on the Wife and Children of Darius, proceeded from his owne naturall elemencie and magnanimitie, without all respect to their Master; that thankes to an enemie was improper that he made no warres against aduersitie, but against those that resisted him, Not against Women and Children, but against armed enemies: and although by the reiterated practice of Darius, to corrupt his Souldiers, and by great fummes of money to perfwade his friends to attempt vpon his person, he had reason to doubt that the peace offered was rather pretended than meant, yet hee could not (were it otherwife and 20 faithfull) resolue in hast to accept the same, seeing Darius had made the Warre against him, not as a King with Royall and ouert-force, but as a Traitor by secret and base practices That for the Territorie offered him, it was alreadie his owne, and if Darius could beate him back againe ouer Emphrates, which hee had alreadie past, hee would then beleeve that he offered him somewhat in his owne power: Otherwise he propounded to himselse for the reward of the Warre, which hee had made, all those Kingdomes as yet in Darius possession, wherein, whether he were abused by his owne hopes or no, the battaile which hee meant to fight in the day following should determine. For conclusion, hee told them, that hee came into Mia to give, and not to receive; That the Heavens could not hold two Sunnes: and therefore if 40 Darius could bee content to acknowledge Alexander for his Superiour, hee might perchance bee perswaded to giue him conditions sit for a second Person, and his

The battaile of Arbela: and that it could not bee so strongly sought as report bath made it.

Ith this answer the Embassadors returne; Derius prepares to fight, and fends Mazeus to defend a paffage, which he never yet dared fo much as to hazard. Alexander confults with his Captaines, Parmenio perfivades him to force Darius his Camp by night; fo that the multitude of enemies might not moue terrour in the Micedonians, being but few. Alexander disdaines to steale the victoric, and resolves to bring with him the day-light, to witheffe his valour, But is was the fuccesse that made good Alexanders resolution, though the counsell given by Parmenio was more found : For it is a ground in Warre, Si pauci necessario cum multitudine pugnare cogantur, consilium est noclis tempus belli fortunam tentare. Notwithstanding vpon the view of the multitude at hand, he staggers & intrenches himselfe vpon a ground of aduantage, which the Persian had abandoned: And whereas Darius for seare of surprise had stood with his Armie in armour all the day, and forborne fleepe all the night; Alexander gaue his men reft and flore of foode, for reason had taught him this Rule in the Warre. In pugna Milites validius reliftunt, licibo potuć, refetti fuerint, nam fames intrinfecus magis pugnat, quam ferrum exterius; Souldiers doe the better fland to it in fight; if they 10 have their bellies full of meate and drinke; for hunger within, fights more eagrely than

The numbers which Alexander had, faith Arianus, were fortie thousand foote, and feuen thousand horse; these belike were of the European Armie; for hee had belides both Syrians, Indians, Agyptians, and Arabians, that followed him out of those Regions. He vsed but a short speech to his Souldiers to incourage them; and I thinke that he needed little Rhetorick; for by the two former battailes upon the River of Graniek and in Cilicia, the Micedonians were best taught with what men they were to encounter. And it is a true faying, Victoria Victoriam parat, animuma, victoribus auget, & aduerfarijs aufert; One victoric begets an other, and puts courage in- 20 to those that have alreadie had the better, taking spirit away from such as have beene

Arrianus and Curtius make large descriptions of this battaile, sought at Gaugamela; They tell vs of many charges and re-charges; That the victorie inclined sometime to the Persians, sometime to the Macedonians; That Parmento was in danger of being ouerthrowne, who led the left wing; That Alexanders Reare-guard was broken and his carriages loft; That for the fierce and valorous encounters on both fides, Fortune her felfe was long vnresolued on whom to bestow the Garland: And lastly, That Alexander in person wrought wonders, being charged in his retrait. But, in conclusion, Curtius deliuers vs in accompt but three hundred dead Macedonians, in 30 all this terrible daies-worke; faying, That Ephestien, Perdiccas, and others of name, were wounded. Arrianus findes not a third part of this number flaine; of the Perfians there fell fortie thousand (saith Curtius,) thirtie thousand according to Arrianus: Ninetie thousand, if we beleeue Diodor. But what can we judge of this great encounter, other than that, as in the two former battailes, the Persians upon the first charge ranne away, and that the Macedonians purfued? For if of these foure or fine hundred thousand Asians brought into the field by Darius, enery man had but cast a Dart, or a Stone, the Macedonians could not have bought the Empire of the East at so easie a rate, as fixe or feuen hundred men in three notorious battailes. Certainely, if Darius had fought with Alexander vpon the bankes of Euphrates, and had armed but fiftie 40 or threescore thousand of this great multitude, only with Spades (for the most of all he had were fit for no other weapon) it had beene impossible for Alexander to have past that River so casily, much lesse the River of Tigris. But as a man whose Empire God in his providence had determined, Hee abandoned all places of advantage, and fuffered Alexander to enter fo far into the bowells of his Kingdome, as all hope and possibilitie of escape by retrait being taken from the Macedonians, they had presented vnto them the choife, either of death or victorie; to which election Darius could no way constraine his owne, seeing they had many large Regions to runne into from those that inuaded them.

of thinges following the battaile of Arbela. The yeelding of Babylon and Sufa.

ARIVs after the rout of his Armie recoursed Arbela the fame night, better followed in his flight, than in the fight. He propounded vnto them that ranne after him his purpole of making a retrait into Medis, perswading them that the Macedonians, greedie of spoile and riches, would eather attempt Palating a Company of the second o ches, would rather attempt Babylon, Sufa, and other Cities, filled with treasure, than pursue the vanquished. This miserable resolution his Nobilitie rather obeied than approued.

Alexander soone after Darius his departure arrives at Arbela; which with a great masse of treasure, and Princely ornaments, was rendred vnto him: for the seare which conducted Darius tooke nothing with it but shame and dishonour. Hee that had beene twice beaten, should rather have sent his treasure into Media, than brought it to Arbela, so neare the place where he abid the comming of his enemies; if he had beene victorious he might have brought it after him at leifure, but being ouer come, hee knew it vnpoffible to drive Mules and Cammels laden with gold 20 from the pursuing Enemie, feeing himselfe, at the ouerthrow hee had in Cilicia, cast the Crowne from his head to runne away with the more speede. But errours are then best discerned when most incurable. Et praterita magis reprehends possunt quam corrigi; It is easier to reprehend than amend what is past.

From Arbela Alexander tooke his way towards Babylon, where Mazeus in whom Darius had most considence rendred himselfe, his children and the Citic. Also the Captaine of the Castle, who was keeper of the treasure, strewed the streetes with flowers, burnt franckinsence vpon Altars of silver as Alexander passed by, and deliucred vnto him what soener was committed to his trust. The Mags (the Chaldean Astrologers) followed this Captain in great solemnitie to entertaine their new King: 30 after these came the Babylonian horsemen, infinite riche in attire, but exceeding poore in warlike furniture. Betweene these (though not greatly to be feared) and himselfe, Alexander caused his Macedonian foote-men to march. When hee entred the Castle hee admired the glorie thereof, and the aboundance of treasure therein found amounting to fiftie thousand talents of filuer vncoyned. The Citie it selfe I have elsewhere described with the Walles, the Towers, the Gates and the Circuite, with the wonderfull place of pleasure about two miles in Circuite, surrounded with a Wall of fourescore foote high, and on the toppe theteof (being vnder-borne with Pillars) a Groue of beautifull and fruitfull trees, which it is faid that one of the Kings of Babylon caused to be built, that the Queene and other Princesses might 40 walke privately therein. In this Citie, rich in all things but most of all in Voluptuous pleasures, the King rested himselfe and the whole Armie foure and thirtie daies, And the consuming that time in banqueting and in all sorts of effeminate exercise, which so much softened the mindes of the Macedonians, not acquainted till now with the like delicacies, as the seuere discipline of warre which taught them the sufferances of hunger and thirst, of painefulltrauaile, and hard lodging, began rather to be forgotten, than neglected. Heere it was that those bands of a thousand Souldiers were erected, & Commanders appointed ouer them, who thereupon were stiled Chiliarchi. This new order Alexander brought in, was to honor those Captaines which were found by certain 50 selected Judges to have deserved best in the late warre. For before this time the Macedoman companies confifted but of fine hundred. Certainely the drawing downe of the foote-bands in this latter age bath beene the cause (saith the Marshal Monluet) that the title and charge of a Captaine hath beene bestowed on every Picque Benf or Spurn-Cow, for when the Captaines of foote had a thouland Souldiers under one imagne, and effer that hue hundred, as in the time of Francis the first, the title was bonorable and the Kings were leffe charged, and farre better ferued. King Henrie the eighth of England neuergaue the commandement of any of his good

Inippes, but to men of knowne valour, and of great effate, nay fometime he made two Gentlemen of qualitie commanders in one thip: but all orders and degrees are fallen from the reputation they had.

While Alexander was yet in Babylon, there came to him agreat supply out of Enrefe, for Artipuer fant him isse thousand foote and fine hundred horse, out of Macedon, of Thracians three thouland foote and the like number of horse, and out of Greece fourethousand toose and foure hundred borse, by which his Armie was greatly 10 firengthned : for those that were insected with the pleasures of Babylon could hardly be brought againe, Lequiner la plume for dermir for ladure; Tochange from foft be b to bar ; bands.

Helefi the Cast'e and Citic of Eabylen with the Territories about it in charge vnto three of his owne Captaines, delinering withall into their handes to fupply al wants a thousand talents; but to grace Mazeus who rendred the citie vnto him, he gaue him the title of his Lieutenant ouer all, and tooke with him Bagiflines that game up the Cafile, and having diffributed to every Souldiera part of the Treafure, he left B drifon and entred into the Province Satrapene: from thence he went on towards Sufa in Perfa, the fame which Ptolomie, Herodotus, and Elianus call Memno- 20 nia, fytuate on the river Enless, a Citie fometime governed by Daniel the prophet. Abulites a fo, governour of this famous Citte gave it vp to the Conquerer with liftie thousand talents of filter in bullion, and twelve Elephants for the warre, with all o-Distorfeeaketh ther the treasures of Davius. In this fort did those Vassalls of fortune, louers of the Dia bar peaketh of more than Kings prosperatie, not of his person (for so all ambitious menare) purchase their

tension non While Alexander spoiled Arbeit, Nazens might have surinisht his owne King from nine Million Baltrion, and while he staid foure and thirtie dates at Baltrion, Abulites might have hol-While Alexander spoiled Arbela, Mazeus might have furnisht his owne King from of coined gold- pen him from Sufa: and while he feathed there, Tiridates from Perfepolis might have reficued him: for the great masse of treasure was laid up in that Citie. But who 30 hath fought out and friended fearcfull advertitie? It is certaine, that benefits binde not the ambitious, but the honest for those that are but preedic of themselues, doe in all changes of fortune only studie the conservation of their owne greatnesse.

And therefore was Alexander well adulfed, that what socuer titles he gaue to the Perpans, yet he left all places of importance in trust with his owne Captaines, to wit, Babylon, Sula, and Perfepolis, with other Cities and Provinces by him conquered; for if Darius (as yet living) had beaten the Muccionians but in one battell, all the Nobilitie of Persa would have returned to their natural Lord. Those that are Traitors to their owne Kings are neuer to beeyfed alone in great enterprifes by those Princes that entertaine them, nor over to be trufted with the defences of any fron-40 tier-Towne, or Fortresse of waight, by the rendring whereof they may redeeme their libertic and effates loft.

Hereof the French had experience, when Don Petro de Monarra, being banished out of Spaine, was trufted with Fontarabe, in the yeare 1523.

It is faid, that Charles the fifth having promifed Charles of Bourbon the governe-

ment of M. rfeilles, if he could have forth it, and whereof he made fure accompt, told fome of his nearest Counsellers, that hee meant nothing lesse than the performance of that promife, because hee should thereby have left the Duke (revolted from his Master) very well wherewithall to have recovered his favour.

The government of Sufa, with the Castle and Treasure, Accorder comitted to 50 his owne Mucedonians, making Abulites who rendred it vnto him his Lieutenant, as he had done Mazeus and others, in giving them Titles, but neither trust nor power; for he left three thousand old Souldiers in Garrison to assure the place; and Davius his Mother and her children to repose themselves.

à. XII.

How ALEXANDER came to Persepolis, and burnt it.

Rom Susa Alexander leadeth his Armic toward Persepolis, and when he fought to passe those Mountaines which funder Susiana and Perfia, hee was foundly beaten by driobarcanes, who defended against him those Straights, called Pyla Persidis, or Susaides, and after the losse of many Companies of his Macedonians, he was forst to saue himselfe

by retrait, causing his foote to march close together, and to couer themselues with their T argets from the stones tumbled on them from the Mountaine-top. Yet in the end he found out an other path, which a Lycian, liuing in that Countrie, disconered vnto him, and came thereby fuddenly in view of Ariobarzanes, who being inforst to fight vpon euenground, was by Alexander broken, whereupon hee fled to Persepolis, but (after that they of Persepolis had refused to receive him) hee returned and gaue a second charge vpon the Macedonians, wherein he was slaine. In like manner did King Francis the first, in the yeare 1515. finde a way ouer the Alpes, the Smitzers undertaking to defend all the paffages, who, if their footmanship had not faued them vpon the Kings descent on the other side, they had beene ill paied for 20 their hard lodging on those Hils.

Foure thousand Greekes, faith Curtius, ( Iustine numbers them but at eight hundred) having beene taken prisoners by the Persians, presented themselves to Alexander now in fight of Persepolis. These had the barbarous Persians so maimed and defaced, by cutting off their Hands, Noses, Eares, and other Members, as they could no way have beene knowne to their Countrie-men, but by their voices; to each of these Alexander gaue three hundred Crownes, with new garments, and such Lands as they liked to liue vpon.

Tiridates, one of Darius his false-hearted Grandes, hearing of Alexanders approch, made him know that Persepolis was readie to receive him, and praied him to double 30 his pace, because there was a determination in the people to spoile the Kings treafure. This Citie was abandoned by many of her Inhabitants vpon Alexanders arriuall, and they that staied followed the worst counsell, for all was left to the libertie of the Souldiers, to spoile and kill at their pleasure, There was no place in the world at that time, which, if it had beene laied in ballance with Perfepo'rs, would have waighed it downe. Babylon, indeede, and Sula, were very rich; but in Perlepolis lay the bulke and maine Rore of the Persians. For after the spoile that had beene made of money, curious plate, bullion, Images of gold and filuer, and other jewells; there remained to Alexander himselfe one hundred and twentie thousand talents. He left the same number of three thousand Macedonians in Persepolis, which he had done in AO Sufa, and gaue the fame formall honour to the Traitor Tiridates, that he had done to Abulites; but he that had the trust of the place was Micarides, a creature of his owne. The bodie of his Armichee left here for thirtie daies, of which the Commanders were Parmenio and Craterus, and with a thouland horse and certaine troupes of chosen foote, he would needes view in the Winter-time those parts of Persia, which the Snow had coursed; a fruit leffe and foolish enterprise, but as Seneca faics: Nonilleire vult, fed non potest ftare ; He hath not a will to goe, but he is unable to fland still. It is said and spoken in his praise, That when his Souldiers cried out against him, because they could not indure the extreame frost, and make way, but with extreme difficultie, through the snow, that Alexander for sooke his horse, and led them the way. But

50 what can bee more ridiculous than to bring other men into extreamitie, thereby to fliew how well himselfe can indure it? His walking on soote did no otherwise take off their wearinesse that followed him, than his sometime for bearing to drinke did quench their thirst, that could lesse indure it. For mine owne little judgement I shall rather commend that Captaine, that makes carefull provision for those that follow him, and that leckes wilely to preuent extreme necefficie, than those witlesse arrogant fooles, that make the vaint of hauing indured equally with the common-Souldier, as if that were a matter of great glorie and importance.

We finde in all the Warres that Cafar made, or the best of the Roman Commanders, that the prouision of victualls was their first care. For it was a true saying of Coligni, Admirall of France; That who so will shape that beass (meaning Warre) must beginne with his besite.

But Alexander is now returned to Persepolis, where those Historians, that were most amorous of his vertues, complaine, that the opinion of his valour, of his liberalitie, of his elemencie, towards the vanquished, and all other his Kingly conditions, 10 were drowned in drinke; That he smothered in carrowsing cups all the reputation of his actions past, and that by descending, as it were, from the reuerend T brone of the greatest King, into the companie and familiaritie of base Harlots, he beganne to be despited both of his owne and all other Nations. For being perswaded, when he was inflamed with wine, by the infamous Strumpet Thais, he caused the most sumpruous and goodly Castle and Citie of Persepolis, to bee consumed with fire, notwithstanding all the arguments of Parmenio to the contrarie, who told him that it was a dilhonour to deliroy those thinges by the perswasions of others, which by his proper vertue and force he had obtained; and that it would be a most strong personafion to the Asians, to thinke hardly of him, and thereby aliene their hearts: For they 20 might well beleeue that hee which demolished the goodliest Ornaments they had, meant nothing leffethan (after such valtation) to hold their possession. Ferevinslentiam crudelitas fequitur; Crucltie doth commonly follow drunkennesse: For so it fell out foone after, and often in Alexander.

d. XIII. The Treason of Bess vs against Darivs. Darivs his death.

Bout this time he received a new fupply of Souldiers out of Cilicia, and goes on to finde Davius in Media. Davius had there compounded his fourth and laft Armie, which he meant to have increafed in Badvia, had he not heard of Alexanders comming on, with whom (trufting to fuch companies as hee had, which was numbred at thirtie or fortie thousand) he determined once agains to trichis fortune. Hee therefore calls together his Captains and Commanders, and propounds vnto them his refolution, who being desperate of good successe vsed silence for a while. Artabazau, one of his eldest men of Warre, who had fometime lived with Philip of Macedon, brake the yee, and protesting that hee could neuer be beaten by any aduersitic of the Kings, from the 40 faith which he had euer ought him, with firme confidence, that all the rest were of the same disposition (whereof they likewise affured Darius by the like protestation) he approved the Kings resolution. Two only, and those the greatest, to wit, Naburzanes, and Bessus, whereof the latter was Governour of Bactria, had conspired against their Master, and therefore adulsed the King to lay a new foundation for the Warre, and to purfue it by some such person for the present, against whom neither the Godsnor Fortune had in all things declared themselves to becan enemie: this preamble Naburzanes vied, and in conclusion admised the election of his fellow Traitor Beffus, with promife that, the warres ended, the Empire should again be restored to Darius. The King swollen with disdaine prest towards Naburganes to have flaine so him, but Beffus and the Bactrians whom he commanded, being more in number than the rest, with-held him. In the meane while Naburzanes with-drew himselfe, and Besses followed him, making their quarter a-part from the rest of the Armie. Artabazas, the Kings faithfull feruant, perswaded him to be aduised, and serue the time, [Geingt_Acksim_crws at hand, and that hee would at leaft make thew of forgetting the offence marle, which the King being of a gentle diffolition willingly yeelded vnto. Beful max's his fubmiffion and attends the King, who remoues his Armic. Patron, who commanded a Regiment of foure thouland Greeker, which had in all the former battailes Green Darius with great fidelities, and alwaies made the retrait in fright of the Chleschomus, offered himfelit to gund his perfon, protelling against the treation of Beful, but it was not in his definie to follow their adulce, who from the beginning of the Warre gauch him faithfull counfell, but hee inclined lill to Beful, alwander, and practified the diufilion of his faithfull Greants. Beful had drawner.

10 Alexander, and practifed the divition of his faithfull feruants. Beffin had drawne with him thirtie thousand of the Armie, promiting them all those thinges, by which the lowers of the world and themselues, are wont to be allured, to wit, riches, safetie, and honour.

Now the day following Darius plainely diffcourred the purpose of Beffus, and being our-come with pallion, as thinking himfelfe vnable to make head against these wagaractfull and vinnaturall Traitors, he praised Ariabacus his fathfull feruant to depart from him, and to prouide for himfelte. In like fort he discharged the creft of his attendants, all faue a few of his Emmels; for his guards had voluntarily abandoned him, His Persians being most base cowards, durit not vndertake his desence

20 againft the Bactrions, notwithflanding that they had foure thousand Greekes to joyne yith him, who had beeneable to have beaten both Nations. But it is true, that him, which forfakes himselfe, no man followes. It had beene farrer more manilike and King-like, to have died in the head of those fourethousand Greekes, which offered him the disposition of their lines, (to which Artahesus perfusaded him) than to have lien bewarding himselfe on the ground, and suffering himselfe to bee bound like a flaue by those ambitious Monsters that laied hand on him, whom neither the consideration of his former great chate, nor the honors he had ginen them, norther trult reposed in them, northe world of benefits bestowed on them, could moue to pittle: no, nor his present adversitie, which aboue all thinges should have 30 moued them, could pierce their viperous and vagratefull hearts. Vaincie was indeed to hope it, for initidelitie hath no compaffion.

Now Darius; thus for fiken, was bound and laied in a Cart, couered with hides of boths, to the end charby any other ornament he might not bee diffeouered; and to adde defpight and derifion to his aduerlitie, they faftened him with chaines of gold, and fo drew him on among their ordinarie carriages and Carts. For Refluend Actions and Action to the control of the provided themselves to redeeme their lives and the Provinces they held either by delivering him a prisoner to Accounter, or if that hope failed to make themselves Kings by his flaughter, and then to defend themselves by force of Armes. But they failed in both for it was againft the nature of God, who is most just, to part of the price of the p

Of THALESTRIS Queene of the Amazons; where, by way of digression it is shewed, that such Amazons have beene, and are.

Ere it is faid, that Thaiestris or Minothes, a Queene of the Amazones, came to vilite him, and her fute was, (which shee easily obtayned) That shee might accompanie him till shee were made with child by him: which done (refuling to follow him into Incia) thee returned into her owne Countrie.

Plutareh citeth many Hiltorians, reporting this meeting of Thalestris with Alexander, and some contradicting it. But, indeede, the letters of Alexander himselfe to Ancipater, recounting all that befell him in those parts, and yet omitting to make mention of this Amazonian bulinesse, may justly breede suspition of the whole matter as forged. Much more justly may we suspect it as a vaine tale, because an Hifiorian of the same time reading one of his bookes to Lysmachus (then King of 20 Thrace) who had followed Alexander in all his voiage; was laught at by the King for inferting fuch newes of the Amazons, as Lyfimachus himfelte had neuer heard of. One that accompanied Alexander tooke vpon him to write his acts; which to amplific, He told how the King had fought fingle with an Elephant, and flaine it. The King hearing fuch fluffe, caught the booke, and threw it into the River of indus; faying, that it were well done to throw the writer after it, who by inferring such fables disparaged the truth of his great exploits. Yet as wee beleeue and know that there are Elephants, though it were falle that Alexander fought with one; fo may we give credit vnto writers, making mention of fuch Amazon, whether it were true or false that they met with Alexander; as Plutarch leaves the matter undetermined. 30 Therefore I will here take leaue to make digreffion, as well to flow the opinions of the ancient Hiltorians, Cosmographers, and others, as also of some moderne discouerers touching these warlike Women, because not only Strabe, but many others of the feour times make doubt, whether, or no, there were any fuch kinde of people. Julius Solinus feates them in the North parts of Alia the leffe. Pom. Mela finds two Regions filled with them; the one, on the River Thermodoon; the other, neare the soline 27, et 65 Caspian Sca; Quas (saith hee) Sauromatidas appellant; Which the people call Sauromati- Libra das. The former of these two had the Cimerians for their Neighbours; Certum est (faith Vadianus, who hath Commented upon MELA) illus proximos Amazonibus fuisse; It is certaine that the Cimerian's were the next Nations to the Amazones. PTOLOMIE 40 fets them farther into the Land North-wards, neare the Mountaines Hippaci, not Puls. farre from the Pillars of Alexander. And that they had Dominion in Alia it felfe Alexander. toward India, Solinus and Plinie tells vs ; Where they gouerned a people called the Pandeans, or Padeans, fo called after Pandea the Daughter of Hercules, from whom all the rest derine themselves. Claudian affirmes, That they commanded many Nations: For he speakes (largely perhaps as a Poet) thus.

d. XIIII. How ALEXANDER purfued BESSVS, and tooke into his grace DARIVS his Captaines,

T was now hoped by the Macedonians, that their tranclls were neare an end, euery man preparing for his returne. Hereof when alexander had knowledge, hee was greatly grieued; for the bounded earth fufficed not his boundleffe ambition. Many arguments hee therefore vsed to draw on his Armie farther into the East, but that which had most strength was, that Bessus, a most cruell Traitor to his Master Darius, hauing at his denotion the Hyrcanians, and Bactrians, would in short time (if the Macedonians should returne) make himselfe Lord of the Persian Empire, and enjoy the fruits of all their former trauailes. In conclusion, hee wanne their consents to goe on: which done, leaning Craterus with certaine Regiments of foot, and Amyntas with fixe thousand Horse in Parthenia, hee enters not without some opposition into Hyreania; for the Mardons, and other barbarous Nations, defended certaine passages for a while. Hee passeth the River of Zioberis, which taking beginning in 40 Parthia dissolues it selfe in the Caspian Sea : it runneth under the ledge of Mountaines, which bound Parthia and Hyrcania, where hiding it felfe under ground for three hundred furlongs, it then rifeth againe and followeth its former course. In Zadracarta or Zendracarta, the same Citie which Ptolomic writes Hyrcania, the Metropolis of that Region , hee rested sisteene daies, banquetting , and feasting therein.

Phataphernes, one of Darius his greatest Comanders, with other of his best followers, submit themselves to Alexander, and were restored to their places and governements. But of all other he graced Artabazus most highly for his approved & constant faith to his Master Darius. Artabazus brought with him ten thousand and fine hun- 50 dred Greekes, the remainder of all those that had served Darius; He treats with Alexander for their pardon, before they were yet arrived, but in the end they render them sclues simply without promise or composition: he pardons all but the Lacedemonians, whom he imprisoned, their Leader having flaine himselfe. Hee was also wrought,

Diogorus Siculus hath heard of them in Lybia, who were more ancient (faith hee) than those which kept the bankes of Thermodoon, a River falling into the Euxine

Herodotis doth also make report of these Amazons, whom hee tells withat the Southing call . Earpatas, which is as much as Viricidas, or Men-killers. And that they made incuriioninto Alathe leffe, fackt Ephefus, and burnt the Temple of Diana. Manethon and Auentinus report, which they performed fortic yeares after Troy was Enried 1.12 taken. At the flege of Troy it felfe wee reade of Penthefiles. That flee came to the fuccour of Priamus.

Am. Marcellinus gives the cause of their inhabiting upon the river of Thermodoon, 10 L.22.C.T. focaking confidently of the Warresthey made with divers Nations, and of their onerthrow.

Plus arch in the life of Thefeus, out of Philochorus, Hellanicus, and other ancient Hiflorians, reports the taking of Antiopa Queene of the Amazons by Hercules, and by him given to Thefens, though some affirme, That Thefens himselfe got her by stealth when thee came to visit him aboord his thip. But in substance there is little difference; all confessing. That such Amazons there were. The same Author in the life of Pompey focakes of certaine companies of the Amazons, that came to aide the Albanians against the Romans, by whom, after the battaile, many Targets and Buskins of theirs were taken vp : and he faith farther, That thefe women entertaine the 29 Gela and Lelages once a yeare, Nations inhabiting betweene them and the Aba-

But to omit the many Authors, making mention of Amazons that were in the old Hillor, Ind. part, times, Fran. Lopez who hath written the nauigation of Orellana, which he made down the River of Amazons from Peru, in the yeare 1542. (vpon which River, for the diners turnings, he is faid to have failed fixe thousand miles) reports from the relation of the faid Orellana, to the Councell of the Indies, That hee both faw those women and fought with them, where they fought to impeach his paffage towards the Eaft-

It is also reported by Viricus Schmidel, that in the yeare 1542. where he failed up 30 the Rivers of Paragna and Parabol, that he came to a King of that Countrie, called Scherues, inhabiting under the Tropick of Capricorne, who gaue his Captaine Ernando Rieffere, a Crowne of filuer, which hee had gotten in fight from a Oucene of the Amazons in those parts.

Ed. Lopes, in his description of the Kingdome of Congo, makes relation of such Amazons, telling vs, That (agreeable to the reports of elder times) they burne off their right breaft, and live a-part from men, faue at one time of the yeare, when they feaft and accompanie them for one moneth. These (saith he) possesse a part of the Kingdome of Monomotapa in Africa, ninetcene degrees to the Southward of the line : and that these women are the strongest guards of this Emperour, all the East Indian Por- 40

I have produced these authorities, in part, to instific mine owne relation of these Amazons, because that which was delivered mee for truth by an ancient Collect. of Guiana, how vpon the River of Papamena (fince the Spanish discoveries called Amazons) that these women still line and gouerne, was held for a vaine and vnprobable report.

How ALEXANDER fell into the Persians Luxurie : and how hee further purfued BESSVS.

Ow as Alexander had begunne to change his conditions after the taking of Persepolis: fo at this time his prosperitie had so much overwrought his vertue, as he accompted elemencie to bee but basenesse, and the temperance which he had vsed all his life-time, but a poore and dejected humor, rather becomming the instructors of his youth, than the condition and state of so mightie a King, as the world could not equall. For he perfwaded himfelfe that he now represented the greatnesse of the Gods; hee was pleafed that those that came before him, should fall to the ground and adore him; hee ware the Robes, and garments of the Persians, and commanded that his Nobilitic should doe the like; hee entertained in his Court, and Campe, the same shamelesse rabble of Curtisans, and Sodomitical Eunuchs, that Darius had done, and imitated in all thinges the proude, voluptuous, and detelled manners of the Persiens, whom he had vanquilhed. So licentious is felicitie, as not with flanding that he was fully perfwaded, that the Gods, whom he ferued (detelting the vices of the inan uaded) affifted him in all attempts against them, he himselfe contrarie to the religion he profest (which how Idolatrous soeuer it were, could not be but searcfull vnto him by neglecting it) became by imitation, and not by ignorance or education, a more foule and fearefull Monster than Darius, from whose tyrannic he vaunted to have delivered fo many Nations. Yea those that were dearest and nearest vnto him, began to be ashamed of him, entertaining each other with this, and the like scornefull discourse, That Alexander of Macedon was become one of Darius his licentious Courtiers: That by his example the Macedonians were in the end of fo many trauailes more impourrished in their vertues, than inriched by their victories; and that it was hard to judge whether the Conquerors, or the conquered were the bafer 20 flaues. Neither were these opinions so reserved, but that the noise of them came to his eares. He therefore with great gifts fought to pacific the better fort, and those of whose judgements he was most jealous; and making it knowne to the Armie that Bessis had assumed the title of a King, and called himselfe Artaxerxes, and that hee had compounded a great Armie of the Bactrians, and other Nations, hee had arguments enough to perswade them to goe on, to the end that all alreadic gotten, might not with themselues (so farre ingaged) be cast away. And because they were pestered with the spoiles of so many Cities, as the whole Armie seemed but the guard of their carriages, (not much valike the warfare of the French) having commanded euery mans fardells to be brought into the market-place, he together with his owne, 40 caused all to bee consumed with fire. Certainely, this could not but have proved most dangerous vnto him, seeing the common-Souldiers had more interest in these thinges, which they had bought with their painefull trauailes, and with their bloud; than in the Kings ambition; had not (as Senera often observed) his happie temeritie ouer-come all thinges. As he was in his way, newes came to him that Satribarzanes, whom he had established in his former gouernement ouer the Arrians, was revolted, whereupon leaving the way of Bacteria, he fought him out, but the Rebell hearing of his comming fled to Beffus with two thousand Horse. Hee then went on towards Bellius, and by letting a great pile of wood on fire with the aduantage of a ftrong winde, wonne a paffage ouer a high and vnaccessable Rock, which was de-50 fended against him with thirteene thousand foote. For the extremitie of the flame and smoke forced them from the place, otherwise innincible. I saw in the third ciuill Warre of France certaine caues in Languedoc, which had but one entrance, and that very narrow, cut out in the mid-way of high Rocks, which we knew not how to enter by any ladder or engine, till at last by certaine bundells of strawler downe by an yron chaine, and a waightie stone in the middest, those that defended it were so smothered, as they rendred themselves with their plate, monie, and other goods therein hidden. There were also, some three yeares before my arrivall in Guiana, three hundred Spaniar ds well mounted, smothered to death, together with their Horses, by the Countrie people, who did set the long drie-graffe on fire to the castward of them, (the winde in those parts being alwaies East) so as notwithstanding their flying from the fmoke, there was not any one that escaped. St John Borrowes alfo, with a hundred English, was in great danger of being loftat Margarita, in the tivil-Indies, by having the graffe fired behinde him, but the fmoke being timefully discoursed, hee reconcred the Sen-thore with the losse of fixteene of his 10 men. I remember these thinges, but to give caution to throse that shall in times to come inuade any part of those Countries, that they alwaies, before they passe into the Land, burne downe the graffe and fedge to the East of them; they may otherwife, without any other enemie than a handfull of firaw feton fire, die the death of honnie-Bees, burnt out of the Hine.

ò. XVII.

A conspiracie against ALEXANDER. The death of PHILOTAS

LEXANDER was after he parted hence no where refifted, till he came into Aija, to the Ealt of Baccria, wherethe chiefe Citie of that Prouince, called Articosns, was a while defended against him, by the re-uolt of Sartibarzones, but in the end hee received the Inhabitants to mercie. At this place his Armie was re-enforced with a new supply of five thousand and five hundred foote, and neare five hundred Horse, out of Greece, Theffalie, and other places. His journie out of Perfix into these parts is very confusedly described. For having (as all his Hillorians tellys) a determination to finde Besses in Builria, he leaves it at the very entrance, and cakes the way of Hyrania; from thence 30 hee wanders Northward towards the obscure Mardi, upon the Caspian-Sea, and thence ouer the Mountaines Corones into Ain, and Drangiana.

At this time it was that the treafon of Dinanas brake out, of which Philotas the fonne of Parmenie was accused, as accessarie, if not principall. This Diminus, having (I know not you what ground) confined with time others againft the life of Alexander, went about to draw Alexanders, a young man whom he loued, into the fame treason. The youth, although he was lift bound by oath to secrecie, when he heard so foule a matter vitered, beganne to protest against it so vehemently, that his friend was like to have flaine him for fecuritie of his owne life. So conftrained by feare, hee made thew as if hee had beene wonne by perfuation, and by feeming at 40 length to like well of the bufineffe, hee was told more at large what they were, that had undertaken it. There were nine orten of them, all men of ranke; whose names Dimmus (to countenance the enterprise) reckoned up to Nicomachus. Nicomachus had no fooner freed himfelfe from the companie of this Traitor Dimput, than he acquainted his owne brother Ceballinus with the whole Historie; whereupon it was agreed betweene them, that Ceballinus (who might with leaft (uspition) should goe to the Court and vtter all. Ceballinus, meeting with Philosos, told him the whole bufinesse; desiring him to acquaint the King therewith: which hee promised to doe, but did not. Two daies pailed, and Philotas never brake with the King about the matter; but fall excused himselfe to Cehallinus by the Kings want of leisure. This 50 his coldnesse bred suspition, and caused Ceballinus to addresse himselfe to another, one Sterron, keeper of the Kings Armorie, who forth-with brought him to Alexanderspresence. Alexander, finding by examination what had passed betweene Coballings and Platetas, did fully perfuade himfelfe that this concealement of the trea-fon argued his hand to have beene in the bulinesse. Therefore when Dimnus was brought before him, he asked the Traitor no other question than this : Wherein have I so offended thee, that thou shouldest thinke PHILOTAS more worthies abe King than I? Dimnus perceiuing, when he was apprehended, how the matter went, had fo wounded him felfe that hee lived no longer than to give his laft groane in the Kings prefence. Then was Philotas called, and charged with the fulpition which his filence might justly breede. His answere was, That when the practife was reuealed unto him by Nicom schus, he judging it to be but friuolous, did forbeare to acquaint Alexander therewithall, vntill he might have better information. This errour of his, (if to it were only an errour) although Alexander, for the notorious feruices of his Father Parmenia, of his brother Nicanor lately dead, and of Philotas himselfe, had freely pardoned and given him his hand for affurance; yet by the infligation of Craterus, hee againe swallowed his Princely promise, and made his enemies his Indges : Curtius gives a note of Craterus in this bufineffe; How hee perfivaded himfelfe, that he could never finde a better occasion to oppresse his private enemie, than by pretending pietie and dutie towards the King. Hercofa Poet of our owne hath given a note as much better as it is more generall in his Philotas.

See how these great men cloathe their prinate hate, In these faire colours of the publike good, And to effect their ends, pretend the State, As if the State by their affection flood, And arm'd with power and Princes jealoufies, Will put the leaft conceit of discontent Into the greatest ranke of treacheries, That no one action shall seeme innocent; Yeavalour, honour, bountie, shall be made As accessaries vnto ends vnjust: And euen the fernice of the State must lade The needfull'it undertaking with distrust, So that base vilenesse; idle Luxurie, Seeme fafer farre, than to doe worthily, &c.

Now although it were fo that the King, following the adulfe of Craterus; had refolged the next day to put Philatas to torment, yet in the very evening of the fame night in which he was apprehended, he called him to a banquet, and discourfed as familiarly with him as at any other time. But when in the dead of the night Philotas was taken in his lodging, and that they which hated him beganne to binde him; he cried out upon the King in these wordes : O A LEXANDER, the malice of mine

40 Enemies bath (us mounted thy mercie, and their hatred is farre more constant than the word of a King. Many circumflances were viged against him by Alexander himselfe; (for the Kings of Macedon did in person examine the accusations of treason) and this was nor the least (not the least offence, indeede, against the Kings humour, who desired to be glorified as a God) That when Alexander wrote vnto him concerning the title given him by Jupiter Hammon; He answered, That he could not but rejoyce that he was admitted into that facred Fellowship of the Gods, and yet hee could not but withall grieue for those that should line under such a one as would exceede the nature of man. This was (faith Alexander) a firme perfivation vnto me, that his heart was changed, and that hee held my glorie in despight. See what a strange Monster

50 flatterie is, that can perfuade Kings to kill those that doe not praise and allow those thinges in them, which are of all other most to be abhorred. Philot, is was brought before the multitude to heare the Kings Oration against him: he was brought forth in vilde garments, and bound like a Theefe; where hee heard himfelfe, and his abfent Father the greatest Captaine of the World, accused, his two other Brothers

Hetter and Ayesmor having beene loft in the prefent Warre. Hee was 6 greatly oppreft with griefe as for a while he could vtere nothing but tears, and forrow had fo waited his jirits as hee funke wider those that led him. In the end the King asked him in what language he would make his defence; he answered, In the same wherenic had pleased the King to accuse him, which hee did to the end that the Profinns, as well as the Akacedoniums, might vinderstand him. But hereof the King made his advantage, perfavading the aitembly that hee diddained the language of his owne Countrie, and so with drawing himselfels, left him to his mercitelle entemies.

This proceeding of the Kings, Philotas greatly lamented, feeing the King who had fo fharply invaied against him, would not vouchfafe to heare his excuse. For, 10 not his enemies only were imboldened thereby against him, but all the rest having discourred the Kings disposition and resolution, contended among themselues which of them should exceede in hatred towards him: Among many other arguments which he yied in his owne defence, this was not the weakest, That when Nicomuchus defired to know of Diminus what men of marke and power were his partners in the conspiracie (as seeming vnwilling to aduenture himselfe with meane and base Companions) Dimmus named vnto him Demetrius of the Kings Chamber. Nicanor, Amyntas, and fome others, but spake not a word of Philotas, who by being commander of the Horfe, would greatly have valued the partie, and have incouraged Nicomachus. Indeede, as Philotas faid well for himfelfe, it is likely that Dimnus, 20 thereby the better to have heartned Nicomachus, would have named him, though hee had neuer dealt with him in any fuch practife. And for more certaine proofe that he knew nothing of their intents, that practifed against the King, there was not any one of the Conspirators, being many, inforst by torments or otherwise, that could accuse him, and it is true, that adversitie being seldome able to beare her owne burden, is for the most part found so malicious, as sieee rather desires to draw others (not alwaies descruing it) into the same danger, than to spare any that it can accuse. Yet at the last, howfocuer it were, to avoide the extremitie of relistlesse and vnnaturall torments, denifed by his profest enemies Craterus, Cenus, Ephestion, and others, Philotas accused his owne selfe; being perswaded that they would have slaine him 20 forthwith. But he failed euen in that miferable hope, and fuffering all that could be laied on flesh and bloud, he was forst to deliver, not what he knew, but what soeuer best pleased their eares, that were farre more mercilesse than death it selfe.

Aug.de Civit. Dei.l.19.6.6. Of this kinde of judiciall proceeding St. Inguistine greatly complained as a matter to bee bewailed, faith her, with Fountaines of teares. Quideam in fue acust quist, to requestive: & cum quartur virum sit nocess cruciatur. & imnecess timp to inverto felelve exvisiomes panes non quiathad commissific detegitur, sed quiar non commissific nescitars. What shallwed syst vis, when one is put to vortice in his owneest; and commented whitely pet it is in question whether he be guiltie, and being innecent suffers assured punishment for a fault of which there is no certaintie, not because he is known to have committed the of-40 street, but because either deep when the subject of the content of the subject of the content of the

It had been een ough for Alexanders fafetie if Philotas had been put to death without torment, the rels would not much have givened thereat, because he was greatly suffected. But Hemolius, who afterward conspired against him, made the Kings crueltie and delight in bloud the greatest motive of his own eill intent. Therefore, Sendellus, In nead peaking of Alexander, faith thus: Crudellus ninne humanum malanses, indicate homine than miti unima; fermalflarabuse eil fanguine gaudere Coultarilus, Schaiet ohomine, in fluestre animal transfire; Crueltie is not a humane vice; it is omvorthie of so mild a spirit. It is even a beastly rage to delight in bloud and wounds, and easiling away the nature of man to become a lause Monther.

For the conclusion of this Tragedie, Curtius makes a doubt, whether the confession that Philosas made were to give end to the torments which hee could not any longer indure, or that the same was true indeed; For (faith he) in this case, they shat speake truely, or they that denic failty; come to one and the same end. Now while the Kings hands were yet wet in bloud, he commanded that Lyncefles, fonnein-Law to Antipater, who had beene three yeares in prison, should bee slaine: The fame dispatch had all those that Nicomachus had accused: others there were that were suspected, because they had followed Philotas, but when they had answered for themselves that they knew no way so direct to winne the Kings tauour as by louing those whom the King fauoured; they were dismist. But Parmenio was yet lining; Parmenio, who had ferued with great fidelitie as well Philip of Mucedon the Kings Father, as himfelfe; Parmenio that first opened the way into Asia; That had depreft Attalus the Kings enemie; that had alwaics, and in all hazards, the leading of to the Kings Vant-guard, that was no leffe prudent in counfell, than fortunate in all artempts; A man beloued of the men of Warre, and, to fay the truth, hee that had made the purchase for the King of the Empire of the East, and of all the glorie and fame he had : That he might not therefore reuenge the death of his Sonne, though not you the King, (for it was valikely that he would have dishonoured his fidelitie in his elderlage, having now lived threefcore and ten yeares) yet voon those that by the witchcraft of flatteric had poffett themselves of his affection; it was resolved that he should be dispatcht. Polydamas was imploied in this butinesse, a man whom of all other Parmenio trusted most, and loued best, who (to be short) finding him in Media, and having Cleander and other Murderers with him, flew him walking in his 20 Garden, while he was reading the Kings letters. Hie exitus Parmenton's funt, the sumilitie domig, clarivini, Multa fine Rege profpere, Rex fine illo militimagneric gettered; Thirtwas the end of Parmento (liath Cartys) who had performed many notable thinges without the King, but the King, without him, did neuer effect any time worther of praile.

A. XVIII.

How Alexander fubdated the Bactrians, Sogdians, and other people, How Bessys was delivered into his bands. How he fought with the Soythians.

Hen these things had end, Accorder went on with his Armie, and brought under his obedience the Araspians or Eurogituse; the made Americes (Sometime Darius his Secretarie) their Governour; then the subded the Araspians, and left Menon to command over them. Here the Armie, sometimes led by Parmenio, findes him, contilling of twelve thousand Macedons and Greekes, with whom he past through some colde regions with difficultie enough. At length hee came to the foote of the Mountaine Taurus towards the East, where he built a Citie which he honoured with his owne 40 name, and peopled it with feuen thousand of his olde Muedons, worne with age and with transiles of the warre. The Arians, who fince he left them were renoited, hee subdued againe by the industrie and valour of Carenus and Erigins; And now he resolues to find out the new King Bessus in Bactria. Bessus, hearing of his comming, prepares to passe ouer the great River of Oxus which divides Bactris from Sogdiana; Artabazus is made Gouernour of Bactria abandoned by Bellius; The Macedonian Armie suffereth for want of Water, infomuch as when they came to the River of Oxus, there died more of them by drinking inordinately then Aexander had loft in any one battaile against the Persians. And it may well be ; For (as Clyrus did after obiect vnto him) he fought against weomen, not against men, and nor a-30 gainst their persons but their shadowes. He found on the bankes of this great Riuer no manner of Timber or other materialls, to make either boates, bridges, or raffe, but was forst to sow together the Hides that couered his carriages, and stuffe them with straw, and on them in fixe daies to passe ouer his Armie; which Besses might cafily have diffrest, if he had dared but to beholde the Macedonian Farmic aL.7.

farre-off. He had formerly complained against Darius for neglecting to defend the bankes of Tigris, and other passages, and yet now, when this traiterous slaue had ftyled himselfe a King, hee durst not perfourme any thing worthie of assaue. And therefore those that were neerest vnto him, and whom he most trusted, to wit Spitamines, Dat ophernes, Catanes, and others the Commaunders of his Armic, moued both by the care of their owne fafetic, and by the memoric of Bellus his Treason and crueltie against Darius, bound him in the like manner that he had done his Mafter, but with this difference, that he had the chaine closed about his neck like a maftife Dogge, and fo was dragged along to be prefented to his enemie.

In the meane while Aexander was arrived at a certaine Towne inhabited with 10 Greekes of Miletum, brought thither by Xerxes, when long before heereturned out of Greece, whose issues had well-neere forgotten their Countrie language. These most cruelly (after they had received him with great joy) he put to the sworde, and destroyed their Citic. At this place he received Bellus, and, having rewarded Spitamenes with the rest that deliuered him, he gaue the Traitor into the hands of Oxatres, Darius his brother, to be tormented.

But while he now thought himselfe secure, some twentie thousand Mountainers affalted his Camp; in repelling whom he received a thot in the leg, the arrow-head flicking in the flesh, so as he was carried in a Horse-Lytter, sometime by the horsemen, fometime by the foote.

Soone after he came vnto Maracanda, which Petrus Perondinus takes to be Samarchand, the regall Citic of the great Tamerlaine. It had in compasse threescore and ten furlongs (Curtius faith.) Heere hee received the Embaffadors of the Seythans (called Arians) who offered to ferue him.

The Bastrams are thortly againe with the Sagdisms stirred to Rebellion by the fame Spitamenes and Catanes who had lately delinered into his hands the Traitor Beffus. Many Cities were refoluedly defended against him, all which, after victorie, hee defaced and rased, killing all therein. At one of these hee received a blow on the neck which strucke him to the ground, and much disabled him for many daies after. In the meane while Spitamenes had recovered Maracanda, against whom 20 he imployed Menedemus with three thousand foote and eight hundredhorse.

In the heate of these tumults Alexander marched (on if we may beleeue Curtius and others) till he came to the River of Tanais; vpon whose banke he built another Alexandria threefcore furlongs in compaffe, which he beautified with houses within feuenteen daies after the walls built. The building of this Citie is faid to have bin occasion of a war betweene him and the Soythians; the Soythian King perswading himfelfe, that this new Towne was fortified of purpose to keepe him under. I doe not well understand, why the Scythians, offering warre in such terrible manner that Alexander was judged by his owne Souldiers to counterfeit fickneffe for verie feare, should neuerthelesse make suit for peace : neither finde I the reason why Alexander 40 (not intending the conquest of those Northerne deserts, but only the desense of his owne banke) should refuse to let them alone, with whom he could not meddle further than they should agree to suffer him. Yet hereof is made a great matter; and a victorie described; in pursuit of which the Macedons ranne beyond the boundes and monuments of Buchus his expedition.

The truth is, That Curtim and Tregus have greatly mistaken this River which they call Tanais. For it was the River of Jaxartes, that runnes betweene Sogdiana and Scythia, which Alexander pastouer, while Menedemus was imploied in the recouery of Samarchand: But Tanais which divides Asia from Europe is necre two thoufaud miles distant from any part of Bactria or Sogdiana, and the way desert and vn- 50 knowne. So that Alexander had (belides Inxartes) the great Riner of Folga and manic others to swimme ouer, ere hee could recouer Tanais; which (from the place where he was) he could hardly have discovered with the Armiethat followed him, if he had imploied all the time that he lived in Asia in that travaile.

Where-

Wherefore it is enough to belowe, that the Assatigne Scythians, making some offer to diffurbe the crection of this new Citie, which was like to give fome hindrance to their excursions, were driven away by the Macedonians; and being naked of defensive Armes, easily chased some tenne or twelve miles; which is the substance of Curtius his report. As for the limits of Bacchus his journie; like enough it is that Bacebus (if in his life time he were as fober a man, as after his death he was held a drunken God) went not verie farre into that walt Countrie, where hee could finde nothing but trees and stones, nor other bulines than to set vp a monument.

Threefcore of the Macedons are faid to have been flaine, and one thousand one hundred hurt in this fight, which might eafily be, in paffing a great River, defended against them by good Archers. Of Sorthian horses one thousand eight hundred were brought into the Campe, and many prisoners. It is forbidden by some Historians, and indeed it is hardly possible, to set downe the numbers of such as perish in battell : yet C.efar commonly did it. And where the diligence of the victors bath beene fo inquilitiue into the greatnesse of their owne successe, that writers have beene able to deliuer fuch particulars by credible reporte, I hold it not vnlawfull to fet downe what we finde; especially when it serves to give light to the bulinesse in hand. The small number which the Mucedonians lost, the omission of the number which they flew (a thing not yould in Curtime, who forbeares nothing that may 20 fet out the greatnesse of Alexander) and the little bootie that was gotten; doe make it probable, that this warre was no better than the repulsion of a few rouing Tartars (the like being yearely performed by the Mofeonite, without any boast) and therefore better omitted by some Historians, than so highly extolled as a great exploit by others.

While Alexander was affuring himselfe of those Seythians bordering upon Jaxartes, he received the ill newes that Menedemus was flaine by Spitamenes, the Armie (by him led) broken, and the greatest numbers slaine, to wit, two thousand foote, and three hundred horse. He therefore, to appeale the rebellion and to take reuenge of Spitamenes, makes all the hast he can; but Spitamenes flies into Bactria. Alexander 30 kills, burnes, and laics wast all before him; not sparing the innocent children, and fo departs, leaving a new Gouernour in that Province.

To repaire this loffe he received a great supply of nineteene thousand Souldiers out of Greece, Lycia, and Syria; with all which, and the old Armie, hee returnes towards the South, and paffeth the River of Oxus; on the South-fide whereof hee built fixe Townes neare each other for mutuall fuccour. But hee finds a new flartvp-Rebell, called Arimazes, (a Sogdian) followed with thirtie thousand Souldiers that defended against him a strong peece of ground on the top of a high Hill; whom when Alexander had fought in vaine to winne by faire words, hee made choise of three hundred yong-men, and promifed ten talents to the first, nine to the second, 40 and fo in proportion to the rest, that could finde a way to creepe vp to the top thereof. This they performed with the loffe of fome two and thirtie of their men, and then made a figue to Alexander, that they had performed his commandement. Hereupon he sent one Cophes to perswade Arimazes to yeeld the place; who, being shewed by Cophes that the Armie of Macedon was alreadic mounted vp, yeelded simply to Alexanders mercie, and was (with all his kindred) foourged and crucified to death; which punishment they well deserved for neglecting to keepe good watch in so dangerous a time. For the place, as seemes by the description, might easily haue beene defended against all the Armies of the World. But, what strength cannot doe: Mans wit, being the most forcible engine, hath often effected; Of which 50 I will give you an example in a place of our owne.

The Iland of Sarke, joyning to Garnfey and of that government, was in Queene Maries time furprifed by the French, and could neuer have beene recovered againe by strong hand, having cattle and come enough vpon the place to feede so many men as will ferne to defend it, and being enery way fo inaccellible that it might bee held against the Great Turke. Yet by the industrie of a Gentleman of the Netherlands, it was in this fort regained. Hecanchored in the roade with one thip of fmall burden, and, pretending the death of his Marchant, befought the French, being fome thirtie in number, that they might burie their Marchantin hallowed ground, and in the Chappell of that Ille; offering a prefent to the French of fuch commodities as they had aboord; whereto (with condition that they should not come a-shore with any weapon, no not fo much as with a knife) the French-men yeelded. Then did the Flemings put a Coffin into their boat, not filled with a dead carkaffe, but with Swords, Targets, and Harquebuffes; The French received them at their landing; and fearthing enery of them fo narrowly as they could not hide a pen-knife, gaue to them leave to draw their Coffin up the Rocks with great difficultie; some part of the French tooke the Flemish boat and rowed aboord their ship, to fetch the commodities promifed, and what elfe they pleafed, but being entred they were taken and bound. The Elemings on the Land, when they had carried their Coffin into the Chappell, thut the dore to them, and taking their weapons out of the Coffin fet vppon the French; they runne to the Cliffe and crie to their companie aboord the Fleming to come to their fuccour, but finding the boat charged with Flemings yeelded themselves and the place. Thus a Foxe-taile doth sometimes helpe well to peece out the Lions-skinne, that elfe would be too fhort.

Q. XIX.

How ΛLEXANDER flew his owne friends.

England Fter these sogdian and Seythian Warres, wee reade of Alexanderskiling of a Lion, and other frivolous matter, and that he committed the government of Manacanda, and the Countrie about it, to Clytta, and how he flew him foote after, for valuing the vertue of 2 billip the father before that of Alexander the sonne, or rather because hee objected to the King the death of Parmenio, and derided the Oracle of Hammon: for therein he 30 toucht him to the quick, the same being deliuered in publike and at a drunken banquet. Clytus, indeede, had deferued as much at the Kings hands, as any man living had done, and had in particular faued his life, which the King well remembred when he came to himfelfe, and when it was too late. Yet to fay the truth, Clytus his infolencic was intolerable. As he in his cups forgat whom hee offended, fo the King in his (for neither of them were themselues) forgat whom he went about to flay, for the griefe whereof he tare his owne face and forrowed fo inordinately, as, but for the perswasions of Califibenes, it is thought he would have slaine himselfe.

Wine begat furie, furie matter of repentance : but præceding mischieses are not amended by fucceeding bewailings. Omne vitium ebrief. is & incendit, & detegit; ob- 40 stantemmalis conatibus verecundiam remouet; obi possedit animum nimia vis vini, quiequid mali latebat, emergit: non facit ebriet as vitia, fed protraint; Drunkenneffe both kindles and laies open euery vice; it remoues out of the way that flame which gives impediment unto bad attempts; where wine gets the mastrie, all the ill that before lay hidden breakes out : drunkennesse indeederather discouers vices, than makes them.

Soone after this, Spitamenes, who flew Befins, and had lately revolted from Alexander, was murdered by his Wife, and his head prefented to Alexander. Spitamenes being taken away, the Dahans also seized vpon his fellow-conspirator Dataphernes, and deliuered him vp. So Alexander being now freed from all these pettie-rebels, disposed of the Provinces which he past ouer, and went on with his Armie into Ga- 50 baza, where it fuffered fo much Hunger, Cold, Lightning, Thunder, and Storme, as he lost in one Tempest a thousand of his traine. From hence hee inuaded the Sacans, and destroicd their Countrie. Then came he into the Territorie of Cohortanes who submitted himselfe vnto him, feasted him greatly, and presented him with thirtic beautifull Virgins, among whom Roxane, afterward his Wife, was one: which although all the Macedonians disdained, yet none of them durst vie any freedome of speech after Clytus his death. From hence hee directed his course towards India, having so increased his numbers, as they amounted to an hundred and rwentie thousand armed men.

In the meane while hee would needes bee honoured as a God: whereto that hee might allure the Macedonians, hee imploied two pernitions Paralites. Hagis and Cleo: whom Califbenes opposed: For, among many other honest arguments yield to the affembly, he told Cleo, That he thought that Alexander would diffaine the gift 10 of God-head from his Vaffalls; That the opinion of Sanctitie, though it did fometime follow the death of those who in their life-time had done the greatest thinges, yet it neuer accompanied any one as yet liuing in the World. He further told him. That neither Hercules nor Bacchus were Deified at a banquet, and voon drinke, (for this matter was propounded by Cleo at a carowling fealt) but that, for the more than manly acts by them performed while they lived, they were in future and fucceeding Ages numbred among the Gods. Alexander flood behinde a partition and heard all that was spoken, waiting but an opportunitie to bee reuenged on Califlhenes, who being a man of free speech, honest, learned, and a lover of the Kings honour, was yet foone after tormented to death, not for that hee had be-20 traied the King to others, but because hee never would condescend to betray the King to himfelfe, as all his detestable flatterers did. For in a conspiracie against the King made by one Hermolaus and others (which they confest) he caused Calliflhenes without confession, accusation, or triall, to be torne a-funder vpon the rack: This deede, vnworthie of a King, Senecathus confureth. Hoc est ALEXANDRI crimen aternum, quod nulla virtus, nulla bellorum fælicit as redimet. Nam quotiens quis dixerit; Occidit Perfarum multamillia: opponitur, & CAELISTHENEM: Quotiens aiction erit, Occidit DARIVM: opponitur. & CALLISTHENEM. Quotiens dictumerit Omnia Occano tenus vicit, ipfum quoque tentanit nonis classibus, & Imperium ex angule Thracia via ad Orientis terminos protulit : dicetur, sed CALLISTHENEM occidit. Omnia licet an-30 tiqua Ducum Regumá, exempla transierit, ex his que secit nihil tam magnum erit quam feelus CALLISTHENES; This is the eternall crime of ALEXANDER, which no vertuenor felicitic of his in Warre shall ever be able to redeame. For as often as any man shall (ay, He flew many thousand Persians; it shall be replied, He did so, and he flew CALLI-STHENES: When it Shall be faid, He flew DARIVS, it Shall be replied, and CALLISTHE-NES; When it shall be said, he wanne all as farre as to the very Ocean, thereon also he aduentured with unufuall Nauies; and extended his Empire from a corner of Thrace, to the otmost bounds of the Orient, It shall be said with all, But he killed CALLISTHENES, Let him baue out-gone all the ancient examples of Captaines and Kings; none of all his acts makes fo much to his glorie, as CALLISTHENES to his reproach.

Of ALEXANDERS iournie into India. The battaile betweene him and Porvs.

. Ith the Armie before remembred, of one hundred and twentie thoufand foot and horse. Alexander did enter the borders of India, where fuch of the Princes, as submitted themselves vnto him, he entertayned louingly, the reft hee conftrained; killing Man, Woman, and Child, where they refifted. Hee then came before Nifa built by Bia-

chus, which after a few daies was rendred vnto him. From thence he rensoued to a Hill at hand, which on the top had goodly Gardens filled with delicate fruits and Vines, dedicated to Bacehus, to whom hee made feafts for ten daies together. Now when hee had drunke his fill, hee went on towards Dedala, and thence to Acadera,

Countries spoiled and abandoned by the Inhabitants, by reason whereof, victualls failing, he divides his Armie; Projomie led one part, Cenon an other, and himfelfe the reft. They take many Townes, whereof that of greatest fame was Mazage, which had in it three hundred thousand men; but after some resistance, it was veelded vnto him by Cleophe the Queene, to whom againe hereftored it; at the fiege of this Citic he received a wound in the legge. After this, 2V or a was taken by Polyfberchon, and a Rock of great strength by himseife: he wannealso a passage vpon one Erre, who was flaine by his companie, and his head presented to Alexander. This is the summe of Alexanders doings in those parts, before such time as hee arrived at the R iver of Indus. Comming to Indus hee found there Ephesition, who (being fent before) had to prepared boates for the transportation of his Armie, and ere Alexanders arrivall, had perswaded Omphis King of that part of the Countrie to submit himselfe to this great Conquerour. Therefore, foone vpon Alexanders comming, Omthis presented himselfe with all the strength of his Countrie, and sixe and sittle Elephants, vinto him; offering him his feruice and affiftance. Hee made Alexander know that hee was an Enemie to the next two great Kings of that part of India, named Abiafares and Porus; wherewith Aexander was not a little pleased, hoping by this diffusion to make his owne victoric by farre the more case. Hee presented. Alexander with a Crowne of gold, so did he the rest of his Commanders, and withall fourescore talents of filuer coine, which Alexander not only refused, but to shew that he was co- 20 uctous of glorie, not of gold, he gave Omphis a thouland talents of his owne treasure, belides other Perlian rarities. Abinfares, having heard that Alexander had received his enemic Omphis into his protection, refolued to make his owne peace alfo : For, knowing that his owne firength did but equall that of Omphis, and that there was no other difference betweene them, than that which the chance of Warre gaue hee thought it an ill match when Alexander, who had alreadie beaten under foote all the greatest Princes of Asia, should make himselfe a Partie and Head of the quarrell. So had Alexander none now to stand in his way but Porus, to whom he fent a commandement, that he should attend him at the border of his Kingdome, there to doe him homage. But from Porus hee received this manly answere; That hee 200 would fatisfie him in his first demand, which was to attend him on his borders, and that well accompanied; but for any other acknowledgement hee was refolued to take counsell of his Sword. To be short, Alexander resolues to passe ouer the Riuer Hydaspes, and to find Porus at his owne home. Porus attends him on the farther banke with thirtie thousand foot, fourescore and ten Elephants, and three hundred armed Chariots, and a great troupe of Horse. If Darius had done the like on Tioris. Alexander had furely staid somewhat longer ere he had seene India. The River was foure furlong broade, which makes halfe a mile, and withall deepe and fwift. It had in it many Ilands, among which there was one well shadowed with wood, and of good capacitie. Alexander fent Ptolomie vp the River with a great part of the Ar- 40 mie, shrowding the rest from the view of Porus: who by this deuice being drawne from his first incamping, fets himselfe downe opposite to Ptolemie, supposing that the whole Armie of Mucedon meant to force their paffage there. In the meane while Alexander recouers the farther shore without resistance. He orders his troups and advanceth towards Porus, who at first rather believes that Abiasares his Confederate (but now the Confederate of fortune) had been come ouer Hydaspes to his aide, than that Alexander had pastit. But he finds it otherwise, and fends his Brother Hagis with foure thousand horse, and a hundred armed waggons to entertaine him. Each waggon had in it foure to fight, and two to guide it; but they were at this time of litle vie: for there had fallen fo much raine, and thereby the fields were to fo moistned, as the horses could hardly trot. The Septhians and Dahans had the Vantguard, who fo galled thefe Indians as they brake their reines, & other furniture, ouerturning the wagons & those in them. Perdiseas also gave vpon the Indian horse-men, and the one & the other were forft to recoile. Porus moues forward with groffe of his

Armie, that those of his Vantguard scattered might recouer his Reare: Alexander being followed with Epheflion, Ptolomie, and Perdicons, tooke on him to charge the indian horse-men on the left wing, commanding Cenus or Cenon to inuade the right; Antigonus and Leonatus , hee directed to breake upon Porus his battaile of foote, throughhed with Elephants, Porus himfelfe being carried upon one of them of the greatest stature. By these beasts the Macedonian foot were most offended; but the Archers and Darters being well guarded with the long and strong Pikes of the Masedons, so galled them, as being inraged, they turned head and ranne over the foote that followed them: In the end, and after a long and doubtfull fight, by the advan-10 tage of weapon, and by the courage and skilfulneffe of the Macedonian Captaines. the victoric fell to Alexander, who also farre exceeded Porus in number : for besides the Macedonians and other Easterne and Northern Nations, Porus was affailed by his owne Confederate and Countrie people. Yet for his owne person he never gaue ground otherwise than with his sword towards his enemies, till being weakened with many wounds, and abandoned by his Armie, he became a prifoner to the Conqueror, from whom againe he received his estate with a great enlargement.

How ALEXANDER finished his expedition, and returned out of India.

Forbeare to trouble my selfe and others with a friuolous discourse of Serpents, Apes, and Peacocks, which the Mace Ionians found in these their trauailes : or of those pettie Wars which Alexander made between the ouerthrow of Porus, and his failing downethe River of Indus. The descriptions of places about the head and branches there of are better knowne vnto vsin this Age, by meanes of our late Nauigations into those parts, than they were in any former times. The magnificence and riches of 30 those Kings we could in no fort be perswaded to beleeue, till our owne experience had taught vs, that there were many stranger thinges in the World, than are to bee feene betweene London and Stanes.

Our great traueller Mandeuile who died in the yeare 1272, and had feene fo much of the World, and of the East India, we accompted the greatest fabler of the World; yet had he an other reputation among other Nations, as well able to judge as we. Witnesse the Monument made of him in the Couent of the Friers Guillimins in Liege, where the religious of that place keepe some thinges of his, Comme pour honorable memoire de son Excellence; For an honorable memorie of his Excellencie, faith of the low Guichardine.

40 The Countries towards the Springs of Indus, and where those many Rivers of Hydaspes, Zaradris, Acesines, and the rest, fall into the maine streame, are now possest by the great Mogor, the ninth from Tamberlane, who commands all that tract betweene Persia and Indus towards the West, as also a great extent of Countrie towards Ganges. In the mouth of Indus, the Ascension, a ship of London, suffered shipwrack in the yeare 1600, and some of the companie trauailed ouer Land till they came to Agra, the same great Citie (as I take it) which our later Cosmographers call Nagra, being named of old Diony fopolis.

Phylostratus in the life of Apollonius Tyanaus, speaking of the expedition of Bacchus and Hercules into the East India, tells vs that those two great Captaines (whom Alex-50 ander fought by all meanes to out-fame) when they indepored to subject vnto them the Oxydraca, a people inhabiting betweene the Rivers of Hyphalis and Ganges, they were beaten from the affault of their Cities with thunder and lightnings. This may well be understood by the great Ordinance that those people had then in vse. For it is now certainely knowne, that the great Kings of the vttermost East, have had the vie of the Cannon, many hundreds of years since, and even fince their first civilitie and greatnesse, which was long before Aexanders time. But Alexander pierst not to farre into the East. It fufficed, that having alreadic over-wearied his Armie hee diffeourred the reat of melia by fame. The indian Kings whom he had fubdued, informed him, that a Prince called Aggramenes, who commanded many Nations beyond the River of Ganges, was the powerfulleit King of all those Regions; and that he was able to bring in o the field two bundred thouland Foot, three thouland Elephants, twentie thouland Horle, and two thouland armed Chariots. With this report, though sixuality were more inflamed than euer to proceede in this difcouerie and conqueit, yet all the art he had could not perfwade the Souldiers to wan- 10 der ouer those great defarts beyond Index and Ganges, more terrible vnto them than the greaten Arane that the hair could gather. Yet at the last contented they were, after many perfuafine Oration, to follow him towards the South, to discouer such part of the Ocean Sea, as was nearer at hand, whereunto the Riuer of indus was their infallible guide. Alexan ler feeing that it would bee no otherwise, deuised a prettie trick, where-with hee hoped to beguile posteritie, and make himselfe seeme greater than he was. He enlarged his Campe, made greater trenches, greater cabbines for the Souidi.rs, greater Horfe flalls, and higher mangers than his Horfes cou'd feede in. He caused all furniture of Men and Horsesto bee made larger than would ferue for vie; and feattered these Armours and Bridles about his Campe, to 20 bekent as religious, and wondered at by the fauages. Proportionable to thefe he raifed vp tweine great Altars to be the monument of his journies end. This was a readie way to encre ife the same of his bignesse; to his greatnesse it could adde nothing fane a fulpition that it was leffe than is thought, feeing he strone so carneslly to make it thought more than it was.

This done, he returned agains to the banke of Acosines, and there determined to fet up his fleet where Accomes and Hyanipis incounter, where to tellifie by a furer monument, how farre he had past towards the East, he built by those Riners two Cities: the one hee called Niesa, and the other Bucer balon, after the name of his beloued Horfe Bucephalue. Here againe her received a fourth supply of fixe thousand Thra- 30 cian Horse-men seven thousand Foot, and from his Lieutenant at Babylon five and twentie thousand Armours, garnished with filter and gold, which bee distributed among his Souldiers. A bout these Rivers he wanne many Townes, and committed great flaughter on those that relisted; It is then written of him, that affaulting a Citie of the Oxidracans, he lept from the top of the wall into it, and fought, I know not how long, against all the Inhabitants; tales like those of Benis of Southampton, friuolous and incredible. Finally, hee path downe the River with his fleet, at which time also the newes came vnto him of a rebellion in Baččria, and then of the arrivall of an hundred Embaffadours from a King of India, who fubmitted himfelfe vnto him. He feafted these Embassadours vpon a hundred beds of gold, with all 40 the fumptuolitie that could be deuised, who soone after their dispatch returned againe with a present of three hundred Horse, one hundred and thirtie Wagons, and to each foure Horses, a thousand Targets, with many other thinges rare

Their entertainements ended, be failes towards the South, paffeth through many obscure Nations, which did all yeeld vnto him either quietly or compelled by force: among these he builded another Alexandria. Of many places which he tooke in this paffage, Samus was one, the Inhabitans whereof fought against him with poisoned Swords, with one of which Pto'omie (afterward King of Egypt ) was wounded and cured by an hearbe which Alexander dreamt that he had feene in the 50 mouth of a Scrpent,

When he came neare the out-let of Indus (being ignorant of the tides of the Sea) his Gallies as they were on a fuddaine fluffled one vpon an other by the Floud, fo on the Ebbe they were left on the drie ground, and on the fandie bankes of the Ri-

nor, wherewith the Macedonians were much amazed, but after hee had a few daies observed well the course of the Sea, he past out of the rivers mouth some few miles, and after Sacrifices offered to Neptune returned : and the better to informe himfelfe, hee fent Nearchus and Onesicritus, to discouer the coast towards the mouth of Emphrates. Arrianus in the beginning of his fixt Booke hath written this paffage downe the River of Indus at length, with the manner of the Veffells, in which hee transported his Armie, the Commanders that were yield therein, and other the marnailous prouifions made.

Neare the out-lets of this River hee spent some part of the Winter, and in eighto teene daies march from thence recoursed Gedrofia, in which passage his Armie suffered fuch miferie for want of foods, that of a hundred and twentie thousand foot. and twelve thouland horse, which hee carried into India, not the fourth part returned aliue.

of ALEXANDERS Riot, Crueltie, and death.

Rom Gedrosia Alexander led his Armic into Carmania, and so drawing neare to Persia, hee gaue himselfe wholly to feasting and drinking, imitating the triumphs of Bacchus. And though this Swinish vice bee hatefull enough in it selfe, yet it alwaies inflamed this King to Cruel-tie. For (saith Curtius) the Hang-man followed the feast, for ASP ASTES one of his Provinciall Governours he commanded to be flaine, fo as neither did the exceffe of voluptuousnesse qualifie his crueltie, nor his crueltie hinder in ought his voluptuousnesse,

While he refreshed his Armie in these parts, a new supply of five thousand foote and a thousand horse, was brought him by Cleander, and his fellowes, that had been imploied in the killing of Parmenio. Against these Murderers great complaint was 20 made, by the Deputies of the Provinces in which they had commanded: and their offences were fo outragious, as Alexander was perfuaded, that had they not altogether despaired of his returne out of India, they durst not have committed them. All men were glad of the occasion, remembring the vertue of him whom they had flaughtered. The end was, That Cleander and the other chiefe, with fixe hundred Souldiers by them imploied, were delinered ouer to the Hang-man; enery one rejoycing that the Ire of the King was at laft executed on the ministers of his Ire.

Nearchus and Onesieritus were now returned from the coast, and made report of an Iland rich in gold, and of other strange thinges; whereupon they were commanded to make some farther discouerie; which done, that they should enter the 40 mouth of Euphrates, and finde the King at Babylon.

As he drew neare to Babylon he vilited the Sepulchre of Cyrus in Palargada, now Arrianus hath called Chelquera: where he was prefented with many rich gifts by Orfines, one of the Princes of Persia, of the race of Cyrus. But because Bagoas, an Eunuchin especial fa- crus Tombe. uour with the King, was neglected, he not only practifed certaine loofe fellowes to witnesse against Orlines, that he had robbed Cyrus Tomb, for which he was condemned to die; but hee affifted the Hang-man with his owne handes in tormenting him. At which time also Alexander caused Phradates to be flaine, suspecting his greatnesse. Caperat (faith CvRTIvs) effe praceps ad reprasentanda supplicia, item ad deteriora credende; He beganne head-longly to shed bloud, and to believe falle reports. It is true, that 50 he tooke a way to make all men wearie of his gouernement, feeing crueltie is more fearefull than all the adventures that can be made against it.

At this time it is faid that Calanus the Philosopher burnt himselfe, when hee had lived threefcore and thirteene yeares. Whether herein he followed the custome of his Countrie, being an Indian, Or fought to prevent the griefe and incommoditie of elder age, it is vncertaine; but in this the Historians agree, that fore-feeing and forethewing Alexanders death, he promised to meete him shortly after at Babylon.

From Palargada hee came to Sula, where hee married Statira, Darius his eldeft Daughter, giving her yonger lifter to his beloued Ephestion, and fourescore other Perlian Ladies to his Captaines. There were fixe thousand guests inuited to the feast, to each of which he gaue a cup of gold. Here there came vnto him three thoufand yong fouldiers out of his conquered Prouinces, whereat the Macedonians greatly murmured. Harpalus, his Treasurer in Babylon having lauishly confumed the monies in his keeping, got him going with fine thousand talents, and sixe thousand hired Souldiers, but he was rejected in Greece, and there flaine. Alexander greatly re- 10 joyced at the lidelitic of the Greekes, whom Harpalus with these forces and treasures could not flirre: yet hee fent commandement that they should againe receive their banished men, whereunto (fearefull of his indignation) all submitted themselves. (except the Athenians) though they refolued that it was a manifest preparation towards their bondage. After this there followed a maruailous discontentment in his Armie, because he had resolued to send into Macedon all those old Souldiers which could no longer indure the trauell of Warre, and to keepe the rest in Asa. He vsed many Orations to fatisfie them, but it was in vaine during the tempest of their furie. But afterward, as Whales are drawne to the Land with a twine threed, when they haue tumbled a while, so are the vnconfiderate multitude easily conducted when 20 their first passions are evaporate. With such as were licenced to depart, he sent Craterus, to whom he gaue the Lieutenantship of Macedon, The Salie, and I in ace, which Antipater had held from his first departure out of Europe, who had beaten the rebellious Greekes in his absence, discharged the trust committed vnto him with great fidelitie, and fent him so many strong supplies into Asia from time to time. Certainely, if Alexander had not taken counfell of his cups, hee would have cast some better colour on this alteration, and given Antipater a stronger reason for his remove, than to have imploied him in the conduction of a new supply to be brought him to Babylon, the warre being now at an end. For Antipater faw nothing in this remove, but the Kings disposition to fend him after Parmenio, and the rest. With this Antipater, 30 the King, notwithstanding his great courage, had no great appetite to grapple: Princes, though jealous, doe not stand in doubt of every man ill-affected though valiant; but there is a kinde of Kingly courage, compounded of hardinesse and vnderstanding, which is many times so fearefull vnto them, as they take leave both of Law and Religion, to free themselves thereof.

After hee had fent for Antipater, hee made a journie into Media to fettle thinges there; where Ephestian, whom he fauoured most of all men, dies. The King according to the greatnesse of his love, laments his losse; hangs his Phisition; and beflowes upon his Monument twelve thousand talents: After which hee returnes to Babylon. Thither Antipater came not, but fent; and not to excuse himselfe, but to 40 free himselfe. For if we beleeue Curtius (whom Plutarch and others gaine-fay) Antipater by his Sonnes, Caffander, Philip, and 16 la, who waited on Alexanders cup, gaue him poifon, The falus (who was of the confpiracie) having inuited him to a drinking feast of purpose. For after he had taken a carouse in Hercules his cup, a draught of drinke stronger than Hercules himselfe, he quitted the World within a few daies.

Certainely the Princes of the World haue feldome found good by making their ministers ouer-great, and thereby suspitious to themselues. For he that doth not acknowledge fidelitie to bee a debt, but is perfwaded that Kingsought to purchase it from their Vaffalls, will neuer please himselfe with the price giuen. The only restoratine, indeed, that strengthens it, is the goodnesse and vertue of the Prince, and his liberalitie makes it more diligent; so as proportion and distance be observed. It may be that Antipater having commanded two or three Kingdomes twelve yeares, knew not now how to play any other part; no more than C.efar did, after he had follong a time gouerned the Gaules, where he vtterly forgat the art of obedience. A most cruell and ungratefull traitor Antipater was, if Curtius doe not belie him: For though hee feared some ill measure upon his remoue (the Tragedies of Parmenio, Clytus, and Callifhenes, having beene foliately acted) yet he knew nothing to the contrarie, but that the King had refolued to have given him some other great government in Afar the old Souldiers thence returned, having perchance defired to be governed by Craterus, whom they had followed in all the former Warre.

ò. XXIII.

Of ALEXANDERS Person and qualities,

Owlocuer it were, Alexanders former cruelties cannot bee excused, no more than his vanitie to be effected the fonne of Jupiter, with his excessive delight in drinke and drunkennesse, which others make the cause of his seuer and death. In that hee lamented his want of enterprifing, and grieued to confider what hee should doe when hee had conquered the World, Augustus Casar found just cause to deride him, as if the well governing of fo many Nations and Kingdomes, as he had alreadic conquered, could 20 not have offered him matter more than aboundant, to busic his braines withall. That he was both learned and a louer of learning, it cannot be doubted. Sr Franeis Bacon, in his first booke of the advancement of learning, hath proved it sufficiently. His liberalitie I know not how to praife, because it exceeded proportion. It is faid. That when he gaue a whole Citie to one of his Seruants, He, to whom it was giuen, did out of modestie refuse it, as disproportionable to his fortune : to whom Alexander replied, That hee did not enquire what became him to accept, but the King to give: of which SENECA; Animofa vox videtur & regia, cum sit stultisima. For nothing simply considered by it selfe beseemes aman. We mall regard what, to whom, when, why, where, and the like; without which confiders tions no act can be approued. Let honours bee proportioned unto the persons : for whereas vertue is ever limited by measure, the excesse is as faultie as the defect. For his Person, it is very apparant, That he was as valiant as any man, a disposition taken by it selfe, not much to be admired; For I am resoluted that hee had ten thousand in his Armie as daring as himselfe. Surely, if aduenturous natures were to be commended fimply, wee should confound that vertue with the hardinesse of Thecues, Ruffians, and mastife Dogges. For certainely it is no way praise-worthie 40 but in daring good thinges, and in the performance of those lawfullenterprises, in which we are imploied for the seruice of our Kings and Common-weales. If we compare this great Conquerour with other Troublers of the World, who have bought their glorie with fo great destruction, and effusion of bloud, I thinke him farre inferiour to Cefar, and many other that lived after him, feeing hee never undertooke any warlike Nation, the naked Scythians excepted, nor was euer encountred with any Armie of which he had not a most mastring aduantage, both of weapons and of Commanders, every one of his Fathers old Captaines by farre exceeding the best of his Enemies. But it seemeth, Fortune and Destinies (if we may vse those termes) had found out and prepared for him, without any care of his owne, 50 both heapes of Men, that willingly offered their necks to the yoke, and Kingdomes that inuited and called in their owne Conquerours. For conclusion, wee will agree with Senecs, who fpeaking of Philip the Father, and Alexander the Sonne, gives this judgement of them. ð. I

Of the question about succession to ALEXANDER.

HE death of Alexander left his Armie (as Demedes the Athenian then compared it) in fuch case, as was that monstrous Giant Polybemus, shaining lost his only 20 eye. For, that which is reported in tables of that great Cydops, might well be verified of the Chacelonians: their force was intolerable, but for want of good guidance vnessedul, and harmefull chiefly to themfelues. The canses whereof c' under the duine ordinance) were, partly the vnectranecie of Title to succession in the Kingdome of Macelonian, partly the sub-borne pride of Alexan Levin fields; who thinking none worthie to be his Heire, did refuse to establish the right in any one, leauing every one to his owne fortune: but especially the great ambition of his followers, who all had 30 carned of their Master to suffer no equalls; a lesson some taught who spirits reflecting upon their owne worth, when the renerence of a greater object faileth.

It hath formerly beene shewed, That Philip (the Father of Alexander) gouerning in Macedon as Protector, assumed vinto himselfe the Kingdome, not rendring it with a Amylata, (the Sonne of his elder brother Perdiceas) when he grew to mansessates, but only bestowing upon him in marriage a Daughter of his owne: by which bond, and much more by his proper strength, he assured the Crowne vinto himselfe:

Amylata neuer attempting ought against Philip, though (with price of his life) he did against Alexander in the beginning of his raigne. Wherefore Eurydies the sole liste of his marriage, ought in reason to have beene acknowledged Queene after 40 Alexander, as having better Title theretee, than either He or Philip had, when they lived, vinesse as having better Title theretee, than either He or Philip had, when they lived, vinesse from their owne bodies: and of great were their conquests, that Oxideadon it selse was (in regard of them) a very small Appendix, and no way deserving to be laied in ballance against the demand of their posteritie, had they left any able to make challenge of the Roiall seas.

Alexander hauing taken many wiues had iffue by none of the principall of them.
Barfine the Daughter of Artabasas a Perfan had borne vnto him a yong Sonne: and Rossnet he Daughter of Oxyaries (whom he had more folemnely married) was left 50 by him great with child. But the bafenefle of the Mothers, and contempt of the conquered Nations, was generally alleaged in Barre of the Plea made for them, by feme that would (perhaps) haue wrought out their owne ends, under the name of Alexander's children.

Cleopatra

Common the theor of Alexander, widdow to the King of Epirm, and Aridaus his bate brother (forme to Philip by a Concubine of no account) who had married the Lade Emphage to be for mentoned, were next in con 16. Of Clopatra there was no feech, which may give sufficient, that either Law or Cultome had made that sex in apable of the Soveraignette: Aridaus (besides his bashardier) was neither for next in nor qualitie fit to rule as Kings yet you him the election fell, but slowly and cashappeners often) for lack of a better: when the Counsaliors having over-labouted diest disagreeing witsin deuting what was belt, were content for very wearing to to the what came next to hand.

Problem: (fooneafter King of Agypt) concurring with them who rejected all mention of the halfe-Porlim broode, King Alexanicos children, was of opinion, that the rule of all floud be eginen to the Captaines, that going for law which by the greater part of them floud be decreed: fo farre was hee from acknowledging any one as true Heire to the Crowne.

This Palamic was called the forme of Lagus, but repited of Philip: who having vied the companie of Affaic Pelameir mother, deliuted ber in narriage to Lagus being great with child. Therefore, whether it were fo, that he hoped well to worke his owne fortune out of those diffentions, which are incident vnto the confultations of many ambitiousmen, equall in place, forcing them at length to redeeme their 20 quiet with fubjection to one, deferuing regard by his bloud, and truft for his euen carriage, or whether hee defired only to get a thate to himfelfe, which could not have come to patie had all been eginen to one; plaine enough it is, that hee thought not on preferring drikum before himfelfe; and therefore gaue fuch counfaile a sitted his owneand other mens purpofes. Yea, this denife of his tooks place in deede, though not in forme as hee had propounded it: For, it was in effect all one, to have all mbled at diexanders emptic chaire, as Ptolomic had conceiued the forme of their confultations, or to let in the chaire fitch a Kiregas Arikusa, no wifer then the chaire it elife. All of the controuer lies ariling were determined by the greater part of the Capatines, by the greater part, if not in number, yet in publiance.

But as these counterfait shewes of dissembling aspirers, doe often takecheck by the painte dealing of them, who dareto goe more directly to worke: so was it like to have fared with Protonica and the rest, when Arisloms, an other of the Captaines, interpreted the wordes of Alexander; saying, That hee left his Kingdome to the worthiest, as designing Perducan, to whom (lying at the point of death) hee delinered his ring. It seemed good in reason, that Alexanders purpose appeared plaine enough, so long as no man would interpose an other construction: eury one being uncertaine how the secret affection; of the rest might be inclined. Many therefore either our of their lone, or because they would not be of the latest, veged Perducas to take

42 youn him the effate Roiall. He was no flranger to the Roiall bloud; yet his birth gaue him not fach reputation, as the great fauour of his dead King, with whom hee had been very inward, and that effectally lince the death of Ephetlion (a powerfull Minion) into whose place he was chosen. For his owne worth hee might well bee commended, as a good man of Warre, and one that had giten much proofe of his prinate valour. But very furly he was: which qualitie (joyned with good fortune) carried a flew of Majesile: being checkt with misduenture, it was called by a true name Pride; and rewarded with death.

In the prefent bulineffe a foolish ouer-weening did him as great harme, as it had been egreat happineffe to haue sticeceded Alexander. For not content to haue the shackmation of the Souldiers, approuing the sentence of Aristons, he would need counterfait modessite, thinking that every one of the Princes would have intreated him to take the waightie burden of an Empire, which would beet he self-entious the more follownitie he vsed in the acceptance. It is truely faid, He that faineth himself a single properties of the princes would be a support of the second with the second self-entities and the second self-entities and the second self-entities are self-entities.

nious, and bearing a particular hatred to Perdiceas) tooke advantage of his irrefolute behauiour, and very bitterly inneighed against him. In conclusion he pronounced, that who focuer was Heire to the Crowne, the Souldiers ought to be Heires to the treafure; and therefore he inuited them, who were nothing flow, to fhare it. This diffurbed all the Confultation. The Captaines were left alone, farre enough from agreeing, and not able to have brought any conclusion to good effect without confent of the Souldiers, who greedie of spoile thronged about Meleager.

ò. I I.

The election of ARIDEVS, with the troubles there-about arifing; the first dunsion of the Empire.

Vring this vp-rore, mention was made of Arideus by some one, and entertained with good liking of many, wntil at lait it grew to the voice of the Armic. Askleage hauing with drawnehimfelfe tumulity from the companie of the Lords, was glad of fo faire an occasion to make himfelfe great: therefore he produced Arideu's, commended him to the Souldiers, who called him by his Fathers name Philip, and 20 brought him into the Palace, inucfting him in Alexanders Robes, and proclaiming him King. Many of the Nobles withflood this election, but in vaine : for they could not refolue what course to follow, rejecting this. Only Python, a hot-headed-man, tooke vpon him to proclaime the Sonne of alexander by Roxane, according to the counfaile which Perdice as at first had given, appointing Perdice as and Leonatus his Protectors. Butthis child was not yet borne, which made that attempt of Python vaine. Finally, Perdiceas with fixe hundred men, and Ptolomie with the Kings Pages tooke vpon them to defend the place where Alexanders bodie lay : but the Armie conducted by Meleager, who carried the new King about whither he lifted, calily brake in voon them, and inforced them to accept Arideus for their Soueraigne Lord. 30 Then by the intercession of the ancient Captaines, a reconciliation was propounded and admitted, but on neither fide farthfully meant.

Leonatus who was of the Roiall blond a goodly Gentleman and valiant, iffued out of Babylon, being followed by all the horse, which consisted (for the most part) of the Nobilitie. Perdices abode in the Citie (but flanding upon his guard) that he might be readie to take the opportunitie of any commotion, that should happen among the infantrie. The King (who was gouerned by Meleager) commanded or gaue leaue to haue Perdiceas made away; which attempt succeeded ill being neither fecretly carried, nor committed to fure executioners. Their comming was not vnexpected : and they were by Perdiceas rebuked with fuch granitie, that they depar- 40 ted honester than they came; being sorrie of their bad enterprise. Vpon the newes of this attempt the campe was in an vp-rore, which the King leeking to pacific wanted authoritie, as having newly got the Crowne by them, and holding it by their courtefie. The matter it selfe affoorded no good excuses, and his indifferetion made them worfe. He faid that no harme was done, for Perdiceas was aline: but their exclamations were against the tyrannous enterprise, which hee imputed to Meleager; abandoning the furest of his friends to the rage of the multitude, who were not appeafed, untill the King by offering to refigne his effate unto them, remued out of their pittie that fauourable affection, which had moved them to fet him up at Perdicent basing now joyned himfelfe with Leanatus kept the fields, intending to cut off all prouision of victualls from the Citie. But after fundric Embassies pasfing betweene the King and the Nobles, (they requiring to have the Authors of fedition ginen vp into their handes; the King, that Meleiger might bee joyned with Leonatus and Perdiceas, as a Third in gouernement of the Armie) things were compounded according to the Kings delire. Meleager should have done well to consider, that such men as had one day demanded his head, were not like the day following to giue him a principall place among them without any new occasion offered, had not some purpose of treacherie lurked under their great facilitie. Generall peace was renewed, and much loue protested where little was intended. The face of the Court was the same which it had beene in Alexanders time : but no longer now did the same heart give it life; and windie spirits they were which moved in the arteries. False reports were given out by appointment of Perdicas, tending to his owne to differace, but in fuch termes as might feeme to have proceeded from Meleager: who finding part of the drift, but not all, tooke it as an injurie done to himfelfe; and (as, defirous of a true friendship) defired of Perdicas, that such authors of discord might bee punished. Perdice as (as a louer of peace) did well approue the motion; and therefore agreed that a generall Muster should bee made, at which time the disturbers of the common quiet should receive their punishment (as was the manner for Souldiers offending) in presence of the Armie. The plot was mischicuously laied: Had Meleager given way to feditious rumours, he must needes have incurred the generall hatred of all, as a fower of diffention; and thereby with publike approbation might have beene cutoff, as having often offended in that kinde : his Prince being 20 too weake a Patron. Now feeking redreffe of thefe diforders, he haftened his owne ruine, by a leffe formall, but more speedie way. This kinde of Muster was very solemne, and practifed with many ceremonies, as for cleanling of the Armie. The Horse-men, the Elephants, the Macedonian foot, the Mercenaries, were each according to their qualitic fet in array, a-part from others, as if they had beene of fundrie forts, met at aduenture: which done, the manner was to skirmish (as by way of exercife) according to direction of their feuerall Captaines. But at that time the great battaile of Macedonian Pikes, which they called the Phalanx, led by Meleager, was of purpose bestowed in a ground of disaduantage; and the countenance of the horse and Elephants beginning to give charge vpon them, was such, as discouered no je-30 fting pastime nor good intent. Kings were alwaies wont to fight among the horsemen; of which custome Perdiceas made great vse that day, to the vtter confusion of his enemics. For Aridaus was alwaies gouerned by him, which for the present had him in possession. Two or three daies before hee had sought the death of Perdicess at the infligation of Meleager : now he rides with Perdiceas vp and downe about the foot-men, commanding them to deliuer vnto the death all fuch as Perdieens required. Three hundred they were who were cast vnto the Elephants, and by them flaine, in the presence of the King who should have defended them, and of their affrighted companions. But these three hundred were not the men whose punishment Meleager had expected: they were fuch as had followed him, when he distur-40 bed the first consultation that was held about the election of a new King, and some of them his especiall friends. Having therefore kept himselfe quiet a while, as vnwilling to give offence to them which had the advantage; when hee faw their proceedings tend very manifestly to his destruction, he fled away into a Temple, which he found no Sanctuarie: for thither they fent and flew him.

The Armie being thus corrected was led into the Citie, where a new Councell of the Princes was held, who finding what manner of man their King was, divided all the Provinces of the Empire among themselves; leaving to Arideus the office of a Visitor, and yet making Perdiccas his Protector, and Commander of the forces remaining with him. Then were the funeralls of Alexander thought vpon; whose 50 bodie hauing beene seuen daies neglected, was opened, and embalmed by the Æeyptians: no ligne of poison appearing, how great soeuer the suspition might bee. The charge of his buriall was committed to Aridaus: one of the Captaines, who was two yeares preparing of a great and coftly shew, making a stately Chariot in which the corps was laied; many coarses of his friends being laied in the ground, before that of Alexander was beltowed in Alexandria, a Cittie of his owne building in Egypt.

Hilest these thinges were in doing, or presently after, Antipater and Craterus, two principall Noble-men, and inferiour to none of Alexanders followers, if not greater than any of the rest, were busied in Greece with a Warre, which the Athenians more brauely than wifely had begunne in Alexanders life, but now did profecute more boldly than before, vpon the courage which they had taken by his death. Alexander, not long before he died, had commanded that all the banished Greekes (few excepted) should be restored vnto their former places. Hee knew the factious qualitie of the Gracian Estates, and therefore thought so to prouide, that in every Citie hee would have a fure partie. But it fell out otherwise: For he lost the hearts of many more than he wanne by this proude injunction. His pleasure indeede was sulfilled; yet not without great murmuring of the whole Nation, as being against all order of Law, and a beginning of open tyrannie. The Athenians greatly decaied in cliate but retaining 20 more, than was needfull, of their ancient spirits, forbad the execution or dissessed in their Dominions; fo did alfo the Leolians, who were valiant men, and inhabited a Region well fortified by nature: yet neither of them tooke Armes, but feemed to beare themselves, as men that had done no more then they might weil justific by reason : neuerthelesse to preuent the worst, the Athenians gaue secretins ruchions to Leolihenes a Captaine of theirs, willing him to leavie an Armie, but in his owne name, and to keepe it in a readinesse for their vse. This was no hard thing for Leefthenes to doe: great numbers of Greeke Souldiers being lately returned from the Afian Warre in poore estate, as defrauded of their pay by the Captaines. Of these he had gathered up eight thou fand, when the certaine newes were brought of Alexan- 20 ders death : at which time the Citic of Athens declared it felfe, and more honorably than wifely, proclaimed open Warre against the Macedonians, for the libertic of Greec. Hereupon Leofthenes drew in the Etolians, and some other Estates, gave battaile to the Baotians, who fided with Antipater, and ouerthrew them; growing fo falt in reputation, and fo strong in Adherents; That Antipater (arming in all halt, yet suspecting his owne strength) was faine to send into Asia to Craterius for Nothing is more vaine than the feares and hopes of men, shunning or pursuing their destinies a-farre off, which deceine all mortall wisdome, even when they seeme neare at hand. One moneth was fearcely past, fince nothing so heavily burthened 40 the thoughts of Antipater as the returne of Craterus into Micedon; which hee then feared as death, but now defired as the most likely affurance of his life. Craterus, whom Alexander held as of all men the most affured vnto him, was sent into Macedon to conneigh home the old Souldiers (that was the pretence) and to succeede Antipater in the gouernement of Macedon and Greece. The fulpitions were ftrong that hee had a privile charge to put Antipater to death : neither did that which was commonly published found much better; which was, That Antipater should bee fent vnto the King, as Captaine of the yong Souldiers, newly to bee leavied in Europe. For Alexander was much incenfed against him by his Mother Olympias: and would fometimes giue out speeches testifying his owne jealousie and hatred of him that to yet he strone to smother it, which in a cruell Prince betokeneth little good. Few of Alexanders Lieutenants had escaped with life : most of them indeede were meane persons in regard of those who followed him in his Indian expedition, and were therefore (perhaps) removed to make place for their betters. But if the Kings riCHAP. 2. S.4. of the Historie of the World.

gour was fuch, ascould inderebellious purposes (for so hee interpreted enen lewd gouernement) in base persons; little might Anipater hope for, who having sitten Viceroy ten yeares in the strongest part of the Empire, was called away to the prefence of so fell a Master, and the enuie of a Court, wherein they had beene his inferiors, which would now repine to fee him their equall. Therefore whether his feare drew him to preuention, working first the Kings death by poison, given by his Son lolaus, Alexanders cup-bearer; or whether it brake not forth vntill opportunitie had changed it into the passion of reuenge, which was cruelly performed by his Sonne Callander: great cause of much searche had, which I note in this place as the ground 10 of effects to be produced in very few yeares.

At the present Crater wi was sent for, and all the Captaines of companies lying neare, follicited to make halt. Not without cause. For in Macedon there could not at that time be raifed more than thirteene thouland foot, and fixe hundryd horse; which Muster was of raw Souldiers, all the force of the Countrie being emptied into Asia. The Thessalians indeede who had long stood firme for Pining and Asyander, who also were the best horse-men of Greece, furnished him with very brage troupes, that might have done great feruice, had their faith held out, which they changed for the libertie of Greece. With these forces did Antipater in Thesalie trie the fortune of a battaile with Leofthenes; rather (as may feeme) fearing the increase 20 of his enemies power and rebellion of the Greekes, (were they not checkt at the first) than prefuming on his owne strength. For Leosthenes had of Athenians, Atolians, and Mercinaries, two and twentie thousand foot, belides the affiltance of many pettie Signories, and of some Illyrians, and Thracians: of horse hee brought into the field about two thousand and fine hundred; but ouer-strong he was that way also, when once the Thessalians had revolted vnto him. So Antipater lost the day : and his losse was fuch, that he neither was able to keepe the field, nor to make a fafe retrait into his owne Countrie: therefore he fled into the Towne of Lamia, which was well fortified, and well prouided of all thinges necessarie to beare out a siege. Thither did Leosthenes follow him, present him battaile againe, and vpon the refusal close vp the 30 Towne with earth-workes, and a wall. There will wee leave him for a-while, trauailing in the last honourable enterprise that euer was under-taken by that great Citie of ulthens.

How PERDICCAS emploied his Armie.

Ing Aridaus living under the rule of Perdiecas, when all the Princes were gone each to his owne Prouince, kept a naked Court : all his greatnesse consisting in a bare title, supported by the strength of his Protector, who cared not for him otherwise than to make vse of him. Perdices had no Province of his owne peculiar, neither was he like to be welcome to any whom hee should visit in his Gouernement. A stronger Armie then any of the rest he had, which he might easily hope in that vnsetled condition of thinges to make better worth to him than many Prouinces could have been. The better to accomplish his desires, he closely sought the marriage of Cleopatra, the sifler of Alexander; yet about the same time he either married Nicea the Daughter of Antipater, or made such loue to her as blinded their eies, who did not somewhat narrowly fearch into his doings.

Ariarathes the Cappadocian, the second of that name, and tenth King of that Countrie, had continued faithfull to the Persian Empire as long as it stood: following the example of his forefathers, even from Pharnaces the first that raigned in Cappadocia, who married Atolfa fifter to the great Cyrus. Some of his Ancesters had (indeede) beene oppressed by the Persians; but what Fortune tooke from them at one time, Vertue restored at an other, and their faithfull Princes had much increased all. But now in the farall Period of fo great an Empire, with much wifedome, and (Darius being flaine) with sufficient honour, he might have acknowledged the Magedenian in the Persians roome. This hee did not; neither did Alexander call him to account, being occupied with greater cares. But Perdiceas, who had no greater bufinesse wherein to entertaine his Armic, found it expedient both for the honour of the Empire, to take in that in-land Kingdome, furrounded with Provinces of the Macedonian conquest, and for his owne particular to have one opportune place of fure retrait, vnder the gouernement of a fledfast friend. Therefore he entred Cappallocia, fought with Ariarathes, who drew into the field thirtie thousand foot, and 15 fifteene thousand horse (astrong Armie, had it not incountred a stronger, and better trained) wanne the victoric, and thereby the whole Kingdome. But with much crueltie did he vie the victorie : for hauing taken Ariarathes prisoner with many others, hee crucified him, and as many of his Kindred as he could light vpon: and fo delinered that Prouince to Eumenes, whom of all men living he trusted most.

An other part of his forces he had committed to Python rather as to the most honourable of fuch as remained about him, than as to the most affured. Python was to Subdue the Greekes, rebelling in the high Countries of Asa. Aboue twentie thoufand foot, and three thousand horse they were, (all old Souldiers) who planted in Colonies by Alexander, to bridle the barbarous Nations, were foone wearie of their 20 vnpleafant habitations, and the rude people, among whom they lived : and therefore tooke aduantage of the present troubles to seeke vnto themselues a better fortune. Against these Python went, more desirous to make them his owne, than to deftroy them: which intent of his Perdice as discovering, did both give him in charge to put all those Rebells to the sword, giving the spoiles of them to his Souldiers, and further enjoyned it vnto Pythons Captains (his owne creatures) that they should fee this command executed. These directions for vse of the victoric might have proued needleffe; fo vncertaine was the victorie it felfe. A Captaine of the Rebells commanding over three thousand, corrupted by Python, did in the heat of the fight (which was very doubtfull) retire without necessitie to a Hill not farre off. This dif 30 maied the rest, and gaue the day to Python: who being farre enough from Perdicens, offered composition to the vanquilhed, granting vnto them their liues and libertie under condition of laying downe their armes; and hereupon he gaue them his faith. Being master of these companies her might well have a good opinion of his owne power: all power being then valued by firength in followers, when as none could vaunt himselfe as free Lord of any Territorie. He had thirteene thousand soot, and eight thousand eight hundred horse, besides these new Companions, whom needleffe feare without great loffe had caused to leave the field; but in true estimation all the greatnesse whereof Python might thinke himselfe assured, was ( and soone appeared to be) inherent in Perdecas. For by his command were ten thousand foote, 40 and eight rhousand horse, of those which followed Python, leavied; the Rulers of the Prouinces carefully obaying the letters of Perdiceas, by which they were enjoyned to giue affiftance to that bufineffe : and by vertue of the precept giuen vnto them by Perdices, did the Macedonians cut in pecces all those poore men who had yeelded themselues; leauing Python as naked as hee came forth to returne vnto his

Now was Perdicens mightie aboue the mightie, and had faire leifure to purfue his hopes of marriage with Cleopatra, and thereby to make himselfe Lord of all : but this must be fecretly carried for feare of opposition. How it succeeded will appeare, when the Lamian warre taketh ending.

out succours from his friends in Asia. Those helps not appearing so foone as he expected, he came to parle with Leofthenes, & would have yeelded vnto any termes of reason, wherewith men possessed with hope of victorie doe feldome limit their defires. Leofthenes willed him without further circumstance to submit himselfe to discretion. This was too much for him that had once commanded ouer them, who now required of him fuch a dif to honorable composition. Wherefore knowing that the extremities, from which as yet he was far enough, could bring no worse with it, Antipater prepared for the defence; and the other for winning the Towne, which felt great want of victualls. In this lingring war, the £10lians (whether wearie of fitting still at a fiege, or having bulineffe which they pretended at home) tooke their leaue, and returned into their owne Countrie. Their departure left the trenches fo thinly manned, that Antipater found meanes to fallie out vpon his enemies to their great loffe; for many were flaine, and Leosthenes himselfe among them, ere he could be repulsed into the Towne. Yet hereby the Macedonians were nothing relicued; their victualls wasted; and they were not strong enough to deale with the Greekes in open fight. Craterus was long in com-20 ming. Ly/imachus who was nearest at hand in Thrace, had work too much of his owne leading no more than 4000, foote, and 2000, horse, against Seuthus the Thracian King, who brought into the field aboue foure times that number; and though Ly/machus, not without loffe, had gotten one victorie, yet the enemie abounding in multitude felt not the blow fo much as might abate his courage. Therefore Leonatus was carneflly follicited by Antipaters friends, to make all haft to the refeue. He had the government of Phrygia the leffe, and was able to raife an Armie of more than 20000 foot, and 2500. horse, whether leavied out of his Province, or appointed vnto him out of the maine Armie, it is vncertaine. Certaine it is, that he was more willing to take in hand the journie into Greece, than Antipater was to have him come, 30 For Cleapatra had written vnto him, desiring his presence at Pella, the chiese Citic of Mucedon, and very kindly offering her felfe to be his wife; which letters he kept not so close as had been requilite, and therefore brought himselfe into great suspition. that foone ended with his life. Antiphilus, chosen Generall by the Athenians in place of Leosthenes, hearing of his approach for fooke the fiege of Lamia, and tooke the readie way to these great Conquerors of Asa, with purpose to give them an euill welcome home, before Antipater and they should joyne in one. He had (not with standing the departure of the Atolians) the advantage of Leonatus in horse, by the ods of 2000. Thessalians, in other things he was equall to him; in cause he thought himselfe Superiors in the fortune of that day he proued fo: for he wan a great victoric (chiefly by 40 vertue of the Theffalians) which appeared the greater by the end of Leonatus himselfe; who fighting valiantly was driven into a marish peece of ground, where hee found his death, which desperately he had fought among the Indians, but it waited for him at home not far from the place of his nativitie. He was the first of Alexanders Captains which died in battell, but all, or most of the rest, shall follow him the same way. After this day the Athenians did neuer any thing sutable to their ancient glorie.

The vanquished Macedonians were too weake to renew the fight, & too proud to flie. They betooke themselues to high grounds, vnfit for service on horse-back, and fo abode in fight of the enemie that day; the day following Antipater with his men came into their camp, and tooke the charge of all. The Athenians perceiving their 50 strength to be at the greatest, and searing less that of the enemic should increase did earnestly seeke to determine the matter quickly by an other battaile. But still Antipater kept himfelfe on ground of advantage: which gave more than reasonable confidence to the Greekes, many of whom departed to their homes, accounting the enemie to be vanquished. This rechlesnesse (incorrigible in an Armie of voluntaries) was very inexcufable; feeing that the victories by Land were much defaced by loffes at Sea, where the Athenians labouring to have made themselves once againe Mafters, were put to the worft.

But now the fatall captinitie of Greece came on, of which shee neuer could be delinered vnto this day. Craterus with a strong Armie hauing made great marches from Cilicia, passed ouer into Europe, and comming into Thessalie joyned himselfe with Antipater. The forces of Leonatus, Antipater, and Craterus, being joyned in one, contained fortie thousand waightily armed, three thousand light-armed men, and fiftie thousand horse; of which numbers the Greeks wanted a thousand and fine hundred in horse, in foot eighteene thousand. Carefully therefore did Antiphilus 10 labour to avoide the necessitie of a battaile, vntill such time as the Townes confederate should return evito the campe those bands which had straggled from it. But those companies were so flow in comming, and Antipater so virgent upon the Greekes, that compelled they were to put the matter in hazard without further attendance. Like enough it is, that with a little more helpe they had carried away the victorie: for the Thestalians had the upper hand, and held it, untill such time as they perceived their battailes (ouer-laied with multitude) retire vnto the higher grounds, which caused them also to fall back. So the Macedonians became Lords of the field, having little eife to boait of, confidering that with the loffe of a hundred and thirtie men, they had purchased only the death of some fine hundred enemies. Yet hereof was 20 great vse made. For the Greekes, as not subject vnto the full command of one Generall, and being euerie one defirous to preferue his owne estate, and Citie; concluded to make a treatie of peace with Antipater; who being a fubtile artificer, & well vnderstanding their aptneffeto divilion, refused to hearken to any generall composition. but willed enery Citie to deale apart for it selfe. The intent of his deuise was so apparent, that it was rejected; the Greekes choosing rather to abide the comming of their Affaithents, whose vnreasonable carelesnesse betraied the cause. Antipater and Craterus belieging & winning some townes in Theffalie, which the armie of the Confederates wanted meanes & courage to relieue, wearied that Nation from attending any longer vpon other mens vnlikely hopes, with their owne affured and prefent calamitie. 20

Q. VI.
Of the peace granted to Athens by Antipater. Of Demosthe-NES his death.

He Thessalians falling of, all the rest soone followed severally, and sued for peace; the gentle conditions given to the most forward inuiting fuch as were flack. Only the Athenians and Atolians held out. Little favour could they hope for, having beene Authors of this tumult; and their feare was not great; the feate of the warre being farre from them. But the celeritie of Antipater confounded all their imaginations; who fate 40 fill at Athens, denifing yoon courfes of profecuting the Warre to come, which came to their dores, before their consultation could finde iffue. He was readie to enter vpon their Frontiers; they had no abilitie to refift, and were as heartlesse as friendlesse. All that remained was to fend Embaffadors desiring peace upon some good termes: necessitie enforcing them to have accepted even the very worst. Phecion, with Demades the Orator, and Xenocrates the Philosopher, were chiefe of this Embassage; Phocion as the most Honorable; Demades as a strong Perswader; (both of them well respected by Antipater), and Xenocrates, as one admired for wisedome, gravitie of manners, and vertue; but all these ornaments consisting in speculation, and therefore of leffe regard, when their admiration was to cost much in reall effects.

Antipater calling to minde the pride of Leofthenes, required of the Athenians that they should wholly submit themselues to his pleasure; which being (perforce) granted, he commanded them to defray the charges of the warre past, to pay a fine, and entertaine a Garrison. Further, he abrogated the popular estate, committing the government of the Citie to those of most wealth, depriving of the related this frage all fuch as wanted a conucnient proportion of riches.

About nine thousand they were, all men of good substance, to whom the adminiffration of the Common-wealth was given; a number great enough to retaine the name and forme of a Democratie. But the rafcall multitude of beggarly perfors, accuftomed to get their huings out of the common troubles, being now debarred from bearing offices and giving their voices, cried out that this was a meere oligarche, the violent viurpation of a few incroaching vpon the publike right. These turbulent fellowes (of whom King Philip had beene wont to fay, T hat warre to them was peace, and peace warre) Antipater planted in Thrace, and gaue them lands to manure; leauing as few of them as he could to moleft the quiet of Athens.

To the same end (yet withall for satisfying his owne suspitions and hatted) hee caused Demosthenes and Hyperides famous Orators, with some others to bee flaine. Had the death of these two, especially of Demosthenes, beene forborne, the rest of his proceedings in this action might well have patied for very milde: whereas now all fuch, as either are delighted with the Orations of Lemofficenes, or have fur-rendred their judgements to Authors justly admiring him, as the most eloquent of all that ever did speake and write, condemne him vtterly, calling him a blood intyrant. Such grace and reputation doe the learned arts finde in all civill Nations, that the ex-20 uill done to a man, famous in one of them, is able to blemith any action, how good focuer otherwife it be, or honourably carried.

Demostheres had taken Sanctuarie in the Temple of Neptune, in the Isle of Calauria; there did Archias (fent with Souldiers by Antipater for the purpose) finde him, and gently perfeade him to leaue the place, but not fo preuailing he threatned violence. Then Demollhenes, entreating a little respit as it had beene to write fomewhat, secretly tooke poison which he had kept for such a necessitie, and so died; rather chooling to doe the last execution upon himselfe, than to fall into the hands of fuch as hated him. Only this act of his (commendable, perhaps, in a Heathert man) argued some valour in him; who was otherwise too much a coward in bat-20 taile, howfocuer valiant in perfuading to enterprifes, wherein the way to very honourable ends was to be made through passages exceeding dangerous. Hee loued monie well, and had great fummes given him by the Perfian, to encourage him, in finding worke for the Accedonians at home. Neither did bee ill (me thinkes) in taking from the Persians which loued not his Countrie, great rewards, for speaking fuch thinges as tended to his Countries good; which hee did not cease to procure, when the Persians were no longer able to give him recompence. Such as in tender contemplation of his death can indure no honourable, though true, mention of Antipater, may (if they can) beleeue Lucian, who tells vs, That it was Antipaters purpose to have done him great honour. Sure it is, that he was a steadfast enemie to the 40 Macedonians; therefore diferetion required that he should be cut off.

The matters of Athens being thus ordered, the chiefe command was left in the handes of Phocion, a vertuous man, and louer of his Countrie, yet applying himfelfe to the necessitie of the times; by which commendations he had both at other times done the Citic much good, and now procured this peace, which (though gricnous to free-men, yet fauourable to the vanquilhed ) hee endeuoured carefully to

How Craterys and Antipathe were drawne from their Ætolian Warres into Afia. The grounds of the first civill Warre betweene the Macedonian Lords.

O Antipater with Craterus returned into Macedonia, where they firengthned their friendship with a new alliance; Craterus taking Philips Ia, the Daughter of Antipater, to Wife.

Shortly after they went against the £tolians, whose pouertie was 10 not so cally danted, as the luxurious wealth of the more powerfull State of Athens had beene. Their Countrie was rough and mountainous, hauing many places of great faitheffe, into which they conneied such of their goods as they most esteemed, and of their people, as were least fit for warre : with the rest they fortified the strongest of their Cities, and so abode the comming of the Macedonians, whom they manfully relifted. With great obstinacie did the Macedonians contend against the difficulties of the places, which the Atolians made good as long as their victualls held out. But when Craterus had thut vp all paffages, and vtterly debarred them of reliefe; then were they put to a miserable choice; either to descend from their strong holds, and fight upon equall ground, with unequal numbers; or to en- 20 dure the miseries of hunger and cold, against which they could make no long resiflance; or to yeeld themselves to the Macedonians : who incensed by the losse of many good Souldiers, were not like to leaue fo stubborne enemies in places, which might give confidence to rebellion. In cases of extremitie, much finenesse of wit apprehending all circumstances of danger commonly doth more hurt, than a blunt consideration of that only, which at the present is in hand. These Atolians did not as yet want meat; but their enemies daily molefled them : wherefore as yet they thought vpon nothing but fighting. Fortune was gratious to their courage. For fuch newes came out of Asia into the Macedonian campe, as made Antipater and Craterus thinke every houre a moneth, till they had rid their handes of these Atolians, 30 giuing them what soeuer conditions they would aske; yet with purpose to call them to seucre account; yea, to roote them out of Greece by death, or by captiuitic, when once they should have settled the affaires of Asa; as they hoped and desired. But of mens purposes God is the disposer : in whose high Councell it was ordained , that this poore Nation should continue a troublesome barre to the proceedings of Macedon and Greece, and (when time had ripened the next Monarchie) an open gate to let the Roman Conquerors into those and other Provinces. Likewise concerning the matters of Alia, the reformation intended by Antipater and Craterus, was so farre from taking effect, that it served meerely as an introduction to all the civil warres

The grounds of the Aflatique expedition, which did fet the World in an vp-rore, were thefe. Anipter and Craterus were of Alexarders Captaines the mightieft in reputation: The one, in regard of his ancient precedencie, and the prefent rule which he bare in the parts of Europe: The other, as of all men the best beloued, and most respected, both of Alexarder and of the whole Armie. Next vnto these had Perdicas beene; whom the aduantage of his presence at the Kings death did make equall, or superiour, to either of these, is not to both together. The first intents of Perdicas were, to haue conforted with these two, and to haue beene with them a third partner in the gouernement of all: to which purpose hee entertained the discourse of marriage with one of Anipators Daughters. But seeling in short space the great of that gale of winde which bore him vp, he began to take wing and soare quite an other way. Aridasu was a very simple man, yet served well enough to weare the title of that Majestie, whereof Perdicas being Administrator, and hoping to become proprietarie, the practife was more seuere than ab beene in the daies of Alexarders.

ander: the delire to feeme terrible, being very familiar with weake Princes, and their ambitious Officers, who know no other meanes of preferring themfelius from contempt, and of guing finch a fire lufter to their actions, as may dazell the cies of the beholders. How cruelly the poore Greekes in the higher Jia were all put to the fivord; and how tyrannoully the King and Princes of Cappadota were crucified, hat alreadie beene flowed. The Prificans were the next who felt the winth of these counterfait Alexanders. One Citie of theirs was viterly razed; the children fold for flaues; and all the reft maffacted. The Jiantians by this example growned eliperate, when after two or three daies triall they found themselues vinable to continue the defence, lock themselues into their houses and set the Towne on fire, included flame whereof the yong-men did throw themselues, after that they had a while repelled the Micedonians from the walls.

These exploits being performed, the Armie had no other worke than to lift the ashes of the burnt Citie for gold and silver; but Perdice is had businesse of greater importance troubling his braines. Nothing was more contrarie to his ends, than to fit ftill without imploiment : letting his Souldiers grow idle about him, whileft others grew great, and tooke deepe roote in their feuerall Provinces. Hee purposed therefore to transport his forces into Europe, vnder pretence of bringing the King into Macedonia, the feate of his Ancestors, and head of the Empire. The Kings 20 presence would make the offices of his Viceroies (during the time) aftually voide: Intipater with Craterus being once in case of private men, and only Peraiceas holding authoritie, the match with Cleapatra might eafily bee made. So should greatnesse meete with a good title; and what more could be wished? Some impediment the power of Ptolomie might give, who held Egypt, well fortified with men, but much better with loue of the people; yet if the businesse prospered in Ascedonia. like enough it was that either Ptolomie would follow of himselfe, or bee driven to come to reason. Antigonus likewise then gouerning in Phrygia, a busic-headed man, and ill affected to the fide, was to bee looked into, and made away, for feare of further trouble. So thought Perdiceas; and was deceived in fo thinking. Antigonus 30 was as good a man of warre, of as deepe a judgement, as high a spirit, and as great vndertaking, as any of Alexanders Captaines. His imploiments had beene leffe than fome of theirs, which made him also the lefferespected. But his thoughts were as proud as theirs: for, he valued himselfe by his owne worth, not by the opinions of other men; with carefull attention had hee watched Perdiceas, and founded the depth of his purposes, which it was now high time to discover. For Perdiceas hauing with a jealous eye pried into the demeanour of Antigonus, and finding him no way fit for his turne, caused him to be charged with such accusations, as might suffice to take away his life, especially by a Judge that sought his death. This deuise Antigonus would not feeme to perceive, but prepared himselfe in shew to make an-40 fwere, indeede, to make escape, which easily he did, putting himselfe and his sonne

PERDICCAS his voiage into Agypt, and his death.

REDUCEAS, vncertaine which way to bend his maine power, at the length refolued to be youn Pidomies; leaving Emmens to keepe to his vie, against Craterin and Intipace, the parts of The bordering youn Emopo.

It may feeme frange, that hee did not rather make head against those who were to come out of Greece with a great number, and of more able men to that Professic Could bring. Perhaps he though, to make a quick end with Professic; or belieued that Grateria would not be readie for him foone enough. Sure it is that he tooke a bad course, and made it work with hil handling.

Ptolomie by his fweet behaviour allured many to his partie, without helpe of any bad arts. Perdices contrariwife was full of infolencie, which nener faileth to bee rewarded with batted; that is truely defined. An affection founded vpon opinion of an unjust contempt. The whole storic of his proceedings in Agypt is not worth relating : for he did nothing of importance ; but (as a wilfull man ) tired his followers, and walted them in hard enterprifes without fuccess. His most forecable attempt was upon a little Towne, called the Camels Wall: thither hee marched by 20 night, with more hall than good speede; for Protomie preuenting him, did put himfelte into the place, where behaving himfelfe not only as a good Commander, but as a flout Souldier, hee gaue the foile to Perdicens, cauling him to retire with loffe; after a vehement, but vaine, affault continued one whole day. The night following, Perdiceas made an other journie, (which was his laft) and came to the divisions of Nilus, ouer against Memphis. There with much difficultie hee beganne to passe ouer his Armie into an Iland, where he meant to incampe. The current was strong. the water deepe, and hardly foordable. Wherefore he placed his Elephants aboue the paffage, to breake the violence of the streame, and his horse-men beneath it : to take vp fuch as were carried away by fwiftnesse of the water. A great part of his Ar- 30 mic being arrived on the further banke, the channell beganne to waxe deepe; fo that whereas the former companies had waded up to the chinne, they who should have followed could finde no footing. Whether this came by rifing of the water. or flitting away of the ground; (the earth being broken with the feet of so manie Men. Horfe, and Elephants) no remedie there was, but fuch as had paffed muftrepaffe againe, as well as they might: for they were too weake for the enemie, and could not be relieved by their fellowes. With great confusion therefore they committed themselves to the River, wherein above two thousand of them perished. a thousand were denoured by Crocodiles; a miserable spectacle even to such as were out of danger; fuch as were ftrong and could fwimme recourred the Campe; many 40 were carried down the ftreame, and driven to the contrarie banks, where they fell into the handes of their enemics.

This misfortune exafperated the Souldiers againft their Generall, giving libertic to their tongues which long time had concealed the cuill thoughts of their hearts. While they were thus murning news came from Ptelomns, which did let them in an vp-rore. Ptelomic had not only blewed much compallion on those who fell into his handes alive, but performed all rights of funerall to the dead carcases, which the River had cast upon his fide; and finally, funt their bones and ashes to bee interred by their Kinsinen or Friends. This did not only move the common Souldier, but made the Captaines fall to mutinic, thinking it vnreasonable to make warre upon to 50 vertuous and honorable a person, to fussil the pleasure of a Lordly ambitious man, vsing them like shaues. The sedition growing strong wanted only a head, which it quickly sound. Pathon was there, who inwardly hated Perdicase, for the disgrace which hee had suffered by his procurement, after the victoric vpont the rebellious Greekes. Python had liaed in honourable place about Accusades, he was it the diufion of the Prouinces made Gouernour of Media; hee had followed Perdiaeus, and being in all thinges (the Protectorthip excepted) equall to him, had neuertheleffe beene feornefully vfed by him, which now he required. Drawing together a hundred of the Capitaieus, and a good part of the horfe, which conflited of the Gentries (the foot-men hauing declared themfelues before) he entred the Tent of Perdiaeus, where without further circumflance they all ranne vpon him, and few him. Such end had the proud mifgouerning authoritie of Perdiaeus. Hee might haueliued as great as any, could be haue fuffered any as great as him felfe yea, peraduenture matter of the felf had be not beene too malterly ouer those which were alreaded his.

The next day Prolomic came into the campe, where he was joyfully received; he excueded himfelf of thinges path, as not having beene Author, or given caufe of the Warre, and was cally believed; the favour of the Armie being fuch toward him, that needes they would have made him Protector in the roome of Predicess. But this her critical, I twas an office fit for one, that would feeke to increase his great-neffe with his trouble. Prolomic was well enough alreadie; wherefore, for his owne quite he forbare to accept it, and for their well-defenting of him hee procured that honourable charge to Python, and to Ariskaus the Captaine, who having had fome companies of Souldiers, to furniff with their attendance the folemnities of Alexan-20 deep Functalls, did with them adhere to him againft Perdicus.

In the middeft of these businesses are newes of two great victories obtained by Eumenes; which newes, had they arrived two or three daies sooner, had beene carterianed with joyfull acclamations; and would have given such reputation to Podescas, as had caused both his private maligners to continue his open flatterers, and his open enemies to have accepted any tolerable composition. But these good tidings comming in ill time, when death had stopped the cares which would have given them well-come, found bad acceptance, as shall be showed hereafter.

Efore wee proceede in the relation of thinges, happening about the person of the King, it is meete that wee speake of those businesses in the lower Afs., which were handled by Eumens with notable dexteritie, while the Perdicess was occupied in the Agyptian warres. Aleass, the brother of Perdicess, and Meoptolemus, hadreceived command from Perdices to be affiltant to Eumenes, and to follow his directions. But Alcetas made flat answere, That he would not; alleaging the backwardnesse of his men to 40 beare armes against so great a person as Antipater, and a man so much honoured as Craterus. Neoptolemus was content to make faire shew, but inwardly he repined at the Precedencie given to Eumenes, as thinking himselfe the better man. Eumenes difcouering, through the counterfaited lookes of Neoptolemus, the mischiefe lurking in his heart, wisely diffembled with him, in hope to winne him by gentle behauiour, and sweet language, that commonly are lost, when bestowed upon arrogant creatures. Yet the better to fortifie himselfe, that hee might stand vpon his owne firength, he raifed out of the Countries under his jurisdiction, about fixe thousand horse, giving many privileges to such as were serviceable, and training them well vp. Not without great neede. For when vpon aduertisement of the great preparations 50 made by Craterus and Antipater (who had newly passed the Hellespont) for the inuafion of his Provinces, hee willed Neoptolemus to come to him with all his power. Neaptalemus did (indeede) aduance, but in hostile manner, though vnprouoked, prefented him battaile. Neoptolemus had fecretly couenanted with Antipater to lay open the way for him to the conquest of Asia, which now intending to performe, he was thamefully disappointed. For though his foot-men, being all Macedonians, had much the better, and premailed farre you Emmens his battailes; yet were his horfe driuen out of the field, and himfelle compelled, with a few of them, to runne away, leaving naked the backs of his Macedonian foot-men, to bee charged by Emmens, who forced them in fuch wife, that casting downe their Pikes they cried for mercie, and gladly tooks their oath to doe him faithfull feruice. Ontipates and Criteria endeuored with many goodly promises to draw Emmens into their focietic, who contrariwise offered limitles, as meane of reconciliation, between Perdicare and Criteria, whom he dearely loued; professing withall his hatred to Matapates, and confiant him to the cause which he had vulcturate no maintained.

Whilest these negotiations were on foor, Neoptolemus came with his broken crew to Antipater, and his Affociates, vilifying Eumenes, and calling him a Scribe (at which foolith railing they laught) but extolling the vertue of Craterus (as well hee might) with high commendations; affuring them, that if Craterus did but once appeare, or that his voice were but heard by any Officedonian in Eumenes his Campe, the victorie was wonne, for they would all forth-with repolt vnto him. Earnefly therefore he defired them to give him aide against Eumenes, and especially requested that Craterus might have the leading of the Armie to be sent. Their owne affections did easily leade them to condescend to his motion; and good hope there was, that the reputation of Craterus might prevaile as much, as the force which hee drew along, 20 For he had in the middeft of Alexanders vanities, when others (imitating their King) betooke themselues to the Persian fashions of garments and customes, retained the ancient Macedonian forme of behauiour, and apparrell; whereby hee became verie gratious with the common Souldiers, who beheld these new tricks of Asia, with discontented eies, as reproachfull and derogatorie to the manners of their native countrie. So Antipater tooke the way toward Cilicia, to hold Perdiceas at bay, and to joyne with Piel mic. Craterus vied great celeritie, to haue taken Eumenes reuelling (as he hoped) according to the common falhion of Captaines after a great victorie. But hee had a warie and well aduised enemie to encounter, who kept good espiall vpon him, and with much wisedome foresaw all that was to bee feared, and the 20 meanes of preuention, which his courage did not faile to execute.

Eumenes was not ignorant, that Craterus was able to defeat him without battaile, yea without stroke; him therefore he feared more than the Armie following him: (yet the Armie following him was fuch as much exceeded his owne in footmen, but was inferiour in horse-men) and thought it more vneasse to keepe the Macedonians from revolting to him, than from knowing him. Hereupon hee tooke in hand a strange peece of worke, which desperation of all courses else taught him, and wife managing, prosperously accomplished. Hee gaue out reports that Neoptolemus was returned with fuch companie as hee could gather together, and had gotten Pigres (a Captaine of no great estimation, who lay not farre off) to joyne with him. Ha- 40 uing animated his men against Neoptolemus, whom hee knew to be despised and bated among them, (as bauing been vanquilhed by some of them, and for saken others in plaine field, whileft they valiantly fought in his quarrell ) hee tooke great care to keepethem from receining any intelligence of the enemies matters. Peremptorily he commanded, that no Messenger nor Trumpetter should bee admitted; and not herewith fatisfied, he placed against Craterus no one Micedonian, nor any other that much would have regarded him had he beene knowne : but Thracians, Cappadorians, and Persians, under the leading of such, as thought more highly of none, than of Perdice, s and himfelfe. To these also begave in charge, that without speaking or hearkening to any word, they should runne vpon the enemie, and give him no leifure to 59 fay or doe any thing, but fight. The directions which he gaue to others, he did not faile to execute in his owne person: but placing himselfe in the right wing of his battaile, opposite to Neoptolemus, who (as heavnderstood) conducted the left wing on the contrarie fide, hee held the Macedonians arranged in good order, and readie to charge the enemie as floone as the diffance would give leave. A riling peece of ground lay between them, which having aftended, the Armies diffeouered each other: but that of Eumenes every way prepared for the light, the other wearied with long journes; which ouer-habily they had made, Leking the deceitfull iffue of friuolous hopes. Then was it high time for Crateria (having fields in turpriling them as enemies), to diffeouer himelifeteo his old friends and hillow-fouldiers; of whom hee could fee none. Phanica Trainting, and Artabezua Perfun, had the leading of that fide, who mindfull of their infurctions beganne to give youn him, with fuch countenance as told him his errour; which to redeeme, he bad his men fight and winne to the day, and take the fpoile to them felius. But the Beare who se kinne hee sells is not yet caught. The ground whereon the battaile was sought gaue most aduantage to the horse, who encountred very roughly on all parts; especially about Emments and Neoptolemus, who as soone as they had discoursed one an other could not containe them selves, but with great rage met bodic to bodic, and letting loofe their bridlesgrappled so violently together; that their horses ranne from whet rhem, leaving both of them tumbling on the ground. Neoptolemus rose first vp, but Emmenes had his sword inthe drawne, where-with hee houghed the other; causing him to fall downe and sight vpon one knee. In this conflict they receited many wounds, but Neoptolemus guing suing light ones tooke sinch as were deadly, by which hee died in the 30 place, and was there (being halfe-dead halfe-aliue) ftripped by his mortall enemic, whose reultings hee required, lying even at the last gaspe, with one wound in the groine, dangerous had it not wanted force. The death of Neopolemus cause this hollowers to runne away you not espure, and seeks shelter behind the battailes of their foot. They were nothing hotly pursued. For Eumenes pained himselfe to carrie succour to his left wing, which he suppeded much to be distribed byte sound accompanied with the same fortune, that had affished him when he sought in person. Craterus had gallantly borne himsele a while and suffained the impersion of artabasus and Pharms, with more courage than force; holding in tothing agreeable with his honour to retire and protract the sight, when hee was charged by men of little clitical.

30 mation or note. Otherwise it is not valikely, that he might hauseither carried the day, or preferued himfelf: to a better aduenture by giuing ground, as the refl (when he and Aeopeleems were flaine) did. But whileft he fought to preferue his reputation, he loft his life by the fall of his horfe, or his falling from his horfe, through force of a wound received; you which accident he ewas trampled under foot by many that knew him not, and so perilhed vriknowne, till it was too late to know it. Euncus recomming to the place where hee lay madegreat lamentation, as having alwaics loued and honoured O-Leius, of whole death hee was now become the influencent. The vanquilhed Armic entertained a Treatic of peace with Euncus; making flew of willingnesses to become this followers, but their intent was only to refush them 49 feltues, which (by his permission) having done, they stale away by night, and fled toward Antipater.

Toward Amplier.

This bartaile fought within ten daies of the former wanne to Eumenes more reputation than good will: for his owne Souldiers rooke the death of Craterus heauily; and the Armies lying further off were imaged with the newes. But other matters there were which incenfed men againft him, befides the death of Craterus, whereof it manifetly appeared, that hee was as for it as any that pretended greater heatineffe. His Armic wanted pay. This was a great fault; which he wifely amended, by giving to them the fpoile of fuch Townes as were ill-affected to him. So hee redeemed the loue of his sowne men, who of their meere motion appointed varo him.

50 a guard for defence of his perfon. Others were not fo easie to be reconciled. They who had beene Traitors to Perdicas hated him for his faithfulnesse, as greatly, as they thought that he would have them for their fallfhood; neither found they any lairer way of excursing their lair evoids, that by a reading and condemning the side which they had for faken. Wherefore they proclaimed Eumenes a Traiter, and condemned him to die: but it was an eatier matter to giue that sentence, than to put it in execution.

Quarrells betweene Evry dici the Queene, and Python the Protector.

Python resignes his office, into which Antipater is chosen.

Y THO N and Arideus being chosen Protectors of King Arideus, and 10 the children of Alexander, tooke the way to Arithelese, conducting the Armic through Syria. Of these two Python was the greater in reputation, yet farre too weake to suffaine so important a charge. For Eurydiee, wise to King Arideus, was come to her husband, a Lacke of a masculine spirit, well undertlanding what thee was or should be, and thinking her selfe able to support the waight which Fortune had laied upon her foolish husband, being due to her owne tule. Her Mother Cynn, sister to Alexander by her father King Philip, was married (as hath beene shewed) to Annua, who was right Heire to the Kingdome of Macedon, being the only sonne of King Praiceas, Philips elder brother.

This Cyna was a warlike woman; thee had led Armies; and (as a true fifter of Alexander) fighting hand to hand with Caria Queene of the Phrygians, a Virago like vnto her selfe, had slaine her. Shee brought up this Eurydice in the same vnwomanly art of warre, who now among the Souldiers beganne to put in practice the rudiments of her education, to the small contentment of Python, that could not brooke her curious intermedling in his charge. Whether it were so that Python had some purpose to advance the some of Alexander by Roxane, to the Kingdome; (as once he had fought to doe) or whether the Queene did suspect him of some such intents or whether only defire of rule caused her to quarrell with him; quarrell shee did, which disturbed the proceeding against Eumenes. The Armie having shaken off 30 Such a ranke-rider as Perdiceas, would not afterward be reined with a twined threed. Python bearing himselfe vpon his office took vpon him to give directions in the kings name, which the Oucene did oftentimes controll, ving the same name, with more authoritie, and better liking of the Souldiers. Python, seeing this, would needes refigne his office, whether vpon wearineffe of the contentions daily growing, or on purpose to bring the Queene into enuic, it is vncertaine. Perhaps he thought, that now being the farre worthiest man in the Campe, he should be intreated to retaine the place, and have his authoritie confirmed, or (as might be) increased, were it but for want of a fit Successiour. Eurydice was nothing forrie at this course; for now shee thought to manage the affaires of the Empire at her owne wil, being freed from the 40 troublesome assistance of a Protector. But the Souldiers disappointed both her and Python, of their contrarie expectations: choosing Antipater, the only powerfull man of Alexanders Captaines, then living, into the roome of Python. Hereat the Queene fretted exceedingly, and beganne to deale earneftly with the Macedonians, that they should acknowledge no Lord faue only the King their Soueraigne. Yet shee failed of her purpose, being hindred (as may seeme) by three thinges: the apparent weakenesse of her husband : the growth of Alexanders children, who (though borne of outlandish women) were bred in the Macedonian campe; and the mightinesse of Antipater, who commanding a great Armie neare at hand arrived in few daies at the campe, and enforced Eury dice to hold her selfe content. Intipater was 50 of such power that hee needed not to worke by any close denises, as Perdicens had done; he had no concurrents; all the Gouernours of Provinces that remained alive acknowledged him their better; yea, many of them he displaced out of hand, putting others in their roomes. This done, he tooke the King, Queene, and Princes along with him into Macedonia, leauing Antigonia Generall of the Royall Armie: to whom for his good feruices done, and to be done against Eumenes, hee gane the rule of Sufiana, befides his former Provinces, and committed into his hands the gouernment of Asia during that warre.

X I.

Anticonvs Lieuctenant of Allawinnes a battaile of Evmenes, and beflegeth limin Nora: He vanquisheth other sollowers of Pendicons,

Ere beginnes the greatness of Antigenus, whose power in sew yeares of our growing the rest wanted lite of spreading it sells ouer the whole Monarchie. Hee was to make warre you Eumenes, Alectus the brother, and Astalus the brother in-law to Persitess: worke enough to keepe his Armie imployed in the publike seruice, till such time as hee might find occasion to make vse of it in his owne businesse. The first of these which hevndertooke was Eumenes, with whom Alcetus and Attalus refused to joyne, hauing vnscasonably contended with him in time of common danger about the chiefe place. Eumenes had an Armie strong in number, courage, and all needfull pronisions: 20 but obedient only at discretion. Therefore Antigonus tried all waves of corrupting his Souldiers; tempting first the whole Armie with letters: which practife failing by the cunning of Eumenes (who made shew as if hee himselfe had scattered abroad those letters to trie the faith of his men) he dealt apart with such Captaines, as hee thought most easie to be wonne. Of these Captaines one rebelled, breaking out too haftily before any helpe was neere him, yet looking to carelefly to himfelfe, that he and his were furprised, when he thought his enemies farre off. An other follower of Eumenes (or rather of good fortune, which he thought now to be in companie with Antigonia) kept his treacherie secret, referring it for the time of execution. Vpon confidence of the treason which this falle man Apollonides had undertaken, Antigonias 30 presented battaile to Eumenes; in the heate wherof Apollonides, Generall of the horse to Eumenes, fled ouer to the contrarie fide, with fuch as he could get to follow him : but was closely followed by fome, whose companie he defired not. Eumenes, perceiuing the irrecouerable mischiefe which this traiterous practise brought upon him, purfued the villain, and cut him off before he could thrust himselfe into the troupes of Antigonus, and boast of his treacherie. This was some comfort to Eumenes in the toffe of that battaile, which disabled him vtterly to keepe the field, and left it very hard for him to make a fafe retrait. Yet one thing he did which much amafed his enemies, and (though a matter of small importance) caused Antigonia himselfe to admire his high resolution. It was held no small part of the victorie to get possession 40 on of the dead bodies. Eumenes, whilest Antigonus held him in chace, turned out of the way, and fetching a compasse returned to the place where the battaile had been fought; there he burned (according to the maner of the time) the bodies of his own men, and interred the bones and alhes of the Captaines, and common Souldiers, apart, railing vp heapes of earth as Mountaines over them, and so went his way. As this bold aduenture bred in the Macedonians, (returned to their campe) great admiration of his braue spirit : so the newes which Menander (who was set to looke vnto their cariages) brought and published among them, entited them to love him as their honourable friend. He had found Menander in an open Plaine, careleffe, as after an affured victorie, and loaden with the spoyles of many Nations, the rewards of 50 their long feruice; all which he might haue taken: but fearing least such a purchase should proue a heavie burthen to him, whose chiefe hope consisted in swift expedition, he gaue secret warning to Menander to flie to the mountaines, whilest he detained his men (whom authoritie could not have restrained) by this sleight, setting them to baite their horses. The Macedonians extolled him for this courtefic, as a noble Gentleman, that had forborne when it lay in his power to strippe them out of all their wealth, and make their children flaues, and to rauish their wives: but Antigonus told them, that he had not forborne to do this out of any good wil to them; but out of meere subtilitie had avoided those precious setters, which would have hindered his speedie flight. He told them true. For Eumenes did not onely thinke all carriages to be ouer-burdensome, but the number of his men to be more troublefome than availeable in his intended course. Wherefore he sent them from him as faft as he could, withing them to thift for themselves; and retaining onely five hundred horse, and two hundred soote. When hee had wearied Antigonus awhile in following him vp and downe, he came to 2\(\text{ora}\): where againe, keeping no more a-10 hout him than necessitie required to make good the place, he louingly dismissed all the rest. Nora was a little Fortresse in the borders of Lycaonia & Cappadocia, so strongly fituated that it feemed impregnable, and so well victualed and stored with all neceffaries, that it might hold out for many yeares. Thither did Antigonio followe him, with more detire to make him his friend, than to vanquish him in warre. To this purpose he entertained parlee with him, but in vaine. For whereas Antigonus offered him pardon, and his loue; Eumenes required restitution of his Provinces, which could not be granted without Antipaters consent. Then was Nora closed vp; where Antigonus leaving sufficient strength for continuance of the siege, tooke his journie into Pisidia against Alcetus and Attalus, with whom hee made short worke. 20 He came vpon them vnexpected, and feifed on paffages, which wanted not men, but fuch a Captaine as Eumenes, to have defended them. Alcetus and A talus, as they had beene too fecure before his comming, fo were they too adventurous in fighting at the first fight, vpon all disaduantages; and their folly was attended with surable euent. Attalus with many principall Captaines was taken; Alcetus fled to the Citie of Termefus, wherethe love of the yonger fort was toward him fo vehement, that stopping their eares against all perswasions of the ancient men, they needes would hazzard their liues and their Countrie in his defence. Yet this availed him nothing. For the Gouernours of the Towne-hauing foretly compounded with Amigenue, caused the yong men to fally out; and vling the time of aduantage, they with their 30 fernants did fet vpon Alcetus, who vnable to refift flew himselfe. His dead body was conucied to Antigonus, and by him barbaroufly torne was calt forth without buriall. When Antigonus was gone, the yong meninterred the careasse with solemne funerals, having once beene minded to fet on fire their owne towne in revenge of his death. Such fauour had hee purchased with courteous liberalitie: but to make an able Generall, one vertue, how great focuer, is infu?ficient.

Q. XII.
PTOLOMIE winnes Syria and Phanicia. The death of ANTIPATER.

Hilest these things were in doing, the rest of the Princes lay idle, rather feeking to enjoy their Gouernments for the present, than to confirme or enlarge them. Onely Ptolomie looking abroad wanne all Syria and Phanicia: an action of great importance, but not remarkeable for any circumftance in the mannaging. He fent a Lieutenant thither with an Armie, who quickly tooke Laomedon prisoner, that ruled there by appointment of Antipater, and formerly of Perdice as; but (as may feeme) without any great ftrength of Souldiers, farre from affiltants, and vainely relying vpon the authoritie which had given him that Province, and was now occupied with greater cares, than with feeking to maintaine him in his Office.

Matipater was old and fickely, defirous of rest, and therefore contented to let Antigonus pursue the dispatch of those businesses in Asia. Hee had with him Polysperchen, one of the most ancient of Alexanders Captaines, that had lately suppreffed a dangerous infurrection of the Ætolians, which Nation had firred in the quarrell quarrell of Perdice.ts, prenailing farre at the first, but soone looting all that they had gained, whileft Antipater was abroad in his Cilician expedition. In this Poly/perchan, Antipater did reposegreat confidence; so farre foorth, that (suspecting the youth of his owne Sonne Callander of infufficiencie in so great a charge) hee bequeathed vnto him on his death-bed the Gouernment of Macedon and Greece, together with his Office of Protestorship. So Antipater died, being foure-score yeares oid, having alwavestrauailed in the great affaires of mightie Princes, with fuch reputation, that Alexander in all his greatnesse was icalous of him, and the successours of Alexander did either quietly give place vnto him, or were vnfortunate in making oppolitions. to In his private qualities he was a subtile man, temperate, frugall, and of a Philosophicall behaulour, not vulcarned, as having beene Scholler to Ariflotle, and written some Histories. He had beene much molested by Olympias, Alexanders mother, whom after the death of her Sonne hee compelled to abstaine from comming into Micedonia, or entermedling in matters of effate: yea, at his owne death he gaue efpeciall direction, that no woman should bee permitted to deale in the administration of the Empire. But this precept was foone forgotten; and yet, ere long, by forrowfull experience approued to have beene found and good.

Of POLYSPERCHON who succeeded unto ANTIPATER in the Protector-The insurrection of CASSANDER against him.

OLYSPERCHON was very skilfull in the art of warre, having long time beene Apprentife in that occupation; other qualities, requities in fo high an Office as he vnder-went, either Nature had not gitten to him, or Time had robbed him of them He mannaged his builinfife more formally, then wielly, as a man of a fecond wir, htterto affilit, than commaund in chiefe. At the first entrance vpon the stage hee called to coun-30 faile all his friends, wherein, for waightie confiderations (as they who waighed not the contrarie reasons held them) the Queene Olympias was remoked out of Epirus into Macedon, that the presence of Alexanders mother might countenance and strengthen their proceedings. For the condition of the times requiring, that the Gouernours of Provinces abroad should keepe greater Armies, than were needfull or easie to be retained about the person of the King in Macedonia; it seemed expedient, that the face of the Court should be filled with all maiestie, that might give authoritie to the Iniunctions from thence proceeding, and by an awfull regard containe within the bounds of ductic fuch as could not by force have beene kept in order, being strong, and lying too farre off.

Such care was taken for preuention of imaginarie dangers and out of fight, whilest present mischiese laie vnregarded in their bosomes. Cassander the Sonne of Antipater, was not able to discouer that great sufficiencie in Polysperchon, for which his father had reposed in him so much considence : neither could hee discerne such oddes in the qualitie of himselfe and Polysperchon, as was in their fortune. Hee was left Captaine of one thousand; which Office by practise of those times was of more importance, than the title now feemes to implie. He should thereby have beene as Campe-master, or Lieuctenant generall to the other: a place no way satisfying his ambition, that thought himselfe the better man. Therefore hee began to examine his owne power, and compare with the forces likely to oppose him. All that had 50 relied on his Father were his owne affured, especially such as commanded the Garrisons bestowed in the principall Cities of Greece. The like hope was of the Magistrates, and others of principall authoritie, in those Common-weales; whose formes had beene corrected by Antipater, that they would follow the fide, and drawe in many partakers: it concerned these men in their owne particular to adhere visco the Captains by whom their faction was vp-held; and by whom the rascall multitude, couetons of regaining the tyrannous power which they had formerly exercifed ouer the principali Citizens, were kept in order, obaying their betters perforce. Belides all their helpes, Coffander had the fecret lone of Queene Eurydice, who had in private rendered him such courtesie, as was due only to her husband. But neither the Queenes favour, nor all his other poffibilities, gaue him confidence to breake out into open rebellion; because hee faw Polysperchon much reuerenced among the Afacedonians, and firong enough to suppresse him before he could have made head. Therefore he made thew of following his pleafures in the countrie, and calling many of his friends about him, under prefence of hunting, adulfed 10 with them upon the fafelt course, and most free from all suspition. The necessitie was apparant of railing an Armie, before the bufineffe were fet on foot; and to doe this, opportunitie prefented him with faire meanes. Ptolomie had by fine force, without any commission, annexed Syria to his government of Agypt and Cyrene: this was too much either for the King to trust him with, or for him to part with. Antigonus voon the first newes of Antipaters death, beganne to lay hold voon all that he could get, in fuch fort that hee manifeltly discovered his intent of making himselfe Lord of all Mia. These two therefore stood in neede of a civill Warre; which Callander well noted, and prefumed withall, That the friendship which had passed betweene his Father and them, would availe him somewhat. Whereupon hee se- 20 cretly dispatched messengers to them both; and within a little while conneied himfelfe on a fodaine ouer the Heile pont, that he might in person advance the businesse with greater speede. Much perswasion is needlesse in winning a man to what he defireth. Anigonus coueted nothing more, than to finde Polysperchon worke by raifing some commotion in Greece. Yet (as formalities must not be neglected) Cassanster did very earnestly presse him, by the memorie of his Father, and all requisite conjurations, to affift him in this enterprife; telling him that Ptolomic was readie to declare for them, and vrging him to a speedie dispatch. Intigents on the other side repaied him with the fame coine; faying, That for his owne fake, and his dead Fathers, whom he had very dearely loued, hee would not faile to giue him all manner 20 of fuccour. Having thus feafted one an other with words, they were nothing flack in preparing the common meanes leading to their feuerall ends.

downe of Cassander.

Reat necessitie there was of timely provision. For Polysterchon necded no other instructions to informe him of Cassanders drift, than the 40 newes of his departure. He was not ignorant of the readie disposition, which might be found in Antigonus and Ptolomie, to the ftrengthning ofrebellion; and well beeknew that one principali hope of Cassander was reposed in the confidence of such as ruled in the Gracian Estate. Therefore (louing to work circumspectly,) he called an other Councel, wherein it was concluded, That the Popular forme of government should be erected in all the Cities of Greece; the Garrisons withdrawne; and that all Magistrates and principall Men, into whose handes Antipater had committed the supreame authoritie, should forthwith bee either flaine or banished. This was a fure way to diminish the number of Cassanders friends, and to raife vp many enemies to him in all quarters. Yet hereby was difclofed both an vnthankefull nature in Poly(perchon, and a factious malice in his adherents. For how could be be excused of extreme ingratitude, that for hatred of the Sonne went about to dishonour the Fathers actions, whose only bountie had inabled him to doe it? or what could bee faid in their defence, who fought to destroy many worthic men, friends to the State, by whom the Greekes were held restrained from firring against the Macedonians; and in opposition to their private Enemie; gaue the rule of thinges to base Companions, and such as naturally maligned the timpire? But as in mans bodie, through finnewes newly iffuing from one branch, a finger is more vexed by inflammation of his next Neighbour, than by any diftemper in the contrarie hand : fo in bodies politique, the humours of men, fubdiuided in faction, are more inraged by the difagrecable qualities of fuch as curbe them in their nearest purposes, than they are exasperated by the generall opposition of such as are divided from them in the maine trunke. Hereby it comes to passe, that conto trarie religions are inuited to helpe against Neighbour Princes; bordering enemies drawne in, to take part in civil warres; and ancient hatred called to counfaile against injurious friends. Of this fault Nature is not guiltie; shee bath taught the arme to offer it felfe vnto manifest losse in detence of the head: they are deprayed affections, which render men fensible of their owne particular, and forgetfull of the more generall good, for which they were created.

The decree, whereby the Greekes were presented with a vaine shew of libertie, ranne under the Kings name; but fo, as one might eafily difcerne, that Poly/perchon had guided his pen. For the maine point was, That they should follow such directions, as Poly/perchon gaue, and treat with him about all difficulties. In the reft it 20 contained fuch a deale of kindnesse, as proceeding on a sodaine from those who had kept them in hard fubjection, might well appeare to have some other root than the pretended good will; and was of it felfe too bale and unfit for a King to vie toward his conquered Subjects, and often-fubdued Rebells.

of the great commotions raised in Athens by POLYSPERCHONS decree. The death of PHOCION.

Euerthelesse the Athenians with immoderate joy entertained this happic-feeming Proclamation, and fought how to put it in execution without further delay. But Wicanor, Captaine of the Garrison, which kept one of their Hauens, called Munychia, in the lower part of the Towne, would needes take longer time of deliberation, than was pleating to their haftie defires. Quicanor, as a truftic follower of Cassander, was by him shifted into the place, and Menillus (that was Captaine there before) discharged, when In inter was newly dead. His comming to Athens was no way gratefull to the Citizens, who soone after hearing the newes of Antipaters death, cried out vpon Photion, faying, That he 40 had fufficient intelligence of that accident, and might by advertifing them in due time have put into their hands a faire opportunitie of thrusting out the Macedonians. But these exclamations argued no more than a desire to shake off the Macedonian voke. Farremore grieuoufly would they have beene offended, had they knowne the instructions, which Casander had given to Micanor, and his resolution to follow them. It was concluded, That he should not only retaine Munyelna, any injunction to the contrarie notwithstanding; but that hee should finde meanes to thrust some Companies into Piraus, and fortifie that also, which was the principall Hauen, against the high-Towne. How to accomplish this herather wanted some reasonable pretence, than good abilitie. But the Athenians were not long in giving him fuf-50 ficient cause to doe that, which he would have done without any cause given. They defired him to come vnto their Councell, affembled in the Priaus, there to confider of the Kings Proclamation; whither vpon Phocions word and fafe conduct he came, and earnestly pressed them to hold with Cassander in the warre which was readicto breake forth. Contrariwise they viged him first of all, to make them Masters of their owne, which how to we they might confult afterwards. Each of them refufing to condescend vnto the others demand; the Athenians (who did alwaies meafure justice by profit, wet seldome through by that course) practifed with Dercyllus, a Captaine following Foly (perchen, and then lying neare at hand, that he should enter into the Towne, and take Nicanor prisoner. But Photion who then governed in Athens, a man very vnlike to the reft of the Citizens, being nothing pleafed with fuch a trick of politique dilhonettie, did quietly fuffer him to depart and faue

Nicanor hereupon beganne to deuise vpon taking Pireus; not as following now the project of Callander, but profecuting his owne just revenge. He leavied as many to Souldiers as he could, and drew them closely into Munrelia: which done he iffined into Pireus, tooke it, and intrenched himfelfe therein: to the exceeding difcomfort of the Athemans, who lately impatient of his keeping the one Hauen, faw him now Matter of both. Aexander, the sonne of Polysperchon, came thither shortly after with an Armie. Then were the Citizens in great hope of recouring all, and addreffed themselves vnto him; who made faire thewes, intending meere mischiefe, which they perceived not being blinded with the vaine Epiftles of his Father, and of Olympias the old Queene. Olympias taking upon her to command, before thee durit well aduenture to returne into Mucedon, had peremptorily charged Nicanor to reflore to the Athenians the places which hee held; but hee would first confider 20 more of the matter. Polyperchan had further ordained, that the Iffe of Samue Should be rendred vnto them; a goodly offer, had it accorded with his power and meaning. He was (indeede) to farre from purpoling to let them have Samos, that as yet he did not throughly intend to let them have themselves. The commoditie of their Hauens was fuch, as he would rather get into his owne handes, than leave in theirs: yet rather wilhed in theirs, than in Caffanders. His fonne Alexander notignorant of this, made faire fliew to the Athenians, and spent much labour in communing with Nicanor, but suffered not them, for whom he seemed to labour, to entermeddle with the businesse. Hereupon the Citizens grew jealous, and the displeasure they conceited against him they powred out your Photion, depriving him of his Office. This 20 was done with much tumult: banished men and strangers, thrusting themselves into the affembly of the Citizens, who distracted with fundric passions, growing out of their present misfortunes, thought enerie one that best could inueigh against thinges palt, a most likely man to finde some remedie for the cuill threatning them. In this burlie burlie was Alexander denifing how he might come to fome good point of composition with Nicanor, and held much privice conference with him; which he could not fo fecretly carrie, but that his negotiation was discovered, whereby the vp-rore in the Towne was fo farre increased, that Phocion with many of his friends were accused, and driven to seeke saveguard of their lives by slight. So they came to Alexander, who entertained them gently, and gaue them his letters of commen- 40 dation to his Father, desiring him to take them into his protection.

Poly/perchon was in the Countrie of Phoeis, readie to enter with an Armie into Attical. Thither came Phocion with his Companions, boping well that the letters which they brought, and their owne deferts. ( having alwaies beene friends to the Macedonians, as farre as the good of their Countrie gaue leaue) should be enough to get patronage to their innocencie. Besides all this, Dinarchus a Corinthian, Polysperchons familiar friend, went along with them, (in an cuill houre) who promifed to himfelfe and them great fauour by meanes of his acquaintance. But Polysperchon was an vinitable man, very earnest in what he tooke in hand, vet, either for want of judgement in following them, or of honestie in holding the best of them, easily so changing his intended courses, and doing thinges by the halues, which made him commonly faile of good faccelle. For feare of Cassander, he had offered wonderfull kindnesse to the Athenians; this had caused them to love him cout of their love hee gathered hope of deceining them, which made him to change his minde, and feeke

how to get into his owne handes those keies, with which Cassander held them fail lockt vp; finding himfelfe disappointed of this purpose, and suspected as a false difbonourable man, hee flood watering betweene the contrarie allurements of profit and reputation. To keepe the Athenians perforce at his denotion, would indeed have done well : but the effecting of this beganne to grow desperate; and many Townes of importance in Greece beganne to call their eies you his proceeding in that action. Wherefore hee thought it the wifelt way to redeeme their good opinion, by giving all contentment vnto the popular faction, which then was growne to be Matter of that Citie. And in good time for this purpose were the Athenian 10 Embaffadours come, treading (as one may fay,) vpon Photions heeles, whom they were fent to accuse. These had solemne audience ginen to them in the Kines prefence, who was attended by many great Lords, and for oftentations fake was glorified with all exteriour showes of majestie; yet all too little to change dridew into Alexander: for hee did nothing there, but either laugh or chafe, as hee faw others. doe, For beginning of the bulineffe Polysperchon commanded that Dinarchus should be tortured and flaing: This was enough to toffifig his heartie affection to the Commonaltie of Athens, in that he spared not his old acquaintance for their sake, whose Embaffadours he then bad to speake. When their errand was done, and answere to it made by the accused, who had no indifferent hearing, Photion and the rest 20 were pronounced guiltie of treason; but to give sentence, and doe the execution vpon them, was (for Honours fake) referred vnto the Citie of Athens, because they were Burgeffes. Then were they fent away to Athens, where the rafcall multitude, not fuffering them to speake for themselves, condemned them to die. So. they perished being innocent. But the death of Phocion, a man very conspicuous, made the fortune of the reft to be of the leffe regard. Fine and fortie times had bee beene chosen Gouernour of the Citie, neuer suing for the place, but sent for when he was absent : so well was his integritic knowne, and so highly valued, even of such as were no pretenders to the fame vertue. Hee was a good Commander in Warre, wherein though his actions were not very great, yet were they of good importance. 30 and neuer vnfortunate. Neuer did the Citie repent of hauing followed his counfaile : nor any private man of having trufted his word. Philip of Macedon highly esteemed him; so, and much more did Alexander, who (besides other signes of his loue) fent him two hundred talents of filuer, and offered to bestow upon him of four Cities in Asia any one which bee would choose. But Photom refused these & other gifts, howfocuer importunately thrust you him; resting well contented with his honest poucrtie: wherein he lived aboue fourescore yeares, and then was compelled by the vajust judgement of wicked men to drinke that poifon, which by just judgement of the righteous God, so infected the Citic of Athens, as from that day forwards it never brought forth any worthie man refembling the vertue of their

Of POLYSPERCHON his vaine expedition against

CASSANDER.

Ot long after these things were done, Cassader with such forces as Antigenus lent him, entred into Piraus; which newes drew Polyfperchon head-long into Attica, with a great Armie, but so ill victualed, that he was faine to depart without any thing done. Only hee had given some impediment to the enemie; who not contented with defending what he held beganne to looke out, and make new purchases abrode. Finding therefore himselfe ynable to drive Callander out of Athens, hee left his sonne Alexander, with fuch number of men, as exceeded not the proportion of victualls, to withit and his further incroching. The greatest part of his Armie he carried into Peloponne jus; to make the Countrie fure to himselfe, wherein Cassander had many Friends.

His doings in Peloponne fus were fuch, as they had beene in other parts of Greece. First, he beganne to fight with Edicts, restoring the Democratic or Popular forme of gouernement. He commanded that the principall Citizens, that had by Antipater beene made Rulers, should be either flaine, or driven into exile. This decree tooke immediate effect in most places: the vulgar fort being very readie to feale the Charter of their freedome and authoritie, with the bloud of those who had kept them in fubicction. Yet many Cities there were, which delighted in the rule of the chiefe Citizens; and many which wished well to Casander; especially they of Megalopolis, on whom Poly/perchan meant to inflict an exemplarie punishment of disobedience to him, which he termed Rebellion. Megalopolis had in it fifteene thousand seruiceable men, well furnished of necessaries, and resoluted to endure the worst. And neede there was of fuch refolution. For Polysperchon comming thither with all his power did so much, that he ouerthrew, by a Mine, three of their Bulwarks, and all the space of wall betweene them. But the Defendants manfully repelled the Macedonians which came up to the breach; and at the fame time with great labour they raifed up an inner wall, to beare out the next affault. The Affailants having failed to carrie the Towne at the first attempt, tooke much paine to cleare the ground, 20 and make faire way for their Elephants, whose violence was likely to operthrow all that came in their way. But the townsfmen perceiuing their drift prepared boards driven through with long nailes, which they yied as gall-throps, bestowing them fleightly, couered with the points vpwards, in the way by which the beafts were to passe. Neither did they set any to encounter them in front, but appointed certaine light-armed men to beat upon their fides with Arrowes and Darts, as they were inftructed by some that had learned the manner of that fight in the Asian Warres. Of these provisions they made happie vse in the next assault. For by them were the Elephants (wherein the enemie chiefly trufted) either forely hurt, or driven back vpon the Macedonians, whom they trampled under feet. Polysperchon came as ill fir-nisht for long abode to Megalopolis, as before to Athens. Therefore being neither able to dispatch the businesse quickly, nor to take such leisure as was requilite, hee for fooke the fiege, with fome loffe, and much dishonour; leaving fome part of his Armie to lie before the Towne for his credit.

After this he fent Clitus, his Admirall, to Sea, to joyne with Aridaus that was come out of Pingus, and to cut of all fuecour which might come to the enemie out of Allo Against allo fent his whole Fleet under Naemary, who taking along with him fome thips of Antiquous, came to the propontis, where hee fought with Clitus, and was beaten. But Antiquous hearing of the out-ethrow gathered together the fluips that were cleaped, and manning them very well fent out Naemar againe, affuring him of the victoric, as well he might. For hee fart out fufficient numbers of light-armed men, whom hee had caufed to bee wafted ouer the Straights in finall Veffells by night; these before day-light fetting vpon Clitus, draue his men, that lay fecurely on the Land, head-long into their flips 3 in which turnult Niemar arriving did affaile them so lutility, that few or none cleaped him.

This loffe at Sea, rogether with his bad fuccesse by Land, brought Polysperchan into great contempt. He had a good facilite in penning bloudie decrees, but when the execution was referred to his owne fword, he could finde the matter more difficult. Wherefore the Athenians, perceiving that he had left them to shift for themselves, and was not able to give them protection against the enemic which lay in 50 their bosomes, came to agreement with Cassinary; accepting a Governour of his appointment; and refloring all thinges to the same state wherein antipater had left them. The like inclination to the partie of Cassinary, was found in very many Cities of Greece, which daily and willingly revolved with ohim, as to an industrious man, and likely to preuaile in the end. Thus was the whole Countrie set in a combustion, yneasie to be quenched; which preferred vnto Anigonus an opportunitie, that he neglected not, of making himselte Lord of Asia.

XVII.

A NTIGONYS feekes to make himfelfe an abfolute Lord: and therenpon treates with EVM 1 NES, who disappointed him. Phrygia and Lydia worne by ANTIGONYS.

NTIGONYS had in Antipaters lifetime a firmeresolution, to make vnto himfelfe the vtmost benefit that hee might of the Armie committed to his charge. And in faire season for advancement of his purposes came the newes of Antipaters death; even then, when all the busines in Pisidia was dispatched, and no more imployment for the Armie remaining, faue onely the continuance of the fiege of Nora; a small thing of it felfe, but as hard as a greater matter; and requiring few men, but much time; when time of all things was most precious. Eumenes lay in that Fort of Nova, able to make the place good, and hoping that the mutabilitie, to which the present estate was manito telly subject, would in continuance of some yeares (which hee might abide) worke more for him, than his enemies in that space could worke against him. His most feare was, that for want of exercise in that narrow Castle, his men and horses might grow fickly and vinferuiceable : which made him to practife many denifes of keeping them in health and luftic. But when he had continued thut vp in this manner about a yeare, his hopes came to good palle, and he was called of his cares by Antigoniss himfelfe, whose forces held him belieged.

Antigonus knowing the great infliciencie of Eumenes, and confidering his fidelitie shewed vnto Perdiceas, thought that he could not find in all the world a fitter man than him, to imploy in mannaging those high designes, wherein he doubted not that hee should be withstood by the mightiest Princes of the Empire. Hee sent therefore to Eumenes by one that was friend to them both, acquainting him with fome part of his intent, and promiting to make him a greater Lord than ever hee had beene, and the next man to himfelfe, if things fell out as hee defired : in regard whereof hee required onely his friendship, and thereupon sent him an oath to take; which done, heemight at his good pleasure iffue fafely out of Nora, and enjoy his perfect libertie. Eumenes peruling the forme of the oath perceived the meaning of Antigonus; which was, rather to make him his follower than his fellow. For whereas, in a few words, it mentioned the King and Princes of the bloud, rather to keepe the Decorum, than vpon any loyall intent; the binding wordes and summe of all 40 the rest were such, as tied him fast onely to Antigonia, omitting all reservation of dutie to the King or any other. This he liked not, holding it vnfeemely to become a fworne man to him, with whom hee had fought for the mastrie; and being assured that his voluntarie affiftance, which way focuer hee gaue, would be more acceptable, and farre more honourable, than the course propounded. Yet would be not therefore breake off the negotiation, and waite for some better occasion of inlargement which might perhaps beelong in comming : but seeming to bee well agreed with Antigonus, hee prepared to give vp his Holde and depart. As for the oath it felfe, when he came to take it, he made thew of diflike, in that it was not folemne enough for fuch personages as they were, who could not be too ceremonious in te-50 stifying their Allegeance. The Macedonians which lay incamped before Wora, liked his wordes, and gaue him leave to put in Olympias, and the children of Alexander, binding himselfe to them and their adherents, as well as to Antigonus; and so he deremoue fome of the Gouernours of Prouinces, behaving him felfeaccording to the authoritie which hee had received of Inipates, to exercise in the time of warre. Neither did hee want fashicine presence whereby to institute his proceedings. For if Polysperchan might lawfully hold the Protectorfup, which the old man doting on his death-bed bequeathed vinto him, as a legacie, without consent of the Princes or Souldiers; why might not bee himslife as fivell treatnet be Leintennyship of Asia, that was granted vinto him for the generall good of the State, in presence of the whole Armie, by the King, and by Antipates, who had power to ordain what should seeme convenient whilet thee lined, not to dispose of thinges that should happen after his death? To give a faire colour to his ambition, this was enough: 10 if any were not herewith statisted, he had three feorethous and footmen, ten thous fand horse, and thirtie Elephants in a reading to an offerer them.

The first that perceited his drifts, and prouided to resist him, was Aridaus Gouernour of Parzau, who sortised the Townes of his owne Province, and sought to have wonne Crastus, a faire Hauen Towne, and seated very conveniently for him, but was faine to goe away without it. Hereupon Antigonus took occasion to commaund him out of the Countrie. Aridaus was so sarresmostying him, that he sent forces to relieue Euments. Neverthels set in single that he was rable of himselfs to make long resistance, he tooke such companies as he could drawealong with him, and so passed on the survey, to complaine at the Court. The like for 10 tune had Clims, who ruled in Lysia, and sought he like remedie of his fortune, with some hope at the first (for both of them were entertained with very good wordes) which quickly vanished, and grew desperate, when they were beaten at Sea, as hath alreadie beene declared.

Notion we shawing thus gotten into his hands all, or most of Mia the lefte, was able to have entred Macedon, and leifed you the Court, which that he forbare to doe, it proceeded (as may feeme) for fome of these reasons. It would have bred as much realousse in teams of reconciliation; It would aske more time then he ecould lepare; and the enuie which followed the Protestians was fuch, as he that had power enough without the Office, ought rather to fluunc, then to pursue. Besides all this, it was 40 manifest that Eumens would not only reside to take his part, but would make war you him in defence of the Roiall house, to which it was found that Antigonus did not stand well affected. Against him therefore hee bent his course, and with an Armie of twentie thousand foote, and source thousand Horse, made great Emmens was one of those few that continued faithful to their dead master, which being well knowne in the Court, hee had commission sent who him from thence to raise an Armie, and make warre vpon Amigomus, taking of the Kings treasure as much ashee should neede. Other letters also there were directed to all the Gouer-50 nours of Provinces, requiring them to give assistance to Emmens, and bee ordered by his direction respecially to the Captaines of the olde Souldiers, called the Argundiete, or filture-sheelded bands, commandement was given to be at his appointment. He had of his old followers gathered together two thousand foot, and sue hundred horfs, before this authoritie was giuen him: but now he purposed with all the strength which her could make, to fight with Antigonus in defence of the Roiall bloud. Oipnass had written to him, deliring him to bring helpe to her and her Nephew the sonne of Alexander; and in the meane time to giue her his aduice in that which Possippershon required of her: for shee was delirous to returne into Macadon, but suffected his ambition, as not contained within lawfull bounds. Emmens therefore counselled her to remaine in Epirus, till such time as he could bring the warre to a good tille; which done, hee promised that his faith and care should not he wantine to the feed of Alexander.

Strange it is to confider, that in all the Empire Carce any one could bee found among the Noble-men, in whom Alexanders mother, wines, and children, might repole firme confidence, fauing onely this Eumenes, a stranger to the Alexa. Entire bloud, borne at Cardas, a Citic of Thrace. His reputation was no more than his owne vertue had made it, his followers obeyed at their ownediferction; and compelled hee was to trausile as Farre as Per flat to gather together an Armie sufficient, to result the enemies that pursued his becles.

How the Princes of Macedon flood affected mutually. OLYMPIAS takes ARIDEVS and EVRYDICE, whom shee cruelly puts to death.

Ow, forasimuch as in this present warre all the Rulers of the Prouinces did entermeddle; and great alterations happened, not onely in the parts of Asia, but Micedon it selfe, which brought a new face vince the State, by the extirpation of the rotall house of Patipa and Alexander: I hold it conucnient in this place, before we enter into the parti-

30 culars of the warre it felfe, to flow breifly how the great ones did mutually trand affected; and by what paffions they were drawne into those courses, which ouer-threw most of them, and out of their ruines built the greatnesse of a few as a likewise to what extremitie the fraction brake out in Macedon it felfe; about the maine controuersic of title to the Crowne, whereupon all other quarrels were or should have beene depending.

Aridaus the King, being simple and fearefull, did onely what hee was bidden.

Polysperchan, desirous to continue long in Office, had a purpose to advance the fonne of Alexander by Roxane to the Kingdome, and become Governour to a King 4° of his owne making.

Eurydice the Queene discoucring plainly this intent, and meaning nothing lesse than to let her husband serue as a Stale, keeping the throne warme till another were growne old enough to sit in it, grew acquainted with Cassander, who hated the memory of Accounter, and was therefore the fitter for her turne.

Cassanders held fresh in mind the danger wherein his samily had beene through Alexanders malice, together with the indignitie offered to himselfe by Alexander, who knockeds his head against a wall for deriding one that adored him after the Persian maner. The displeasure hereof; and the pleasure which he tooke in the amorous Queene, made him resolue, both to suppresse the linage which hee hated, 3° and to maintaine his belowed miltress, either by supporting her weake hulband, or by taking her to be his owne wife.

Thereft of the Lords held it a thing indifferent who raigned ouer all, fo as they might raigne in their feuerall Countries, and establish their authoritie in such wife, that it might not be taken from them.

Amono

Among these, Ptolomie and Antigorus were well enough alreadie, if their ambition would have suffered them to see it.

Pitho and Seleacus lying farre off, and being ftrong, had fome good hope to encroach you their neighbours. Againft these, Pencylies and Some others with much aduc hardly made rentlance, until fuch time as Enmens came to them; who propounded to himselfe great matters which he lived not to accomplish.

this met. the old Queene (as it is common with Repdames) hated the children of her hulband by his other wines. It was thought that thee had guen poyfon to Aridous, which failing to take away his life had much impaired both his bodie and wittes. Now the confidering, that Eumenes was too full of businesse to come home to foone as she wished that he should; and that Cossander daily preualled in Greece; thought it the best way to sopn evith Posts speechon, and set vp.as King, her Nephew Alexander, the sonne of Rexame, remouing Aridous before Cassander were able to desend him. To this intent she procured men among her kindred in Epirus, and so tooke her way towards Posts she who is opining with the entired into Oslacedon.

Eurydiec hearing these newes wrote veric carnetily to Calfander, praying him to set asset all eacher bussels, and come to succour her. Shee hersels by entreatic, gilts and promises, circw to her partie as many of the Macclonians as shee could, yutil thee thought her owne side strong enough, and then taking her husband with her went boldly forth against Osmpias, and the Traitour Parisperchan.

The fe two Queenes met armed, as if the matter should have be andetermined by their owne shands, which ended without any stroke fireken, by the revolve of those who followed Euryliee. For a soone as the Maedanian sheeld of Jupylie, I calling to mind her former Estate, and the victorious reignes of her bushand and some, they resulted to list any weapon against her. Euryliee shoting hersels thus for skeen, sled towards - Amphippli, but was intercepted and made prisoner with her husband.

Olympias having obtained this victoric without bloud, thought that all thinges would fucceed as eafily, and that upon the same considerations for which they had tetused to beare Armes against her, the Macedonians would not sticke to maintaine her, what focuer her proceedings were. Having therefore that vp Aridem and his 30 wife in a close roome, where they could scarce turne round, sheefed them through a little hole, till after a while it came in her head, (for feare least the people should haue commisferation of him, that had raigned almost fixe yeares and a halfe) to put them to death. So she deliucred Aridans to some barbarous Thracians, who tooke away his life by cruell torments: to Eurydice shee sent a sword, a halter, and a cup of poylon, willing her to choose the instrument of her owne death, who praying that the like prefents might one day bee fent to Olympias, yeelded her necke to the halter, having spent her last curses not invaine. Nicanor the brother of Casander, and a hundred the chiefe of his friends, did Olympias then choose out, all whom since commaunded to be flaine. His brother tolaus that was alreadic dead and buried, shee 40 accused of poyson given to Alexander; and thereupon caused his Tombe to bee throwne downe, and his bones to be scattered abroade. The Macedonians wondering at this furie, began to condemne themselues, and the folly of Polysperchon, who had, quite contrarie to Antipaters charge given on his death bed, called this outragious woman to the gouernment of the Empire.

How CASSANDER Wasrenenged upon OLYMPIAS.

† I.

The great expedition of Cassander, Olympias fbuts her felfeinto Pydna, where Cassander be before the Racides King of Epirus, comming to fuctor OLYmpias, is forfaken, and banifled by his owne which

ASSANDER at that time laie before Teges, in Pelopomefus; whither when all the feill tidings were brought to him, he never staict to take the Citie, nor to gue order for the State of things in that Countrie, (though Alexander the fonne of Poff feedow were there with an Armie) but compounding with them of Teges, be cwilled his af-

20 fociates to looke to themfelues as well as they could, till his returne and foin all hat he tooke his journie toward Macedon, carried headlong with the greedic defire of juttreeners. The Artistism had taken the Straights of The mapping, in haour of the Queene and Polyfpershon, to hinder his passage, but he, net willing to mispend any time in dealing with them, got together as many hips as he could great and small, with which heet transported his Armie into Theilate. There hee disided his companies, appointing some vnder Callas, a subtile Captaine, to hold relyyers on hund, who then lay incamped neare to Perbabas, with the rest he marched directly against Olympias. Shee, having once prevailed by the respect guest to her dignitie, tooke more care now to appeare Maichteall, than to make herself strong. To this end

20 fince made a folemne progreffe to Pydma, a Sea-towne, and well lenced, hauing in her companie all the flowre of the Courte flocially the great Ladies, among whom was Box.me, and her yong fonne Alexander, here to the great Alexander, by his grandmothers defignement: who, during his minoritie, kept the Soueraigne power in her owne handes. But all this pompe ferued to little vs., against the violence of the emenie, that foone prefented himfel be before the wals, sonely it fod the beforged with a vaine hope of fuccour, that would from all partes arriue, to refeue perfons of their qualitie. And hereof there foone appeared faire likelihood, which as foone vanished, and went away in finoke.

For *Eacides King of Epirus, made great hast to bring succour to Olympias, his co40 sn, with whom Dealamis his daughter was also thut vp. Neuerthelesse, bis Subjects were nothing forward in this expedition; but finding operatine passes taken in the way by Callandors men, they called vpon him to retire, and quit the enterprise. The Kingsimportunitie vrging them to proceed, and the oblinate refusal of the Armie, brake out at length into such termes, that when hee had raged in vaine against the multitude, his authoritie, with which he thought to baue preuailed vpon them, was by them taken from him and he compelled to forsake his Kingdome, and to wander vp and downe in forraine Countries, a banished man, his people ioyning with the enemic, against whom he had led them forth to warre.

Pydna in the meane time was closed up straightly, both by Sea and Land, so that 50 neither any could issue of the Citie, nor any reliefe bee connected into it; but it held out as long as any food was left, no memorable seruice being done there, whilst great actions were mannaged abroade.

A continuation of OLYMPIAS berstorie. POLYSPERCHON defeated. Extreme famine in Pydna. OLYMPIAS yceldsto CASSANDER.

 $N^{\rm Ow}$ , though order of time require it, that wee should rehearse the doings of Eurocuss and Antigonus in this place, leaving Olympias yet a while to the hower of her destine, which growes the faster upon her, because thee may discerne it comming, yet that we may not be compelled to interrupt the course of our narration, 10 by inserting her Tragedic in the midst of things, not manifestly coherent with it; we will heere (as elsewhere wee haue done and elsewhere must) continue to an end one Historic, that we may not be therewith distracted, when wee shall come to the relation of another. All the hope of the befeiged, remaining in Poly/perchon, was in like maner disappointed, as their former trust had beene, which was reposed in the succours of the Epirot. For Callas, who was fent against him, found the meanes to corrupt the greatest part of his Armie with monic, leaving him within a little while so flenderly accompanied, that he was fit for no other butineffe of warre, than a fwift retrait. When famine had so farre prevailed in the Citie, that the horses were killed as a precious food, many men feeding on the dead carcaffes of their fellowes, 200 and fawdust being given to the Elephants for provender; some of the souldiers obtaining the Queenes leave; (who could not denie it) others, without asking leave, veelded themselves to the enemy, and were by him gently relieved, and sent abroad into the Countrie. The newes of the Queenes affaires, dispersed by thesemen, did so affright her wel-willers, that fuch as had referred themselves to the event, came in 2 pace and submitted them to Cassander. At length, when the mortality was forgreat in the Towne, that the liuing were euen poysoned with the noysome fent of the dead.

O'propius bethought her selfe of stealing away by Sea in a Galley that shee had: wherein her successe was as bad as in the rest. For God had appointed this Towne, by her chosen as a place of refuge, to be evnto her as a house of torment, and a laile, 20 out of which shee should not bee deliuered, but vnto an cuill death. Being therefore vtterly broken with miferies, which daily afflicted her and the other Ladies, vnaccustomed to so wretched a kinde of life, shee offered composition; and with much labour hardly obtained of Cassander (who having fetcht her Gally out of the Hauen, accounted himselfe as good as master of her bodie) a graunt of her owne life. Immediately vpon her apprehension, Pella, the chiefe Citie of the Kingdome, was yeelded to Cassander. Amphipolis did stand out: for Aristonus, to whom Olympias had giuen charge of fuch forces as were left abroad in the Countrie, taking courage from the successe of some pettic services wherein hee had prevailed, beganne to promise himselfe great vnlikelihoods. But Olympias, to winne Cassanders fauour, very car- 40 neftly required him vpon his faith to her, that he should give it vp. Heedid so; and presently after was killed by his private enemies, that were set on by Cassander, who partly bated him vpon old respects, partly doubted him, as a man likely to seeke innouation.

† III. The death of OLYMPIAS, and her Condition.

WW Hen olympias had now heard forrow full tidings of all her friends, thee her-felfe was called into question, and accused in an affembly of the Macedo.

mins, for the murthers (they were fo stiled in her affliction, which in time of profperitie shee called justice) by her committed. There was shee, (being notheard, sor called to speake) condemned to die. The suite was commenced and prosecuted against her, by the kindred of those whom she had flaine. But it was at Casanders initigation; who (to haften the execution) fent her word that he would furnish her with a thip and other necessaries, to faue herselfe by flight: which when the refused, faving that shee would plead for herfelfe, and tell her owne tale; hee differnbled no longer. But fent vnto her fuch men as hated her most, who tooke away her miferable life. Shee was daughter and fifter vnto two Kings of Epirus, wife and mother vnto two the mightiell Kings of that or many other ages, a flout Ladie, and of ynreproueable chastitie; but her ambition was boundlesse; her hatred ynappeasable, and her furie in reuse amouton was bounderies her hatred wnappealable, and her furie in reusenge most wnownanly. Her peruer fe conditions made the hutband feeke other wines and Concubines, which caused her to hate both him, and them. She was thought privie toher husbands death; after which, very cruelly the flew his late wife Cleopatra, having first murdered one of her two children in her armes, and with a beaftly furic broiled the other aliue in fire, in a copper bason. For these things, her sonne Alexander (otherwise louing her well) forbad her to meddle in the government of Macedon. But God, more severe vnto cruell Tyrants, than onely to hinder them of their wils, permitted her to live and fulfil the rest of her wickedneffe; (which was his justice vpon the adulteries of Philip, and the oppression done by him and others) after all which hee rewarded her malice by returning it vpon her owne head.

t. IIII.

CASSANDER celebrates the funerall of ARIDEVS and EVRYDICE; and feekes to make him felfe King of Macedon.

A Fter her death, Cassander gaue honourable buriall to Aridaus and Eurydice, among their Progenitours, Kings of Macedon. And looking further into his own possibilities of greatness, he married the Ladie The following, whom he had taken at Pydna, being the daughter of King Philip by any other of his wines; that by her hee might haue some title to the Crowne. For the same end the committed Rosane, and hervyong some, to close prison, removing thereby some part of his impediment. And, the better to increase his same, and purchase loue, hee built a Citic, called by his owner name Cassander, that soon grewe to be very great and powerfull. He readified likewise Thebes in Greece, and restored it who the old janhabitants, after it had laine twentie yeares wast, being wtterly razed by Messander. By these meanes, specially by the restauration of Thebes, whereunto all Greece voluntarily contributed, he grew so strong that sew remained enemies who him; and they, with much abour, hardly coulders thim. Leauing him therefore daily prevailing in Greece, we will returne to them, who contended in Asia for lesse tiles, but larger Provinces, with greater forces.

ģ. I

The lownie of EVMENES into Persia. His wife dealing with those that loyned with him.

V M.E. N.E. s, hauing ioyned vnto his companie the Myrafida, made hath into the hafterne parts, or take poliefilion of those Countries, according to his commission, and strengthen himselfe against Minigenus. He tooke his journey through Carlefyria and Phamicia, hoping to reclaime those Provinces, vsurped with the rest of Syria (as hath beene shewed) by ao Prolomic, to the Kings obscience. But rosselt his, his hast of his passing forward was too great, his Armic too little, and the readinesse of the people, to returne to their due obedience, none at all. Besides all which impediments, one inconvenience troubled him in all his proceedings, making them the leffe effectuall. The Captaines of the Argyrafpides were fo froward, that they scorned to repaire to him, and take his directions; and their fidelitie was fo vniteadie, that he might have more eafily dealt with open T raitours. It was not expedient, that he, being Generall, should weaken his authoritie by courting them; neither lay it in his power to keepe them in order by compulsion. Therefore hee 20 fained, that Alexander had appointed vnto him in a dreame, a place for their mec-*ing, namely in arich paullion, wherein an emptie throne was placed, as if Alexander himfelfe had beene prefent at their confultations. Thus hee freed himfelfe from their vaine pride; but of their faith he could have no affurance. Yet when Ptolomie requested them, & Antigonus bribed them to forsake him, they continued (though not without confidering of the matter ) to take his part. So hee marched on, fending before him the Kings warrant; which Pytho and Seleucus refused to obey; not as rejecting the Kings authoritic, but excepting against the person of Eumenes, as a man condemned to die by the Macedonian Armie, for the death of Craterus. Eumenes, knowing well that he was not to relie vpon their affiftance, who flood otherwife af- 40 feeled than his affaires required, and were not to bee dealt with by perfuafion, fought passage by strong hand, through the Countrie of Babylon, in such wife, that Seieucus, having in vaine affaired to hinder him, by opening the fluces of Euphrates. was glad at length to grant him friendly way, as defirous to be ridde of him. Thus he came to Peuceftes and the reft of the Easterne Lords, who were glad of his companie, because of the differences between Pytho, Seleucus, and themselves. Yet the contention about superioritie, grew very hot among them; every one finding matter enough, to feed his owne humour of felfe-worthinesse. But the former denice of affembling in one paulion, made all quiet; the conclusion ever being fure to follow that which Eumenes propounded, who was both wifestingining aduice, and 50 best able to reward, by meanes of the authoritie given him, to take what he pleased of the Kings treasures. By these meanes hee wonne to himselfe many of those, who had most power to doe good or hurt.

ð. I İ.

How Anticonvs, comming to fet upon Evu enes, was driven off with loffe.

NTIGONYS, hearing that Eumene lay in the Province of Sufa, had an earneft defire to follow him, and drive him further from the Kings treafures, which were kept there. To which end, as foone as he had made himselfe ftrong enough, he removed out of Mefopotamia, where hee had wintered; and taking to him Pitho and Selencus, with their men, hee marched directly against the enemies, with intent to give them battaile. Eumenes had fortified the Caltle of Sufa, and was retired backe toward Persia, keeping the River of Tigris betweene him and his pursuers. The passages of the Riner were well garded, and good espiall kept vpon Antigonus, to obserue which way he tooke. Before he came to Tigris it felfe, he was to passe ouer Coprates, a great Riuer, and not foordable, which he fought to doe by fmall veffels, whereof he had no great flore. A great part of his Armie had gotten ouer, when Eumenes, who kept a bridge vpon Treris, came with a thousand horse, and foure thousand foote, to see their demeanour: and finding them out of order, charged them, brake them, and 20 drang them headlong backe into Coprates, wherein most of them were drowned, verie few escaping with life, except foure thousand that yeeled themselves priloners, in fight of Antigonus, that was not able to releiue them. This loffe made Antigomus glad to full off; and the heate of that Countrie in the dog-daies, breeding diferens in his Armie, by which many perished, caused him to remoue as farre as into Media. So he tooke Pithon with him; (leaving Selencus to befege the Caftle of Su(a) and feeking to goe the nearest way, passed through sauage Nations, that continually vexing him with skirmilhes, flew great numbers of his men, before he could arrive in Media, with his troupes that were quite heart-broken.

. III.

of EVNENES his cunning. A battaile between e him and ANTIGONYS.

Frer his departure, Euments with his affociates fell into confutation, about the remainder of their bufineffe. Faine he would have had them to enter vpon those Prouinces, which Antigenus had left behind birn; to which alfo the Captaines of the Arggrafides or Silvershive were verie inclinable, as deliring to draw nearcr to Greece. But Peneefles, and the reft, whose Dominions lay in the high Countries, had note care of their owne particular Estates , and would needes march Eastward. These carried it; for the Armie was not strong enough to divide it selfe into parts.

When they came into Perfix, Pensesses yearling there, seased them royally, and sought by all meanes to win the Souldiers soue to himselfe. Eumeness, perceiving whereunto those doings tended, suffired him awhile to keep good cheare, till the time of warre drew neere. Then did he faine an Epistle, directed, as from Oranies Gouernor of Armanis, to Pensesses himselfe: The purport where twasthat Osmpias had vanquished Collander, and Sent ouer agent Armie vader Pesspecious, to jove with Eumense.

Callander, and lent oner a great Armie vnder Paylperenn, (1) oyne with imments.

9 The far week, as they filled the Campe with vaine joy, 6 they wrought in all mens mindes a great willing neffe to obey Eumenes, by whom was the likelieft apparance of their preferment, wherein they dealt wifely, hee being farre the most fufficient Commanufer, as they found foone after. For when Antigenus, comming out of Media, drew neere with them, Eumenes by fome milehance was fallen ficke; and faine to be carried in a litter; the Armie marched in verie bad array, and was likely to have beene forced to take battaile in that diforder. But Eumenes, when the reft of the Captaines were amazed, was carried about the Armie in his litter, and vpon the fodaine did cast his men into so good forme, that Antigonia, perceiuing him a farre off, could not refraine from giving him descrued commendations. Yet he did not cease to promise great rewardes to the Captaines, and all forts of men, if they would for fake Eumenes: which hopes deceiving him, hee came to the triall of a battaile. Eumenes had more Elephants than Antigonus; otherwise, hee was inferiour in number both of horse and foot by athird part. The battaile was fought with variable fuccesse, and great losse on both sides, continuing a great part of the day, and 10 of the night following. Yet the victorie was vncertaine. For Eumenes could not force his men to lie farre from their carriages: by which meanes Antigonus (who had a more absolute commaund ouer his) incamping on the ground whereon they fought, had in his power the dead bodies; which was accounted the figne of victorie; for he buried his owne, and gaue leaue to his enemies, crauing it, to doe the like. But a greater figne of victorie had Eumenes. For he abode ftill in the fame place, and not onely buried his men verie honourably, at great leifure, but held the Countrie round about; whereas Antigonus was glad (having tarried but one day) to ficale away by night, and returne into Media, from whence he came.

Of diverle stratagems practifed by Antigonus, and Eumenes, one against the other.

Husdid the warre continue doubtfull, and was protracted to a greater length, each part having front Souldiers, and skilfull Generals: but the fide which had hitherto prenailed, being hindered by the equall authoritic of many, from purfuing all aduantages to the best. Antigonus grew daily weaker in men and reputation, forthat to 30

repaire himselse hee could find no way safer, than to put all to aduenture. He knew that his enemies lay in their wintering places, quartered farre afunder, so that if hee could suddenly come among them, he was likely to put them in great distresse. Betweene him and them, the way was not long, being onely nine dayes journey, but very bad, through a rough drie wildernesse, hard'y passeable. Another way, fairer, and leading through a Countrie well peopled, but requiring twentie fine dayes journey, hee for looke, partly for the length, partly and chiefly, because hee would come vndiscouered. So therefore taking his journey in the dead of Winter, he forbad vnto his men the vse of fire by night, because he would not have them descried a farre off. This commaundement had beene well observed foure or fine dayes, 40 when continuance of time (as commonly) breeding negligence, and the cold weather pinching them, they were bolde to cherish themselves, being neare to their wayes end. The light of these fires gave notice of their comming; which being reported to Pencefles, and other Captaines, they were fo aftonished with the fodaine danger, that in all hast they betooke themselves to slight. But Eumenes, meeting with the newes, began to hearten his affrighted companions, promifing to make Antigonus march leasurely, and willing them to abide, and draw up their mentogether. They could scarce beleeue him; yet they were content to be ruled, and did as hee appointed, who failed not in making his word good. Hee tooke with him fome companies of the readiest men, wherewith hee occupied certaine toppes of 50 mountaines, looking toward the Campe of Antigonus: there he chose a connenient ground to incampe vpon, and made great store of fires in fundrie places, as if the whole Armie had beene present. This was a sorrowfull spectacle to Antigonis, who thought himselfe preuented of his purpose; and began to seare least hee should bee compelled to fight, whileth his men were tired with a long and painefull journey. Therefore he resolved to turne aside, & take the way to such places, as might better ferue to refresh his Armie. This hedid with great care and circumspection, at the first, as knowing how readic Eumenes would be vpon all aduantages. Butaftera while confidering that no enemie stirred about him, he began to pause, and thinke in himselfe, that somewhat or other was not fallen out according to his opinion. To be the better informed in the matter, he caused some inhabitants of that Defert to be taken, and brought before him; of whom hee learned, that they had feene no other Armie than his thereabout, but onely a few men that kept fires on the hil-tops. 10 It vexed him exceedingly to finde that hee had beene fo deluded. Therefore hee went against these troupes with great furie, meaning to take sharpe vengeance on them, for having so deceived him. But by this time, sufficient strength was arrived there, which could not bee forced without much bufineffe, and long flay. All the Armie was come, faue onely Eudamus, Captaine of the Elephants, who, befides those beastes, had no more than foure hundred horsemen in his companie. Antigonus hearing of this supply comming to his enemies, sent about two thousand horse, and all his light-armed footmen, to cut it off by the way. Eudamus being fallen into this danger, was faine to place his Elephants round about his carriages, and fo to defend himselfe as well hee could; for his horsemen, overlaid with multi-20 tudes were quickly broken, and driuen to runne away vpon the spurre. Neither knew they, who fate your the Elephants, which way to turne them; for on all fides they received woundes, and were not able to requite them with the like. In this extremitie there appeared braue troupes of horse and foot, that came vnexpected to therefcue; and charging the affailants upon the backe, draue them to feeke their owne fafetic by speedic flight. These were sent by Eumenes; who though hee knew not what his aduerfarie meant to doe, yet hee knew very well what was fitteft for him to doe: and therefore, playing both games him felfe, prouided the remedic.

Y thefe meanes Eumenes wanne great honour, and was by the whole Armie acknowleged a most expert Generall, and well worthie of the chiefe commaund. But Peueefles, and the other Captaines, guiltie of their owne much infufficiencie, were so transported with enuie, that they could now no longer containe their vile thoughts, but held 40 communication, as youn a necessarie point, how they might finde meanes to murder him. Surely, it is great injuffice to impute the mischiefe, contriued against worthing men, to their owne proud carriage, or some other ill deserving: For, though it often happen, that fmall vices doe ferue to counterpoyfe great vertues; (the fenfe of euillbeing more quicke and lafting, than of good ) yet hee shall bewray a verice foolish malice, that, wanting other testimonie, will thinke it a part of wisedome. to find good reason of the cuills, done to vertuous men, which often times have no other cause than their vertue it selfe. Eumenes, among many excellent qualities, was noted to be of lingular courtelle, of a very fweet conversation among his friends, and 50 carefull by all gentle meanes to winne their loue, that seemed to beare him any secretill affection. It was his meere vertue that ouerthrewhim, which even they that fought his life acknowledged. For they concluded that hee should not bee flaine, before the battaile were fought with Antigonus, wherein they confessed that it flood best with their safetie, to be governed by his directions. Of this treafon, he was quickly aduertifed by Eudamus, to whom hee had done many pleafures, and by fome others of whom he vice to borrowmonie when he needed not, to to end that they flouid be carefull of his good, for fear of looling their owne. Confidering therefore, and difcourling with himfelfe of the villanie intended againft him, hee made his lait will, and born tall his writings that contained any matter of fecret: which done, her evoluted many things in his minde; being doubtfull what courfe were best to follow. All the Nobles of the Empire stood ill affected to the Royall bloud, excepting those which were with him, that were more innumber, than in worth. How things at that time stood in Macedon and Greece, either he knew not, or, knowing the truth, knew nothing that might encourage him to seek their to helpe, that needed his. To make his owne peace with Aningonus, had beeneas ainth his faith to Olympias, and the Princes, that had committed this great power into his hands. For which cause also subject to good, and make shift for himselfeamong his old friendes. At length hee refolued to doe his best against the common remie, and afterwardes to looke to bimselfeas well as he might.

Q. VI. The last battaile betweene Antigonys and Eymenes.

He Souldiers, efectially those old bandes of the filuer-shields, finding Eumene perplexed, and not knowing the cause, entreated him not to doubt of the victorie, but onely to bring them into the field, and see them in arraie; for the reft, they alone would take sufficient order. The like alacritie was generally found in the common Souldiers faces, but the chiefe Commanders were so missible inoutly bent against him, that they could not endure to thinke upon being beholding to him for the vistorie. Yet he ordered the battaile so well, that, without their owne great fault, they could hardly 30 faile of getting the vpper hand.

Before the Armies came to joyning, a horfeman from the fide of Eumenes, proclaimed with a loud voice to the followers of Antigonus, That their wickednefle, in fighting againft their owne fathers, would now bee punifiled, as it well deferued. This was not fooken in vaine. For the Silver-finele's were men of threefore or feauentie yeares olde, firengthned more by continual lexer-fie, than decade by age, and excelling in courage, as having passed through greater dangers, than any like to be prefented in that fight. Therefore Antigonus his men (who had often beene beaerf by them, and were now to trie their last hope with these resolute warriours, the most Auncient and best regarded of all Alexanders Souldiers) grew verie pensitue, and adaunced heavily, suspecting their owne cause, and searing that the threatnings vettered would prove true,

Anigonus was now againe farre the stronger in horse, which gaue him cause of great hope; the ground, on which they were to fight, being a plaine leuelled field. Placing therfore himselfe and his sonne Demetrius in the right wing, and committing the left wing to Pithon, he did set forward couragiously against the enemies, that were readie to give him a sharpe entertainment.

Eumenes tooke vnto him Peucesses, with the rest of the Lords, and stood in the left wing of his battaile, in the sace of Antigonus, meaning both to pretuent the Traitours, his Companions, of all means to make head against him on the sodaine, and (withall) to give proofe of his owne valour, which perhaps he should no more doe, in the face of all his enemies. In the right wing, opposite vnto Pithen, hee bestowed the weakest of his horse and Elephants, vnder one Philip, an honest man, and (which was enough at such a time) obedient commanding him to protrast the fight, and make a leifurable retrait, expecting the euent of the other fide.

So they joyned verie fiercely; Antigonus, labouring to make himfelfe mafter of all ¿Eumenes, to die an honourable death, or to winne fuch a victorie vpon his open enemies, as might give him leifure and opportunitie to deale with his falle friends.

The footmen of Anigonus, being, even in their owne opinions, farre interiour to thole whom they must encounter, were at the first brung prefently defeated by the Slunessields, who slew aboue five thoussaid of them, looking of the circowne, not one man. But in horse, Eumenes was so over-matched, that he could not repell Anigonus, who pressed him very hard, but was shinter to stand wholy youn defence. Yet j his courage wrought so well by example, among his followers; that the enemie could not winne one foot of ground ypon him, yntill such time as Peucesses, with one thousind she bundred horse, withdrew himselfe out of the battaile, leauing his companions fighting to defend his backet.

Then did Eumenes desperatly, rush amongst his enemies, labouring to breake open the way vnto Antigome himselfe. And though hee failed of his purpose, yet with great slaughter he did so beate vpon them, which came in his way, that the victorie hung a long time in suspense.

The ground whereon they fought, being of a flight fandie mould, through the trampling of hords, men, and Elephants, did call vp fuch a cloude of dult, as bin20 dered the prospect, so that no mancould see what was done a little from him. Antigrouns finding this aduantage, dispatched away some companies of horse, that passive dudictions are described by the same of his carriages, which lay about halfe a mile from the place of sight, slenderly garded, (for that the whole bodie of the Armic lay betweene them and danger) and therefore easily taken. Had Peaesses resident existing the same should be such as the same should be seen to surprise them, & fo haud done as good a peece of service as a better man. But he was gotten somewhat further, to a place, where our of danger he might expect the euent: and Euroness was so ouer-laboured both in bodie and minde, that he could not giucan eye to e20 uerv place, being not well able to continue where he was

It happened fo, that the Elephants meeting together, those of Antigonus had the better hand; whereupon Eumens, finding himselfe cuery way ouer-charged, began to gue backe, and withdrew himselfe and his companies in good order, to the other fide of the battaile, where Philip (as hee was directed) had by fighting and retiring together, kept that wing from loss. The Antigonum had ich to much of Eumensethat day, that they were well contented to thim depart quietly, and withed not to see him come againe; as faine he would have done.

The loffe of the carriages was reported vnto him, as foone as he had any leifure to hoare how thinges went, whereupon hee prefently ordered his men for a fresh 40 charge, and sent for Peaceles that was not farre off, requesting him to bring in his men, and renew the fight, whereby hee trusted, not onely to recourt their owne goods, but to inrich themselues with the spoiles of the enemies. Peacestes not onely refused to joyne with him, but immediately withdrew himselfe into a safer place, where he might be further from such dangerous temptations.

By this, the night grew on; and both Armies, wearied with fighting, were defirous to returne into their Campes. Yet Antigonus conceiued hope of doing formewhat more; and therefore taking halfe his broffemen, he waited yon Europes apart of his way homewardes, but found no opportunitie to offend him: the other halfe heecommitted to Pithon, willing him to fet you the Sthar-Jivelds in their retrait, which yet he forbare to doe, because it appeared too full of danger. So the battaile ended, wherein Antigonus had not so much the better in horse, as the worse in foot; but the spoile which hee got, by surprising his enemies carriages, made amends for all his other losses.

How EVMENES was betrayed to ANTIGONVS, and flaine.

V MENES, comming into his Campe, and finding the Silver-fhields extremely discontented with their misfortune, began to cheare them vp.and put them in hope of recouering all with advantage. For their braue demeanour that day had fo crushed the enemie, that hee had no power left wherewith to abide them in open field, and was much leffe able to drawe their Cartes after him, through that great Wilderneffe, ouer the

But these perswasions availed nothing. Pencestes was gone; the other Captaines would needs returne into the high Countries; & the Souldiers had no defire either to flie or to fight, but onely to recouer their goods. Wherefore Teutamus, one of the two Captaines of the Silver-shieldes, (who had in former times readily confented vnto traiterous motions, in hope of gaine, but was letted by his partner Antigenes) finding, as he thought, a fit occasion of making him felfe great, and winning the lone of those bands, dealt secretly with Antigonus, requesting him to reftore vnto those old Souldiers their goods, which he had taken, being the onely reward of their feruices in the warres of Philip, and Alexander.

Antigonia, as a fubtile man, knew very well, that they which requested more than they had reason to expect, would also with a little entreatie performe a great deale more than they promifed; and therefore he louingly entertained the meffengers, filling them with hopes of greater matters than they defired, if they would put Eumenes into his handes, by whom they were seduced to make warre against him. This answere pleased them so well, that they forthwith deuised how to deliuer him aliue. Wherefore comming about him, as at other times, to doe their dutie, and pretending more joy of their victorie, than forrow of their loffe, which they faid they would redeeme by another fight; in the middeft of this goodly talke they leapt vpon him, caught hold of his fword, and bound him fast. So they haled him away; and ftopping their cares against all perswasions, would not yeeld to farre, as to looken one of his handes and let him kill himselfe, but brought him alive (that was their owne Generall, vnder whom they had obtained many victories) as it had beene in triumph, into the Campe of their enemies.

The presse of men, running out of the Campeto see him, was so great, that Antigonus was faine to fend a gard of horsemen and Elephants, to keepe him from being fmothered, whom he could not fodainly resolue either to kill or saue. Verie few they were that fued for his life; but of these, Demetrius the sonne of Antigonus was one; the rest were desirous to be rid of him quickly; thinking belike, that if hee were faued, he would foon be the chiefe in great reputation, for his great abilitie. So 40 after long deliberation, Antigonus cocluded, that it was the fafeft way to put him to death, which intending to have done by famine (perhaps because he would keepe it awhile in his own power to reverse the sentence, as desiring (if it might be) to have him liue hisfriend; halt of other businesse made him doe it by the sword.

To this end came all the trauailes of the worthie Generall, Eumenes; who had with great wisedome, fidelitie, and patience, laboured in vaine, to vphold the family which God had purposed to cast downe. He is reckoned among the notable examples of Fortunes mutabilitie, but more notable was his gouernment of himselfe in all her changes. Aduerfitie neuer leffened his courage, nor Prosperitie his circumspection. But all his vertue, industrie, and wit, were cast away, in leading an Armie, 50 without full power to keepe it in due obedience. Therefore it was not ill answered by Gaspar de Collignie, Admiral of France, in our dayes, to one that foretold his death. which enfued foone after in the maffacre of Paris, That rather than to leade againe an Armie of Voluntaries, he would die a thousand times.

Antigonus himfelfe gaue to the body of Eumenes honourable Funeral; and rewarded the Treason, wrought against him, with descrued vengeance. One chiefe Captaine of the Silver-fieilas he burntaliue; many of the other Captaines he flew; and to the whole multitude of the Silver-fhields, that had betraied fo worthy a Commander, he appointed a Leader, that should carie them into farre Countries, vnder pretence of warres; but with a privie charge, to confume them all, as periured wretches, letting none of them returne aline vnto his friends and kindred, or so much as once behold the Seas, that beate upon the shoares of Greece and Macedon.

d. VIII.

How ANTIGONYS flew PITHON, and occupied MEDIA. How hee removed Governours of Provinces, and made himfelfe Lord of Persia, carrying away PEVCESTES.

He two Armies being joyned thus in one, were carried into Media, where they spent the rest of the Winter; the common Souldier idly; the principall men intentiuely bent vnto the bufineffe enfuing, Pithan began to confider his owne deferuings; for that the whole warre had beene chiefely maintained by the strength and riches of his Prouince. Belides, he thought himfelfe as good a man as Antigonus, vnleffe it were in the fouldiers opinion, which he judged easie to be purchased with gifts, and therefore spared not to affay them with great liberalitie. But in following this course, hee was driven by necessitie to trust many, of whom he stumbled vpon some, that were unfecret, and others, bearing him no fincere affection. Thus was his purpose discouered to Antizona, who (nothing like to Pithon) diffembled his indignation, and rebuked the informers, as breeders of diffention betweene him, and his honourable friend, vnto whom hee meant to commit the Gouernment of all those Countries: his owne businesse calling him into the lower Asa. These reportes, comming

30 daily to his cares, did finely delude Pithon. By his greatnesse with Alexander: his authoritie in that Province where they lay, whereof he was Governour; and the love of the fouldiers which he had bought with money; he was strong enough to maintaine, euen an offenfiue warre. But what neede had he to vie the fword, when hee was likely without contention, to obtain more than his owne asking? Therefore he came as foone as he was fent for, to take his farewell of Antigonus, and to divide the Prouinces with him, that meant nothing leffe than to yeeld to any fuch division. As foone as he came, he was taken, and accused, condemned to die, and flaine out ofhand. For Antigonus, having begunne with Eumenes his ancient friend, was not afterward restrained by any consideration of old acquaintance, from cutting downe 40 indifferently all that stood in his way: but swamme carclesly through the bloud, wherein at the first he doubtfully waded.

When this businesse was ended, he appointed a new Gouernour in Media, to order the Prouince; and a Captaine, to suppresse all commotions: thinking belike that the power and authoritie, so divided, would hardly agree in one against him, from whom both were deriued.

After this he marched into Fersia, where he was entertained, as absolute Lord of Alia. There began he to show how well he understood his owne might inesse. For he placed and displaced, at his pleasure, Gouernours in all Provinces; leaving none in Office, that were not his owne creatures, excepting fuch as lay too farre off to bee 50 diflodged eafily.

Pencestes, who ruled in Persia, thought with good cheare to redeeme old offences; but was deceived; having to doe with one, that could not be taken with fuch baites: he was carried away, and feasted with goodly words of promise, that neuer tooke effeet. Thus he, that equied the vertue of his friend, was driven to flatter (in vaine)

the fortune of his enemie; after which he lined a contemptible life, till hee died obfeurely a man forgotten.

How Selevevs was thised out of Babylon, by Anticonvs. The great riches of Anticonvs.

RepErreces was the next in this visitation; one that had from time to time continued in the fame tenor of good-will to Intigenus, and 10 now gaue proofe of his heartie affection toward h m, by making the Captaine of the Caltle of Sufa to meete him on the way, rendring vnto him that strong Peece, and all the treasures therein behowed. I his offer was fo great, that Antigonia (though having in his hands the Keeper of the place) could hardly beleiue it; but vsed him with excessive kindnesse, tor teare so good a moode should change. In that Castle he found all the treasures of cilexander, with the lewels of the Perfun Kings, which, added to his former flore of money, made up twentie fine thousand talents. Having all this, he might well account himfelfe a happie man, if riches were fufficient to happineffe. But large dominion was the marke at which he aimed; therefore he proceeded, with intent, to leave no 20 Countrie behind his backe, that should not acknowledge him for Sourraigne Lord. Comming to Babylon, he was entertained by Sciencus with all possible demonstration of loue, and bonoured with prefents, befeeming the maieffic of a King. All this he accepted with great grauitie, as being due to him; and began to require an account of the renenues of that Province. This demand Seleneus held virteafonable; faying, that it was not needfull for him to render vnto any man an account of that Prouince, which was given vnto him, in respect of his many good services to the State. But whether he spake reason or no, it sufficed, that Antigonus was powerfull; who vrged him daily to come to a reckoning. Manifest it was, that neither want of money, nor any other necessitie, moued Antigonus to presse him thus, but 20 onely the defire to picke matter of quarrell against him, whereof it was likely that he should find such iffue, as Pithon and Penecifes had done. Therefore taking with him onely fiftie horse, he conneied himselfe away, and fled into Ptolomies Dominions; defiring him to protect him from the violence of fuch a man, as went about to oppresse all, that in former times had beene his betters, or at least his equals. Antigonus was glad of his flight; for now all those Countries were yeelded ynto him without battaile, whereas to fight with Selenens for them hee wanted all pretences and to kill him it was not his delire, having received many benefits of him, and those not intermixed, as commonly it happens, with any injuries. Yet it is reported, that the Childenss brought a strange prophecie to Anigonus, bidding him looke well to 40 himselfe, and know, that if Selenens did cscape his hands, hee should recover Bidslen, yea, winne all Afia, and kill Antigonus in battaile. Eafie belieuers may give credit to this tale. Had it beene true, methinkes, anigonus rather thould have hanged those Childrens, for giving him no warning till it was too late, than fent purfuers (as they fay that he did) after him, whome the destinies presented for so great purposes,

When hee had fetled things at Babylon, he tooke his journie into Cilicia, where he wintred. There hee tooke vp ten thousand talents more of the Kings treafures, and casting his accounts, found his yearely income to amount vnto cleauen thoufand Talents.

CHAP. V.

Of the great civill Warre betweene ALEXANDERS

Captaines: and how they assumed the name and state of Kings.

¿. I.
The combination of PTOLOMIE, CASSANDER, and others, against ANTI-

GONVS. Their demands and his answer.

HIS great riches, and the rest of his power, made Antigonias dreaded, entited, and fulpected, whereby he quickly was embarked in a new War. Ptolomie, Caffander, and Lysimachus, had privily combined them-selues together, intending to hinder his further growth, and bring him to more reason, than of his owne accord he seemed like to yeeld vnto. Of their practifes hee had fome notice; the good entertainement giuen vnto Seleucus, giuing him fufficient cause of mistrust. Therefore he sent Embassadors to them feuerally, entreating them to continue firme in their

loue toward him, that would be readic to require them with the like. The cold answers which they made, occasioned his hafty preparation against the most forward of them, which was Ptolomie; it being likely that a good armie should prevaile more than a faire message. Therefore, as soone as the season of the yeare would permit, he tooke the way toward Syria, and was encountred by Embaffage from them all. These told him, that their Lords did much rejoyce at his victorie, obtained against Eumenes their common enemie, and the honor that he had therby gotten. In which 30 war, for a fmuch as they being his Confederates must have endured great losse, with hazzard of their whole estates, if the contrarie faction had prevailed; they held it very iust, that all should be partakers in the fruits of that voiage, wherin they had been all aductivers. Wherefore they defired him, that making betweene them all an equall divilion, of the treasures that were in his hands, (a thing easie to be done) he would alfotake some convenient order for enlarging their Dominions, according to the rate of his new purchases. This might best beet to euery ones liking, if hee would make ouer Cappadocia, with Lycia, to Caffander; and Phrygia, bordering vpon the Hellesport, to Lysimachus; for wheras his own Dominions were so much extended Eastward by his late victoric, he might well spare some of those westerne Prouinces, 40 to those that were seated in the West. As for Ptolomic, he would not craue any new addition, but rest contented within his owne Territories. Prouided alwaies, that Seleucus their common friend, and partner in the late warre, might be restored to his owne, out of which he had beene driuen fo iniuriously, that all of them were forced to take it deeply to heart; requiring amends, with his friendly consent unto their demands, which otherwise they must labour to obtaine with armed hands.

Antigonus knew, that after many losses received, hee should yet bee able to redeeme peace when soeuer he listed, with these, or perhaps with easier conditions. Neither was he so weak, to give away quietly any part of his strength into the hands of fuch bad friends, for feare only, leaft it should be taken from him perforce. Ra-50 ther he hoped that he should be able to find them worke, more than enough to defend their owne. Therefore, he roundly answered the Embassadors, that it was no part of his meaning to communicate with other men the profits of that victorie, which he alone without other mens helpe had obtained. Though indeede they had alreadic sufficiently gained by him, if they could see it, having by his meanes kept their gouernments, wherof they were like to be dispossessed by Polysperchon, and the councell of chate in Misselon. But what meruaile was it, if they confidered not how he had faued them, feeing one of them had forgotten the time, when coming to him as a fugitive, and begging fuccour, he was by his meere bountie relicued, and enabled to get all that he now held? Caffander did not (faid he) in those daies command me to furrender Prouinces, and give him his equall share of my treasures; but (for his Fathers (ake) defired me to pittic him, and help him against his enemies; which I did; by lending him an Armie, and Fleet, on confidence whereof hee now prefumes to threaten me. As for Seleucus, how can be complaine of wrong, that durft not flay to pleade his right? I did vie him well; but his confeience told him that he 10 had deferred ill; else he would not have fled. Let them that so curiously search into my doings, consider well their owne, which some of them can hardly instific. I am now in the way to Spria, meaning to examine Ptolonies proceedings; and after him to deale with others, if they continue to prouoke me.

¿. I I.
The preparations and beginnings of the Warres.

Hen the Embaffadors were difmiffed with this answere, nothing was thought vpon but warre. Intigonus perceining that he should ben 20 inuaded from Europe, as soone as hee were entred into Syria; left his Neyhew Picionic to guard the Sea-coasts, and hinder Cassader from landing in Asia: giuing himalso in charge, to drive out of Caspadacia fome that were alreadic fent ouer to molest him. Likewise he dispatched Messengers into Greece and Cyprus, not vnfurnished of monie, to draw friends to his side, and raife vp troubles to his enemies. Effecially he laboured to make himfelfe the strongeft by Sea; to which purpose he rather hastened, than foreslowed his journie into Syria, that he might get possession of Mount Libanus, which affoorded many excellent commodities for building of a Nauie. Therefore, having creeted Beacons, and laid post-horsesthroughoutall Asia, to give swift advertisement of all occurrences, 20 he intiaded Syria, that was not held against him by any power sufficient to main-

Ptolomie lay in Egypt, the strength and heart of his Dominion, where he was beloued and honoured of the people as their natural! Lord : his other Proninces hee kept with a few Garrifons, better feruing to containe the people within obedience, than to confront a forraine enemie. So Amizonus tooke many Cities, and Places, of that Countrie, and beganne to fet great numbers of Artificers on worke in making thips, which was one of his most carnest cares. In these bulinesses hee consumed a yeare and three moneths; notidly. For he tooke toppe, and Gaza, which were veelded vnto his diferetion, and wellvfed. The strong Citie of Trus held out long, 40 but was compelled in the end, by famine, to render it felfe vpon composition, that Ptolomies Souldiers might depart with their Armes; which was permitted.

Ptolomie was not affeepe, whileft thefe things were in doing, though he kept himfelfe within the bounds of Egypt, as indeede it behoued him to doe. His forces were not able to stand against Antigonus in plaine field, but likely they were to increase, which made him willing to protract the time. Neuerthelesse by Sea (where his enemie was as yet vnreadie) he fent his Fleet into all quarters, whereof Selenens had the chiefe command.

Selenens paffed with an hundred faile along the coast of Syria, in the full view of Antigonus, and his Armie, to their no litle discomfort. He landed in Cyprus, which 50 was then gouerned by many pettie Lords; of whom the greatest adhered to Piolomie; the rest were, by the Factors of Antigonus bought for him with gold but now redeemed by the Agyptian with sharpe steele.

The same commoditie of aide by Sea encouraged the President of Caria (called alfo Callander, but not the fonne of Antipater, how focuer by the painefull and learned writer Reinerus Reinescius, he is by fome ouer-light, counted for the fame) to declare for Ptolomie, and his Confederates, and bufily employ in their quarrell all his forces, which hee had hitherto kept in good neutralitie, and thereby enjoyed reft; burnow her threw himfelfe into dangerous warre, choosing rather to vidergoe trouble at hand, than to fall under certaine ruine, though somewhat further distant, which would have over-whelmed him, if Antigonus had beaten all the reft.

Howeach partie fought to winne the afiftance of Greece. Antigonus his declaration against Cassander. Alexander the some of Polysperciion renolteth from ANTIGONVS, who had let him up.

N the meane feafon all care possible was taken on both sides, to assure vnto them the people of Greece, whose aide which way socuer it inclined was of great importance. Herein at the first Antigonus sped fo well by large effusion of his treasure, that he drew to him the La-cedamonians, and other Peloponnesians, of whom he waged eight thoufand, and caused Polysperchon (who had a good while made hard shifts) to rowse

20 himselfe againe, and taking voon him the title of Captaine of Peloponnesus, to make head against Cassander.

These hopefull beginnings encouraged him to proceed further in the same kinde. Wherefore to make Callander the more odious, hee called together both his owne Souldiers, and all the Greekes and Macedonians that were to be found thereabouts. To these he declared, That Cassander had very cruelly slaine Olympias, mother to the great Alexander; and not herewith contented, had thut up in close prison the poore Ladie Roxane, Alexanders wife, and his sonne begotten on her bodie. That all this proceeded from a defire to make himfelfe King ouer the Macedonians; which well appeared by his enforcing the Ladie Theffalonica; Daughter to King Philip, a match

30 vnfit for a man of no greater Parentage than he, to ioyne with him in marriage. That in meere despight of those dead Princes, Philip, and Alexander, hee had planted the Olynthians, rooted out by Philip, in a new Cittie by him built, and called by his owne name Casandria; and had reedified the Citic of Thebes, which for the great treason of the Inhabitants, was leuclied with the ground by the victorious hand of Alexander. For these reasons hee required them to make a decree, that Cassander should restore to absolute libertie the Ladie Roxane, and her sonne; and should yeeld obedience to the Lord Lieutenant Generall of the Empire (by which name Antigonus himselfe was understood) or esse should be reputed a Traitor, and open Enemie to the State. Furthermore he propounded, that all the Cities of Greece 40 should be restored into freedome; this he did, not because he was carefull of their good, but for the neede which he had of their affiltance. These things being decreed, Antigonus was perswaded, that not only the Greeks would adhere vnto him, as to their louing Patron, and fall off from Castander; but that the Rulers of Provinces, who had hitherto suspected him as a man regardfull of nothing, but his owne benefit, would correct their opinion, and thinke him the most faithfull of all others to the Roiall bloud. But concerning his loyaltie to the yong Prince, the world was too wife to be deceined with vaine shewes. His vndertaking for the libertic of the Greekes was more effectuall, and got easie beliefe, in regard of his present hatred to Cassander. Yet herein also Ptolomic strone to be as car-50 nest as he, making the like decree, in hope to winne to himselfe that valiant Nation, which affoorded men farre more feruiceable in warre, than were to be found in any

Prouince of the Empire. And this indeed was the point, at which both fides aimed. Wherein Antigonus thinking to make all fure, deceived himfelfe, not without great cost. For he gaue to Yyyy 2

Alexander the sonne of Polyspershon fine hundred talents, willing him to set the warre on foot in Peloponne us, whereby it might appeare, that on his fide was meant nothing elfe, than what was openly pretended.

In Peloponnelius, Callanders men had, with much bloud-flied, grieuoufly afflicted the contrarie faction; and he himselfe perceiuing, that they were more easily spojled as enemies, than retained as friends, thought it the best way, to make what yse he could of them, that were not long like to continue his. Finally, perceiping that Alexander came furnished with plentic of gold, wherewith he was able, not only to winne the doubtfull, but to corrupt fuch as might feeme best affured : hee thought it a good part of wisedome, to surrender vpon faire conditions, that which he could not affure himselfe to hold any long time by force. Therefore, he sent one to deale with Alexander, about the matters in controuerfic; letting him know, that Antigomas was very skilfull in fetting men together by the cares, not caring who prevailed. but only deliring to have them wearie themselves, whilesthe was busied elswhere; that so at length he might finde oportunitie to set vpon the stronger. If therefore Alexander were so wise, as to keepe in his purse the fine hundred Talents which he had, and without ftroke ftricken, to receive the whole Lordship of Peloponne (145; it should be freely put into his hands by Cassander. Provided, that hee should from thenceforth, renounce all confederacie made with Antigonia, and enterinto a fure and faithfull league with Ptolomie, Caffander, and the rest of the Confederates. O- 20 therwise, hee might well perswade himselfe, that the Countrie which his Father could not keepe, when he was indeede the Lieutenant of the Empire, should not in hafte be wonne by him, that was only the Factor of a proud injurious man, so stiling himselfe, but not acknowledged by others.

Alexander had lived a while with Antigonus fince the beginning of these wars : among whose followers it was not hard to discouer the intent, ( which hee did not carrie verie secret) of making himselfe absolute Lord of all. Therefore he was soone entreated to accept so good an offer; and did not stick to enter into that league. whereby he was to become a free Lord, and subject vnto no mans controll.

Howbeit this his honour continued not long, ere he loft both it and his life toge- 20 ther, by treason of the Sieyonians; who thinking thereby to have made themselves free, were soone after vanquished in battaile by Cratespolis, Alexanders wife, a difcreet and valiant Ladie. Shee in reuenge of her husbands death crucified thirtie of the Citizens taken in fight; and having by seneritie taught them obedience, did af-terwards containe her Armie in good order, and governed those places that shee held, with the loue and commendation of her Subjects and Neighbours.

ð. IIII.

The Atolians rife against CASSANDER in favour of ANTIGONYS, and are beaten. A fleet and land-armie of ANTIGONVS, viterly defeated by PTOLOMIES Lieutenant. In what termes the warre food at this time. ANTIGONVS drawes nearer to Greece.

NTIGONVS, when he found, that with fo much monie he had only bought an enemie, beganne to raife troubles to Caffander and his other aduersaries, in Greece, by stirring vp the Ætolians against them; Likewise he laboured to winneto his partiette Ilands in the Greeke Seas, by whose affishance he might bee the better able to deale with Ptolomie, that greatly prevailed by reason of his strong fleet. But neither of these attempts had the successe which he expected. The Ætolians, a factious Nation, and alwaics enuying the greatnesse of their Neighbours, were often in commotion, but fo, that commonly their gaines equalled not their loffes. Caffander wanne fome of their owne Countrie; fortified the Acarnanians against them, and compelled Glaucias, King of the Illyrians, whom he vanquished in battaile, to forsake their side, and binde himfelfe to beare no armes against Caffanders friends.

On the other fide, as many pettic llands were drawne to ioyne with Antigonus: fo the Fleet of the Rhodians vnder Theodatus, who was Admirall to Antigonus, paffing along the coast of Alistoward Cyprus, with an Armie vnder conduct of Perilaus marching on the shore for mutuall affistance, was quite ouerthrowne by Ptolomies Nanie. Polyclytus, who in Ptolomies behalfe had beene fent into Peloponnelius against 10 Alexander, finding no neede of his service in that Countrie, because Alexander was come ouer to their fide, returned homewards, and by the way heard of the course which these Antigonians held, whom he very cunningly surprised. Hee rode with his Fleet behinde a Cape, which the enemies were to double; his Land-forces hee placed in ambush, whereinto Perilaus falling was taken prisoner, with many of his men, and many were flaine, making little relistance. Theodatus the Admirall perceiping this, made all hast to helpe his fellowes that were on Land; but whilest hee with all his Fleet were intentiue only to that businesse, Polyclytus appeared at their backs; who as foone as he perceived their diforder, haftened about the Cape, and charging them behinde suffered not one of them to escape him. These ill tidings 20 caused Antigonus to deale with Ptolomie about some composition. First, hee sent Embaffadors; afterwards they met in person. But Antigonus would not yeeld vnto the demands of Ptolomie: fo the parlie was vaine. Hitherto each part feemed to have indifferently feed in the Warre, and thereby to have equal cause of hope and seare. This late victorie with the good successe of his affaires in Cyprus, did seeme to make amends to Ptolomie for his losses in Syria. Likewise the repolt of alexander from Anisonus did equall the Consederacie, made betweene the Atolians and him; as also those petries kirmishes, that had beene in Alia the leffe, to Antigonus his advantage, were fufficiently recompensed by others of like regard, but aduer fe to him; and by the troubles brought vpon his estates in 30 those parts by the two Cassanders.

Contrariwife, Intigonus valued the loffe of his men, monic, and ships, no otherwisethan as the paring of his nailes, that were left long crough, and would easily grow againe; but the enlargement of his Territoric by addition of Syria, he prized at a higher rate, as if thereby hee had fed vpon a limbe of Ptolomie his enemie, and strengthened the bodie of his owne Empire. Concerning other accidents, whereof the good were hitherto sufficient to counterpoize the bad, he meant to proceede as occasion should direct, which commonly is not long wanting to them, that want

That which most molested him was the attempts of his enemies upon Asia the 40 leffe; wherein though as yet they had gotten little, yet had he cause to seare, left the people, being tied vnto him by no bond of allegeance, might vpon small occafion report from him, to men of as honorable reputation as hee himselfe. To preuent this, and to be nearer to Greece, he held it expedient for him to be there in perfon, where his affaires did seeme to prosper the worse, by reason of his absence. Therefore he left part of his Armie in Syria, under his sonne Demetrius, to whom, being then but two and twentie yeares old, he appointed many ancient Captaines as affilt.nts, or rather as Directors: the reft he carried with him into Phrygia, where he meant to winter.

HOW LYSIM ACHVS and CASSANDER Vanauilled Some enemies, raised against them by ANTIGONVS. The good successe of ANTIGONVS in Asia and Greece: with the rebellion of many Cities against

He comming of Intigonus into those parts, wrought a great alteration in the procedle of his bufinefle thereabouts. For his enemies had thort leifure to thinke vpon molefting him in Asia: they themselves 10 were held ouer-hardly to their owne worke on Europe fide. Seuthes a

King of the Thracians, joyning with some Townes that rebelled against Ly/imachus, brought also the bordering Seythians into the quarrell. All these relied vpon Antigonus, who was to helpe them with monie, and other aide. The Etolians likewife tooke courage, and role against Cassander, having Ancides, lately restored to the Kingdome of Epirus, their affistant. But Ly/machus gaue vnto his Rebels no time to confirme themselves. Hee sodainly presented himselfe before two of the Cities that had rebelled, and compelled them by feare to returne to their dutie. He fought a battaile with the Soythians, and wild Thracians, and draue them out of the Countrie. Finally, he ouer-came Seuthes; and following the heat 20 of his victorie, flew Paufanias in battaile, whom Antigonus had fent ouer with an Armie; and all his men he did either put to ransome, or fill vp with them his owne Bands. The like fuccesse had Philip, Cassanders Lieutenant, against the Etolians. For he wasted their Countrie; fought with the Epirotes, that came to helpe them; and after the victorie, fought againe with their forces io yned in one, ouerthrowing them, and killing * Eacides that vnfortunate King. Finally, hee draue the * Etolians out of most of their Countrie, and forced them to seeke their safetie among the wild Mountaines. Of the Epirotes he fent as prisoners to Cassander, the principall authors of the Kings restitution, and of the present Warre.

Yet thele actions required fome time, and wearied Antigonus his aduerfaries 30 with painefull trauaile; after which they remained only fauers. Antigonus himfelfe at faire leifure wanne all Caria the whileft, and fent Armies into Pelaponnelius. and other parts of Greece, bestowing libertie upon all the Cities he tooke out of Cals fanders hands. The whole Countrie of Peloponne fus (excepting Sicyon and Corinth) with the Ile of Eubaa, and many places of the firme Land were by these meanes wonne to be his in true and vehement affection, readie to doe or fuffer any thing for him, that had made so cuident a demonstration of his readinesse, to give them the libertie indeede, which others promifed in idle words. Many States defirous of the fame benefit, would faine have shewed their good will; but they were kept in by Cylinders Garrifons, who was too wife to truft them loofe. Therefore Antigonus 40 made thew as if he would paffe ouer into Macedon : by which terror he forced Caffander to repaire thither in all hafte, with the best of his strength, leaving many good Townes of Greece fo weakely guarded, that well they might take courage to helpe themselves, if any forraine succour appeared. The aide which they defired was not long wanting. The Lieutenants of Antigonus, taking the advantage of Cassanders departure, entred the Countrie; draue his Garrisons out of divers Cities; forced the Governour of Athens to enter into league with their Lord; wanne the Citadell of Thehes, and let the people at libertie. This last action was somewhat remarkable. For Thehes had not long before beene raifed out of her old ruines by the meere power of Caffander; of which act hee was accused by Antigonus, as if it had beene 50 fome hainous crime. Yet now the same Antigonus winnerth the Citic, and the loue of the Inhabitants, only by expelling him that was their Founder. So much are men readier to thanke the Increaser, than the Author of their good; and rather to looke forward vpon those hopes, which vainely they extend beyond all measure, than backward vpon their miferable nullitie, that held them vncapable of being

Victories of PTOLOMIE by Sea. A great battaile at Gaza, which PTOLOMIE and SELEVCUS wanne, against DENE-TRIVS the Sonne of ANTIGONVS.

'S the presence or nearenesse of Antigonus gaue life to his affaires in the lower Alia, and Greece; fo the delignes of his enemies, taking aduantage of his absence, ruined the very foundations of those great works in the Easterne parts, wherewith in the yeare preceding bee had ouer-topped them. The Isle of Cyprus, whose Princes wanered betweene contrarie affections, inclining one while to Antigonus, another while faintly regarding their couenant with Prolomie, was visited by an Agyptian fleet, wherewith Ptolomie, in his owne person, easily reduced them to a more settled order, putting fome to death, carrying others away prisoners, and leauing a Lieutenant of his own 20 appointment, Gouernour of the whole Countrie. With the same fleet he ranne alongst the Sea-coasts, wasting a great part of Caria and Cilicia, with the spoiles of which he enriched his followers, and returned loden to Cyprus. Demetrius the sonne of Antigonia, hearing frequent reports of the mileries, wherewith his Fathers Subjects were oppressed, made all hast out of Syria to the rescue, taking only his Horse and light-armed foot with him, because the businesse required expedition. But in vaine did he tire himselfe and his followers, in hastie seeking of one, that by lanching out into the deepe could in a few minutes delude the labour of fo many dayes, if neede had forequired. Answerable to the vanitie of this expedition was the succeffe. For Ptolomic was gone, before Demetrius came into Cilicia. Neither was it cer-30 taine, whether having lightened his ships of their burthen in Crprus, hee would returne vponthole maritime Countries; or make toward Syria, where his comming was expected. He was indeede gone into Egypt, and there with Seleucus was deferibing aroyall Armie, which he leuied with all convenient speede, for the recouerie of Syria. This was more than Demetrius knew. Therefore he was faine to choose our of vicertainties the most likelyhood, and returne the way that hee came, with all his companies, which were fitter for feruice in the open field, than to be beflowed in Garrifons among the Cilicians. Hee had fearce refreshed his Men and Horses in Syria, when the newes arrived of Peolomies comming with a puiffant Armie, to give him battaile. Hereupon he called to counfaile his principall friends, who aduised 49 him to give way to the time, and expect some better oportunitie in the future: being a yong man, and weakely furnished with meanes to refist such ancient and famous Generalls, as Ptolomie and Seleucius. This counfaile feemed rather to proceede from the cold temper of those aged men that gaue it, than from any necessity growing out of the present businesse. For Demetrius considering himselfe to beethe fonne of Antigonus, and now Generall of his Fathers Armie, thought his owne title waightic enough to bee laid in ballance against the bare names of those two great Commanders. Neither found hee much reason that should moue him to distrust his forces, as infufficient. His men were better exercised than the enemies, and promifed as much as could be required. Therefore perfuading himfelfe, that fuch ods 50 of number, and of great fame, would rather ferue to adorne his victorie, than hinder Arabia.

him in obtaining it, hee refolued to put the matter to triall, without expecting the advantage of more helpe. So animating his Souldiers with hope of spoile and rewards, he abode the comming of the Enemies at Gaza, with purpose to encounter them, as foone as they had finished their wearisome journic ouer the Deserts of together.

Ptolomie and Seleucus ithing out of forich a Prounce, as Egypt, came to well

prouided of all necessaries, that their Armie felt not any great gricuance of the cuill way, when battaile was prefented them, which confidently they undertooke. In all things elfe they had the ods of Demetrius; of Elephants they were veterly unprouided. But how to deale with those beasts they were not ignorant. They had prepared a kinde of Palifado, faftened together with chaines, and fharpened in fuch manner, that the Elephants could not feeke to breake younit, without receiving much hurt. The rest of their forces, which (besides that they had advantage in multitude) were heartened with many fortunate feruices, by them performed that long and dulling expectation, they disposed in such order, as best answered to the forme, wherein Demetrius was embattailed. The fight beganne, and was maintained with equall courage, for a long time, each part striuing more to winne honour, than to satisfic any other passion, as having little cause of hatred, or revenge. But after some continuance, the greater number holding better out, the error of Demetriue, who vpon no necessitie would needes fight a battaile with disaduantage, be-ganne to appeare by his losses. Hee had committed himselfe to Fortune, having more to loofe by her than he could get: but in this fight flice was idle, and left all to be decided by firong hands; vnleffe it may be faid, that the terror brought vpon of warre hardly to be relifted on plaine ground, and therefore at the first they made great spoile amongst Ptolomies men. A fterward seeking to breake through the Palisado, they were forely hurt, and cucrie one of them taken. This disaster caused the Horsemen of Demetrius to faint. They had laboured hard, and prevailed little, till now perceiuing that all must lie vpon their hands, who were ill able to make their owne places good, they beganne to shrinke, and many of them to provide for their fafetie by timely flight, which example the rest quickly followed. When Demetrius had strough fo long in vaine to make his menabide, that hee himselfe was likely to be loft; he was faine to give place to the stronger, making a violent retrait as farre as of his carriages was in Gaza, whither forme of his companie turned afide, hoping to faue fuch goods, as in haft they could pack vp. This foolish couetousnesse was their destruction, and the losse of the Towne. For whilest they forgetfull of the danger, had filled the streets with sumpter Horses, and cloied up the gates, thronging, some to get in and fetch, others, to carrie out what they had alreadie loden, Polomies Armie brake in without relistance, taking them with their goods and the Citie al-in those times to get, than to keepe; and opened the way vnto all the greatnesse of and Phanicia, some townes held out a while, but were soone taken in by Ptolomie.

Among these were the great Cities of Tyrus and Sidon; of which Sidon was given vp by the Inhabitants; Tyrus by the Garrison, falling to mutinie against their Ca-ptaine; who trusting to the strength of it, had made great vaunts, but was pardo-

How SELEVCUS recovered Babylon, and made bimfelfe Lord of many Countries in the higher Alia. The ARA of the Kingdome of the Greekes, which beganne with this Dominion of SELEVEVS.

Hile Ptolomie followed his businesse with such prosperitie, Seleucus tooke leave of him, and went vp to Babylon, to trie his owne fortune; which hee found so fauourable, that recouring first his owne Prouince, hee became at length mafter of the better part of Alexanders

This expedition of Seleucus was very strange, and full of vnlikelihoods. His traine of no more then eight hundred foote, and two hundred horse, a number too small, to have been placed as Garrison, in some one of those mainegreat Cities, against which he carried it into the higher Afia. But little force is needfull, to make way into ftrong places, for him that alreadie stands possessed of their hearts which dwell within the walls. The name of Seleucus was enough; whom the Babylomans had found fo good a Gouernour, that none of them would finde courage to relift him; 20 but left that worke to Antigonus his owne men, withing them, ill to speede. Some of the Macedonians that were in those Countries, had the like affection; others made a countenance of warre, which by easie compulsion they left off, and followed new Enlignes. This added courage to the people, who came in apace, and fubmitted themselues ioyfully to Seleucus. In a defection so generall, it was not a safe course for the Antigonians, to thrust themselves into the Townes of most importance: for every man of them should have been troubled with daily enemies, in his owne lodging. It remained that they should iffue forth into the field, and triethe matter by fight. But the treason of one principall man, who revolted to the enemie, with more then a thousand Souldiers following him, so difmaied the rest, that 30 they did no more than feeke to make good one strong place, wherein were kept the Holtages and Prifoners, that Antigonus held for his fecuritie in those quarters. This Castle, belike, they had not fortified in times of leisure, against dangers, that were not then apparent. Seleneus quickly tooke it; and fo got the entire possession of Melopotamia and Babylon.

Antigonus had bestowed in Media and Persia, forces convenient for defence of those Provinces, that were the vtmost of his Dominion. In the Countries about Emplirates he had not done the like: for his owne great Armie lay betweene them and all enemies. Therefore when the victorie at Gaza, had opened vnto Selencus the way into those parts; he found little impediment in the rest of his businesse. 49 Hauing now gotten what he fought; it behoued him to feeke how he might keepe his gettings: for his owne forces were too fmall, and his friends were ill able to lend himany more. That which his friends could not doe for him; his enemies did. Nicanor, to whom Antigonus had committed his Armie in Media, ioyning vnto himselfe, out of Persia and other Countries, all needfull helpe, came with ten thousand foote, and seuen thousand horse, either to saue all from being lost, or to drive Seleneus out of that which he had wonne.

Against this power, Seleucus had only foure hundred horse, and somewhat aboue three thousand foot, wherewith to oppose himselfe: his large conquest of vnwarlike Nations having yeelded him many louing subjects, but few souldiers. There-50 fore when his enemies were neare to the River of Tigris, he withdrew himselfe from the place where his reliftance was expected, into certaine marilhes not farre off; where he lay fecretly waiting for some advantage. Nicanor thought that hee had beene fled, and was the leffe carefull in fortifying his campe. In recompence of this vaine securitie, his campe was taken by surprize, the first night of his arrivall;

the Satrapa, or Lieutenant of Persia, together with fundrie of the Captaines, were flaine, he himselfe was driven to flee for his life into the Deserts; and the whole Armie yeelded vnto Selencus: whose gentle demeanour, after the victorie, drew all Media, Sufiana, and the Neighbour Provinces, to acknowledge him their Lordwithout any further stroke stricken.

This victorie of Seleucus gaue beginning vnto the new file, of The Kingdome of the Greekes, an accompt much vied by the lewes, Chaldaans, Syrians, and other Nations in those parts. I will not make any long disputation about the first yeare of this Era. The authoritie of that great Astrologer Ptolomie, from which, there is Piol.A'mag.lin no appeale, makes it plaine, that the fine hundred and nineteenth yeare of NABONAS-10

SAR, was the fourescore and two years of this accompt. Other inference hereupon is L. Gaurie, in an- needleffe, than that note of the learned GAVRICVS, That the first of these reares notat. ad lunm was reckoned compleat, at Babylon, together with the end of foure hundred thirtie and eight yeares after NABONASSAR. With the observation of the Saturne, recorded by Ptolomie, agrees (as it ought) the calculation of Bunting; finding the fame Planet to have beene so placed in the signe of Virgo, as the Chaldeans had observed it, in the same yeare; which was from Nabonassar the fine hundred and mineteenth; from Seleucus the fourescore and two yeare; and the last of the hundred thirtie and seuenth Olympiad. These observations of the Celestiall bodies, are the surest markes of time: from which he that wilfully varies, is inexcusable. As for such occurrences 20 in Historie, and the yeares of succeeding Princes (that are not seldome ambiguous, by reason of vnremembred fractions) if they seeme to be here-against, it is not greatly materiall. Yet thus much is worthic of note; that these yeares of the Greekes, were not reckoned in all Countries from one beginning; as plainly appeares in the difference of one yeare, that is found betweene actions, related by the feuerall Authors of the two Bookes of the Machabees, who follow divers accompts. He that shall adhere to the time defined by Ptolomie, may apply the other supputations thereunto, as being no farther from it, than a yeares distance.

d. VIII.

How PTOLOMIE lost all that he had wonne in Syria. What the causes were of the quiet obedience, performed onto the Macedonians, by those that had beene subiect unto the Persian Empire. Of divers pettie enterprizes, taken in hand by ANTIGONVS and DEMETRIVS, with ill successe.

N a happie houre did Seleucus aduenture, to goe vp to Babylon, with fo few men as his friend could then well spare : for had he staied longer 40 vpon hope of getting more Souldiers, Ptolomie could have spared him none at all, Demetrius the sonne of antigonus, having lost the battaile at Gaza, received from Ptolomie all his owne goods, his Pages, and Ser-

uants, in free gift, and therewithall a curteous message, to this effect: That no perfonall hatred was the ground of this Warre, which hee and his Confederates held with Antigonus; but only termes of honour, wherein they would feeke to right themselues after such manner, that other friendly Offices, without reference to the quarrell, should not be forgotten.

This Noble dealing of Ptolomie, did kindle in Demetrius an earnest desire, of requiting him, with some as braue liberalitie. Which to effect, he gathered together 50 the remainder of his broken troups; drew as many as could bee spared, out of the Garrisons in Cilicia, or other Provinces thereabouts; and advertising his Father of his misfortune, befought him to fend a new fupply, wherewith he might redceme his honour loft. Antigonus, vpon the first newes of this ouerthrow, had said,

That the victoric which Ptolomie wanne vpon a beardleffe Boy, should bee taken from him by bearded men: yet voon delire that his sonne, whom hee tenderly loued, should amend his owne reputation, He was content to make a stand in Phrygia. Ptolomic hearing of Demetrius his preparations, did neuertheleffe follow his owner butinefle in Catefyriz; thinking it enough, to fend part of his Armie vnder Cilles his Licutenant, against the remnant of those, that had been ealreadie vanquished, when their forces were entire. I his peraduenture would have beene sufficient: had nor Cilles too much undertualised the power of fuch an Enemie. Hee thought that this yong Gallant, having lately faued his life by flight, would now bee more carefull of to baning a faire way at his back, than adventurous in fetting further forward, then vrgent reason should prouoke him. In this confidence he passed on without all fear; as one that were alreadic Mafter of the field, and should meete with none, that would iffue out of their places of strength, to make resistance. When Demetrius was informed of this careleffe march; he tooke the lightest of his Armic, and made his journie with fuch diligence, one whole night, that early in the morning, he came vpon Cilles vnexpected, and was on the fuddaine, without any battaile, Mafter of his Campe: taking him aline, with his Souldiers, and their carriages all at once.

This exploit served not only to repaire the credit of Demetrius, which his losse at Gaza had almost ruined: but further it enabled him, to recompence the bountie of 20 Ptolomie, with equal fauor, in refloring to him Cilles, with many other of his friends, accompanied with rich presents. But neither was Ptolomie so weakned by this losse, nor Demetrius so emboldened by his victorie, that any matter of consequence therevpon enfued. For Demetrius feared the comming of Ptolomie; and therefore he fortified himfelfe in places of advantage: Ptolomic on the other fide was loath to engage himfelfe in an enterprise, wherein he might perceiue, that if the comming of Antiganus found him entangled, he should either be driven to make a shamefull retrait, or a dangerous adventure of his whole estate, in hope of not much more than alreadie he possessed. Antigonus, indeede, was nothing flow in his way towards Syria; whither hee 30 made all hafte, not so much to relieue his sonne, as to embrace him. For he rejoyced exceedingly, that the yong man had so well acquitted himselfe, and being left to his owne advice, performed the office of a good Commander. Wherefore to increase the reputation of this late victorie, he brought such forces, as might serue to re-conquer all Syras: meaning, that the honour of all, should be referred vnto the good foundation, laied by his sonne; whom from this time forwards, he imploied in matters of greatelt importance. Profamic had now leffe reason, to encounter with Antigonia, than before his comming to hane affailed the Campe of Demetrius. Yet he made it a matter of confulration; as if he had dared more than he meant. But all his Captaines adulfed him to retire into segrept; all eaging many good arguments, to that purpose: which they might well perceive to bee agreeable to his owne intent, by his propounding that course; not without remembrance of the good successe against Perdiceas, in the like defensive warre, So he departed out of Syria, preserving his honor; as being rather led by mature deliberation, than any fuddaine passion of seare: and he departed at faire leifure, not only carrying his treasures along with him, but staying to difmantle some principall Cities, that he thought most likely to trouble him in the future. All the Countrie that he left at his back, fell presently to Antigonus, without putting him to the trouble of winning it by peeces: fo casic was it in those times, for the Captaine of a strong Armie, to make himselfe Lord of a great

50 Prouince. We may inftly wonder, that these Kingdomes of Syria, Media, Babylon, and many other Nations, (which the victorie of Alexander had ouer-runne, with fo haftie a courfe, as gaue him not leifure to take any good view of them) were so cassly held not only by himfelfe, but by the Captaines of his Armie after him. The hot contentions for superioritie betweene the King of Israel, and those of Damajeus; betweene Agypt, and Babylon; Babylon, and Niniue; the Persians, and many Countries; argue a more manly temper, to have once beene in those people; which are now so patient of a forraigne yoke, that like Sheepe or Oxen, they suffer themfelues to be distributed, fought for, wonne, lost, and againe recoursed, by contentious Masters; as if they had no title to their owne heads, but were borne to follow the fortune of the Macedonians. This will appeare the more firange, if wee thall consider, how the seuerall States of Greece (many of which had never posselled to large Dominion, as might cause their Spirits to swell beyond their abilitie) did greedily embrace all occasions of libertie : and how these proud Conquerors were glad to offer it, defiring to have them rather friends than feruants, for feare of further inconvenience.

It must therefore be noted, that most of these Countries, had alwaies beene subject vnto the rule of Kings, or pettic Lords; whom the Babylomans and Persians long fince hadrooted out, & held them in fuch bodage, that few of them knew any other Law, than the command of forraigne Masters. This had vtterly taken from the mall remembrance of home-borne Princes, & incorporated them into the great body of the Persian Empire: fo that wanting within themselves al soueraign power, or high authoritie, the life and spirit of enery Estate; then lay as dead, and were bereaued of motion, when that Kingdome fell, whereof they lately had beene members.

Why the Persian Satrapa, or Princes of that Empire, did not when Darius was taken from them, as the Macedonian Captaines, after the death of Alexander, firine to lay hold vpon those Prouinces, which had many ages beene subject vnto them. and scarce foure yeares in quiet possession of their enemies; or why at least they contended not ( when the terrible name of that great Conquerour did cease to affright them) to get their shares among his followers, if not wholly to dispossesse them of their new purchases : it is a question, wherin, who is not satisfied, may finde no leffe reason to suspect the Historie, than authoritie to confirme it. For wee seldome reade, that any finall Kingdome, preuailing against a farre greater, bath made fo entire a conquest, in the compasse of ten yeares, as left vnto the vanquished no 30 hope of recourrie, nor meanes to rebell; especially when such disorders, or rather vtter confusion hath enfued, by the furie of civill warre among the Victors.

The cause why the Macedonian held so quietly the Persian Empire, is well set downe by Macedianell; and concernes all other Kingdomes, that are subject vnto the like forme of Gouernement : the fumme whereof is this. Wherefocuer the Prince doth hold all his Subjects under the condition of flaues; there is the conquest casie, and soone affured: Where ancient Nobilitie is had in due regard, there is it hard to winne all, and harder to keepe that which is wonne. Examples of this are the Turkifb Empire, and the Kingdome of France. If any Inuader should preuaile fo farre vpon Turkie, that the great Sultan and his Children (for brethren hee 40 vseth not to suffer aliue) were taken or slaine: the whole Empire would quickly be wonne, and easily kept, without any danger of rebellion. For the Bassaes, how great focuer they may feeme, are meere flaues; neither is there in all that large Dominion, any one man, whose personall regard could get the people to follow him in such an attempt, where in hope of private gaine, should not countervaile all apparent matter of feare. Contrariwife, in France, it were not enough for him that would make a conquest, to get into his hands the King and his Children; though hee further got the better part of the Countrie, and were by farre the strongest in the field. For, besides the Princes of the Roiall bloud, there are in the Kingdome store of great men; who are mightie in their feuerall Countries, and having certaine Roy- 50 alties and Principalities of their owne; are able to raise Warre, in all quarters of the Realme; whereunto the remembrance of their owne ancient Families, and long continued Nobilitie, will alwaies stirre vp and inflame them, so that vntill euery one peece were wonne, and enery one (an endlesse worke) of the chiefe Nobilitie, brought vnder or destroyed, the victorie were not compleat, nor well affured. It is true, that fuch power of the Nobilitie, doth often-times make way for an Inuader; to whom the discontentments of a few can easily make a faire entrance. But such affiftants are not so easily kept, as they are gotten: for they looke to bee satisfied at full, in all their demands; and having what they would, they foone returne to their old allegeance, vpon condition to keepe what they have, vnleffe they be daily hired with new rewards: wherein it is hard to please one man, without offending another as good as himselfe. The Turke, on the other side, needes not to seare any perill, that might arise from the discontented spirits of his principall men. The grea-

to tell mischiefe that any of them could worke against him, were the betraying of fome frontier Towne, or the wilfull loffe of a battaile; which done, the Traitor hath front his fling, and must either flic to the enemie, whereby he looseth all that he formerly did hold, or elfe, in hope of doing fome further harme, he must aduenture to excuse himselfe vnto his Malter, who seldome forgiues the Captaine, that hath not ftriuen by desperate valour, against misfortune. As for making head, or arming their followers against the great Sultan, and so joyning themselves vnto any Inuader; it is a matter not to be doubted: for none of them haue any followers or dependants at all, other than fuch, as are subject vncothem, by vertue of their Offices and Commissions. Now as this base condition of the principal men, doth 20 leaue vnto them no meanes, whereby to oppose themselves against the flourishing cftate of their Prince; fo would it weaken both their power and their courage in giuing him affiltance, if aduerlitic should make him stand in neede of them. For there is scarce any one among the Turkes Bassas provinciall Governours, that knowes cither from whence he was brought, or from whom descended, nor any one among them, that by the loffe and vtter ruine of the Turkifb Empire, can loofe any foot of his proper inheritance, and it is the proper inheritance of the subject, which is also a Kingdome vnto him, which makes him fight with an armed heart against the Conqueror, who hath no other denice painted on his Enfigne, than the picture of

As is the Turkifb Empire, fo was the Persian, voide of libertie in the Subjects, and veterly destitute of other Nobilitie, than such as depended upon meere fauour of the Prince. Some indeede there were of the Royall bloud, and others, descended from the Princes that joyned with Darius, the Sonne of Hyllafjes, in oppresfine the Magi: these were men of reputation in Persia; but their reputation consifted only in their Pedigree, and their fafetic in not medling with affaires of State, which made them little effeemed. In what finall account these Persian Princes wereheld, it may appeare by this, that the Kings Vncles, Cosen Germans, and Brethren, were called by the Kings, Their Slanes, and so did stile themselues, in speaking vnto these great Monarchs. That vpon cuery light occasion of displea-40 fure they were handled as Slaues; it is easie to be discerned, in that example of crueltie, practifed by Xerxes vpon his owne brother Massfees, which hath beene formerly noted, in place more convenient. As for the Sairapa, or Governours of the Proninces, it is needlesse to cite examples, proning them to have been meere slaues:

it may suffice, that their heads were taken from them at the Kings will; that is, at the will of those Women and Eunuches, by whom the King was gouerned. To this want of Nobilitie in Persia, may be added the generall want of libertie, convenient among the people: a matter no leffe availeable, in making easie and fure the conquest of a Nation, then is the cause assigned by Machianel. For as Alope his Affe, did not care to runne from the enemies, because it was not possible, 50 that they should loade him with heavier burthens, than his Master caused him daily to beare; fo the Nations, that endure the worst under their owne Princes, are not areatly fearefull of a forraigne yoke; Nor will be haltie to shake it off, if by experience they finde it more light, then was that whereunto they had beene long accustomed. This was it that made the Gascoignes beare such faithfull affection. to the Kings of England; for that they gouerned more mildly than the French: this enlarged the Venetian jurisdiction in Lumbardie; for the Townes that they wanne, they wanne out of the hands of Tyrannous oppressors : and this did cause the Macedonians, with other Nations, that had beene subject vnto the posteritie of Alexanders followers, to serue the Romans patiently, if not willingly; for that by them they were eased of many burthens, which had beene imposed upon them by their owne Kings.

So that of this tamenesse, which we finde in those that had beene subjects of the Persian Kings, the reasons are apparent. Yet some of these there were, that could 10 not so easily be contained in good order by the Macedonians: for they had not indeede beene absolutely conquered by the Persian. Such were the Sogdians, Ba-Etrians, and other Nations about the Caspian Sea. Such also were the Arabians bordering vpon Spria: against whom antigonus sent part of his Armie; thinking therewith to bring them vnder; or rather to get a rich bootie. The Captaine that hee fent fell vpon the Nabathaans, at fuch time as they were busied in a great Mart, wherein they traded with the more remote Arabians, for Myrrhe, Frankinsence, and other such commodities. All, or most of these rich wares, together with fine hundred talents of filter, and many prisoners, the Macedonians laid hold vpon: for their comming was suddaine, and vnexpected. But ere they could recour Syria, 20 the Nabatheans ouer-tooke them, and hading them wearic with long marches, made fuch a flaughter, that of foure thousand foot, and fixe hundred horse, only fiftie horse escaped. To reuenge this loffe, Demetrius was set out with a greater power: yet all in vaine; for he was not refifted by any Armie, but by the naturall defence of a vast Wildernesse, lack of water, and of all things necessarie. Therefore he was glad to make peace with them; wherein heeloft not much honor: for they craued it, and gaue him presents. Returning from the Nabatheans, hee viewed the Lake Alphalities, whence he conceived hope of great profit that might be raifed, by gathering the Sulphure. With this good husbandrie of his fonne, Antigonus was well pleased; and appointed men to the worke: but they were flaine by the Ara- 30 bisns, and fo that hope vanished.

These pettic enterprises, with the ill successe accompanying them, had much impaired the wood admintage against Ptolomie: when the newes of Seleucus his victories in the high Countries, marred all together. For neither was the loffe of those great and wealthy Prouinces, a matter to be neglected; neither was it safe to transport the warre into the parts beyond Euphrates, whereby Syria and the lower After thould have beene exposed, to the danger of ill affected Neighbours. A middle course was thought the best; and Demetrius, with fifteene thousand foot and three thousand horse, was sent against Seleneus. These forces being sent away, Intigonus did nothing and his sonne did leffe. For Seleucus was then in Media; 40 his Lieutenants about Babylon withdrew themselves from necessitie of fight; some places they fortified and kept; Demetrius could hold nothing that he got, without fetting in Garrison more men than he could spare; neither did hee get much; and therefore was faine to fet out the brauerie of his expedition by burning and spoiling the Countrie; which he did thereby the more alienate, and as it were acknowledge to belong vnto his enemie, who thenceforth held it as his owne affured.

Antigonus had laid vpon his sonne a peremptorie commandement, to returne vnto him at a time prefixed: reasonably thinking (as may seeme) that in such an unsettled state of things, either the Warre might bee ended, by the surice of the first brunt; or esse it would bee vaine to strine, against all difficulties 50 likely to arife, where want of necessaries should frustrate the valour, that by length of time was like to become leffe terrible to the Enemie. Demetrius therefore, leaving behinde him fine thousand foote, and a thousand horse, rather to make shew of continuing the warre, than to effect much, where himselfe, with greater forces, could doe little more than nothing, for looke the enterprise, and went back to his Father.

Hese ambitious heads, having thus wearied themselves with vnesse-Etuall trauaile, in seeking to get more than any one of them could hold; were contented at length to come to an agreement: wherein it was concluded, that each of them should hold quietly, that which at the present he had in possession. As no private hatred but meere defire of Empire had moved them to enter into the warre; so was it no friendly reconciliation, but only a dulneffe growing vpon the flow advancement of their feuerall hopes, that made them willing to breath a while, till occasion might better

ferue to fight againe. Besides that maine point, Of retayning the Provinces which every one held, there were two Articles of the peace, that gaue a faire, but a false colour, to the businesse: That the sonne of A LEXANDER by ROXANE, should be made King, when he came to full age ; and, That all the Estates of Greece should be set at libertie. The advancement of yong Alexander to his Fathers Kingdome, feemes to have beene a matter, forceably extorted from Antigonus; in whom was discouered a purpose, to make himselse Lord of all. But this, indeede, more nearly touched Cassander. For in his custodie was the yong Prince and his Mother: neither did he keepe them in fort anfwerable to their degree; but as close prisoners, taken in that warre, wherein they had seene the old Queene Olympias taken and murdered, that sought to have put 30 them in possession of the Empire. The mutuall hatred and feare betweene them, rooted in these grounds, of injuries done, and remenge expected; vpon this conclufion of peace, grew vp faster than any time before, in the heart of Cassander : who faw the Mucedonians turne their fauourable expectation, towards the fonne of their

All this, either little concerned Antigonis; or tended greatly to his good. The yong Prince must first haue possession of Macedon: whereby Cassander should be reduced to his poore office, of Captaine ouer a theulandmen, it not left in worse case. As for them that held Prouinces abroad, they might either doe as they had done vnder Aridaus; or better, as being better acquainted with their owne ftrength. He in the meane time, by his readinesse to acknowledge the true Heire, had freed himselse from that ill-fauoured imputation, of feeking to make himfelfe Lord of all that Alexander had gotten.

The like advantage had he in that Article, of restoring the Greekes to their libertie-This libertie had hitherto beene the subject of much idle discourse : but it neuer tooke effect. Antigonus held scarce any Towns of theirs; Cassander occupied most of the Countrie : which if he should fit free ; he must be a poore Prince ; if not, there was matter enough of quarrell against him, as against a Disturber of the com-

In the meane season, the Countries lying betweene Enphrates and the Greeke seas, 50 together with a great Armie, and monie enough to entertaine a greater, might serue to hold up the credit of Antigonus, and to raise his hopes, as high as ever they had them all in puissance, Cassanders friends had sett him in an ill case; but he could not doe withall: for where every one mans helpe is necessarie to the warre, there may any one make his owne peace; but no one can fland out alone, when all the reft are wearie. The best was, that he knew all their affections: which tended to no such end as the becomming Subjects vnto any man; much leffe to the fonne of an Afratique woman, of whom they had long fince refused to heare mention. Therefore he tooke a short course, and caused both the Child and his Mother to be slaine: freeing thereby himfelfe in a trice, from the dangerous necessitie of yeelding up his gonernement, which he must have done when the child had come to age, Roxane was a Ladie of fingular beautie, which was perhaps the cause, why Perdicens defired to haue her sonne, being as yet vnborne, proclaimed Heire to the great Alexander. Immediately upon the death of alexander, the had yfed the fauour (if it were not love) of Perdicens, to the fatisfying of her owne bloudie malice, vpon Statira, the Daughter of King Darius, whom Alexander had likewife married, according to the custome of those Countries, wherein pluralitie of wines is held no crime. For having by a counterfait letter, in Alexanders name, gotten this poore Ladie into her hands. thee did, by affiltance of Perdiceas, murder her and her Sifter, and threw their bodies into a Well, caufing it to be filled vp with earth. But now, by Gods just vengeance, were shee and her some made away, in the like secret fashion; even at such time, as the neare approching hope of a great Empire had made her life, after a 20 wearifome imprisonment, grow dearer vnto her than it was before.

The fact of Cassinder, was not so much detested in outward thew, a sinwardly it was pleasing into all the reft of the Princes. For now they held themselues free Lords, of all that they had worker them; fearing none other change of their clates, than such as might artie by chance of warre; wherein every one perswaded himselse of successive them the territorial worker. Hereuponal of them (except Lysmachus and selencus, that had work enough at home) beganne to row ze themselues: as is now the time were come, for each man to improve his owne stock. Antigonus his Lieutenants were busine in Peloponnessus, and about testespont: while their Master was carefull in following other, and some greater matters that were more secretly to be handled. Hep pretended the libertie of Greeze: yet did the same argument minster write Deslowne, matter of quartell, against both him and Cassinder. Protomic complaining (as if he had taken the matter deeply to heart) that Antigonus had put Garrisons into some Towness, which ought, in saire dealing, to be fet at libertie. Vndereolour of rederesting this enormitie, he fernan Armie into Cissia; where he wan foure Towness, and some after lost them, without much labour of his owne or his

After this, putting to Sea with a flrong fleet, heranne along the coast of Asse, winning many places: and in that voinge allured wro bim an Nephew of Antiganus (agood Commander, but discontented with the ill requitall of his services) whom 49 sinding shortly, as false to himselfe, as he had beene to his owne Vncle, he was faine to put to death. But in doing these things, his desire to set the Greekes at libertic, appeared not so plaine, as he wilhed that it should for their case was no way bettered, by his molelling Antiganus in Asia. Therefore to get the lone of that valiant Nation, He made at the slaft an expedition into Greekes if sleft where having set tree slower little slands, and landed in Pelapomossus, he raised so great an expectation, of finishing the long desired worke, that Crassipasis, the Widow of Aslexander, Polys exhons some, gaue vp into his hands the Townes of Sisson and Conntb.

Ptolomie had conceiued a vaine beleefe, that the Greekes emboldened by his countenance and alfillance, would all of them take heart, and rife vp in armes: where-50 yo with litle labour, their libertie might be gotten; and hee bee acknowledged as Author of this immortall benefit. But long fernitude had well-neare extinguished the ancient valour of that Nation: and their ill fortune; in many likely attempts to

The Lacedamonians, about these times, beganne to fortisse their Towne with walls; trusting no longer in their vertue (for both it, and the discipline that vpheld it, were too much impaired) that had beene a wall to their Towne and Territoric.

The Athenians were become as humble ferruants as they had been, in times paft, infolent Maßers: creeting as many flatuaes in honor of Demetrius Phalereus, as there were dayes in their yeare. This Demetrius was now their Gouernour; and he gouerned them with much moderation: but in flight of their hearts, as being fit of une tribudy Defallment. By this bafe temper of the principall Cities, it is eafle to gather, how the reft of the Countrie flood affected. Protomic could not get them, to fet their helping hands, to their owne good, and to furnish them with the promifed fupplies, of monic and victualls. Credible it is, that he had a true meaning to deliver them from thraldome; as judging the commoditie, that would arife by an exing them to his patite, a matter of more weight, than the lofte that Culfunder should receive thereby, who could hardly retaine them, if once Antigonus tooke the worke in hand. But when he tound fuch difficultie in the bulinefie, he changed his purpose; and retenging his former triendship with Culfunder, he retained Si-eyon and Corimb in his owne policifion.

Before the comming of Ptolomie into Greece, Cassander had beene held occupied with very much worke. For (besides his paines taken in warres among barbarous Princes) he found meanes to allure vnto himselse, the Lieutenants of Antigomus, that were in Peloponness, and about Helessons in making his owne aduantage, of their discontentments. By the like skilfull practife, Hee freed himselse from a greater danger: and made those murders which he had committeed seeme the lefte odious, by teaching his enemiest odo et helike. Old Possipersbon, that had made so great a stirre in the raigne of Aridaus, did after the death of Roxane and her Child, enteragaine vpon the Stage: leading in his hand another sonne of the great Alexander, and meaning to place hom in his Fathers Throne.

The name of this yong Prince was Hereules: hee was begotten on Bar/me, the Daughter of Arshazum a Perlim; but had beene lefte eftermed than the fonce of Barsine, either for that his Mother was held no better than a Concubine, or elfe perhaps, in regard of the fauour which Perdiceat, and after him Olympias, did beare vnto Barsine. At this time, the death of his brother, had moued fuch compallion, and regard of his being Alexanders only liuing child, had procured vnto him fuch good will, that the demand which Polylperchon made in his behalfe, was deemed very juft and honorable. There were indeed em more hearts then hands, that joyned with this yong Prince: yet wanted he not fufficent flrength of hands, if the heart of him, that leaft ought, had not beene most falle. Calfunder had raifed an Armic, to 40 with fland his entrie into Alexedon: but little trult could he repoie in that Armic, to whose wishes he perceived to be with tiercules. Therefore he affaired pelyspectum himselfe, with gifts and promises; wherewith at length he preuailed so farre, that the old Vilaine was contented to murder his Pupil, choosing rather with many curses, and sowledishonour, totake the offered Lordship of Pelopoungius, and Commander of an Armie; than to purchase a Noble same with dangerous trauaile, in maintaining his faith, wito both his dead and liuing Soueraignes.

Anizonus had not all this while beenea-fleepe; though his loffes were hitherto the chiefe witneffes, of his hauing beenea fittret in thefe commotions. He though it it enough for him at the prefent, to retaine his owne; and therefore tooke order for the recourse of those places, which Ptolomie had taken paines to winne. As for the

50 the recourse of thole places, which Plainme had taken painted so white. And the reft, it no way grieued him, to fee Calfander incurre the generall harred of men, by committing those murders, of which the profit was like to redound vnto him, that was the most powerfull: or to fee Polyspershow and Protomic Sweat, in a builte warre against against Cassander. If they would have continued their quarrells, he could well have affoorded them leifure, and have thought the time well fpent, in beholding their contentions. For he was throughly perfwaded, that when the rest had wearied themselves in vaine with long strife, his armies and treasures, wherein he exceeded them all, would bring all vnder. According to these haughtic conceipts, he demeaned himfelfe among his followers; looking bigge vpon them, and like a King before his time. This was it that caused so many of them, to revolt from him; but it was no great loffe to bee for faken by those that looked with engious eyes, you that fortune, whereon their owne should have depended. Against this envic of his owne men, and the malice of others, Antigonus bufily fought a remedie, fuch as 10 was like to give him a goodly title, to the whole Empire. Cleopatra, Sifter unto the great Alexander, lay for the most part in Sardes; whom he had a great defire to take to wife. This his defire was not without good hope: for howfocuer thee discouered much willingnesse thereufito, yet was shee in his power, and might therefore be entreated, were it only for feare of being enforced. But it was not his purpose, to get her by compulsive meanes; either because his faincie being an old man, was not ouer violent; or rather because his ambition, wherevnto all his affections had reference, could have made finall vse of her, by doing fuch apparent wrong. Shee had beene married vnto Alexander King of Epirm, atter whose death shee came to her brother in Asia; hoping, belike, to finde a new 20 husband in his Campe. But neither any of those braue Captaines, that were, in times following, so hot in loue with her, durst then aspire vnto her marriage: nor did her brother, full of other cares, trouble himfelfe with prouiding her of an husband. Shee therefore, being a lustie widow, suffered her bloud, so farre to prevaile against her honour, that shee supplied the want of an husband by entertainment of Parramours. Alexander hearing of this, turned it to a jest: faying, that shee was his fifrom a month of the allowed this libertie, as her portion of the Empire. When by his death, the Empire lay, in a manner, voide, and the portion due to her therein, grew, in mens opinion, greater than it had beene: then did many feeke to obtaine her, while thee her felfe defired only a proper man, with whom thee might lead a merie 30 life. To this purpose did shee inuite Leonatus vnto her; who made great haste: but was cut off by death, ere he came to her presence. Now at the last, after long tarrying, shee had her choise of all the great Commanders: Antigoniu, Ptolomie. Lylimachus, and Cassander, being all her earnest wooers. All these (Antigoniu excepted) had wines alreadic, Ptolomie had many wines, and many Concubines, whom he respected as much as his wives, being noted of too much dotage in that kinde. This hindred not his fute: peraduenture it advanced it, by giving to Cleopatra, some hope of mutuall tolleration. To him therefore shee bequeathed her selfe, and was taking her journie from Sardes towards him; when Antigonus his Deputie in that Citie, made her to flay, vntill his Mafters further pleasure should be knowne. Anti- 40 gonus had now a Woolfe by the cares: he neither could well hold her, nor durft let her goe. Shee would not be his wife; he had none honeft pretence to force her; and to keepe her prisoner, had beene the way, by which he might have incurred a generall hatred, lasting perhaps beyond her life; as the course taken by Cassander against Roxane (a Ladie leffe respected than Alexanders owne sister) did well testifie. Therefore he thought it the wifest way, to procure her death: for to let any other enion the commoditie of so faire a title to the Kingdome, it was no part of his meaning. To this purpose he sent instructions to the Gouernour of Sardes; willing him in any case to docit secretly. So the fact was committed, and certaine women about her put in trust with the murder: which women afterwards were put to death, as 50 mischieuous conspirers, against the life of that good Ladie. So was Antigonus freed from blame, at the leaft, in his owne opinion: but the world was leffe foolish, than to be so deluded. How the murther was detected, we neede not aske: for seldome

is that bloudie crime vnreuealed; and neuer fo ill fmothered, as when great perfons are the Authors.

Thus was the whole race of Philip and A'exander the Great extinguished, and it was extinguished by the hands of such as thought vpon nothing lesse than the execution of Gods justice, due vnto the crueltie, of these powerfull, but mercilesse Princes. Wherefore the ambitious frames, erected by these Tyranes, vpon so wicked foundations of innocent bloud, were foone after cast downe, ouer-whelming themselues or their children, with the ruines, as the sequele will declare.

How DEMETRIVS, the Sonne of ANTIGONVS, gane libertieto Athens, expelling the Garrisons of CASSANDER out of those parts. The immoderate honors decreed by the Athenians to ANTIGONVS and DENETRIVS.

One being left aline, that had any title to the Kingdome; it flood with good reason, that they which were Lords of the Provinces, acknowledging no Superior, thould freely professe themselues Kings in name, as they were alreadie in fubfiance. Yet had this name ill beseemed the weaker, while the strongest of all did forbeare it : neither feemed it convenient in the judgement of Antigonus, to crownehis last action with fuch a title, as if he had attained vnto greatneffe by that foule murder, the infamie whereof he was carefull how to discharge from his owne head. He purposed therefore to vndertake a plaufible enterprife, euen the libertie of Greece: whereby it was apparent, that he might get such honor as would not only drowncall bad rewas apparent; trace the inight equal to any name of roialtic, whereof in feeming ports, but make him be thought equal to any name of roialtic, whereof in feeming modellie, hee was not couctous. To this purpofe, hee deliuered a ftrong Armic, 30 with a Nauie of two hundred and fiftie faile, and fine thousand talents of liluer, vnto Demetrius his sonne: willing him to beginne at Athems, and thence to proceede, in setting all the Countrie free.

Demetrius came to Athens before he was expected: fo that without refistance he entred the Hauen; it being thought that a fleet of Ptolomie, Caffanders good friend, had beene arrived. But when it was knowne, both who he was, and what was the cause of his comming; the joy of the Citizens brake out into loud acclamations; Demetrius Phalereus forsooke the Towne, and withdrew himselfe to Thebes, vnder lafe conduct; only the Garrison in Munychia stroue to make good that piece, which after a while was wonnevpon them by force. During the liege of Munychia, Deme-

I thinke it not impertinent, sometimes to relate such accidents, as may seeme no better than meere trifles: for euen by trifles, are the qualities of great Persons as well disclosed, as by their great actions; because in matters of importance, they commonly firaine themselves, to the observance of generall commended rules; in leffer things they follow the current of their owne Natures. The Ladie Crasesipolis lay in Patras, and had a great defire to fee Demetrius, hoping, belike, that she might, by his meanes, better her effate, and recouer her Townes of Sycion and Corinth, detained by Ptolomie (to whose Lieutenant, in those places, Demetrius before his de-30 parture out of Greece, offered monie for the furrender of them. Yet the only buffnesse pretended was loue. He being aduertised hereof, left his forces in the Countrie of Megara, and taking a companie of his lightest armed, for guard of his perfon, made a long journie to meete with her. This troupe also, he caused to lodge a

The great victorie of DEMETRIVS against PTOLOMIE in Cyprus. How An-TIGONVS and DEMETRIVS tooke upon them the file of Kings; wherein others followed their example.

Rom this glorious worke, Antigonus called away Demetrius, vnto a bulinesse of greater difficultie: meaning to imploy his seruice against Ptolomic in Cyprus. Before his departure out of Greece, he was willed, to establish a generall Counfaile; that should treat of matters, concerning the common good of the Countrie. About the fame time, Antigonus withdrew his owne Garrison out of Imbros, committing their libertic entire, into the peoples hands: whereby it might appeare, that as he would not permit any other, to oppresse the Greekes, so would be be farre from doing it himselfe. This was enough, to hold his reputation high, among these new purchased friends: it followed, that he should conuert his forces, to the winning of ground voon his

A pittifull Tragedic had lately hapned in Cyprus; through the indiferction of Menelaus, Ptolomies brother, and his Lieutenant in that Ille. Nicodes , King of Pa-20 phos, was entred into some practice with Antigonus: yet not so farre that he thought himselse past excuse; by which considence, he was perhaps, the more easily detected. To cut off this negotiation, and the false hearted King of Paphos at one blow. Menelaus was fent thither: who furrounding Nicoeles his house with Souldiers, required in Ptolomies name, to have him yeelded to the death. Nuocles offered to clear himselfe; but Menelaus told him, that die he must, and bad him come forth quietly. This desperate necessitie, caused the vnhappie King, to rid himselfe of life and his death strooke such an impression into his wife, that shee not only slew her selfe, but perfwaded the wines of her husbands brethren, to doe the like. Also those brethren of Nicocles, vnto whom Ptolomie had intended no ill, being amazed with the 30 fuddamenesse of this calamitie, did shut vp the Palace, and setting it on fire, consu-. medit, with all that was in it, and themselves together.

What socuer the crime objected was; Nicocles perished as a maninnocent, because he was not suffered to make his answere. Of this sad accident, though Menelaw described the blame, for his rigorous proceeding; yet is it to bee thought, that much dislike fell also vpon Ptolomie : as men that are grieued, cast an ill assection, euen vpon those, that gaue the farthest remoued occasion.

Not long after this, Demetrius came into Cyprus, with a power fufficient, against any opposition that Ptolomie was like to make. The Cypriots did litle or nothing against him; either because they had small strength, or for that they held it a matter 40 indifferent, whom they acknowledged as their Lord, being surethat they should not themseliues haue the rule of their owne Countrie. Menelaus therefore, out of his Garrisons, drew forth an Armie, and fought with Demetrius. But hee was beaten, and driven to faue himfelfe within the walls of Salamis; where he was so hardly befieged, that without frong fuccour hee had no likelihood to make good the place, much leffe to retaine possession of the whole lland. His greatest helpe at the present, was the fidelitie of his Souldiers; whom no rewards could winne from him, nor good vlage (when any of them were taken prisoners, and inrolled in the enemies bands) keepe from returning to him, with the first opportunitie. Most of them were Mercinaries: but all their goods were in Agypt, which was enough to 50 keepethem faithfull. Yet could not this their refolution have flood long, against the ods of number, which Demetrius had of men as resolute, and against his terrible

Engines of batterie, if Ptolomie had not hasted to the rescue. Prolomie brought with him, a hundred and fortic Gallies, besides two hundred great way from his Tent, that none might fee her when thee came. As closely as the bulinesse was carried, some of his enemies had gotten knowledge of it; whereby they conceiued good hope, that the diligence of a very few men, might ouerthrow all the great preparations of Antigonus; and bring him to any termes of reafon, by taking his deare some prisoner. Their project fell but a little short of the effect. For they came to fuddainly upon him, that he had no better thift, than to muffle himselfe in an old cloake, and creepe away disguised; leaving them to ranfack his Tent. There was in this Prince a strange medly of conditions; especially an extreme diffolutenesse in wanton pleasures, and a painefull industrie in matter ofwarre. He was of a most amiable countenance, a gentle nature, and a good wit; 10 excellent in deniling Engines of warre, and curious in working them with his owne hands. He knew better how to reforme his bad fortune, then how to rule his good. For aduerfitie made his valour more active: prosperitie stupised him with an overweening, wherein he thought, that he might doe what he lifted. His fortune was as changeable, as were his qualities : turning often round , like the picture of her wheele, till shee had wound up the threed of his life, in such manner as followeth

Returning to his Campe, and finishing his businesse at Megara; he resolved no longer to attend the iffue of a fiege, to affaile Munjohia by force, that so hee might accomplish the libertie of Athens: which, vntill it was fully wrought out, he refu- 20 fed to enter into the Citic. Munychia was strongly fortified : yet by continuance of the affault, the multitude without, through helpe of their Engines that feoured the walls, preuailed vpon the resolution of those that lay within it, and wanne the place in two daies. The walls, and all the defences of that peece against the Citie, were leuelled with the ground, and so was it freely put into the Citizens hands, to whom withall was given their libertie, with promife to aide them in maintaining it.

The fame of this action was lowder, than of any other victorie, gotten by Demetrius with greater skill and industrie. For the Athenians, having forgotten how to employ their hands, laboured to make vp that defect with their tongues: converting to base flatterie, that eloquence of theirs, which the vertues of their Ancestors 20 had futed vnto more manly arguments.

They decreed, vnto Antigonus and Demetrius, the name of Kings; they confecrated the place, in which Demetrius leaped from his Chariot, when hecentred their Citic, and built there an Altar, calling it of DEMETRIVS the a-lighter; they called them by the Names of the Godstbeir Sauiours, ordayning that every yeare, there should be chosen a Priest of these Gods; and further, that such as were emploied by their State, in dealing with either of these two Princes, should not be called Embassadors, but Theori, or Consulters with the Gods; like as were they, whom they fent vnto the Oracle of Iupiter or Apollo.

It were a friuolous diligence, to rehearfe all their flatteries; these being so groffe. 40 Hereby they not only corrupted the yong Prince; but made that acclamation, which best would have pleased the old man, to be of no vse. For he could not handfomly take vpon him the name of King, as imposed by the Athenians; vnleffe hee would seeme to approue their vanitie, in loading him with more than humane honors. Yet was he so tickled, with this their fine handling him, that when their Theodori, or Confulters, came shortly after, desiring him to relieue them with Corne, and Timber to build ships; he gave them almost a hundred thousand quarters of wheat, and matter sufficient to make a hundred Gallies. So gracious was his first Oracle: orrather, so weake is great power in relisting the affaults of flatterie.

thips of burden, for transporting his Armie and Carriages. This fleet made a terrible shew, when it was descried a farre; though more than halfe of it, was whit for seruice, in fight at Sea. Wherefore to make the opinion of his forces the more dreadfull, Ptolomae sets with the more dreadfull, Ptolomae sets with the more dreadfull, Ptolomae sets with the more dreadfull, Ptolomae sets with the more dreadfull, Ptolomae sets whether whether with multitudes, & trampled to death in a throng. But this yong Gallant, repaied him, with words of as much brauerie, promising to ten him escape, yon condition, that he should withdraw his Garrisons out of Suyon and Carinth.

Demotrus had no more then one hundred and eighteene Gallies; but they were, for the most part, greater than those of Ptolomics, better stored, with weapons fit for 10 that service, and very well strinished with Engines in the prowes, to beat vponthe linemie. Neuertheless he stood in great doubt, of threesfoot Gallies; that lay in the Hauen of Salamis, least Meraleus with them should set vponhis back in which case, it was likely that all should goe very ill with him. Against this mischiese, hee bestowed ten of his owne Gallies in the mouth of that Hauen, to keepe Mendaus irom issuing forth, and setting his borse-men on the shore, to give what affishance they could, he with the rest of his sleet, puts to Sea against Trelomic.

The fight beganneearly in the morning, and continued long, with doubtfull fuecefle. The Generalls were not ranged opposite one to the other; but held each of them the left wing of his owne fiee. Each of them prevailed against the fapuadron 20 wherewith he encounted; but the fuecefle of Denetire was to better purpose. For his victorie in one part was fuch, as caused others to fall out of order, and finally draue all to betake themselues with opened flight. As for Ptolonie, he was faine to leave his advantage vpon the enemie in one part of the fight, that he might relice and animate those of his owne which needed him in another. Wherein hee found his loss our great, to be repaired, by contending any longer, against the fortune of that day; and therefore he laboured only to faue himselfe, in hope of better event, that might follow fome other time.

There fell out in this battaile, no vnufuall accident; yet was the victorie greater then could have been expected. The occasions whereof were, partly the great 30 skill in Sea-fervices, which the Greekes and Phamitians, that were with Demetrius, had, about those which followed Ptolomie: partly the good furniture of the Ships, wherein conflicted no leffe, than in the qualitie of those with whom they were manned. Further, we may reachonably judge, that the two hundred ships of burthen, carying the strength of Ptolomic Armie, did not more encourage his owne men and certific his enemes the day before the fight; than breede in each part the contrary affections, when in the beginning of the fight, they fell off, and stood aloofe. For though it were sitting, that they should so doe; yet a multitude, preposses with examinely apprehend very slight occasions, to thinke themselves abandoned. Besides all this, the expectation, that Meneluss isluing with his 40 sleet out of Salamis, should charge the enemies in sterne, was veterly frustrate. He was kept in perforce, by the ten ships appointed to barre vp the mouth of the Hauen; which they manfully performed, as great necessitie required.

Such disappointment of expectation, doth much abate the courage of men in fight, especially of the affailants: whereas on the contraire, they that finde some part of their feares vaine, doe callly gather hopefull spirits, and conceine an opinion of their owneabilitie to doe more than they had thought vpon, out of their not fuffering the harme that they had imagined.

Whatfoeuer the caufes of this wictorie were, the fruit was very great. For Ptolomic had no more than eight Gallies that accompanied him in his flight: all the reft of his fleet was either taken, of funke. Neither did Mendaus any longer firiue againft the violence of Fortune; but yeelded vpall that hee held in Cyprus, together with his Armie, confifting of twelue thousand foor, and a thousand and two hundred horse, and those Gallies in the Hauen of Salamis. The same dejection of Spirit, was sound, in the common Souldier, as well that was taken at Sea, as that had served the Egyptian by Land: none of them reposing any more confidence in Prolomic, but willingly becomming followers of a new Loid, whose Armie they now

It was enerally belowed, that much more depended on the event of this fight, than the lile of Cyprus; for which they contended. Wherefore the common expechation was great; especially Anigonus, whom it most concerned, was deeply perplexed with cares, thinking euery day a yeare, till he were aduertised of the issue. In this moode Ariflodemus found him, a notable flatterer, whom Demetrius had honoured, with the Message of these good newes. Aristodemus had bethought himfelte of a trick, whereby to double the welcome of his joyfull errand: He caused his ships to ride at Anchor, a good distance from the shore; he himselfe landed in a Cock-boat, which he fent immediately back to the ship; and so all alone, he went forward, looking very fadly that no part of his tidings, might appeare in his countenance. Report of his arrivall (for it was knowne where he had beene) came prefently to Antigoniu, who fent Meffenger after Meffenger, to meet him on the way, and bring speedie word how all went. But neither any answere, nor so much of a looke, as might intimate the purport of his errand, could be wonne from this demure Gentleman. Thus marched he faire and foftly forward, with a great throng at his heeles (that ferued well to fet out his Pageant) vntill he came in fight of Antigonus, who could not containe himselfe, but went downe to meet him at the Gate. and heare the newes. Then did Ariflodemus, vpon the fuddaine, with a high voice falute Antigonus by the name of King; vttering the greatnesse of the victorie (with as much pompe, as before he had couered it with filence) in the hearing of all the people; who with loud acclamations, gaue that name of King, both to Antigonies, and to his sonne Demetrius. Antigonus in requitall of the long suspence, wherein Aristodemus had held him, said that it should also be long ere he received his reward. But the title of King, together with the Diademe, which his friends did set on his 30 head, he could not with a fairer occasion to assume: wherefore he readily accepted them, and fent the like to his fonne.

When it was once noised abroad, that Antigonus and Demetrius called themselues Kings; it was not long, ere their sellowes were readic to follow the good example. Prolome his friends would by no meanes endure, that their Lord should be thought aman dejected, for the losse of a fleet: therefore they saluted him also King. Lysimachus in Thrace had boldnesse enough, to put the Diadense about his ownen head. Seleutus had, be fore this time, among the Barbarous people, taken yono him as King: but now he vsed the stille indisterently, as well among the Greekes and Macedoniuss, as in dealing with others. Only Casander held himselfe contented, with his ownen name: whereby hows source the might shadow his pride, he no way lesse not the same of his cruelite, against his Masters house. But the name which he forbore, his sonnes, after him, were bold to vsurpe, though with ill successe, as will appeare, when they shall enter you the Stage; whereon the 6 old Tragidians, under new habits, as no longer now the same persons, beginne to play their parts, with bigger lookes, and more boisterous actions, not with greater grace and judgement, than in the Scenes alreadie past.

Of the warres betweene the Kings of Ægypt, Asia, Ma-cedon, Thrace, and others: vntill all ALAXA DER'S Princes were consumed.

The Expedition of ANTIGONYS against Egypt, with ill succession.

L the rest of these Kings had taken that name voon them, in imitation of Antigonus himselfe, as befeeming his greatnesse: which was such as gaue him hope, to fwallow them vp, together with their new titles. Being not ignorant of his owne strength, hee resolued to lingle out Ptolomie, and make him an example to others: who should hard!y be able to stand, 20 when the greatest of them was fallen. To this purpose hee prepared an Armie of eighteene thousand foot, and eight thousand horse, with sourc-score and three Elephants: as likewife a fleet of a hundred and fiftie Gallies, and a hundred ships of burden. The Land-forces he commanded in person : of the Nauie Demetritis was Admirall.

When all was readie for the journie, the Sea-men adulfed him, to stay yet eight dayes longer, and expect the fetting of the Pleiades. But his hastic desire, to prevent all preparations for relifiance that Ptolomie should make, rejected this counsaile; imputing it rather to their feare than skill. Wherefore he departed from Antigonia 30 (a Towne which he had built in Syria, and called after his owne name, that was Soone changed into Selencia, by his mortall Enemic) and came to Gaza; where hee met with his fleet. The nearer that he drew to Agypt, the more hast hee made: thinking by celeritie to preuaile more then by his great power. He caused his Souldiers to carrie ten daies provision of victualls; and had many Camells loaden with all necessaries for passing the Deserts, ouer which he marched with no small toile, though he met with no resistance. At Mount Cassus, which is neare adjoyning to Wilus, he saw his fleet, riding at Anchor, not farre from the shore; in ill case, and many thips wanting. It had beene forely beaten with foule weather, wherein fome were loft, others driven back to Gaza, or feattered elf, where into fuch creeks as they 40 could recouer: Demetries himselfe, with the best and strongest vessells, did so long beat it vp against the winde, that all his fresh water was spent; in which extremitie, he and all his must have perished, bad not the tempest ceased when it did, and Antigonus appeared in fight, from whom these over-wearied, thirstie, and Sea-beaten Souldiers received reliefe; After these painefull travailes there followed a Warre no leffe painefull than to little purpole, for Ptolambad to fortified all the paffages ponthe River of Nilm, as he affired himselfe either to end the warrethere, or if his guards should happen to be forst, yet could it not be done, but so much to the weakning of the Affailants, as he should afterward, with a second Armie (which he held entire) entertaine the Inuader vpon advantage enough. All that Antigonus 70 fought was to come to blowes speedily, Ptolomie on the contrarie to beat Antigonus by the belly. It is true that Ailius gaue him water enough, but wood hee had none to warme it, and while Antigonus affaulted the Rampiers raised vpon the River in

vaine, Ptolomie affaied the faith of his Souldiers with good fuccesse, for with great gifts, and greater promises, he ferried them over so fast, as had not Antigonus thrust fome affured Regiments, vpon the paffages next the enemic, and in the meane while taken a resolution to returne, Ptolomie had turned him out of Egypt, ill

Some of them indeede he laid hands on, in the way of their escape, and those he Some of their indeeds to and individually and their their and their period death with extreme torments; but in all likelihood with the fame ill fuccess that Perdicess had formerly done, when he invaded £gypt: had he not readily remoued his Armie further off; from the noise of their entertainement, that had alreadic beene wonne from him. To preuent therefore as well the present danger of his stay, as the shame following a forst retrait, hee secretly practized the aduice of his Councell, vpon whom the burden must be elaid of his entrance, and leauing

Agypt.

It is indeede leffe prejudiciall in fuch like cases, that errours, dishonours, and loffes, be laid on Concellours and Captaines, than on Kings, on the Directed than on the Director, for the honour and reputation of a Prince is farre more precious. than that of a Vaffall; Charles the fift, as many other Princes have done, laid the loffe and dishonour he received in the invasion of France, by the way of Province, to Antonie de Leua, whither justly or no, I know not; but howsoeuer all the Hi-20 storians of that time agree, that the forrow therof cost that braue Captaine his life. Certainely to give any violent advice in doubtfull enterprises, is rather a testimonie of lone, than of wisedome, in the giver; for the ill successe alwaies cast vpon the Councell, the good neuer wants a Father, though a falle one, to acknowledge it. Yet I have sometime knowne it that great Commanders, who are for the present in place of Kings, have not only beene diffwaded, but held in a kinde by strong hand, from hazarding their owne persons, and yet haue those kinde of Mutiners neuer beene called to a Marshalls Court.

ò. I I. How the Citie of Rhodes was besieged by 40 defensive warre. Antigonus on the contrarie flattered himselfe with another interpretation, calling the joyes of his enemies for witnesses of his owne greatnesse, seeing they arose but from so litle things: his enemies being but bare sauers by the last bargaine, and himselfe, as he supposed, having lost but a little time, and no part of his honour in the late retrait. How soener it were, yet he meant to follow his affaires henceforth in another fashion, for that which he could not cleave a funder by great blowes, he purposed by little and little to pare off, by cutting off the branches first, to fell the Tree it felfe with the more facilitie. To effect which, he resolved (leating the great ones to grow a while) to roote vp the Dependants of his Enemies: Dependants, whom the forenamed Confederates should be forst, either to relieue, 50 or to loose; and hereby he doubted not, to draw them into the field, where the aduantage of power, and of all other warlike prouisions, promised him victorie.

At this time the Citie of Rhodes was very mightie, being well gouerned, and having long held it selfe in good Neutralitie, it drew the better part of all the trade of those parts, and thereby a great deale of riches to it selfe, to maintaine which, and to increase it it furnished and kept on the Seas a Fleet of well armed ships, by which it not onely beat off all Pyrates and pettic Theeues, but the reputation of their strength was thereby so much increased, as all the neighbour Princes sought their aliance and confederacie.

In this fo dangerous a time (in which they must eyther refuse all that fought them, and so stand friendlesse and a part, or joyne themselves to some one; and thereby forgoe the peace, by which their greatnesse had growne) their affections carried them to the Leyptian, both because the greatest part of their trade lay that way, as also for that Antigenus his disposition, greatnes, & neighbourhood was fearfull vnto them. This affection of theirs, with some other passages, more apparent; gaue argument of quarrel to Antigonus, who began to declare himselfe against them by pettic injuries, of taking some of their ships, with such other grieuances, while he made a more waightie preparation to purfue the warre against them openly and strongly. All things soone after ordered according to the greatnesse of the enterprife, he imployed his sonne Demetrius against them in their owne Iland, who brought fuch terrour vpon the Citizens, that laying alide all respect of friendship and honour, they offered him their affiftance, and feruice against whomsoeuer. Demetrius, who knew from whence this charge came, and that the alteration was perfwaded by feare, and not by loue; raifed his demands to an intollerable height, re- 20 quiring a hundred Hostages to be deliuered him, and libertie to lodge in their Port as manie ships of warre as himselfe pleased: these conditions, more properly to be imposed vpon a State alreadic conquered, then on those who as yet had heard of nothing but a confirmined affiftance, reflored vinto the Rhodians their loft courage, and made them resolue to defend their libertie to the last man : this taught them to infranchife all their able bond-men, and wifely rather to make them their fellow Cittizens, than to make themselves sellow siaues with them.

Demetrius having refused the faire conditions offered, and the Rhodians the fearefull ones propounded them, makes preparation for a long fiege, and finding no appearance to carrie the place in furie, he fet in hand with his Engines of batterie; in the invention and vie of which, he never shewed himselse a greater Artisan, then in this warre. But in conclusion, after the Citizens had fustained all the affaults given them for a whole yeare, after many brave fallies out of the Towne, and the famine which they indured within the Towne, which had proued farre more extreme, if Ptolomie had not with many hazards relieued them, Demetrius by mediation of the Gracian Embaffadors, gaue ouer the fiege; a hundred Hostages they gaue him for performance of the peace made, but with exception of all the Magiftrates and officers of the Citie.

Hereunto Demetrius was brought by the viual policie of warre, and state: for while, with the flowre of all his fathers forces, he lay before Rhodes, Caffander reco- 49 nered many of those places in Greece, which Demetrius had formerly taken from him; neither did Cassarder make the warre as in former times, by practife and furprise, but by a strong and well compounded armie, which hee himselfeled as farre as into Attica, and therewith greatly diffressed and indangered Athens it selfe. On the other fide (though with leffe fuccesse) did Polysperchon inuade Peloponnesus. These dangerous undertakings upon Greece, aduised the Athenians and Atolians to dispatch their Embassadours towards Demetrius, and aduised Demetrius rather to abandon the enterprise of Rhodes, then to abandon the great honour which he had formerly gotten, by fetting all Greece at libertie.

Demetrius was no fooner out of the Iland, then that the Rhodians crected statues in honour of Ly/machus, and Caffander, but for Ptolomie, whom they most affected, and from whom they received their most reliefe, they consulted the Oracle of Iupiter, whether it were not lawfull to call him a God. The Priests which attended in the Temple of Hammon, gaue the same faire answere for Ptolomie, which they had formerly done for Alexander his Master, for as Alexander consulted the Oracle with an Armie at his heeles; fo was Ptolomie at this time Lord of the foile: and yet was this a farre more cleanly creation, then that done by the Athenians, who Deified Antigonus and Demetrius, by decree of the people. A madage it was, when so many of Alexanders Captaines could not content themselues with the stile of Kings, but that they would needes be called Gods.

ò. III.

HOW DEMETRIVS prevailed in Greece, CASSANDER defires peace of ANTIGONYS, and cannot obtaine it. Great preparations of warre against ANTIGONVS.

EMETRIVS comming with a strong Fleet and Armie into Greece, quickly draue Caffander out of Attica; and pursuing his fortune, chaled him beyond the straits of Thermopyle. Herein his reputation did much auaile him; which was fo great, that fixe thousand of his enemics Souldiers revolted vnto him. So partly by the greatnesse of his name, partly by force, he recoursed in short space all that Cassander held in those ftraights, and giuing libertie vnto the people, hee bestowed you the Athenians those peeces, which had beene fortified against them, to block them vp. Then went he into Peloponnesw, where he found the like, or more easie successe: for hee fuddainly tooke Argos, Corinth, Sieyon, and the most of the Countrie, bestowing libertie vpon such as needed it. The Towne of Suyon hee translated by consent of the Citizens, from the old feat into an other place; and called it after his ownename Demetrias. This done, he betooke himselfe to his pleasure: At the Ishmian games he caused himselfe to be proclaimed Captaine Generall of Greece, as Philip and A-20 lexander had been in former times: whereupon (as if he were now become as great as Alexander) he despised all others, making it a matter of jest, that any, saue himselfe or his Father, should vsurpe the name of King. But in his behausour hee was fo farre vnlike to a King, that in all the time of his leifure, he deserved none other name then of a drunken Palliard. Yet were the Athenians as readic as ever to deuise new honours for him: among which they made one decree, that what soeuer King Demetrius should command, ought to bee held facred with the Gods, and just with Men.

All Greece being now at the disposition of Antigonus, Cassander stood in great feare, leaft the warres should fall heavily upon him in Macedon, which to avoide, he 40 knew no better way then to make peace with his enemie betimes. And to that purpose he sent Embassadours; but had no better answere from Antigonia, then that he should submit his whole estate to his discretion. This proud demand made him looke about him, and labour hard in foliciting his friends, both to affift him, and take heede to themselues; neither found hee them slow in apprehending the common Danger, for Lylimachus knew, that if once Calfander had lost Macedon, Demetrius would foone be Master of Thrace. Neither were Ptolomic and Seleucus ignorant of that, which was like to befall them, if Antigonus were fuffered to put himselfe in quiet possession of those Provinces in Europe. Wherefore it was agreed, that with joynt forces they should all together set vpon the common Hercof Antigonus had notice: but scorned all their preparations, saying, That hee would as easily scatter them, as a flock of Birds are driven away with a stone. With these conceipts hee pleased himselfe, and no way hindred the proceedings of his Enemies. He lay at that time in his Towne of Antigoria (a name that it must shortly loose) where he was carefully prouiding to set out some stately game and Pageants, in oftentation of his glorie. But thither was brought vnto him the tumultuous newes of Lysimachus his victories about Hellespont. For Cassander had committed vnto Lysimachus part of his forces, wherewith to passe ouer into Asia, while him felfe with the rest should oppose Demetrius on Europe side. So Lysimachus passing the Hellesport, beganne to make hot warre vpon the Subjects of Antigonia. getting fome of the Cities in those parts, to joyne with him, by faire meanes; winning others by force, and wasting the Countrie round about.

To represse this vnexpected boldnesse, Antigonus made hastic journies, and came foone enough to recour his losses, but not strong enough to drive Lysimachus 10 home, or compell him to come to battaile. Lyfmachus waited for the confiming of Seleucus; keeping himselfe the whilest from necessitie of fighting. But Bebylon was farre off; and Seleucus his preparations were too great to bee soone in a readinesse. The Winter alfo did hinder his journie: which inforced them on both fides to rest in some quiet, without performing any matter of importance. I his delay of debating the quarrell in open field, held all those Nations in a great suspence, and bred much expectation. Yet might all haue come to nothing, had not Antigonus beene so froward, that hee refused to yeeld vnto any peaceable conditions. At length Seleucus drew neare with a mightie Armie of his owne (for hee had gathered frength in that long time of leifure, which Antigonus had given him) and with great 20 aide from Ptolomie, that was joyned with his forces.

To helpe in this needfull case, Demetrius was called ouer into Asia by his Fathers letters: which he readily obaied. Before his departure out of Greece, he made peace with Cassander, vpon reasonable termes: to the end he might not be driuen to leave any part of his Armie for defence of the Countrie; and that his journie might bee without any such blemish of reputation, as if hee had abandoned his Dependants: for one Article of the peace was, That all the Cities of Greece should be at libertie. Cassander was glad to bee so rid of an Enemie', that was too strong for him. Yet would this league have done him little good, if things had fallen out contrariwife then they did in Asa; seeing the ratification thereof was reserved unto Antigonus. 30 It sufficed, that for the present, enery one found meanes to cleare himselfe of all incumbrances elsewhere, to the end that each might freely apply himselfe to the triall of the maine controuerlie in Alia.

How Anticonvs was flaine in a great battaile at Ipfus, neare unto Ephefus; wherein his whole effate was loft.

@PELEVCVS, with his Sonne Antiochus, joyning with Lysimachus, compounded a great Armie, which was (all considered) not inferiour to that of the Enemie. Ingreatnesse of name (that helpeth much in all warres, but especially in the Civill) they were rather vnanswerable, than equall to their aduersaries: for Antigonus had of long time kept them under with a mastering spirit, and had beene reputed a King indeede, when the rest were held but Vsurpers of the title. Likewise Demetrius was generally acknowledged a brave Commander, having given proofe of his worth in many great feruices of all kinds, and inriched the Art of warre with many inventions, which euen his enemies, & particularly Lyfmachus, did much admire. Seleucus, who had fom- 50 times flattered antigonus, and fearfully stollen away from him to saue his life, with yong Antiochus, a Prince not heard of before this journie; and Lylmachus, that had liued long in a corner, hardly keeping his owne from the wilde Thracians; wanted much in reputation, of that which was yeelded to their opposites: yet io, that as ancient Captaines under Philip and Alexander, two of them were held worthin enough, to receive any benefit that fortune might give, and the third a Prince of great hope, whereof he now came to make experience.

The Souldiers, on both sides, were for the most part hardic and well exercised: many of them having served vnder Alexander; though of those old Companies, the long space of two and twentie yeares had consumed the greatest number. But concerning their affections; the followers of Seleneus were callly perswaded, that in this battaile they must either get the vpper hand, or put in extreme danger all that belonged vnto the Confederate Princes: whereas Antigonus his men could difcerne no other necessitie of fighting, than the obtlinate qualitie of their Lord, that needes would be Master of all. Antigonus had about three-score and ten thousand foot, ten thousand horse, and three-score and fifteen Elephants. His enemies were fixe thousand thort of him in number of their foot; in horse they had the ods of fige hundred; of Elephants they had foure hundred, and a hundred and twentie armed Chariots of warre; which helps, though they little had availed the Persians, yet were they not to be despised, in the hands of a good Captaine.

Antigonus himselfe, either troubled with the vnexpected greatnesse of his enemies forces, or presaging little good like to ensue, grew very pensiue, communing much in private with his sonne, whom he commended to the Armie as his Succession of for: whereas in former times he had neuer been fo jocund, as towards the houre of battaile, nor had been eaccultomed to make his sonne, or any other, prinie to his counfaile, before it required execution. Other tokens of bad luck, either foregoing the fight, or afterwards deuised, I hold it needlesse to recount : Diana of Ephelus dwelt neare to the place of battaile, a busie Goddesse in many great fights, and therefore likely to have been ethrust into the fable, if any matter, nearly resembling a miracle, had chanced.

It is easie to beleeue that these two so gallant Armies, contayning well neare all the strength of Alexanders whole Empire, performed a notable fight, being led by fuch worthie Commanders, and whom the iffue thereof did highly concerne. Yet an are few of the particulars recorded : an easie losse in regard of the much varietie, wherewith every storic aboundeth in this kinde. The most memorable things in the battaile, were these. Demetrius with his best force of horse, charged valiantly vpon yong Antiochus; whom when hee had broken, and put to flight, hee was fo transported with the heat of his good successe, that he never gave over his pursute, but left his Father naked, and lost thereby both him, and the victorie. For when Seleucus perceiued this aduantage, he enterposed his Elephants, betweene Demetrius and the Phalanx of Antigenus : and with many troups of horse offering to breake vpon the enemies battaile, wherefocuer it lay most open, he did so terrifie the Antigomians, that a great part of them rather chose to revolt from their Lord, whilst they 40 were fairely inuited, than to sustaine the furie of so dangerous an impression. This cowardize, or rather treason of some, discouraged others, and finally, cast them all into flight; exposing their Generall to the last end of his destinies. Antigonus was then foure score yeares old, very fat and vnweildie, so that hee was vnapt for flight, if his high spirit could have entertained any thought thereof. Hee had about him fome of his most trustie followers, and as many others as hee could hold together. When one that perceived a great troupe making towards his person, told him, Sir King, yonder companie meanes to charge you; he answered, Well may they; for who defends me? but anon DEMETRIVS will releeve vs. Thus expecting, to the very last, that his some should come to the rescue, he received so many Darts into his body, 50 as tooke away his lately ambitious, but then fearefull hopes, together with his troublesome life.

Hisgreat abilitie in matter of Armes, together with his infatiable defire of Empire, have sufficiently appeared in the whole Volume of his actions. He was more feared by his enemies, than loued by his friends; as one that could not moderate his fortune, but vfed infolence towards all a like, as if it had beene fome vertue nearest representing a Kingly Majessie. This was the cause that so many of his followers resulted to bis enemies; a and finally, that a great part of his Armie forsoke him in his last necessities. For those Kings and Princes that call all the carefull indeamours of their Vassalls, onely dutie and debt; and are more apt to punish the least offences, than to reward the greatest services: shall sinde themselves you the first change of fortune, (seeing it is love only that states by adversitie) not only the most friendselse, but even the most contemptible, and despited of all other. This Antigens found true in part, while he lived, in part he left it to be verified ypon his son.

). V.

How Debietrivs for faken by the Athenians after his overthrow, was reconciled to Selevevs and Prolobile, beginning a new fortune, and footly entring into new quarrels.

Posses Or Demetrius, at his returne, from the idle pursuit of yong Antiochus, finding all quite loft, was glad to faue himfelfe, with foure thousand horse, and fine thousand foot, by a speedy retrait vnto Ephelia, whence 20 he made great halte towards Athen, as to the place, that for his fake would fuffer any extremitie. But whileft he was in the middelt of his course thither, the Athenian Embassadours met him with a decree of the people, which was, that none of the Kings should be admitted into their Citie. These were Embaffadours, not Theori, or Consulters with the Oracle. It was a shamelesse ingratitude in the Athenians, to reward their Benefactor, in his miserie, with such a decree: neither did any part of his calamitic more afflict the unfortunate Prince, than to see his aduersitie despised by those whom he had thought his surest friends. Yet was he faine to give good words. For he had left many of his ships in their Hauen, of which he now flood in great neede, and therefore was faine to speake them faire, 30 that sometimes had grofly flattered him. But he shall line to teach them their old language, and speake vnto them in another tune. When he had gotten his ships he failed to the Isthmus, where he found nothing but matter of discomfort. His Garrifons were enery where broken vp; the Souldiers having betaken themselves to his enemies pay. So that he was King only of a small Armie and Fleet, without monie or meanes, wherewith to fuffaine him and his followers, any long time. All the rest, or the greatest part, of his Fathers large Dominion, was now in dividing among the Conquerers, and those few places which as yet held for him (having not perchance heard the worst of what had happened) he no way knew how to relieue. For to put himselfe into the field, on the fide of Afia, hee had no power; and to inclose himfelfe in any Towne, how strong soeuer, were but to imprison his fortune, and his hopes, or therein indeede to burie himfelfe and his estate. Hee therefore creeping thorow those bushes, that had fewest briers, fell vpon a corner of Lysimachus his Kingdome, whereof hee gaue all the spoile, that was gotten, to his Souldiers: his owneloffes having beene too great, to be repayed againe by small prizes.

In the meane while, the Confederate Princes had wherewithall to buffe themcleur, in the partition of those Provinces, of which their late vidorie had made them Lords: wherein Selences had a notable advantage, by being present and Mafler of the field. For neither Prolomie, nor Cassimates, were at the overthrow given, having onely sent certaine troupes to re-inforce the Armic which Selences led: who 50 tooke hold of a part of site less, and all Syrie, being no otherwise duisded from his owne Territorie than by the River of Euphrates. For there had not any order beener taken by the Confederates, for the division of all those Lands: because they did not expect to prosperous an issue of that warre, which they made only in their owne common defence. It was therefore lawfull for Selencis, to make the best benefit that he could of the victorie: at which, neuerthelesse others did repine, and though they neither could, nor durst, accuse him of ill dealing, for the present, yet seeing the our-greatmesse of Selencis brought no lesse danger to the reti of the new Kings, than that of Anisomu had done, they confulted you the fame reason of state as before, how to oppose it in time. Neither was Selencis ignorant of what they had determined from the read it in the Law vinitersal lof Kingdoms and States, needing no other intelligence. Hereupon they forget friendship on all sides, and cure themselices of all unprofitable passion: the state of each to other, and their lones to being laid on the one side, against their profits on the other, were found to farre too light, as Selencis who had to day slaine Anisomus the lather, and driven Demirius the some out of Asia, Sought to morrow, how to match himselse with Stratonica, Demetris his daughter, and so by Demetrius to Serue his turne against Lysimachus.

The storic of this Stratonica, with whom young Antiochus, the sonne of Selencus fell so passionately in loue, and so distempered, as Seleneus his father, to sauchis fonneslife, gaue her (though she were his wife) vnto him, and how his passion was discouered by his pulse; is generally noted by all Writers. But neyther did this alliance betweene Seleucus and Demetrius; betweene Ptolemie and Lysimachus; between Demetrius and Cassander; between Demetrius and Ptolemie; though for the present it brought one of them again into the ranck of Kings; otherwise tye any of them to each other, than the marriages betweene Christian Kings have done in latter times: namely betweene the Austrians, the Aragonians, the French, and other Princes; neither haue the Leagues of those elder times beene found more faithfull. then those of the same later times have beene; as in the stories of Charles the eighth of France, and of Charles the Emperour, of Francis the first, and of the Kings of Naples, Dukes of Millan, and others, the Reader may obserue: betweene whom from the yeare of our Lord, One thousand, soure hundred, ninetic and fine, when Charles the eighth undertook the Conquest of Naples, to the yeare one thousand fine hundred fiftic and eight, when Henrie the second died, the Histories of those times tell vs 30 that all the bonds, eyther by the bed or by the booke, eyther by weddings, or Satrate an tree bornes, extrete by the ore on by the booket system by weedings, of sa-cramentall Oathes, had neither faithfull purpose nor performance. Yet did Deme-tium reape this profit, by giving his daughter to his enemie Seleneus, that he recoue-red Cilicia from Plist archive, the brother of Coffender; who had gotten it as his share in the division of Antigonia his possessions: for the Intruder was not strong enough to holde it by his proper forces, fcom him, that entred vpon it as a lawful Heire: neither would Seleucus lend him any helpe, as by the rule of Confederacie he should have done, against the common enemie. So Plistarchus with very angry complaint, as well against Selencus as Demetrius, went vnto Caffander; whither Phila, their lifter, followed him shortly, to pacifie them both, and keepe all quiet; being sent for that AQ purpose by Demetrius her husband, that was not firong enough to deale with Caffander, and therefore glad to make vse of that bond of aliance betwixt them, whereof in his owne prosperitie, he neuer tooke notice to the others good. About the farne time he tooke to wife a daughter of Ptolomie (pluralitie of wines being familiar with these Macedonian, that had learned it in their Easterne conquests ) and so was he by two marriages, rather freed from two enemies, then firengthened with two friends: for neither of them wished him any good, otherwise then might serue to advance their owne ambitious desires.

Schemes and Palomic, could both of them have been contented better, that Demetrius, with helpe of their countenance, thould feek his fortune form what further 50 off, than fettle his chate wnder their nofes. Particularly Schemes thought that Chike 1 any very fitty for himfelfe: and Prolomic had a great appetite (which yet he concealed a while) to the file of Cyprus. Now whether it were fo, that Schemes would faine have fet his new father in law vpon the neck of Lyfinsahus; or whether he were indeed greedie of the bargaine, he offered to buy of Demetrius for readie monie, his late purchase of Cilicia. Hereunto Demetrius would not hearken, but meant to keepe as much Land as hee could, having alreadie found in Cilicia twelve thousand talents of his fathers treasure, that would serue him to make sport a while. This refulall fo displeased Seleneus, that in angrie termes hee demanded the Citie of Tyre and Sidon, to bee furrendred vnto him; which were the only places in Syria, that had not followed the fortune of the late great battaile. In stead of giving them vp. Demetrius tooke present order to haue them better manned; and spake it stoutly. That were hee ouer-come a thousand times, yet would hee not hire Selencus to become his sonne in law. In this quarrell Seleucus was generally reprehended, as one of a malignant disposition, that would breake friendship with his father-in-law for two Townes, from whom he had alreadie taken more then well hee knew how to gouerne. But the fire confumed it felfe in words, which had it fastned vpon armes. like it is that the weaker should have found friends, out of enuie to the stronger.

How DEMETRIVS wanne the Citie of Athens, and prevailed in Grecce, but lost in Alia. Of troubles in Macedon following the death of N the meane while, the Athenians not knowing how to vie the libertie, which Demetrius had bestowed on them, were fallen by sedition. wnder the tyrannic of Lachares. I brough which anteration then the frempered Citie was fo weakned, that it feemed ill able to keepe off thempered Citie was fo weakned, that it feemed ill able to keepe off thempered Citie was fo weakned, that it feemed ill able to keepe off vnder the tyrannie of Lachares. Through which alteration their dithe punishment due to their late ingratitude. This aduantage hastened him, whom they had once called their God and Sauiour, to present himselfe vnto them, in the habit of a reuenging furic. Hee brought against them all the force that he could wel spare from other emploiments, which were at that time perhaps the more, because his doubtfull Easterne friends, were vnwilling to give impedi- 200 ment to any businesse, that might entangle him in Greece. His first enterprise in Athens had ill successe; a great part of his fleet perishing in a tempest. But he soone repaired the losse; and (after fome victories in Peloponnesus, where hee wanne diuers Townesthat had fallen from him) returning to the enterprize, wasted the Countrie of Attica, and cut off all reliefe from the Citic, both by Land and Sca.

Altens was not able to feede the great multitude within it, any long time : for ir stood in a barren soile, and wanted now the command of those Ilands, and places abroad, from whence it was wont to be flored with victualls; being also destitute of meanes to keepe such a Nauie, as might bring in supply, or dare to doe any thing at Sca, against that of Demetrius. Yet was there some hope of succour from Ptolomie, 40 who (trusting thereby to winne the love of Greece) had loaden a hundred and fiftie ships with corne, and sent them to releeve the hungrie Citie. But these hundred and fiftie were vnable to deale with three hundred good fighting ships, which Demetrius had; rather they feared to become a prey to him, and therefore hafted them away betimes, as having done enough, in adventuring to come so neare, that they might be discried. This brake the heart of the people; among whom the samine was so extreme, that a Father and his Sonne did fight for a dead Mouse, which dropped downe betweene them from the house top. Wherefore they sent Embas-fadours to yeeld up the Towne, and craue pardon, having so farre offended, that out of desperation, they made it a capital offence, to propose any motion of peace. 50 Yet were they faine to abolish this decree : rather because they knew not what else to doe then because they hoped to be forgiuen.

Demetrius, contented with the honour of the victoric, did not only forbeare to take away the lines of these vnthankefull men; which they had submitted vnto his mercie; but out of his liberalitie gaue them foode, and placed in Office among it them fuch as were most acceptable to the people. Nenerthelesse hee was growne wifer then to trust them so farre as he had done in times past. And therefore, when (among other flattering acclamations) they bade him take their Hauens, and difpose of them at his pleasure; he was readie to lay hold upon the word, and leaue a fore Garrison within their walls to keepe them honelt perforce. After this be went into Peleponne (us, vanquished the Lacedemonians in two battailes, and was in very faire pollibilitie to take their citie: when the dangerous news called him in all halte, of Lylimachus and Ptolomie, that prevailed fafter upon him elfewhere, than himfelfe did vpon his enemies in Greece. Lyfimachus had wonne many Townes in Alia; Ptolomie had gotten all the Ifle of Cyprus, except the Citic of Salamis, wherin Demetrius had left his Children and Mother, that were straightly besieged. Whilest he was bethinking himselfe which way to turne his forces, a notable peece of businesse offered it felfe, which thrust all other cares out of his head. Cassander was lately dead in Macedon, and soone after him, Philip his eldest sonne, whose two yonger bretheren, Antipater and Alexander, fought for the Kingdome. In this quarrell The falonicathe Daughter of King Philip, whom Caffander had married, seemed better affected to Alexander, then to her elder sonne; who thereupon grew to enraged, that most barbarously he slew his owne Mother. The odiousnesse 20 of this fact gaue a faire luftre to Alexanders cause : drawing the generalitie of the Macedons to take his part, as in reuenge of the Queenes death, vpon that wicked parricide Antipater. But Antipater was fo firongly backed by Lyfimachus, whose Daughter he had married; that Alexander could not hope to make his partie good without fome forraigne aide. For which cause he called in both Pyrrhus and Demetrius, who how they dealt with him, it will soone appeare, in the following Tragedie, of him and his brother. Their Father Cassander had beene one that shifted well for himfelfe, at fuch time as every man fought how to get somewhat, in the ill ordered diuision of the Empire. Hee was cunning in practize, and a good Souldier : one of more open dealing then were his Companions, but withall more impudent, rudely 20 killing those, whom others would more wisely haue made away. He deeply hated the memorie of Alexander, that had knocked his head against a wall, upon some opinion of contempt. With Olympias he had an hereditarie quarrell, deriued from his Father, whom shee could not abide. Her feminine malice did so exasperate him, by crueltie, that shee vsed against his friends, both aline and dead, as it made him admenture youn shedding the Royall bloud; wherewith, when once hee had frained his hands, he did not care how farre he proceeded in that course of murder. His carefulnesse to destroy those women and children, whose lines hindred his purpose, argues him to have beene rather skilfull in matters of Armes, than a valiant man: fuch crueltie being a true marke of cowardize, which feares a-farre off the dan-40 gers, that may quietly passeaway : and seekes to avoide them by base and wicked meanes, as neuer thinking it felfe fafe enough, vntill there be nothing left, that carries likelihood of danger. Of Olympias and Roxane it may bee faid, that they had well deserved the bloudie end which ouer-tooke them; yet ill beseemed it Cassander to doe the office of a Hang-man. But Alexanders children had by no law of men deferued to die for the tyranie of their Father. Wherefore, though Cassander died in his bed, yet the divine Iustice brought swords you his wife and children, that well reuenged the crueltie of this bloudie man, by destroying his whole house, as he had done his Masters.

YRRHVS, the Sonne of that vnfortunate Prince Facides, which perished in warre against Castander, was hardly preserved, being a sucking Infant, from the furie of his Fathers enemies. When his Fosteking Infant, from the furre of his Fathers enemies. When his Fonce-rers had conneighed him to Glaucias, King of Illyria; the deadly ha-tred of Cassander would have bought his life with the price of two hundred talents. But no man can kill him that shall be his Heire, Glaucias was so far from betraying Pyrrhus, that heerestored him by force to his Fathers Kingdome, when he was but twelue yeares of age. Within the compasse of fixe yeares, either the indifcretions of his youth, or the rebellious temper of his Subjects, draughim out of his Kingdome, and left him to trie the world anew. Then went hee to De- 20 metrius (who maried his fifter) became his Page; followed him a while in his wars; was with him in the great battaile of Ipfus, whence hee fled with him to Ephefus; and was content to be hostage for him, in his reconciliation with Ptolonie. In A gypt he fo behaued himselfe, that he got the fauour of Berenice, Ptolomies principall wife; fo that he married her Daughter, and was thereupon fent home, with monio and men, into Epirus; more beholding now to Ptolomie, than to Demetrius. When he had fully recoursed the Kingdome of Epirus, and was setled in it, then fell out that businesse betweene the children of Casander, which drew both him and Demetrius

Antipater, the elder of Cassanders sonnes, was so farre too weake for Pyrrhus, that 30 hee had no defire to attend the comming of Demetrius, but made an hastic agreement, and divided the Kingdome with his yonger brother Alexander; who likewife felt the aide of Pyrrhus fo troublesome, that he was more willing to fend him away, than to call in such another helper. For Pyrrhus had the audacitie to request, or take as granted, by strong hand, Ambracia, Acarnania, and much more of the Countrie, as the reward of his paines: leauing the two brethren to agree as well as they could about the rest. Necessitie enforced the brethren to composition : but their composition would not satisfie Demetrius, who tooke the matter hainously, that he was sent for, and made a foole, to come so farre with an Armie, and finde no worke for it. This was a friuolous complaint; whereby it appeared, that Deme- 40 trius had a purpose to doe as Pyrrhus had done, and so much more, by how much he was stronger. Hereupon it seemed to Alexander a wife course, to remove this overdiligent friend, by murdering him vpon some aduantage. Thus Demetrius reported the storie, and it might bee true; though the greatest part, and perhaps the wifest, beleeved it not. But the iffue was, that Alexander himselfe was feasted and flaine by Demetrius; who tooke his part of the Kingdome, as a reward of the murder; exculing the fact fo well, by telling his owne danger, and what a naughtie man Caffander had been, that all the Macedonians grew glad enough to acknowledge him their King. It fell out happily, that about the same time Lysimachus was bulled in warre with a King of the wilde Thracians: for thereby hee was compelled to feeke peace of 50 Demetrius, which to obtaine, he caused the remainder of Macedon to bee given vp; that is, the part belonging to Antipater, his sonne in law. At this ill bargaine Antipater grieuously stormed, though he knew not how to amend it: yet still he stormed; untill his Father in law, to faue the labour of making many excuses, tooke away his troublefome life. Thus in halte, with a kinde of neglect, and as it were to auoide moleitation, were flaine the children of Cassanter: of Cassanter that had flaine his owne Masters children, in a wise course of policie, with carefull meditation (so much the more wicked as the more long) studying how to erect his owne house, that fell downe you his graue, ere the earth on it was throughly setted.

It might be thought, that such an accesse of Dominion, added much to the greatnesse of Demetrius. But indeede it shewed his infirmitie'; and thereby made him neglected by many, and at length hated by all. For he had no Art of civill Gouernement: but thought (or shewed by his actions that he thought) the vse and fruit of a Kingdome, to be none other, than to doe what a King litted. Hee gaue himselfe ouer to Women and Wine, laughing openly at those that offered to trouble him with supplications, and the tedious discourse of doing justice. He hath more skill in getting a Kingdome, than in ruling it: warre being his recreation, and luxurie his nature. By long reft (as fixe yeares raigne is long to him, that knowes not how to raigne one yeare) he discourred so much of his worst condition, as made both the people wearie of his idleneffe; and the Souldiers, of his vanitie. He was freed from care of matters in A/ia, by hearing that all was loft, though more especially, by hearing that Ptolomie had with great honor, entertained and dismissed his mother and children. This affoorded him the better leifure, of making warre in Greece: where 20 he vanquished the Thelans, and wonne their Citie twice in thort space, but wied his victoric with mercie. Against Lysimachus he would faine haue done somewhat (the victorie with interest and motiviths and ingly at such time as he was taken by the Tina-cians; but Lysimachus was freely dismissed, and in good case to make resistance ere Demetrius came; fo as this journey purchased nothing but enmitte. Another expedition he tooke in hand against Pyrrhus, with no better, or rather with worse event. Pyrrhus held fomewhat belonging to Macedon; which hee had indeede as honeftly gotten, as Demetrius the whole Kingdome; he had also made excursions into Thesfalie; but there needed not any handlome pretence of quarrell, feeing Demetrius thought himselfe strong enough to ouer-runne his enemies Countrie, with two 30 great Armies. It is a common fault in men, to despise the vertue of those, whom they have knowneraw Nouices in that facultie, wherein themselves are noted as extraordinarie. Pyrrhus was a Captaine, whom later ages, and particularly the great Hannibal, placed higher in the ranke of Generalls, than either Demetrius, or any of Alexanders followers. At this time, he miffed that part of the Armic, which Depretries led, and fell ypon the other halfe; which he ouerthrew, not with more commendations of his good conduct, than of his private valour, shewed in single combat against Pantauchus, Demetrius his Lieutenant; who being a strong man of bodie, challenged this yong Prince to fight hand to hand, and was vtterly beaten. The losse of this battaile did not so much offend the Macedonians, as the gallant be-

42 hauiour of Pyrrbus delighted them. For in him they feemed to behold the linely figure of Alexander in his best qualitie. Other Kings did imitate, in a counterfeit manner, fome of Alexanders graces, and had good skill in wearing Princely veltures: but (fand they) none, faue Pyrrbus, is like him indeed, in performing the office of a Captaine.

The ferumours were not more nourished by the vertue of the Epinet, than by dissike of their owne King; whom they began to dissentene, no somethin regard of his vnprolitable journey into Epinet (for he had wasted much of the Countrie, and brought home his Armie in good case) as of his insolence, that grew daily more and more intollerable. His apparell seemed, in the eyes of the Macedons, not 50 only too sumptious and new Engled, but very vnmanly, and serving chiefly to be a daily witnesse, how much hee contenined them and their good opinion. Of his Souldiers liues he was rechesse: and suffered vnwisely this vn-princely sentence to escape out of his mouth; That the more of them died, the search was to pay. Hee made a mockerie of justice; and (as it were, to publish vnto all his Subjects, how little he effeemed it or them) having by a flow of popularitie invited Petitioners. and with a gracious countenance entertained their Supplications, hee led the poore futers after him in great hope, till comming to a bridge, he threw all their writings into the River; pleasing himselfe, in that he could so easily and so boldly delude the cares of other men. By these courses he grew so odious, that Pyrrhus gathered audacitie, and inuading Macedon, had almost wonne it all with little resistance. Demetrius lay then fick in his bed: who reconcring health, and taking the field, had fuch great oddes of strength, as made Pyrrhus glad to for fake his winnings and be

At length he beganne to have some feeling of the generall hate; which to redresse, he did not (for he could not) alter his owne conditions; but purposed to alter their idle discourses of him, by setting them on worke in such an action, wherein his best qualities might appeare; that is, in a great warre. His intent was to inuade Asia, with a Royall Armie: wherein the fortune of one battaile might giue him as much, as the fortune of another had taken from him. To this end, hee first made peace with Pyrrbus; that so hee might leave all safe and quiet at home. Then did he compose a mightie Armie, of almost a hundred thousand foot, and twelve thoufand horse: with a Nauie of fine hundred saile, wherein were many ships, farre exceeding the greatnesse of any that had beene seene before; vet so swift and vsefull withall, that the greatnesse was least part of their commendation.

The terrible fame of these preparations, made Seleucus and Ptolomie suspect their owne forces, and labour hard with Lysimachus and Pyrrhus, to joyne against this ambitious sonne of Antigonus; that was like to proue more dangerous to them all. than ever was his Father. It was callly differed, that if Demetrius once prevailed in Asia, there could be no securitie for his friends in Europe; what league socuer were of old concluded. Therefore they refolued to beginne with him betimes, and each to invade that quarter of Macedon, that lay next his owne Kingdome. Lysimachus came first, and against him went Demetrius with a great part of his Armie: but whilst he was yet on the way, newes were brought into his Campe, that Pyrrhus had won Berrhea. The matter was not oner great : were it not, that mindes prepared with 20 long discontent, are readie to lay hold vpon small occasions of dislike. All the camp was in vp-rore: some wept, others raged, few or none did for beare to vtter seditious words, and many defired leaue of Demetrius, to goe to their owne houses, meaning indeede to have gone to Lysimachus.

When Demetrius perceived the bad affection of his Armie, he thought it the wifeit way, to lead the Macedonians further off from Lysimachus their owne Countrieman, against Pyrrhus that was a stranger: hoping by victorie against the Epirot, to recourr the loue of his followers, in such fort that hee might afterwards at leisure deale with the other. But herein his wisedome beguiled him. For the Souldiers were as hastie as he, to meet with Pyrrbus; not intending to hurt him, but longing 40 to fee that noble Prince, of whom they daily heard the honourable fame. Some spake of his valour; some enquired, othersanswered, of his person, his armor, and other tokens whereby he might be knowne; as particularly, by a paire of Goats hornes, that he wore on his creft. It was not likely, that these men should hurt him. Divers of them stole away, and ranne over into Pyrrbus his campe: where the newes that they brought, were better welcome than their persons. For they said, and it was true, that if the Macedonians might once get fight of Pyrrhus, they would all salute him King. To trie this, Pyrrhus rode forth, and presented himselfe bareheaded in view of the camp, whither some were sent before to prepare his welcom. The newes of his arrivall found a generall applause, and every one began to looke 50 out, with defire to fet eye on him. His face was not fo well knowne as his helmet: therefore he was admonished to put it on; which done, all came about him, and proffered their service; neither were there any, that spake for Demetrius; only some (and they the most moderate of tongue) bade him be gone betimes, and shift for himselfe. So Demetrius threw aside his maskers habit, and attiring himselfe poorly. did fearefully steale away out of his owne Campe : deseruing well this calamitie, whether it were fo, that he would not hearken to the good counsaile of his friends, or whether his behauiour depriued him of fuch friends, as would dare to let him heare the ynpleafant found of necessarie truth.

Whilest Pyrrhus was making this triumphant entrie, into the Kingdome of Macedon; Lysimachus came vpon him, very vnseasonably, and would needs have halfe: faying, that he had done as much as Pyrrhus in the warre, and therefore had reason to challenge his part of the gaines. The bargaine was quickly made, and the diviion agreed vpon: each of them being rather delirous to take his part quietly, than to fight for the whole; as hoping each of them, to worke his fellow quite out of all, vnon better oportunitie.

d. VIII.

How DEMETRIVS gathering forces, enterprised many things with ill succeeffe, in Greece and Asia. How he was driven upon SELEVCVs, and compelled to reeld himselfe. His imprisonment and death.

He Athenians, were as vnthankefull to Demetrius in this his aduersitie. as they had beene in former times. For they presently for sooke his friendlhip, and called Pyrrhus out of Macedon to be their Patron. Demetrius, when hee went against Lysimachus, had left a great part of his forces in Greece, vnder his sonne Antigonus. Therefore it is like, that he had foone gotten an Armie; though Phila his wife (who is highly commended for a wife and vertuous Ladie) did poison her selfe, vpon desperate griefe of his misfortune. The first, vpon whom he attempted to shew his anger, were the Athenians, that had well deserved it. Hee beganne to lay siege to their Towne : but was pacified by Crates the Philosopher, whom they made their spokesman; and taking 30 faire words instead of satisfaction, passed ouer into Asa, with eleuen thousand Souldiers, meaning to trie his fortune against Lysimachus, for the Prouinces of Lydia

At his first comming into those parts, fortune seemed to smile vpon him. For many good Townes, willingly, or by compulsion, yeelded to his obedience. There were also some Captaines, that fell from Lysimachus to him, with their companies, and treasures. But it was not long, ere Agathoeles, the sonne of Lysimachus, came vpon him, with an Armie fo strong, that it was not for Demetrius his good, to hazard his last stock against it. Wherefore, he resolved, to passe through Phrygia and Armenia, into Media, and the Provinces of the higher Asia; trufting to finde a 40 Kingdome somewhere in those remote quarters. The execution of this counsaile was grieuously impeached by Agathocles: who pursued him close, and cut off all his prouisions, driving him to take which waies he could, without following his intended courfe. In many skirmilhes, Demetrius vanquished this troublesome enemie: neuerthelesse, hee could not be shaken off, but continued afflicting the poore titularie King, with extreme famine. At length, in passing the River Lyens, so many of Demetrius his men were loft, that the rest could no longer make resistance : but were driven to travaile with fuch speede, as might well be called a plaine flight. So that with famine, pestilent diseases following famine, and other accidents of warre, eight thousand of them were consumed : the rest, with their Captaine, escaped into 50 Cilicia. Seleucus had gotten possession of Cilicia, whilest Demetrius was occupied in Greece : yet was it no part of Demetrius his errand, to lay claime to the Countrie; but with vehement and humble letters he befought his fonne in law, to call to minde their alliance, and to pitie him in his great miferie. These letters, at the first wrought wel with Seleucus, and he condescended to the request: yet considering further how Demetrius had carried himselfe, when he recovered strength after the battaile at Ip-(iu, he changed his purpose, and went against him with an Armie.

Many treaties were held betweene them; of which none tooke effect, through the jealousie of Seleveus. Therefore, meere desperation enforced Demetrin, to fight like a mad man; and his furie got him some victories, though of small importance. At length sicknesse tooke and held him fortie dayes, in which time, a great number of his few men, ranne to the enemie. This not withflanding hee still held out, and once had like to haue taken Selencus in his bed, had not his comming been discourred by fugitiues, that gaue the alarme. Finally, when all his Armie had for faken him, and left him, with a few of his friends, to shift for himselfe: hee was compelled, 10 by the last of those adherents (for even some of those few forsooke him) to yeeld vnto Seleucus.

Seleucus hearing this, was exceeding glad, and fent him very comfortable meffages. But the approbation of his owne humanitie, by his followers, was fuch, as renewed his jealous thoughts; and hindred him from admitting Demetrius to his presence: though otherwise he ysed him with as much fauour, as any prisoner could wish. He was kept vnder sure guardin a demic-iland, wherein were goodly walks, Orchards, and Parks for hunting. He had all that he asked roially, and friends allowed to visit him, at his, and their pleasure. Only his libertie was reserved vnto the comming of yong Antiochus and Stratonica, out of the high Countries. In this 20 for the spent three yeares, living merrily all the while (as one that now enjoyed the happinesse, which with so much trauaile and bloud shed, hee had sought in vaine) and then died, leaving to his sonne Antigonus, the same which his father had left vnto himselse; that is, friends and hope. His ashes were honourably buried in Covinth; his qualities haue appeared in his actions, and the fortune of his house will shew it selfe hereafter, in times and places conuenient.

ð. IX.

The death of Prolomie, of Lysimachus, and of Selevcus, that was last of ALEXANDERS Captaines : with other

Bout the same time that Demetrius died, died also Ptolomie King of Ægypt; a vertuous Prince, warlike, gentle, bountifull, and (which in those times was a rare commendation) regardfull of his word. Hee had, by many Wines and Concubines, many children: out of whom he selected Ptolomic Philadelphus, and caused him to raigne together with himselfe, two or three yeares before he died, that so hee might confirme him 40 in the inheritance of the Kingdome. At this, Ptolomie Ceraunus (for all of that house affumed the name of Ptolomie) was grieuously incensed. But no man cared for his anger. Therefore he went to Selencus, who gaue him louing entertainment. There were now only two of Alexanders Captaines left; Seleucus and Lysmachus. These two needes would fight for it, who should be the longest liver of that braue Companic. The true ground of their quarrell was, their neare equalitie of strength, and want of one to part them. The pretence was, the murders which Lysmachus had committed upon many of his Nobles, together with his poiloning agathetles his eldest sonne: whose wife and children fled vnto Seleucus for aide.

The Macedons, after seuen Moneths pause, having spent their first heat of admi- 50 ration, beganne to hearken so well to Lysimachus, their naturall Countrie-man, that they forfooke Pyrrhus, vpon none other ground than because hee was an Alien. This they had knowne well enough before: but they did him no great wrong in taking lightly from him, what they lightly gaue him. Lysimachus had raigned about five yeares alone, when the Citie of Lyfmachia (built by him, and called after his name) falling by an earthquake, appeared, by cuents, to have foreshowed the fall of his house. His owne jealousie, and the instigation of a mother in law, caused him to poison his Sonne Agathoeles, which drew vpon him that warre, wherein (after the loffe of all his fifteene children, that were taken away by diners accidents) he perished himselfe.

Seleucus was encountred by Lysimachus on Asia side, where one battaile concluded the warre, with Lysimachus his death. It pleased Seleucus more than the victorie, that he was the last of all the great Heroes which had followed Alexander. For now he seemed to himselfe, as Lord and Heire of all the conquered world. So he passed ouer into Macedon, to take possession of Europe, where there was none to withstand him. But there he ended his daies, and within feuen moneths followed Lysimachus, and other of his fellowes, by a bloudie death: being treacherously slaine by Ptolomie Ceraunus, whose friend and Patron he had beene. Scuentie and seuen yeare old he was, when hee fought with Lysimachus, and Lysimachus was seventie and foure. Withthem ended the generation of old Captaines, that had seene the daies as it were of another world under the Persian : yet was there left one equal to any of them, in the Art of warre : euen Pyrrhus the Epirot, of whom we spake before; that is now readic to enter into warre with the Romans, a more warlike people, than Mexander himselfe euer did encounter. Of which warre, and of which people, it is needfull that we here make mention, as of a storie more important, than any likely to ensue in Greece, or in the great Kingdomes, that were held by Alexanders Successors, with lesse (and still decreasing) vertue, than was that, by which they were first purchased.

Demetrius had carried himselfe, when he recovered strength after the battaile at spfus, he changed his purpose, and went against him with an Armie.

Many treaties were held betweene them; of which none tooke effect, through the jealoulie of Seleusus. Therefore, meere desperation enforced Demetrius, to fight like a mad man; and his furie got him some victories, though of small importance. At length sicknesses to the sound held him fortic dayes, in which time, a great number of his sew men, rannet o the enemie. This not withstanding hee still held out, and once had like to haue taken Seleusus in his bed, had not his comming been discounted by fugitines, that gaue the alarme. Finally, when all his Armte had for saken him, and left him, with a few of his friends, to shift for himselfe: hee was compelled, to by the last of those adherents (for even some of those few for sooke him) to yeeld ynto Seleusus.

Sciences hearing this, was exceeding glad, and fent him very comfortable medfages. But the approbation of his owne humanitie, by his followers, was fuch, as renewed his jealous thoughts; and hindred him from admitting Demertius to his prefencethough otherwise he yield him with as much fauour, as any prisoner could with. He was kept wnder fore guard in a demic-iland, wherein were goodly walks, Orchards, and Parks for hunting. Bout the fametime that Demetrius died, died also Ptolomie King of Agyr; a vertuous Prince, warlike, gentle, bountifull, and (which in those times was a rare commendation) regardfull of his word. Hee had, by many Wines and Concubines, many children: out of whom he selected Ptolomie Philadelphus, and caused him to raigne together with himfelfe, two or three yeares before he died, that fo hee might confirme him 40 in the inheritance of the Kingdome. At this, Prolomic Ceranus (for all of that house affuned the name of Prolomic) was grieuoufly incented. But no man cared for his anger. Therefore he went to Selencus, who gaue him louing entertainment. There were now only two of Alexanders Captaines left; Selencus and Lyfmachus. These two needes would fight for it, who should be the longest liver of that braue Companie. The true ground of their quarrell was, the murders which Lyfmachus had committed you many of his Nobles, together with his poiloning Againetes his eldest fonce; whose wife and children fied vnto Selencus for aide.

The Macedons, after feuen Moneths paule, having spent their first heat of admi- 50 ration, beganne to hearken so well to Lysmachus, their naturall Countrie man, that they for sook of Pyrrhus, youn none other ground than because he was an Alien. This they had knowne well enough before the they did him no great wrong in taking lightly from him, what they lightly gaue him. Lysmachus had raigned about fine yeares alone, when the Citie of Lyfimschia (built by him, and called after his name) falling by an earthquake, appeared, by cuents, to haue forethewed the fall of his house. His owne icaloufie, and the influgation of a mother in law, cauged him to poison his Sonne Agathedes, which drew upon him that warre, wherein (after the loffe of all his fifteene children, that were taken away by diuers accidents) he perilhed himselfe.

Seleucus was encountred by Lysimachus on Asia side, where one battaile concluded the warre, with Lylimachus his death. It pleased Seleucus more than the victorie, that he was the last of all the great Heroes which had followed Alexander. For now he seemed to himselfe, as Lord and Heire of all the conquered world. So he passed ouer into Macedon, to take possession of Europe, where there was none to withstand him. But there he ended his daies, and within feuen moneths followed Lysimachus, and other of his fellowes, by a bloudie death: being treacherously flaine by Ptolomie Ceraunus, whose friend and Patron he had beene. Seuentic and seuen yeare old he was, when hee fought with Lysimachus, and Lysimachus was seuentie and foure. With them ended the generation of old Captaines, that had feene the daies as it were of another world under the Persian: yet was there left one equal to any of them, in the Art of warre seuen Pyrrhus the Epirot, of whom we spake before; that is now readie to enter into warre with the Romans, a more warlike people, than Mexander himselfe euer did encounter. Of which warre, and of which people, it is needfull that we here make mention, as of a storie more important, than any likely to ensue in Greece, or in the great Kingdomes, that were held by Alexanders Succeffors, with leffe (and still decreasing) vertue, than was that, by which they were first purchased.

Ow Rome was founded by Romulus; fetled in good order by Nama Pompliins; and by many, though fimall, vifetories, it gathered firrength; ynto fuch time as it became the head of Latium, by the conquet of Alba, in the raigne of Tullus telfilius: it hath beene alreadie noted, in due order of time. But whereas now the Roman greatmefic, beginneth to encounter the power of Greece; and extending it felth out of Italic, to ouer-whelme the Dominions of other States and Princes: I hold it connenient (as in likecafes I have done) briefly to fet downe the growth of fith is migh-

Bbbb 2 After

After the death of Tullus Hostilius ( who when hee had raigned two and thirtie veares, was burnt together with his house by lightning) Ancus Maritus, Grandchild to Numa Pompilius by his daughter, and not much vnlike him in disposition, fucceeded in the Kingdome of Rome. He walled the Citie about; enlarged it with the hill Auentine, which he enclosed; built a bridge ouer Tybris, and the Citie of Ostra vpon the Sea, fixteene miles distant from Rome. Finally, having raigned foure and twentie yeares, he died, and by his last will bee left his children in charge with one Lucumon, the sonne of Damaratus a Corinthian, who avoiding Cypselus King of Corinth his tyranny, had fled into Hetruria, and dwelt in Tarquing, by the name of which Townshee was afterwards called Tarquinius. From that Citie in Hetruria 10 comming to Rome, and encouraged by fome ominous occurrents, together with his wife Tauaquils prophecie, he grew a fauourite of Ancus Martius; by his Grecian wit humoring the factions of the Roman Court, in so much that after his decease, he became not only Protector to the children, but Gouernour to the Citie. He doubled the number of Senators, and enlarged the Centuries of Horse-men: neither was he lesse eminent in warre, than in peace : for he preuailed often against the Tuscans, and from his victories, the chiefest ornaments of triumph tooke their originall. When this Lucius Tarquinius had raigned eight and thirtie yeares, he was slaine by the sonnes of Ancius Martius, to whom he had been left Guardian. But Tanaqual his wife, perceiuing what was done, enformed the people, from out of an high Turret, 20 that her Husband was wounded, and licke, but not dangeroully. And withall lignified vnto them, that in the interim of his ficknesse, one Servins Tullius, whom from his birth she alwaies prophecied to be borne to great hopes, (the sonne of P, Corniculanus and Ocrifia, a well descended, but captine woman) brought vp in her house, and husband unto her daughter, should supplie her husbands place, in gouerning the State, vntill his recouerie: which gouernment, being thus at first obtained by cunning, he afterwards vsurped as his right. He first ordained Ratements, Substdies, and valuations of the peoples wealth; among whom, at that time, fourescore thousand were mustered, of which number consisted their whole corporation; and by distinction of Dignities, Ages, Trades, and Offices, he managed the King- 30 dome in as good fort, as if it had beene a private household. At length, having two daughters of different natures, the one milde and gentle, the other fierce and outragious : and finding also that the two sonnes of Tarquinius Priscus, Sextus and Aruus, which had beene committed to his tuition, were of different dispositions, proportionably answering to his daughters; he (willing to adde water, not oile, to lire) gaue the milde daughter to Sextus the hot-headed fonne; and the violent, to Aruns, the gentle, in mariage. But whether by intended courfes, or by accident, it happened; the two milde ones being made away, the furious matures were readily 10 yned in marriage: who foone concurring, and calling the Senate together, beganne to lay claime to the Kingdome. Vpon this tumult, Servius Tullius hasting to the Senate, 40 (where he thought by authoritie to have bridled insolencie) was throwne downe the staires, and going home fore bruised, was slaine by the way, when he had raigned fortie and foure yeares. Then Tullia his daughter, first proclaiming her husband Tarquinius Superbus King; returning home, enforced her Coach-man to drinchis Chariot ouer her fathers corpes; whereupon the fireet had the denomination of wicked fireet. This Tarquine, exercifing crueltic without justice and tyrannic without mercie, vpon the people and Senators; having tired himselfe and them at home, vied the fame rage of treacherie vpon his borders. He tooke Octivalum, Sueffa Pometia, and the Gabij. The iffue of befieging Ardea, a towne eighteene miles distant from Rome, was of bad successe. In the heate of which warre, his sonne Sextus Tar- 50 quinius violently rauished that chaste Ladie Lucretia, his kinsman Collatines wife: who in way of expiation for so vnchaste a deed, thought good to wash out those spots of infamie with her owne bloud; so (having first bequeathed the reuenge unto her father Sp. Lucretius Tricipitimus, her husband Collatine, and Iunius Brutus)

she killed her selse: whereupon (chiefly by Junius Brutus his resolution) Tarquinus Superbus, with his wife and children, was deposed and banished; and sed to Parsona King of Hetruria for succour, in the five and twentieth years of his raigue, and the two hundred fortie and sourth from the building of their Citie: in which space Rome had scarce gotten full possession of fitteene miles round absorber.

Iunius Brutus by the helpe of Collatine, having expelled Tarquine, and freed his countrey from that heavie yoake of bondage, inforced the people by folemne oath, neuerto admit any gouernment by Kings amongst them: whereupon they 10 ransacked their Kings goods, consecrated their fields to Mars, and conferred the gouernment of the State vpon Brutus and Collatine. But because the name of King was odious in their eares, they changed the manner of their government, from perpetuall to anuall, and from a fingle gouernour to a double, lest perpetuall or sole dominion might be some motive to vsurpation; and in stead of Kings they called them Confuls, lignifying, as it may be interpreted, Providers: that their titles might remember them of their place, which was to be alwayes mindefull of their Citizens welfare. And yet was it so hard setling of troubled waters, that the people after this innovation of State, scarce daring to affure themselves of their owne securitie, enforced Tarquinius Collatine to religne vp his authoritie, fearing that tyrannie 20 would be hereditarie, and supposing that the very name and affinity with the house of Tarquin, favoured alreadic of their condition. In his roome was substituted Valerius Publicola, who that he might (as his name importeth) be gratious in the peoples eyes, gaue libertie, in matters of controuerfie, to appeale from the Confuls to the people: and that he might as well in goods as in person, auoyde occasion of suspicion, caufed his owne house to be pulled downe, because it was built in a place defensible, as it it had been a Citadell. Neyther was Bratus any wayes deficient in matter of greater moment; which concerned as well the peoples safetie, as their fauour; for hauing got intelligence, that some greener wits, and in the first ranke his owne fonnes, were itching after innouations, hoping to restore the banished Kings; 20 he caused them, publikely in the Market-place, to be whipt, and then to be brought all vnpartially to the blocke.

all vingartatily to the Diocks.

Hitherto the Remans, bauing by the viblemisled integritie of Bruins, well appeased all inbred quarrels at home, now hereafter imploy their militarie designements, against Forrainers; sirst, for their libertie; secondly, for inlarging of their possession and lassly, for defending their consederate Protinces, and extending their Empire. For Rome situated as it were in the mid-way between e Lasum and the Tuleans, hauing as yet but narrow bounds, being in her minoritie, cannot but guie occasion of offence to her neighbours syntill by maine opposition, hauing pre-uailed against her borders, shee vsed them as instruments, whereby to obtaine the rett.

Their first warre, in the first yeare of confuls, was against porfenna King of Hetruria, who being ouer-perswaded by Tarquines lamentation, came to Rome, together with the banished King, and with great forces, to seate him agains in his Kingdome.

In the first conside, the atius Coeles, having long time borne the maine brunt of his enemies, on the bridge over Tibris; at length feeling him less too faint to shand against so many, caused the bridge behinde him to be broken downe, and with his armour, leaping into the River-like a hunted Stagge, refreshed his hore spirits, and returned fafe to his followes, with the like resolution to give a new charge. Persentance vanto the Citie and sound the visitorie, in a manner, assured by this he had well-nigh won the hill Lantaslus, which is the vericentrance vanto the Citie and sound the vistorie, in a manner, assured by its owner; yet admiring their valour, and terrified by the constant resolution of Casturus Scends (who having by errour slaine Persena his Secretarie, instead of the King himselfe, did in scorne of torments threatned, burne off his owne hand) hee thought it not Bubbb 3 any any whit prejudiciall, either to his fafetie, or credit, to enter league with them at the worlt hand. And yet the edge of Tarquinius his filecene, was not quite abated, though Aruns his fonne, and Bruns his enemie, in fingle combat, had flaine each other. And here the Reman, although they loft Bruns, got the field; and their Ladies, whose Champion hee was, for their chastitie, not for beautie, mourned the losse of him one whole yeare. Into his place, for the residue of his yeare, was subrogated $P_Lunetius Truspitinus, father to Lucretia and in his roome (deceasing naturally before the yeare expired) Horatius Pubullus.

Tarquine, vpon his ouerthrow, feeling the fates disastrous, thought it no boot to ftrue against the streame, and spent the residue of his time; which was about foure- 10 teene yeares, privately at Tusculum. Yet his sonne-in-law, Mamilius Tusculanus, stomaching a fresh at those old repulses, because Porsenna had made peace with the Romans, and denied further fuccour vnto the Tarquines, mustered vp his Latines, and gaue battaile to the Romans, at the Lake Regillum; where the conflict was fierce, and the issue vncertaine, vntill Aulus Posthumins, the Roman Dictator, (for they had created this Magistracie greater than Consults, purposely for this Warre, when first it was expected) to exasperate his Souldiers courage, threw their owne Ensignes amidit the Enemie; and Cofius or Spurius Cafius (mafter of the Horfe-men, an affiftant Officer to the Dictator) commanded to take off their bridles, that they might runne with free violence, to recour againe their Ensignes. This fight was so well 20 performed, that a report went currant, of Caster and Pollux, two Gods, who came on milke-white Steeds, to be eye witnesses of their valous, and fellow helpers of their victorie; for the Generall confecrated a Temple to them, as a stipend for their paines. After this the Romans fierce spirits, having no object of valour abroade, reflected vpon themselues at home; and the sixteenth yeare after the Kings expulsion, vpon infligation of some desperate banckrouts, thinking themselues wrongfully oppressed by the Senate and Consulls, they made an vproarein the holy Mount; untill by Menenius Agrippa, his discreet allusion, of the inconvenience in the head and bellies discord, to that present occasion, they were reconciled to the Senate: with condition, that they might have some new Magistrates created, to whom they 30 might appeale in cases of variance, and make them Solicitors in their controuersies, the Confuls authoritie notwithstanding. This was enacted; and they were called the Tribunes of the people. After this attonement amongst themselves, they had continuall Warre with the Latines, concerning their bounds and limits, and with other neighbouring States. Amongst these, the Volsa and Aqui held them longest; who made warre, of themselves, vpon the Romans: whereby they lost the best Citie in their whole jurifdiction, Corioli,

In this conquest, T. Martius got the sirname of Coriolanus: a name honorable then, as derined from a great victorie: although, by reason of the ponertie of the Towne, a Roman Generall, in after times, would have beene ashamed of that title. But yet 40 these graces had beene no occasion of disparagement, had hee not afterwards, in a great time of dearth, adulfed to sell corne, which they procured from Sicil, at too high a rate, to the people: whereupon, Decius Mus, their Tribune, in their behalfe, accused him, and after judgement, banished him. Coriolanso flying to the Volsai, whom lately before he had vanquished, incensed them to renew their forces againe, which being committed vnto him, and to Attiss Tullus, he prevailed in field, so farre forth, that hee was come within foure or fine miles of the Citie. Incamping there hee made so sharpe warre, and was at such defiance, with his Countrie, that hee would not relent, by any supplications of Embassadours, vntill his Mother Peturia, and Volumnia his wife, with a pittifull tune of deprecation, shewing themselves bet- 50 ter Subjects to their Countrie, than friends to their sonne and husband, were more auaileable to Rome, then was any force of armes. Hereupon Coriolanus difiniffing his Armie, was after put to death among the Volsei, as a Traitor, for neglecting such opportunitie: or (as others furmise) living with them untill old age, hee died natuNot long after this, the Veij in Hetruria, prouoked the Romans; againft whom the Fabij, three hundred and fixe in number, all of one Familie, intreated and obtained, that they only might be imploied, as it had been in a private quarrell. The Fe Fabij, after fome good feruices, lying incamped at Cremera, were circumuented and all flaine: one only of that whole houle, had been left, by reason of infancie, at home; from whom afterward forang Fabins Maximus, who vanquilhed Hamibal.

In processe of time, the Romans were also troubled with the Volsi, at the hill Algidum, two miles from Rome; where Lucius Minusius their Confull, with his whole Armie, had beene discomstited, had not L. Quintius Cincinstus chosen Distator, and to taken from the plough to the highest honour in Rome, with successe and the his expedition, dispersed his enemies, and freed his Countrie in the space of fixeen dayes. In the continuance of this Volsian warre it was, that Appius Claudius, one of the ten men, whom they had two yeares before chosen Gouernours of the State, and inactors of Solans lawesamongh them, procured from Aibens (abrogating in the meane while the Confuls, and all other Magistracies) would have ranisled Virginia, the daughter of T. Virginius, Capatine of a Companie, and lying then in campe at Aigidum. Hercupon the people, in an vproare, tooke the Hill Amentine, and after much variance, enforced the ten men, to religne up their authoritie againe, to new Confuls.

20 After this, either new quarrells, or defire to reuenge old loffes, drew the Romans into a new warre, againft the Peientes, and their adherents, ypon whom hauing tried their forces, with diuerlitie of Captaines, and varietie of euent, they vanquished the Fidiplis, and the Fidorates, and vitterly subdued the Peientes. In conquering the Faligis, Furius Comillum shewed no less interesting than fortitude. For when a Schoolemaster, by trayning forth into the Romaccampe, many children of the principall Citizens, thought to betray the Towne, yeelding them all vp as Hostages: Camillus deliuered this Traitor bound wnto his Schollers, willing them to whip him back into the Citic; which forth with yeelded wnto him in reuerence of his putite. The siege of Yeij was ten yeares, and so troublesome, that the Romans were there first 30 enlored to winter abroade vnder beasts skinnes (to which they were the more cafiliy induced, because then first they received pay) and to make vowes neuer to re-

At length winning the Citie by a Mine, they got so large spoiles, that they confectated their tenths to Apolle Pythius: and the whole people in generall, were called to the ransacking of the Citie. But yet they were no less withankefull to Camillus for his service, than before they had beene to Cariolamus; For they banished him the Citie, ypon some occasion of inequalitie in dividing the spoiles: yet herequited their vinkindnesse with a new peece of service, against the furie of the Gaules: who being a populous Gountrie, and very healthfull, the stathers (as sometimes one) lived for long rharthe somes, were enforced to roamea-onw) lined fo long, that the sonnes, desirtute of meaners, were enforced to roaneabroad, slecking some place, where to set up their rest: and withall being a Nation wast in body, rude by nature, and barbarous in conditions, wandred as Rouers our many Countries. Some of them lighting on Italie, set upon Clussium, a Townein Herruria; where of Rome hauing information (and being carefull of her Consederate Townes) sent Embassadours, examing them to delift from such injurious enterprises. But the barbarous people, not regarding the message, upon some injurie offered by the Roman Embassadours, connected their forces from Clussium towards Rome; and guining a great ouerthrow to the Romans, by the River Alia, upon the sixteenth day before the Calends of Angust (which day was after branded for vuictous characteristics). Then was Rome the true man of missire and desidation. For some leaving the citie.

50 Inckie, and called Allenfis in the Roman Kalendar) they be retend towards the Citie. Then was Rome the true map of mifeire and defolation. For forme leauning the citie; forme creeping into holes; Priefis hiding their reliques; and euery one fhifting for himfelfe, ere the enemie came; Rome was abandoned, as indefenfible. The Vehal Virgins, at this tumulet, were faifely contained away; the Ancients of the Citie, gallong in the structure of the Citie, gallong in the structure.

thering boldneffe out of desperate stare, did put on their Robes, and taking their leaue of the world, did state themselues in Thrones, in their seuerall houses, hourely expecting the messengers of death, and meaning to die, as they had lund, in State. The yonger sort, which A. Manlau their Captaine, tooke yoon them to make good the Capitoll.

By this, the Gaules were entred the Citie, who feeing all quiet, at first suspected fome ambush; afterward finding all secure, they fell to the spoile, committing all to the fire and sword. As for the old Senators, that sate in their Majestie, with a graue resolution: having first reverenced them as Gods, anon they tryed whether they would die like men. When the Citic was throughly rifled, they attempted 10 the Capitoll: which held them worke for the space of scuen Moneths. Once they were like to have surprised it by night, but being discried by the gagling of Geesco. M. Manlius did awaken, and kept them from entrance. At length a composition was agreed upon: the Gaules being wearie, and the Romans hungrie. The bargaine was, that the Gaules should take a thousand pound waight in gold, to desit from their fiege. Whilest the gold, was in waighing, the Gaules, with open insolencie, made their waights too heavie: Brennus, their Captaine, casting his sword into the ballance, and, with a proud exprobration, faying, that the vanquished must bee patient perforce. But in the midit of this cauilling, came Furius Camillus, with an Armic, from Ardea, (where he had lived in his banishment) and fell vpon the Gaules, 20 with such violence, that hee dispersed their troups, quenched the fire of the Citie with their bloud, forcing them to restore the spoiles with advantage, and sorbeare the gold, in accepting which, they had lately beene so nice. Further, having rid the Citic of them, he so hotly pursued them, through a great part of Italie, that the remainder of their Armie, which escaped from him, was very small. Other Armies of the Gaules, which followed this hrst, had the like ill successe. They were often beaten by the Romans; especially the victories of M. Torquatus, and of M. Valerius Corninus (each of which in fingle fight, flew a Champion of the Gaules) abated their prefumption, and restored courage to the Romans. Camillus, for his notable service, was afterwards accompted a fecond Romulus.

The people, after this destruction of their Citie, were earnessly bent to goe to the Vey to inhabite; but Camillus dissipated them.

About the same time, somewhat before the siege of Peij, they changed their gouernement from Confulls to militarie Tribunes. The gouernement of these also, after some yeares, was by civill diffension interrupted : so that one while Confulls ruled : another while there was an Anarchie : Then the Tribunes were reflored and ruled againe, till after many yeares expired, the Confular authoritie was established; it being enacted, that one of the Confulls should alwaies bee a Plebeian. This was after the building of the Citie, three hundred fixtic fine yeares. And now Rome by suppression of her neighbour Countries, creeping well forward out of her 40 Minoritie, dares set forth against the warlike Samuites, who dwelt almost one hundred and thirtie miles off: fituated betweene Campania and Apulia. These did so strongly inuade the Campanians their Neighbours, that they forced them to yeeld themselues subjects to Rome, and vndergoe any conditions of Tribute, or what else what locuer to obtaine protection, which the Romans, although both Countries had beene their Confederates, yet not willing that the greater, like fifh, should deuour the leffe, eafily allowed off; especially aiming themselves at the good situation of Campania, the aboundance of Corne and Wine, pleafant Cities and Townes, but especially Capua it selfe, the fairest Citie then in all Italie.

The Families of the Papyrij and Fabji were most employed in the managing of 50 this warre, which indured the space of fiftic yeares. And in this scason were the Romanos straimes dangeroully encountred by the Sammies, as when T. Feterius, and 5.9. Position were Consolis, and disconsited by Position at Caudium, with no small ignominie: and when Q. Fabius Gurges lost the field with three thousand men.

But for these losses, many great victories made large amends: The greatest whereof were gotten by L. Papprus, and by Quintus Fabius Maximus.

The Sammites drew the Hetrurians into their quarrell. But the force of the Sammites was well broken, ere the Hetririans (the greater and richer, but lesse warlike Nation) beganne to stirre. So the one and the other of these two Countries, became at length, tributare to Rome.

In the continuance of this long warreit was, (though in time of truce betweene the Romans and Samitas) that the Latines beganne to challenge equal freedome in the Corporation of Rome, and right in bearing Office, to that they required to have 10 one of the Confulls yearely cholen out of them.

This demand, of the Latines, was not vnreasonable. For the Romans themselves were a Latine Collonie; besides all which, they made offer, to change their name, and to be all called Romans. But the Romans were too proud, to admit any such capitulation. So a great battaile was fought betweene them: wherein the fortune of Roman premailed, by the vertue of the Confulls.

Munitua Torquatus, and the elder Desius, were then Confulls, whom the Soothfayers aduertifed, that the fide fhould be victorious, which loft the General in fight. Hereupon, Desius the Confull, exposed his life to the Enemie, and purchased victoree (as was beleeued) by his death. In which kinde of deuoting himselfie for his Ar-

To Mic, the fonne of this Detiut, being after Confull, did imitate his father, in the Hetrusius warre. But (as Tulke well notes) it was rather the desperate resolution of these Decy, that purchased victoric, by rulhing into the mids of the enimies, wherein their Souldiers followed them, than any great commendation of such a religion, as required the liues of so worthic Citizens, to be sacrificed for their Countrie. The discipline of Manhius was no lesser follower, than the valour of Decius. He forbadany one to for sake his place, and fight single with an enemie. For breach of which order, he caused his owne sonne to be put to death, who had slaine a Captaine of the Latines, being challenged, in single sight.

When the Latines, the Aqui, Volfis, Hernici, Campani, Samnites, and Hetrurians, 30 with some other people, were brought vader obedience; it was a vaine labour for any people of Haile, to contend against the Romans.

Yet the Sabines aduentured to trie their fortune; and found it bad. For Curins Dentatus, the Roman Confull, wasting all their Countrie with fit e and fword, from the River Nar and Velia, to the Adriatique Sea, brought them into quiet subjection.

The laft of the Italians, that made triall of the Roman Armes, were the Tarentines, and their adherents. These had interposed themselues as Mediatours, betweene the Romans and Samites; with a peremptorie denunciation of warre, wnto that partie, which should dare to refuse the peace by them tendred. These threats, which discouered their bad affection to Rome, ended in words; but when the Samulanians were exterly subdued, matter enough of quarrell was found, to examine their abilitie of performance.

The Romans complained, that certaine ships of theirs were robbed; and sent Embassadours with Tarentum, to require amends. Vpon some wrong done to these Embassadours, was laid the foundation of that Warre; wherein the Lueans, Messams plants, sprutams, and Appulians, joyning with the Tarentimes, procured the Sammites, and other Subjects of Rome, to rebell, and take their part. But some experience of the Roman strength, taught all these people to know their owne weaknesse. Wherefore they agreed to send for Pyrrbus, by whose aide (being a Graessam, as the Tarentimes also were) great hope was conceived, that the Dominion of Rome should bee 50 confined, with ome narrow bounds, than all stalie, which alreadie, in a manner it did ouer-foread.

How PYRRHVS warred upon the Romans, and vanquished them in two battailes.

YRRHUS, for faken by the Macedonians, and vnable to deale with Lyimachus, was compelled a while to line in rest: which he abhorred no And the standard of the standa

the power of Lysimachus, that it was no point of wisedome, to make an offensine warre vpon him, without farre greater forces. Antigonus, the sonne of Demetrius. held Corinth, at the same time, and some other Townes, with the remainder of his fathers Armie and treasures, left in his hand. Vpon him it is like that Pyrrhus might haue wonne; but it was better to let him alone, that hee might ferue to give some hinderance to Lylimachus.

In this want of imploiment, and couctous defire of finding it, the Tarentine Embaffadours came very fitly to Pyrrbus: and they came with braue offers, as needing none other aide then his good conduct, which to obtaine, they would cast themselues under his protection. They had in their companie, some of the Sammites, 20 Lucanians, Messapians, and others; which promised, in behalfe of their seucrall Nations, as much as could be defired. This encouraged Pyrrhus, and filled him with hopes of goodly conquests; that he might enlarge his Empire to the West, as farre as Alexander had gotten Eastward; and still by one victorie open the gate vnto another. To which effect it is faid, that once he answered Cyneus his chiefe Counsailour, asking what he meant to doe after every of the victories which hee hoped to get : that, having wonne Rome, he would soone be Master of all Italie; that, after Italie he would quickly get the Isle of Sicil; that, out of Sicil hee would passe ouer into Africk, and winne Carthage, with all the rest of the Countrie; and being strengthned with the force of all these Prouinces, hee would be too hard, for any of those, 30 that were now fo proud and troublefome. But Cyness enquired yet further, what they should doe, when they were Lords of all : Whereunto Pyrrhus (finding his drift) answered pleasantly, that they would line merrily; a thing (as Cyneas then told him) that they prefently might doe, without any trouble, if he could bee contented with his owne.

Neuerthelesse, this Italian expedition seemed vnto Pyrrhus, a matter of such consequence, as was not to bee omitted, in regard of any scholasticall disputation. Wherefore he prepared his Armie; of almost thirtie thousand men, well sorted, and well trained Souldiers : part of which he sent ouer before him under Cyneas, with the rest he followed in person. At his comming, he found the Tarentines very prompt 40 of tongue, but in matter of execution, vtterly carelesse to provide for the Warre. Wherefore he was faine to shut up their Theater, and other places of pleasure and refort; enforcing them to take Armes, and making such a strickt muster, as was to them very unpleasing, though greatly behooning to their estate.

Whilest he was occupied with these cares, Lauinus the Roman Conful drew near, and beganne to wast Lucania, a Province confederate with the Tarentines in this

The Lucanians were not readie to defend their owne Countrie; the Sammiles were carelesse of the harme, that fell not (as yet) vpon themselues; the Tarentines were better prepared than they would have beene, but their valour was little: all 50 of these had been accustomed to shrinke, for feare of the Roman fortitude: and therefore it fell outhappily, that Pyrrhus relied more vpon his owne forces, than the iffue of their vaunting promifes. He was now drinen, either to fet forward, with those that himselfe had brought into Italie, and the affiliance of the Tavenines, wherein little was to be reposed; or else to weaken the reputation of his owne sufficiencie, which by all meanes he was carefull to vp-hold. In good time a great part of his forces, that had beene scattered by foule weather at Sea, were safely come to him; with which he refolued to affay the valour of the Romans, against whom hee proudly marched.

Lauinus the Consull was not affrighted, with the terrible name of a great King; but came on confidently to meet him, and give him battaile, ere all his adherents should be readie to joyne with him. This boldnesse of the Roman, and the slackneffe of the Mesapians, Lucanians, Samnites, and others, whom the danger most o concerned, caused Pyrrhus to offer a treatic of peace : requiring to have the quarrel, betweene the Romans and his Italian friends, referred to his arbitrement. Whether he did this to winne time, that the Samnites and their fellowes might arrive at his Campe; or whether, confidering better at neare distance, the weight of the businesse, which he had taken in hand, he were desirous to quit it with his honour; the fhort answere, that was returned to his proposition, gaue him no meanes of either the one or the other : for the Romans fent him this word, that they had neither chofen him their ludge, nor feared him their enemie.

Hereupon, both Armies hastened their march vnto the River of Siris: Leuinus intending to fight, before the arrivall of the Samnites; Pyrrhus, to hinder him from 20 paffing that River, vntill his owne Armie were full. Vpon the first view of the Roman Campe, it was readily conceined by Pyrrhus, that he had not now to doe with barbarous people, but with men well trained in a braue discipline of warre: which caused him to set a strong Corps degarde, vpon the passage of the river, that he might not be compelled to fight, vntill he saw his best aduantage. But he quickly found, that this new enemic was not only skilfull in the Art of warre, but couragious in execution. For the Roman Armie entred the Foord, in face of his Corps de garde; and their horse, at the same time, beganne to passe the River, in sundrie places: which caused the Greekes to forsake the defence of their banke, and speedily retire vnto

This audacitie forced Pyrrbus to battaile; wherewith he thought it best to prefent them, ere their whole Armie hadrecouered firme footing, and were in order. So directing his Captaines how to marshall his battailes; himselfe with the horse, charged upon the Romans: who foutly received him, as men well exercised in sustaining surious impressions. In this fight, neither did his courage transport him beyond the dutie of a carefull Generall; nor his providence in directing others, hinder the manifestation of his personall valour. It behooved him indeede to doc his best; for he neuer met with better opposers. Once, and shortly after the fight began, his horse was slaine under him : afterwards, he changed armour with a friend; but that friend paid his life for the vie of his Kings armour, which was torne from 40 his back. This accident had almost lost him the battaile : but he perceining it, disconcred his face, and thereby restored courage to his men, and tooke from the Romans their vaine joy. The fight was obstinate, and with the greater losse (at least of more eminent men) on Pyrrhus his fide, as long as only speare and sword were vled. But when the Elephants were brought into the wings, whose vnusuall forme and terrible aspect, the horses of the Romans (vnaccustomed to the like) were not able to fultaine; then was the victorie quickly gotten. For the Roman battailes, perceiuing their horse put to rout, and driven out of the field; finding also themselues both charged in flanke, and ouer-borne, by the force, and huge bulke, of these strange beasts; gaue way to necessitie, and saued themselues, as well as they 50 could, by hastic fight: in which consternation, they were so forgetfull of their difcipline, that they tarried not to defend their Campe, but ranne quite beyond it, leaving both it, and the honour of the day, entirely to Pyrrhus.

The fame of this victorie was soone spread ouer Italie; and the reputation was no leffe than the fame. For it was a matter very rare to bee heard, that a Roman with him.

Confull, with a felect Armie, should loofe in plaine battaile, not only the field, but the Campe it selfe, being so notably fortified, as they alwaies were. And this honour was the more brauely wonne by Pyrrhus, for that hee had with him none of his Italian friends, faue the vnwarlike Tarentines. Neither could be well diffemble his content that he tooke, in having the glorie of this action peculiarly his owne, at fuch time as he blamed the Lucans and Samnites, for comming (as we fay) a day after the faire. Neuerthelesse, he wisely considered the strength of the Romans, which was such, as would better endure many such losses, than he could many such victories. Therefore, he thought it good to compound with them, whilest with his honour he might; and to that purpose hee sent vnto them Cyness his Embassadour; 10 demaunding only to have the Tarentines permitted to live at rest, and himselfe accepted as their especiall friend. This did Cyneas, with all his cunning, and with liberall gifts, labour to effect; but neither man nor woman could be found in Rome. that would take any bribe of him; neither did their defire of recouering their captiues, or their danger, by the riling of many States in Italie against them, so incline them to peace, as the vehement exhortation of Appius Claudius, an old and blinde Senator, did stirre them up to make good their honour by warre. So they returned answere, that whilest Pyrrhus aboade in Italie, they would come to no agreement

Such was the report, that Cyneas made, at his returne, of the Roman pullfance 20 and vertue; as kindled in Pyrrhus a great delire of confederacie, with that gallant Citic, Hereupon many kinde Offices passed between them: but still when hee vrged his motion of peace, the answere was, He must first depart out of Italie, and then treat of feace.

In the meane season, each part made prouision for warre; the Romans leauving a more mightie armie than the former; and Pyrrhus being strengthned with accesse vnto his forces, of all the East parts of Italie. So they came to triall of a second battaile, wherein (though after long and cruell fight) the boifterous violence of the Elephants, gaue to Pyrrhus a fecond victorie. But this was not altogether fo joyfull, as the former had beene : rather it gaue him cause to say, that such another vi- 20 ctorie would be his vtter vndoing. For hee had loft the flower of his Armie in this battaile, and though he draue the Romans into their Campe, yet he could not force them out of it, nor faw any likelihood of prevailing against them, that were like to be relicued with daily supplies, whilest he should bee driven to spend vpon his old flock. Neither could hee expect, that his Elephants should alwayes stand him in stead. A little knowledge of their manner in fight, would soone teach the Romans, that were apt Scholers in such learning, how to make them vnseruiceable. Wherefore he desired nothing more, than how to carrie his honour safe out of Italie: which to doe (feeing the Romans would not helpe him, by offering or accepting anie faire conditions of peace, or of truce) he tooke a flight occasion, presented by 40 fortune, that followeth to be related.

δ. I I I.

The great troubles in Macedon and Sicill. How PYRRHVS, being inuited into Sicill, for fooke Italie; wanne the maft of the Ifle, and lost it in Ilbort foac.

PYRRHVS returnes into Italie; where he is beaten by the Romans, and be over back to his owne Kingdome.

Hen Ptolomie Ceraunus had traiterously murdered his Benefactor and Patron Seleucus, he presently seized vpon all the Dominions of Lysimones in Europe, as if they had beene the due reward, wnto him, that had slaine the Conquerour. The houses of Cassander and Lysimachus were then fallen to the ground: neither was there in Macedon any were then fallen to the ground : neither was there in Macedon any man of strength and reputation enough, to advance himselfe against Ceraunus. The friends of Lylimachus were rather pleased to have him their King, that had (as hee professed) reuenged their Lords death; than any way offended with the odiousnes of his fact, by which they were freed from subjection, to one, against whom they had flood in opposition. Many there were, that vpon remembrance of his Fathers great vertue, gathered hope of finding the like in Ceraunus: perswading themselves that his raigne might proue good, though his entrance had beene wicked. These 20 affections of the Macedonians did ferue to defeat Antigonus the fonne of Demetrius, that made an attempt vpon the Kingdome. As for Antiochus, the forme of Selencus. he was farre off, and might be questioned about some part of Asia, ere he should be able to bring an Armie neare vnto Europe. Yet hee made great shew of meaning to reuenge his fathers death: but being stronger in monie than in armes, hee was content, after a while, to take faire words, and make peace with the murtherer. While these three strone about the Kingdome, Pyrrhus, who thought his claime as good as any of theirs, made vse of their diffention: threatning warre, or promiting his affiltance, to enery one of them. By these meanes he strengthned himselfe, and greatly aduantaged his Italian voiage, which hee had then in hand : requesting monic of 30 Antiochus, ships of Antigonus, and souldiers of Ptolomie, who gave him his daughter in marriage, and lent him a strong power of Macedonian Souldiers, and of Elephants (couenanting to have them restored at two yeares end) more for feare than for loue: that so he might free himselfe from trouble, & quietly enjoy his Kingdom. Thus Ptolomic grew mightie on the fuddaine; and the power that by wicked meanes he had gotten, by meanes as wicked he increased.

All Matedon and Thrace being his, the strong Citic of Cassandria, was held by Arfines his slitter; the widow of Lysimachus, who lay therein with her yong children. Her hee circumuented by making loue to her, and (according to the fushion of those times, wherein Princes regarded no degree of consanguinitie) taking her to wise, with promise to adopt her children: a promise that he meant not to performe; for it was not long, ere he flew them, and draue her into exile.

In the pride of this good fuceoffe, which his vilanic found; vengeance came vpon him from a farre, by the furie of a Nation, that hee had neuer heard off. Belgius a Captaine of the Gaules, hauing forced his paffage through many Countries, vnto the confines of Macedon, fent a proud medfage to Ceraumus, commanding him to buy peace with monie, or otherwife, to look for all the miferies of warre. The Gaules were the race of those, that iffued out of their Countrie, to seeke new seates, in that great expedition, wherein Bremun tooke and burnt the Citic of Rome. They had divided themselues, at their setting forth, into two Companies, of which the one fell 50 ypon Malies, the other palling through the Countries that lie on the Northerns side, of the Adriatik Sea, made long aboade in Pumonia, and the Regions adjoyning, where they forced all the neighbour Princes to redeem peace with tribute, as now they would have compelled Ceraumus to doesyntow hose borders they came about an hundred and eight yeares after such time as their fellowes had taken Rome.

Ccccc

Whe

When their Embaffadours came to Ptolomie, asking what he would give: His answere was, that he would be contented to give them peace, but it must bee with condition, that they should put into his hands their Princes as hostages, and yeeld up their armes; for otherwise, he would neither pardon their boldnesse, nor give any credit to their words. At this answere, when it was returned, the Gaules did laugh; faying, that they would foone confute with deeds, the vanitie of fuch proud words. It may feeme strange, that he, who had given away part of his Armie vnto Pyriha, for very feare; should bee so consident in undertaking more mightic enemies. The King of the Dardanians offered to lend him twentie thousand men against the Gaules; but hee scorned the offer; saying, that hee had the children of those, to which under the conduct of Alexander, had subdued all the East. Thus hee iffued forth against the barbarous people, with his famous Macedonians, as if the victorie must needes have followed the reputation of a great name. But he soone found his great errour, when it was too late. For the enemies were not only equall in strength of body, and fiercenesse of courage, but so farre superiour to the Macedonians in numbers, that few or none escaped their furie. Ptolomie himselfe grienously wounded, fell into their hands, whileft the battaile continued; and they prefently strooke off his head, which they shewed to his men, on the top of a Lance, to their vtter aftonishment.

The report of this great ouerthrow filled all Macedon with fuch defperation, that 10 the people fled into walled Townes, and abandoned the whole Countrie as loft. Only Softweens, avaliant Captaine, animating as many as he could, gathered a fmall Armie, with which hee many times got the vpper hand, and hindred Belgius from vling the victorie at his whole pleasure. In regard of this his vertue, the Souldiers would have made him King, which title he refused, and was content with the name of a Generall. But (as milchiefs doe seldome come alone) the good successed of medical more and fitted with the sum of the Cantes, with an hundred and fitted thouse and fitted with his weake troups made opposition, he was easily beaten, and the Micedonium againe compelled to hide themselues within their walls, lea-30 using all their Countrie to the spoile of the Barbarians.

Thus were the Macedonians deliture of a King, and troden downe by a Nation, that they had not heard of; in left ethen fiftie yeares after the death of Alexander, who fought to difcour and flubdue vnknowne Countries, as if all Greece, and the Empire of Persia, had beeneroo little for a King of Macedon.

Very feafonably had these newes beene carried to Pyrthus in Italie, who fought a fare pretext of reliquishing his warre with the Romanishad not other tidings out of Stad distracted him, and carried him away in purfuse of nearth opes. For after the death of Agashodes, who raigned ouer the whole Iland, the Cashaginians sent an Armie to conquer Stad, out of which, by him, they had beene expelled. This 40 Armie did fo fast prevaile, that the Statians had no other hope to avoide flaueric, than in submitting themselnes to the rule of Pyrthus whom, being a Gracian, and a noble Prince, they thought it more for their good to obey, than to liue vnder the well knowne heauie yoake of Casthage. To him therefore, the Syraudjust, Leonines, and Agraciantee, principal Estates of the Isle, sent Embassadours, carnestly desiring him to take them into his protection.

It grieued Pyrrhus exceedingly, that two fuch notable occasions, of enlarging his Dominions, should fall out to valuekily, both at one time. Yet whether hee thought the businesse of scial more important, or more full of likelihood; or whether perhaps he beleeued (as came after to passe) that his advantage, vpon Macedon, would not so hastily passe away, but that he might finde some occasion to lay hold on it, at better leisure, ouer into Sicil he transported his Armie, leaving the Tarentines to shift for themselves; yet not leaving them free as hee sound them, but with a Garrison in their Towne, to hold them in fubication.

As his departure out of Italie, was rather grounded on head-long paffion, than mature aduice; so were his actions following, wrill his returne who Epirus, rather many and tumultuous, than well ordered, or note worthie. The Armie which he caried into that Ifle, confifted of thirtie thou fand foot, and two thou fand fine hundred horfe: with which, some after his defeent in Stall, he fore the Cartheginians, out of all, in effect, that they held therein. He also wonne the firong Citico (Epsys, and hauing beaten the Atamertines in battaile, hee beganne to change condition, and turne i yrant. For he draue Selfratus (to whom his crueltie was fulped) out of the Iland, and put Themeon of Syrasufe to death, being jealous of his greatness; to which two persons had faithfully served him, and deliuered the great and rich Citico Syrasufe into his hands. After this, his fortunes declined to fast, as hee served himselfer, and falued the disfreputation of his leaving Stall, by an Emballage sen himselfer, and falued the disfreputation of his leaving Stall, by an Emballage sen himselfer, and falued the disfreputation of his leaving Stall, by an Emballage sen himselfer, and falued the disfreputation of his leaving stall, by an Emballage sen himselfer, and falued the later had subject to the passes, who since his leaving Italie, had well neare disposses them of all that they had.

Taking this faire occasion, hee imbarked for Italie; but was first beaten by the Carthaginian Gallies, in his passage, and secondly assassing the Italies seller, by eighteen hundred Mamerimes, that attended him in the straints of the Countrie. Lastly, after he had recoured Tarentum, hee sought a third battaile with the Romans, and the Straint, who was victorious ouer him, and fore't him out of Italie, into his the Countries and the Straint St

A Prince he was farre more valiant than constant, and had he beene but a Generall of an Armie, for some other great King or State, and had been directed to have conquered any one Countrie or Kingdome, it is to be thought, that he would have purchased no lesse homour, than any man of warre, either preceding or succeeding him; for a greater Captaine, or a valianter man, hath beene no where sound. But hencuer staid vpon any enterprise; which was, indeede, the disease hee had, whereof not long after he died in Agos.

δ. IIII.

How Antigonvs, the sonne of Demetrivs, delivered Macedon from the Gaules. How Pyrrhys wonnethe Kingdome of Macedon from Antigonvs,

He vertue of Softhenes being too weake, to defend the Kingdome of Macedon; and the fortune which had accompanied him againt Belgins, failing him in his attempts againft Brennus: the Macedonians were no leffeglad to fubmit themselues with the government of Antigonus, than they had formerly beene desirous, to free themselues, from the he entertained their Embaffadors in very louing and fumptnous manner, with a roiall feast; wherein he exposed to their view, such aboundance of massie gold and silner, that they were not so much delighted with the meat, as with fight of the vesfells, wherein it was ferued. He thought hereby, to make them understand, how great a Prince he was, and how able, if neede required, to wage a mightie Armie.

To which end he likewife did flow vnto them, his Camp and Nauie, but efpecially his Elephants. But all this brauerie ferued only to kindle their greedie appetites; who feeing his ships heavie loaden, his Campe full of wealth, and ill fortified, himselfe (as it seemed) secure, and his men, both in strength and courage inferiour vnto the Gaules : thought all time loft, wherein they fuffered the prefent poffeffors, 10 to found the riches, which they accompted affuredly their owne. They returned therefore to their Companions, with none other newes in their mouthes, than of Spoile and purchase: which tale, caried the Gaules head-long, to Antigonus his camp. where they expected a greater bootie, than the victorie ouer Ceraunus had given to Belgius. Their comming was terrible and fuddaine; yet not fo fuddaine, but that Antigonus had notice of it: who distrusting the courage of his owne men, dislodged fomewhat before their arrivall, and conveighed himfelfe, with his whole armie and carriage, into certaine woods adjoyning, where he lay close.

The Gaules, finding his Camp for faken, were not haltie to purfue him, but fell to ranfacking the emptie Cabbines of the Souldiers; in hope of finding all that was 20 either lost or hidden. At length, when they had searched enery place in vaine, angric at their loft labour, they marched with all speede toward the Sea-side; that they might fall vpon him, whilest hee was busic in getting his men and carriages a ship-board. But the successe was no way answerable to their expectation. For being proud of the terrour which they had brought vpon Antigonus, they were fo carelesse of the Sea-men, that without all order, they fell to the spoile of what they found on the shore, and in such ships as lay on ground. Part of the Armie had left Antigonus, where he lay in couert, and had faued it felfe by getting aboard the fleet:in which number were some well experienced men of warre, who discourring the much advantage offered vnto them, by the desperate 20 prefumption of their enemies, tooke courage, and encouraged others, to lay manlie hold vpon the oportunitie. So the whole number, both of Souldiers and Marriners, landing together, with great resolution, gaue so braue a charge vpon the disordered Gaules, that their contemptuous boldnesse was thereby changed into suddaine feare, and they, after a great flaughter, driven to cast themselves into the sernice of Antigonus.

The fame of this victorie, caused all the barbarous Nations in those quarters, to re-entertaine their ancient beliefe of the Macedonian valour: by which, the terrible and reliftlesse oppressors of so many Countries, were overthrowne.

To speake more of the Gaules, in this place; and to shew how, about these times, 40 three Tribes of them passed over into Asia the lesse, with their warres and conquests there; I hold it needlesse: the victorious armes of the Romans, taming them hereafter, in the Countries which now they wanne, shall give better occasion, to rehearfe these matters briefly.

Howfoeuer the good fucceffe of Antigonus got him reputation, among the barbarous people, yet his owne Souldiers, that without his leading, had wonne this victorie, could not thereupon be perswaded, to thinke him a good man of warre: knowing that he had no interest in the honour of the service, wherein his conduct was no better, than creeping into a wood.

This (as presently will appeare) was greatly helpfull vnto Pyrrhus: though as 50 yet, he knew not so much. For Pyrrhus, when his affaires in Italie stood vpon hard termes, had fent vnto Antigonus for helpe: not without threats, in case it were denied. So was be fure to get, either a fupply, wherewith to continue his war against the Romans, or some seeming honourable pretence, to forsake Italie, under colour of making his word good, in feeking reuenge. The threats which he had vsed in brauerie, meere necessitie forced him, at his returne into Epirus, to put in practise.

He brought home with him, eight thousand foot, and fine hundred horse: an armie too little to be imploied, by his restlesse nature, in any action of importance; yet greater than he had meanes to keepe in pay. Therefore he fell vpon Macedon; intending to take what spoile he could get, and make Antigonus compound with him, to be freed from trouble. At his first entrance into this businesse, two thoufand of Antigonus his Souldiers, revolted vnto Pyrrhus; and many Cities, either willingly or perforce, received him. Such faire beginnings, eafily perfwaded the 13 courage of this daring Prince, to fet vpon Antigonus himfelfe, and to hazard his fortune, in triall of a battaile, for the whole Kingdome of Macedon.

It appeares, that Antigonus had no defire to fight, with this hot warriour; but thought it the wifest way, by protracting of time, to wearie him out of the Countric. For Pyrrhus ouertooke him in a straight passage, and charged him in the reare; wherein were the Gaules, and the Elephants, which were thought the best of his firength: a manifest proofe that he was in retrait. The Gaules very brauely fustayned Pyrrbus his impression; yet were broken at length (when most of them were flaine) after a sharpe fight : wherein it seemes, that Antigonus keeping his Macedonian Phalanx within the ftreight, and not advancing to their succour, tooke away 20 their courage, by deceiuing their expectation. The Captaines of the Elephants were taken foone after; who, finding themselves exposed to the same violence, that had confumed fo many of the Gaules, yeelded themselues and the beasts. All this was done in full view of Antigonus, and his Macedonians, to their great discomfort: which emboldened Pyrrhus, to charge them where they lay in their firength. Where the Phalanx could be charged only in a front, it was a matter of extreame difficultie (if not impossible) to force it. Butthe Macedonians had seene so much, that they had no defire to fight against Pyrrhus; who discoursed so well their affections, that hee aduentured to draw neare in person, and exhort them to yeeld. Neither the common Souldier, nor any Leader, refused to become his follower. 30 All forfooke Antigonis, a few horfe-men excepted, that fled a long with him to The falonica; where he had some small forces left, and monie enough to entertaine agreater power, had he knowne where to leanie it. But while it he was thinking, how toullure a sufficient number of the Gaules into his service; whereby hee might repaire his losse: Ptolomie, the sonne of Pyrrhus, came vpon him, and easily defeating his weake forces, draue him to flie from the parts about Macedon, to those Townes a farre off in Peloponne (us, in which he had formerly lurked, before such time as he looked abroade into the world, and made himselfe a King.

This good successe reuiued the spirits of the Epirot, and caused him to forget all forrow, of his late mif-fortunes in the Roman warre: fo that he fent for his sonne He-40. lenus (whom he had left with a Garrison, in the Castle of Tarentum) willing him to come duer into Greece, where was more matter of conquest, and let the Italians shift for themselues.

How PYRRHUS assailed Sparta without success. His enterprise upon Argos, and his death.

YRRHVS had now conceived a great hope, that nothing should bee able to withfland him; seeing, that in open fight, he had vanquished the Gaules, beaten Anigonus, and wonne the Kingdome of Macedon; There was not in all Greece, nor, indeede, in all the Lands that Alexandra of the ander had wonne, any Leader of fuch name and worth, as descrued to be set vp against him: which filled him with the opinion that he might doe what he pleased. He raised therefore an Armie, consisting of fine and twentie thousand foot, two thousand horse, and source and twentie Elephants; pretending warreagainst Antigonus, and the giuing libertie to those Townes in Pelsponnes, which the same Antigonus held in subjection; though it was easily discovered, that such great preparations were made, for accomplishment of some designe more important. than warre against a Prince alreadie vanquished, and almost veterly dejected. Especially the Lacedemonians feared this expedition, as made against their State. For Cleonymus, one of their Kings, being expelled out of his Countrie, had betaken himfelfe to Pyrrhus: who readily entertained him, and promifed to restore him to his Kingdome. This promife was made in fecret; neither would Pyrrhus make thew 10 of any displeasure, that he bare vnto Sparta; but contrariwise professed, that it was his intent, to have two of his owne yonger sonnes trained vp in that Citie, as in a p'ace of noble discipline. With such colours hee deluded men, euen till he entred vpon Laconia; where prefently he demeaned himfelfe as an open enemie: excusing himselfe, and his former dissembling words, with a jeast; That he followed herein the Lacedamonian custome, of concealing what was truly purposed. It had been, indeed, the manner of the Laced amonians, to deale in like fort with others, whom, in the time of their greatnesse, they sought to oppresse: but now they complained of that, as falsehood, in Pyrrhue, which they alwaies practifed as wisdome, till it made them distrufled, for faken, and almost contemptible. Neuerthelesse, they were not wanting to 20 themselves, in this dangerous extremitie. For the old men and women laboured in fortifying the Towne; causing such as could beare armes, to reserue themselves fresh against the assault: which Pyrrhus had viwisely deferred, vpon assurance of prenailing.

Sparta was neuer fortified, before this time, otherwise than with armed Citizens: fooneafter this (it being built vpon vneuen ground, and for the most part hard to approch) the lower and more accessible places, were fenced with walls; at the prefent, only trenches were cast, and barricadoes made with Carts, where the entrance feemed most easie. Three daiestogether it was assailed by Pyrrhus, exceeding siercely; and no lesse stoutly defended. The desperate courage of the Citizens preserved 30 the Towne the first day; whereinto the violence of Pyrrhus had forced entrance the fecond day, but that his wounded horse threw him to the ground, which made his Souldiers more mindfull of fauing the person of their King, than of breaking into the Citie, though alreadie they had torne in funder the barricadoes. Presently after this, one of Antigonus his Captaines got into Sparta, with a good strength of men; and Areas the King returned out of Crete (where he had beene helping his friends in warre) with two thousand men, little knowing the danger, in which his owne countrie flood, vntill he was almost at home. These succours did not more animate the Spartans, than kindle in Pyrrhus a defire to preuaile against all impediments. But the third daies worke showed, how great his errour had beene, in forbearing to affault 40 the Towne at his first comming. For he was so manfully repelled, that hee saw no likelihood of getting the place, otherwise than by a long siege: in which tedious course, he had no defire to spend his time.

Mizenus bad now raifed an Armie, though not firong enough to meet theenemic in plaine field, yet able to hinderall his purpofes. This made Pyrrhus doubtfull what way to take; being duerfly affected, by the difficultie of his enterprife in hand, and the shame of taking a repulse in his first attempt. While she evast thus perplexed, letters came from argo*, inuiting him thither; with promise, to deliuer that Citic into his hands.

Civill diffension raging then horly in Argos, caused the heads of severall facti- 50 one, to call in Pyrshus and Antigonus, but the comming of these two Princes, taught the Citizens wit, and made them desirous, to rid their hands of such powerfull AL sistants, as each of the two Kings pretended himselfe to be. Antigonus told the Argues, that he came to such them from the tyrannic of Pyrshus; and that hee would begone if they needed not his helpe. On the other lide, Pyrrhus would needes perfixed e them, that he had none other errand, that no make them fafe from Antigomus, offering in like manner, to depart, if they so delired.

The Argines tooke small pleasure, in hearing the Foxe and Kite at strife, which of them should keepe the Chickins from his enemie: and therefore prayed them both, to diuert their powers some other way. Hercunto Antigons readily condeded cended, and gaue Hoilages to assure this word: for he was the weaker, and stood in neede of good-will. But Pyrthus thought it enough to promise: Hostages he would give none, to his inferious; essentially, meaning deceip. This made them suspects his purpose to be such, as, indeede, it was. Yet he leile regarded their opinions, than to hold them worthie of assurance, by giung such a bond, as hee intended to breake ere the next morning.

It was concluded, that a Gate of the Citic (hould be opened by night vnto Pyrrhus, by his Complices within Argar: which was accordingly p-rharmed. So his Armie, without any tumult, entred the Citic: till the Elephants, with Towers on their backs, cloyed the way, being too high to paffe the Gate. The taking off, and fetting on againe, of those Towers, with the trouble thereto belonging, did both gue alarme to the Citic, and some lediture to take order for defence, before so many were entred, as could fully Masserit. Argas was full of ditches, which greatly hinclotded the Gauls: (that had the Funtgarde) being ignorant of the waise, in the darke night. The Citizens, on the other side, had much advantage, by their knowledge of euery by-passegand setting ypon the enemies on all lides, did put them to great losse, and more trouble.

Typribus therefore, understanding by the confused noise, and unequal shoutings of his owne men, that they were in diltress, entred the Cities person, to take order for their relices, and assume and among the place. But the darkeness, the throng, and many other impediments, kept him from doing any thing of moment, untill breake of day. Then beganne beto make his passage by force, and so larre preusalied, that heggs into the Market-place. It is said, that seeing in that place, the Image of a Wolfe and a Bull, in such posture as it they had been combattant, hee called to minde an Oracle, which threatned him with death, when he should behold a Bull fighting with a Wolfe; and that hereupon he madercratit.

Indeede, the comming of satigonas to therefere, the diforder and confusion of his owner men; with ditures ill accidents, gaue him reasonable cause to have retired out of the Citie, though the Wolfe and Bull had beene away. The turnuls was fuch, that no directions could be heard; but as fore gaue back, so did others thrust forward, and the strigges prefling hard you him, forced Pyrthus to make good his retrait, with his owner sword. The tops of the houses were coursed with women, that shood looking on the sight. Among these was one, that shaw her owne somein dangerous case, fighting with Pyrthus. Wherefore, shee tooke a tile stone, or flate, and threw it so violently downe on the head of Pyrthus, that hee fell to ground aftonished with the blow; and lying in that case, had bis head cut off.

Thus ended the refilesse ambition of Pyrthu, together with his life: and thus returned the Kingdome of Distaction to Intigonus; who forthwith possess the armie, the bodie, and the children of his enomie. The bodie of Pyrthus, had honourable funerall, and was given by Antigonus with Helenus his sonie; which yong Prince he graciously sent home, into his Fathers Kingdome of Epirus. From this time forwards, the cace of Antigonus, held the Kingdome of Masselon; the positive of Selenus, raigned ouer Asiand Syriz; and the bouse of Ptolomie had quiet to possession of the Cities of Rome, swallowing all vp.oige-sted these, among other Countries, into the bodie of her owne Empire.

CHAP. I. Of the first Punicke Warre.

). I.

A discussion of that probleme of Livie; Whether the Romans could have refisted the great Alexander. That neither the Macedonian nor the Roman Souldier, was of equal valour to the English.

HAT question handled by LIVIE, Whether the great ALEXANDER could have pressible the Romans, if after his Eafterne conquest; he had bent all his forces against them, hath beene, and is, the subject of much disputes which (as it feemes to me; the arguments on both sides do not so well explane, as doth the experience that Pyrthus bath giuen, of the Roman power, in his daies. For if he, a Commander (in Hannibla) judgement) inseries to Alexander, though to noncelle, could with small strength of men, and little thore of monie, or of other needfull helps in warre, vanquish them in two battailes, and endanger their estate, when it was, well setled, and held the best part of stalie, vnder a confirmed obedience: what would Alexander have done, that was aboundantly provided of all which is needful.

full to a Conquerour, wanting only matter of emploiment, comming vpon them before their Dominion was halke fo well felted. It is eafle to fay, that Alexander had no more, than thirtse thousand foot, and foure thousand horse (as indeede, at his fift passage into Asia, he carried ouer, not many more) and that the rest of his followers were no better than base estimates Asias first passage in the carried ouer, not many more) and that the rest of his Armies of Perduces, Assignary Craterus, Eumenes, Ptolomic, Antigonus, and Lysinsabus, with the actions by then performed, euery one of which (to omit others) commanded only some fragment of this dead Emperours power; shall easily sinde, that such a reckoning is starte short of the truth.

It were needlesse to speake of Treasure, Horkes, Elephants, Engines of batterie, 10 and the like: of all which, the Macedonian had aboundance; the Roman haining nought, sauce men and armes. As for Sea-forces, he that shall consider after what fort the Roman, in their sint Panick warre, were trained, in the rudiments of Nauigation; sitting you the shoare, and beating the sand with poles, to practise the stroke of the Oare, as not during to lanch their ill-built vesses into the Sea; will easily conceiue, how farre too weake they would have proued in such services.

Now for helpers in warre ; I doe not fee, why all Greece and Macedon, being abfolutely commanded by Alexander, might not well descrue to be laid in ballance, against those parts of Italie, which the Romans held in ill-assured subjection. Toomit therefore all benefit, that the Easterne world, more wealthic, indeede, than 20 valiant, could have affoorded vnto the Macedonian : let vs only conjecture, how the States of Sicilland Carthage, nearest neighbours, to such a quarrell (had it happened) would have stood affected. The Sicilians were, for the most part, Gracians, neither is it to bee doubted, that they would readily have submitted themselues vnto him, that ruled all Greece belides them. In what termes they commonly flood, and how ill they were able to defend themselves, it shall appeare anon. Sure it is, that Alexanders comming into those parts, would have brought excessive joy, to them that were faine to get the helpe of Pyrrhus, by offering to become his subjects. As for the Carthaginians; if Agathocles, the Tyrant of Syracule, hated of his people, and ill able to defend his owne belieged Citic, could, by adventuring to faile into Affrek, 30 put their Dominion, yea and Carthage it selfe, in extreme hazard; shall wee thinke that they would have been able to withfland Alexander? But, why doe I question their abilitie, feeing that they fent Embassadours, with their submission, as farre as Babylon, ere the warre drew neare them? Wherefore it is manifest, that the Romans must, without other succour, than perhaps of some sew Italian friends ( of which yet there were none, that for sooke them not, at some time, both before and after this) have opposed their valour, and good militarie discipline, against the power of all Countries, to them knowne, if they would have made reliftance. How they could have sped well, in undertaking such a match, it is uncasie to finde in discourse of humanereason. It is true; that vertue and fortune worke wonders: but it is a- 40 gainst cowardly fooles, and the vnfortunate: for who focuer contends with one too mightie for him; either must excell in these, as much as his enemie goes beyond him in power; or else must looke, both to be ouer-come, and to bee cast downe so much the lower, by how much the opinion of his fortune and vertue renders him suspected, as likely to make head another time against the vanquisher. Whether the Roman, or the Macedonian, were in those daies the better Souldier, I will not take upon me to determine: though I might, without partialitie, deliuer mine owne opinion, and preferre that Armie, which followed not only Philip and Alexander, but also Alexanders Princes after him, in the greatest dangers of all forts of watre; before any, that Kome either had, or in long time after did fend forth. Concerning 50 fortune; who can give a rule that shall alwaies hold? Alexander was victorious in enery battaile that he fought: and the Romans in the iffue of cuery warre. But forasmuch as Linie hath judged this a matter worthie of consideration; I thinke it a great part of Romes good fortune, that Alexander came not into Italie: where in three yeares after his death, the two Roman Confulls, together with all the power of that State, were furprized by the Sammites, andenforced to yeeld up their armes. We may therefore permit Limit to admitte his owne Romans, and to compare with Alexander, those Captaines of theirs, which were honoured sufficiently, in being thought equal to his followers: that the same conceipt should blind our judgment, we cannot permit without much vanitie.

Now in deciding fuch a controuerfie, me thinks it were not amiffe, for an Englishman, to giue fuch a fentence betweene the **Odacedomans* and Romans*, as the Romans* once did (being chosen Arbitrators) betweene the **Ardeates and Arbitmi*, that Links Deca. 1.5, through about a pecce of land; saying, that it belonged with oneither of them, but yun-to the Romans themselves.

If therefore it be demanded, whether the Macedonian, or the Roman, were the best Warriour? I will answere: The Englishmen. For it will soon cappeare, to any that shall examine the noble acts of our Nation in warre, that they were performed by no advantage of weapon; against no savage or vinnansic people; the enemic being farre superiour vinto vs in numbers, and all needfull prouisions, years well trained as we, or commonly better, in the exercise of warre.

In what fort Philip wanne his Dominion in Greece, what manner of men the Perfams and Indians were; whom Aexander vanquilhed; as likewife of what force the Macedoma Phalans was, and how well appointed, againft fuch arms as it commonly encountred; any man, that bath taken paines to reade the foregoing floric of them, doth fufficiently underitand. Yet was this Phalans neuer, or very feldome, able to fland, againft the Roman Armies; which were embattailed in for excellent a forme, as I know not, whether any Nation befides them haue vfed, either before or fince. The Romans weapons likewife, both offenitive and defenfive, were of greater vfe, than those with which any other Nation hath serued, before the serie instruments of Gunne-powder were knowne. As for the enemies, with which Romans had to doe; we finde, that they, which did outer-match her in numbers, wereas farre outer-matched by her, in weapons; and that they, of whom shee had little adaquating of their in multitude. This also (as Plutarch well observed; has a part of her happinesse; that they was neuer outer-laied, with well observed; has a part of her happinesse; the was neuer outer-laied, with two great warres at once.

Hereby it came to paffe, that having at first increased her strength, by accession of the Sadines, having wonne the State of Alba, against which shee adventured her owne selfe, as it were in wager, you the heads of three Champions: and having thereby made her selfe Princesse of Latinus: shee did afterwards, by long warre, in many ages, extend her Dominion over all Italie. The Carthaginians had well neare oppressed her: but their Souldiers were Mercinaries fo that for want of proper strength, they were easily beaten at their owne doores. The Atolians, and with

40 them all, or the most of Greece, affished her against Philip the Macedonian; hee being beaten, did lend her his helpe, to beat the same Atolians. The warres against Antichus, and other Affisiques, were such as gaue to Rome small cause of boash, though much of joy; for those opposites were as base of courage, as the lands which they held were aboundant of riches. Sieil, Spaine, and all Greece, fell into her hands by vining her aide, to protect them against the Cartheigh into and Macedonian of

I shall not neede to speake of her other conquests: it was easie to get more when shee had gotten all this. It is not my purpose to disgrace the Roman valour (which was very noble) or to blemish the reputation of so many samous victories: I am not so idle. This I say; that among all their warres, I finde not any, wherein their 50 valour hath appeared, comparable to the English. If my judgement seeme ouerpartiall; our warres in France may helpe to make it good.

First, therefore tits well knowne; that Roome (or perhaps all the world besides) had neuer any so braue a Commander in warre, as thing Cessar, and that no Rooma armie, was comparable vnto that, which serued vnder the same Cessar. Likewise, it is apparent, that this gallant Armie, which had given faire proofe of the Roman courage, in good performance of the Heluetian warre, when it first entred into Gaule; was neuertheleffe vtterly difficartened, when Cefar led it against the Germans, So that we may justly impute, all that was extraordinarie in the valour of Cafars men, to their long exercise, under so good a Leader, in so great a warre. Now let vs in generall, compare with the deedes done by these best of Roman Souldiers, in their principall feruice; the things performed in the same Countrie, by our common English Souldier, leavied in halte, from following the Cart, or fitting on the shop-stall : fo shall we see the difference. Herein will we deale fairely, and beleeue Cefar, in relating the acts of the Romans: but will call the French Historians to witnesse, what actions were performed by the English. In Cafars time, France was inhabited by the Gaules, a flout people, but inferiour to the French, by whom they were subdued ; euen when the Romans gaue them affiftance. The Countrie of Gaule was rent in Junder (as Cefar witneffeth) into many Lordships: some of which were gouerned by pettic Kings, others by the multitude, none ordered in such fort as might make it appliable to the nearest Neighbour. The factions were many, and violent: not only in generall through the whole Countrie, but betweene the pettie States, yea in euery Citie, and almost in euery house. What greater aduantage could a Conquerour desire? Yet there was a greater. Arionistus, with his Germans, had ouer-runne the Countrie, and held much part of it in a subjection, little different from meere 20 flauerie: yea, so often had the Germans prevailed in warre vpon the Gaules, that the Gaules ( who had sometimes beene the better Souldiers ) did hold themselves no way equall to those daily Inuaders. Had France beene so prepared vnto our English Kings, Rome it selfe, by this time, and long ere this time, would have beene ours. But when King Edward the third beganne his warre vpon France, hee found the whole Countrie setled in obedience to one mightic King; a King whose reputation abroade, was no lesse, than his puissance at home; under whose Ensigne, the King of Bohemia, did serve in person; at whose call, the Genowayes, and other Neighbour The Dol- States, were readie to take armes: finally, a King vnto whom one a Prince gaue aphin of Vien- way his Dominion, for loue; b another fold away a goodly Citic and Territoric 30 nois.

The King for monic. The Countrie lying so open to the Roman, and being so well senced aof Majorca. gainst the English; it is note-worthic, not who prevailed most therein (for it were meere vanitie, to match the English purchases, with the Roman conquest ) but whether of the two gaue the greater proofe of militarie vertue. Cefer himselfe doth witnesse, that the Gaules complained of their owne ignorance in the Art of warre, and that their owne hardinesse was ouer-mastered, by the skill of their enemies. Poore men, they admired the Roman Towers, and Engines of batteric, raised and planted against their walls, as more than humane workes. What greater wonder is it, that such a people was beaten by the Roman; than that the Caribes, a naked people, but valiant, as any vnder the skie, are commonly put to the worfe, 40 by small numbers of Spaniards? Besides all this, we are to have regard, of the great difficultie that was found, in drawing all the Gaules, or any great part of them, to one head, that with joynt forces they might oppose their affailants: as also the much more difficultie, of holding them long together. For hereby it came to paffe, that they were neuer able to make vse of oportunitie: but sometimes compelled to flay for their fellowes; and sometimes driven, to give or take battaile, vpon extreme disaduantages, for feare, least their Companies should fall a-sunder; as indeede, vpon any little disaster, they were readie to breake, and returne every one to the defence of his owne. All this, and (which was little leffe than all this) great oddes in weapon, gaue to the Romans, the honour of many gallant victories. What 50 fuch helpe? or what other worldly help, than the golden metall of their Souldiers, had our English Kings against the French? Were not the French as well experienced in seats of Warre? Yea, did they not thinke themselves therein our superiours? Were they not in armes, in horse, and in all pronision, exceedingly beyond vs?

Let vsheare, what a French writer faith, of the inequalitie that was betweene the Idm de Serres. French and English, when their King John was readile to give the on-let, upon the Rlack Prince, at the battaile of Poitiers. IOHN had all advantages over EDWARD, I PAN quoit both of number, force, flew, Countrie, and conceit (the which is commonly a confideration tout Vanantage of no small importance in worldly affaires) and withall, the choice of all his horse-men (estee-par del in Edomed then the best in Europe) with the greatest and wisest Captaines of his whole Realme, bre. I force, le And what could he wish more?

I thinke, it would trouble a Roman antiquarie, to finde the like example in their it provides months Histories; the example, I say, of a King, brought prisoner to Rome, by an Armic noncomof eight thousand, which he had surrounded with fortic thousand, better appoint through the surrounded with fortic thousand, better appoint through the surrounded with fortic thousand, better appoint the surrounded with fortic thousand, better appoint the surrounded with fortic thousand, better appoint the surrounded with fortic thousand, better appoint the surrounded with fortic thousand, better appoint the surrounded with fortic thousand, better appoint the surrounded with fortic thousand, better appoint the surrounded with fortic thousand, better appoint the surrounded with fortic thousand, better appoint the surrounded with fortic thousand, better appoint the surrounded with fortic thousand, better appoint the surrounded with fortic thousand, better appoint the surrounded with fortic thousand, better appoint the surrounded with fortic thousand, but the surrounded with fortic thousand, but the surrounded with ted, and no leffe expert warriours. This I am fure of; that neither Syphan the Nu- officered dismonmidian, followed by a rabble of halfe Scullions, as Linie rightly tearmes them, nor de ante foi those cowardly Kings Perseus and Gentius, are worthic patternes. All that have will fire ense read of Cresie and Agincourt, will beare me witnesse, that I doe not alleage the bat- fines la meltaile of Poitiers, for lack of other, as good examples of the English vertue: the proofe leave detail for whereof hath left many a hundred better marks, in all quarters of France, than euer did the valour of the Romans. If any man impute these victories of ours to the long Bow, as carrying farther, piercing more ftrongly, and quicker of discharge than the French Croffe-bow: my answere is readic; that in all these respects, it is also (being and drawne with a strong arme) superiour to the Musket; yet is the Musket a weapon of more vie. The Gunne, and the Croffe-bow, are of like force, when discharged by a Boy or Woman, as when by a strong Man: weakenesse, or sicknesse, or a fore finger, makes the long Bow vnferuiccable. More particularly, I fay, that it was the custome of our Ancestors, to shoot, for the most part, point blanck : and so shall hee perceine, that will note the circumstances of almost any one battaile. This takes away all objection; for when two Armies are within the distance of a Butts length, one flight of arrowes, or two at the most, can be deliuered, before they close. Neither is it in generall true, that the long Bow reacheth farther, or that it pierceth more frongly than the Croffe-bow: But this is the rare effect of an extraordinarie 20 arme; whereupon can be grounded no common rule. If any man shall aske, How then came it to passe, that the English wanne so many great battailes, having no ad-nantage to helpe him? I may, with best commendation of modestie, referre him to passed a bridge, in face of the enemie, vieth these words; The English comes with a tole; de Serres, conquering brauerie, as he, that was accustomed to gaine enery where, without any stay : hee forceth our garde, placed upon the bridge, to keepe the passage. Or I may cite another place of the same Authour, where hee tells, how the Britons, being inuaded by Charles the eight, King of France, thought it good policie, to apparell a thousand and two hundred of their owne men in English Cassacks; hoping that the very fight of the English red Croffe, would be enough to terrifie the French. But I will not stand to borrow of the French Historians (all which, excepting De Serres, and Paulus Amylius; report wonders of our Nation) the proposition which first I vndertooke to maintaine; That the militarie vertue of the English, prevailing against all manner of difficulties, ought to be preferred before that of Romans, which was affisted with all aduantages that could be defired. If it be demanded; why then did not our Kings finish the conquest, as Casar had done? my answere may bee (I hope without offence) that our Kings were like to the race of the Lacide, of whom the old Poet Ennine gaue this note ; Belli potentes funt mage quans fapienti potentes ; They were more warlike than po-

50 worke like a Conquerour : faue only King Henrie the fift, the course of whose victories, it pleafed God to interrupt by his death. But this question is the more casily answered, if another be first made. Why did not the Romans attempt the conquest of Gaule, before the time of Cafar? why not after the Macedonian warre? why not after the third Punick, or after the Numantian? At all these times they had good lei-Ddddd litique. Who so notes their proceedings, may finde, that none of them went to the French Historian: who relating the victorie of our men at Cresant, where they fure : and then especially had they both leifure, and fit oportunitie, when visiter the conduct of Marin, they had newly vanquished the Cimbri, and Teutones, by whom the Countrie of Gaule had beene pitcoully walted. Surely, the words of Tullie were true; that with other Nations, the Romans fought for Dominion; with the Gaules, for preferuation of their owne fafetie.

Therefore they attempted not the conquest of Gaule, vntill they were Lords of all other Countries, to them knowne. We on the other fide, held only the one halfe of our owne Iland; the other halfe being inhabited by a Nation (vnleffe perhaps in wealth and numbers of men fomewhat inferiour) every way equal to our felues; a Nation, anciently & strongly allied to our enemies the French, and in that regard, 10 enemie to vs. So that our danger lay both before and behinde vs: and the greater danger at our backs; where comonly we felt, alwaies we feared, a stronger inuation by land, than we could make vpon France, transporting our forces over Sea.

It is viuall, with men, that have pleased themselves, in admiring the matters which they finde in ancient Histories; to hold it a great injurie done to their judgment, if any take vpon him, by way of comparison, to extoll the things of later ages. But I am well perswaded, that as the divided vertue of this our Hand, hath given more noble proofe of it felfe; than under so worthie a Leader, that Roman Armie could doe, which afterwards could win Rome, and all her Empire, making Cefor a Monarch; fo hereafter, by Gods bleffing, who hath concerted our greatest hindrance, into our 20 greatest helpe, the enemie that shall dare to trie our forces, will finde cause to wish, that auoiding vs, hee had rather encountred as great a puissance, as was that of the Roman Empire. But it is now high time, that laying a fide comparisons, we returne to the rehearfail of deeds done: wherein we shall finde, how Rome began, after Pyrrhus had left Italie, to firiue with Carthage for Dominion, in the first Punick warre.

Q. II.
The estate of Carthage, before it entred into warre with Rome.

He Citic of Carthage had flood aboue fixe hundred yeares, when first 30 it beganne to contend with Rome, for the mastric of Szeal, It forewent Rome one hundred and fittie yeares in antiquitie of foundation : but in the honor of great atchieuements, it excelled farre beyond this aduantage of time. For Carthage had extended her Dominion in Africa

it felfe, from the west part of Cyrene, to the streights of Hercules, about one thousand and fine hundred miles in length, wherein flood three hundred Cities. It had (ubp élechail Spaine, euen to the Pyrenean Mountaines, together with all the Ilands in the Mediterran Sea, to the west of Sieil; and of Sieil the better part. It flourished about fenen hundred and thirtie yeare, before the destruction therof by Scipio: who belides other spoiles, and all that the Souldiers referred, carried thence source hun- 40 dred & seuentie thousand weight of filter, which make of our monie (if our pounds differ not) fourteene hundred and ten thousand pound sterling. So as this glorious Citie, tanne the same fortune, which many other great ones have done both before and fince. The ruine of the goodliest peeces of the world, fore-shewes the diffolution of the whole.

About one hundred yeares after such time as it was cast downe, the Senate of Rome caused it to be rebuilt: and by Gracebus it was called Iunonia: it was againe and againe abandoned and repeopled, taken and retaken; by Genseries the Vandal, by Belofarius under Instinian, by the Persians, by the Agyptians, and by the Mahometans. It is now nothing. The feat thereof was exceeding firong : and, while the Cartha- 50 gini ins commanded the Sea, inuincible. For the Sea compassed it about, saving that it was tied to the maine by a neck of land; which passage had two mile and more of breath (Appin faith three mile, and one furlong) by which we may be induced, to beleeue the common report, that the Citie it selfe, was about twentie mile in

compasse; if not that of Strabe, affirming the circuit to have beene twice as great. It had three walls, without the wall of the Citie; and betweene each of those, three or foure streets, with vaults under ground, of thirtie foot deepe, in which they had place for three hundred Elephants, and all their food. Ouer these they had stables for foure thousand horse, and Granaries for all their prouender. They had also lodging in these firects, betweene these out-walls for foure thousand horse-men and twentie thousand foot-men, which (according to the discipline vied now by a The Tarket, at this those of China) neuer pettered the Citie. By these two treaties it may appeare, that the Carthaginians had an intent, not only now no service at all, to keep the Romans (as perhaps they did other people) from getting any knowledge and (perchance) as of the flate of Africk; but to countenance & vphold them, in their troubling all Italie, " I linie Dec. 1, 1, 7.

that Iland should be destitute of Italian succours. Hereupon wee finde good cause. of the joy that was in Carthage, and of the Crowne of gold, weighing twentie & fine pound, lent from thence to Rome, when the Sammites were ouerthrowne. But the little flate of Rome, prevailed faster in Italie, than the great power of Carthage did in Sicill. For that mightie Armie, of three hundred thouland men, which chanibal conducted out of Africk into Sicill, wanne only two Cities therein; many green fleets were denoured by tempests; and howsoener the Carthaginians premailed at one time, the Sicilians, either by their owne valour, or by affillance of their good friends out of Greece, did at some other time repaire their owne losses, and take reuenge vpon these Inuadours. But neuer were the people of Carthage in better hope, of getting all Steill, than when the death of Agathocles the Tyrant, had left the whole Hand in combustion; the estate of Greece being such, at the same time, that it seemed impossible, for any succour to be sent from thence. But whilest the Carthaginians were busic, in making their aduantage, of this good oportunitie; Pyrrhus, inuited by the Taventines, and their fellowes, came into Italie, where hee made flarpe warre vpon the Romans. These newes were unpleasing to the Carthaginians, who, being a subtile Nation, casily foresaw, that the same busic disposition, which had brought this Prince, out of Greece into Italie, would as casily transport him over into Sicill, as soone as he could finish his Roman warre. To preuent this danger, they sent Mago Em- 20

baffadour to Rome; who declared in their name, that they were forie to heare, what miladuenture had befallen the Romans, their good friends, in this warre with Pyr-

It was, indeede, the maine defire of the Carthaginians, to hold Pyrrhus fo hardly to his worke in Italie, that they might, at good leifure, pursue their businessein Sieill: which caused them to make such a goodly offer. But the Romans were too high minded: and refused to accept any such aide of their friends, least it should blemish their reputation, and make them seeme vnable to stand by their owne strength. 30 Yet the message was taken louingly, as it ought; and the former league betweene Rome and Carthage renucd, with covenants added, concerning the present businesses, That if either of the two Cities made peace with Pyrrhus, it should be, with reseruation of libertie, to affift the other, in case that Pyrrhus should inuade either of their Dominions. All this notwithstanding, and notwithstanding that the same Mago went and treated with Pyrrhus, vling all meanes to found his intentions (a matter very difficult, where one vpon enery new occasion changeth his owne purpoles) yet Pyrrhus found leisure to make a step into Sicill: where, though in fine he was neither getter nor fauer, yet hee cleane defeated the purposes of Carthage, leaning them at his departure thence, as farre from any end, as when they first 40

So many disafters, in an enterprise, that from the first undertaking, had beene so firongly purfued, through the length of many generations, might well haue induced the Carthaginians to beleeue, that an higher prouidence relisted their intendment. But their desire, of winning that fruitfull Iland, was so inveterate; that with vinwearied patience, they still continued in hope, of so much the greater an haruest, by how much their cost and paines therein buried had beene the more. Wherefore they re-continued their former courses; and by force or practife, recouered in few yeares, all their old possessions: making peace with syrause, the chiefe Citie of the lland, that so they might the better enable themselues to deale with 50

Somewhat before this time, a troupe of Campanian Souldiers, that had scrued under Agathocles, being entertained within Meffana as friends, and finding themfelues too frong for the Citizens, tooke advantage of the power that they had to doe wrong; and with perfidious crueltie, flew those that had trusted them; which done they occupied the Citie, Lands, Goods, and Wines, of those, whom they had murdered. These Mercinaries called themselues Mamertines. Good Souldiers they were ; and like enough it is, that meere desperation, of finding any that would approve their barbarous treacherie, added rage vnto their stournesse. Having therefore none other colour of their proceedings, than the law of the ltronger, they ouerranne the Countrie round about them.

CHAP.I. S.2. of the Historie of the World.

In this course, at first, they sped so well, that they did not only defend Messena against the Cities of Sicill Confederate; to wit, against the Syracusians, and others, but to they rather wan vpon them, yea, and vpon the Carthaginians, exacting tribute from many Neighbour places. But it was not long, ere fortune turning her back to thefe Mamertines, the Syracufians wanne fall vpon them, and finally, confining them within the walls of Mellena, they also with a powerfull Armie belieged the Citie. It happened ill, that about the fame time, a contention beganne, betweene the Syracufan Souldiers, then lying at Megara, and the Citizens of Syracufe, and Gouernours of the Common-wealth; which proceeded fo farre that the Armie elected two Governours, among themselves; to wit, Artemiderus, and Hieren, that was afterward King, Hieron, being for his yeares excellently adorned with many vertues, although it was contrarie to the policie of that State, to approve any election made 20 by the Souldiers, yet for the great elemencie hee vsed at his first entrance, was by generall confent, established and made Gouernour. This Office, he rather vsed as a Scale, thereby to clime to some higher degree, than rested content with his prefent preferment.

In briefe, there was fomewhat wanting, whereby to strengthen himselfe within the Citie; and somewhat without it, that gaue impediment, to his obtayning, and fafe keeping, of the place he fought; to wit, a powerfull partie within the Towne, and certaine mutinous troups of Souldiers without, often and eafily moued to fedition and tumult. For the first, whereby to strengthen himselfe, hee tooke to wife the daughter of Leptines, a man of the greatest estimation and authoritie among the 30 Syracusians. For the second, leading out the Armie to besiege Messana, he quartered all those Companies, which he held suspected, on the one lide of the Citie, and leading the rest of his horse and foot vnto the other side, as if he would have affaulted it in two feuerall parts, he marched away under the couert of the Towne walls, and left the Mutiners to be cut in peeces by the affreged: So returning home, and leauying an Armic of his owne Citizens, well trained and obedient, he hasted againe towards Mellana, and was by the Mamertines (growne proud by their former victorie ouer the Mutiners) incountred in the plaines of Myleum, where hee obtained a most fignall victorie, and leading with him their Commander Captine into Syraeuse, himselfe by common consent was elected and saluted King. Hereupon the 40 Mamertines, finding themselues vtterly inseebled, some of them resolved to give themselves to the Carthaginians, others to crave assistance of the Romans: to each of whom, the feuerall factions, dispatched Embassadours for the same purpose.

The Carthaginians were soone readic, to lay hold upon the good offer: so that a . Captaine of theirs got into the Castle of Messana, whereof they that had sent for him gaue him possession. But within a little while, they that were more inclineable to the Romans, had brought their Companions to fo good agreement, that this Captaine, either by force, or by cunning, was turned out of dores, and the Townereser-
